This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com

D 413,140

Hosted by Google

PROPERTY OF THE University of Michigan
Libraries
1817
ARTES SCIENTIA VERITAS

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 1.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1872, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

THE LAST CALL.—[DRAWN BY MISS JENNIE BROWNSCOMBE.]

Hosted by Google

TWAIN.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

ONCE they were one, as the light is,
Whose colors are seven,
Whose source is the ancient of ancients,
Whose splendor fills heaven.

And as blossoms are bright in the sunshine,
Birds build, and bees murmur,
So all things took root in their gladness,
Grew greater and firmer.

But now— Have you looked on two shadows
Two storm-clouds are urging
Over wastes of disaster and ruin
That tempests are scourging?

Ah! as utterly twain as such shadows
Are they, in whose gladness
All things that were glad now are fallen
The wreck of their madness!

Sad souls, that were able to torture
Such pangs from such blisses,
Shall the years after death ever bring you
No nearer than this is?

Shall the red rose of love fail to bourgeon
In fields always sunny,
And the flower whose thorns had your hearts' blood,
Refuse you its honey?

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1873.

☞ WITH the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 28, 1872, was issued gratuitously an EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing the opening chapters of CHARLES READE'S new story, illustrated in the most effective and attractive manner.

"THE WANDERING HEIR,"

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of a rich variety of Bridal, Walking, Visiting, and Evening Dresses for Dolls of various sizes; Infants' Hoods and Caps; a choice assortment of Ladies' and Children's Winter Walking and House Dresses; Opera Hoods; Cravat Bows, Collars; Kitchen Aprons; Lamp Shades; Photograph Holders; Pen-Wipers; Napkin-Rings; Tablets; and numerous other Fancy Articles; together with varied literary and artistic attractions.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

WE suppose that to each of the generations living on the earth the coming of the new year brings an entirely individual set of emotions.

To all of us, at least, it is another notch on the tally. But for how many different things to how many different natures does that notch stand! To this one it is merely another entry in the profit and loss of his account with fate, to the next it is one more round climbed in the ladder to God, to still another it is but a reprieve from the executioner.

But whether we keep the New-Year's Day as a fast or a festival, it is at any rate an epoch. The very old must regard its dawning either as the glad signal that they are a degree nearer to the loved and lost of the past, or as the dreadful summons to the surrender of breath and sense and all the delightsome loveliness of earth; while the middle-aged look with as much wonder at the insouciance with which youth regards it as they would have in looking at some procession of bacchantes dancing over a chasm that is hidden with flowers.

It is, indeed—but for the isolated examples of the unhappy old who long to go, or the religious enthusiasts whose mind is in a state of too great exaltation for them to be normal examples of any thing—only the young who, so far as this world matters, can be very cheerful over these tide-marks, the recurring Thanksgivings, Christmases, New-Years, birthdays, and holidays in general. To them each one is either a step toward freedom, toward the goal of ambition, toward pleasure of some sort, or else it is something to be enjoyed by them without thinking, till all at once they are startled by the gray shadow beside them, and turn to find old age looking over their shoulders. Then, indeed, the merry-making still goes on—somewhat by habit, it may be, somewhat by choice; but the skeleton is henceforth there, only they crown it with roses and cover it with such glamour as they may, that its horrors shall be unguessed.

To those of us who are approaching or who have already reached middle age each New-Year's Day is now apt to be as much a season of sadness as of joy; for every return of the day sees another line upon the face, another shade of gray upon the hair; every return of the day the chairs are drawing a little closer round the board; every return of the day there is some health to be drunk "standing and in silence," since, after one has passed the age of forty, friends seem to drop away from any circle like the ripe apples from a bough.

But it would be a miserable thing if, perpetually conscious of this, one refused to join in the merriment of the day, and carried a sad face about like the memento mori that the Egyptians displayed at their banquets. And it is, therefore, fortunate that custom has made a gala day of the thing; that families and friends and lovers interchange their gifts thereon; that coldnesses and misunderstandings are to cease with the mutual and amicable call of the heads and representatives of houses; that all belledom is to put on her best bloom and her fairest frippery in welcome of the caller.

Perhaps there are no prettier pictures in our social life than those which New-Year's Day presents on every opening of the door: the decorated rooms, where the Christmas green still hangs; the stately dowager; the blushing girls, all of whom modern dress and style make lovely; the table in the back drawing-room, with its snowy damask, its silver and gold and crystal, and its load of flowers and grapes and dainties; while the cordial greeting completes the pleasure at the picture—greeting whose warmth is produced partly by the excitement of the scene, partly by the sense of what is due to the altars of hospitality, and partly by genuine kindness, and which fills the heart of every guest with a delicious sense of his wealth in the way of friends.

It may be that there is still room for some improvement in our way of keeping this holiday, and we find certain innovations made on each return of it. In many Southern households, for instance, it used to be the custom to send to every room in the morning, waking the sleeper with a glass of rich apple-toddy or of eggnog; this "eye-opener" is gradually being changed for a cup of coffee, smoking hot; and in many other of our households it has been thought unwise to provide wines on an occasion necessitating so many sips at so many houses. But all that is a matter of personal taste, and will be allowed to regulate itself according to individual preferences; we only hope that none of the innovations will ever wipe away the kindly habit of renewing acquaintanceship and assuring friendship which is practiced at present. And we believe so fully in the necessary progress of the race toward a fuller share of perfection than it now enjoys that we do not doubt that the New-Years of the next generation will be kept even more delightfully than those of this. Certainly the New-Year's drawing-room of 1873 to the man of 1573 would seem, with its luxurious appliances, like an entrance into the enchanted castles about which he and his compeers romanced so much. Perhaps in the next three centuries we shall not make quite such rapid progress into the realm of wonders as has been made in the past three; perhaps that magic fluid, vril, will not reduce the January temperature to summer heat for us then; perhaps we shall not make our trips from square to square in aerial cars; but we fancy that marvels quite as marvelous will be the common things of that time, and we are contented now to be a part of the world that is rolling on toward the great New-Year's Day of the future!

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Rosamond's Bower.

MY DEAR ALFRED,—A man in traveling thinks of a thousand things, and most of us, I observe, usually think a great deal of ourselves—careful to secure the seat next the window, for instance, and to be as comfortable as we can. It is our self-knowledge, probably, which makes us a little suspicious of our neighbor's aggressive intentions. We know that we are bent upon accommodating ourselves first, and our fellow-passengers incidentally. But we are ourselves only fellow-passengers to our neighbor, and we reason accordingly. As I was lately sitting reflecting upon this fact, one of my neighbors turned to me and said, "What would be the result if we should believe the best of others, and assume that they believe the same of us?" He asked the question audibly, and I saw one old gentleman sitting near him look at him over the top of his paper with a blank stare, while one of my young Wall Street friends smiled with a superiority that must have been depressing to my neighbor had he remarked it.

Curiously enough, as the question was asked I had been thinking of the bower of fair Rosamond, and of the labyrinth through which the king found his way by a clew. Have you any very lucid conception of that bower and labyrinth and clew? The tale used to seem to me to be a fairy story set in the midst of history, and I longed to be a knight, to snatch the beautiful Rosamond from the dreadful queen with her bowl of poison and her dagger. And as I went on musing upon that old story and upon the question of my neighbor, it seemed to me as if we were all set to find a clew to the bower of some beautiful Rosamond, and that the labyrinth is as plain as a turnpike when the clew is found. There are a great many master-clews, as they are called; but somehow they do not suffice. They turn out like the famous panaceas, the nostrums which will equally cure the toothache and the heart-break, proud flesh and baffled ambition.

The old gentleman who stared blankly over the top of his newspaper I know very well. Indeed, Senex is no stranger to any of us. He has long ago decided that the true view of life is that of a conspiracy. Every man for himself, and the Old Nick for the hindmost, is the master-clew by which Senex expects to reach the bower of the beautiful Rosamond. To him, therefore, every man is a customer: he wishes either to buy or to sell. If he would buy, he is for the lowest price, and therefore, says Senex, he is a bear, and will depreciate the article to depress the market. If he would sell, he is for the largest price. He is a bull, and would toss every thing up to the highest figure. Truth? No, that is not the object. This man will make the best bargain he can. He will get the advantage of me if possible, says Senex, and you would not have me the under dog? Diamond cut diamond. 'Tis the tug of war, and I am not going to the wall if I can help it.

Senex is seventy. His credit is good. He is considered a prosperous, "mighty smart" man. Yes, that is his house; the largest one with marble front. His carriages are known of all men. Perhaps he is not the man in whose society his neighbors find the greatest pleasure; and when younger men look at their boys they do not instinctively wish that they should develop into what Senex is. Yet there is nothing wrong suspected in his career, and certainly nothing wrong has been meant. Senex has not evaded the duties at the custom-house, nor concealed his income when that tax was levied. He has not been mean nor ostentatious in his subscriptions and his charities. He has only been upon his guard that nobody should cheat him, and he has believed that every body whom he met was as solely bent upon his profit as he was upon his own. He has merely said that it was as much as he could do to look out for himself, and begged it might be generally understood that he was not his brother's keeper. With that clew in his hand he has sought Rosamond's bower. Do you think that he has found it?

Or my young friend from Wall Street, who smiled at our fellow-passenger when he asked me that singular question, what is his clew? It is his theory that nothing is very much worth caring about. He is of Horace Walpole's mind, that life is a comedy to those who think, and a tragedy to those who feel; and he would much rather laugh than cry. His catholic contempt embraces every thing and every body. He sees Shylock extorting his just pound of flesh, and Vincent de Paul feeding the starving, and both are equally ludicrous. "Men are but pismires," says my airy friend; "why should a man endanger his digestion or lose his sleep because of their antics, whether they call this thing dishonesty and that virtue, or not? It's all one at last. This world and the next, as Zany says, and all's over!" And the airy youth laughs as if wisdom would die with him.

His feeling is that nothing is quite worth the trouble of doing, and so he lives in Sybaris. Reformers, philanthropists, martyrs, seem to him humorists. "Yes, 'twas their way," he says; "they were eccentric. But Simeon Stylites would have been much happier if he had come down from his ridiculous column, and had eaten a series of hearty dinners, and the early Christians were fools for their pains. Was the truth any truer because they were broiled upon gridirons? and why did they put their lives in the power of those whom they knew meant them harm? What is mother-wit given us for but to cozen knaves, as we call them? A wise man bids the world slide; and for my part I do not find reformers so much better than those whom they would reform, nor the pulpit so much purer than the pews. If you like sitting in barns, and to hear prayers drawled through the noses of ignorant people of unbalanced minds, you would probably have been an early Methodist. But do you really think that John Wesley was a better man than George Herbert, or George Whitefield a more fervent Christian than Fénélon? There's no choice in things, believe me; and if you avoid what is disagreeable, you are the wisest of men."

This is the clew with which my airy friend feels his way toward Rosamond's bower. It is a good-natured indifference, which paralyzes moral action, and makes him the most exquisitely selfish of men. Is his clew strong? Will it hold? If you were giving a delicious dinner to the gayest of youths and maids, you would send for this Sybarite. If you were heart-broken or in real sorrow, you would as soon seek comfort from a butterfly. Senex is constantly fighting, so to say, and the Sybarite is constantly contemptuous and cynical, although he smiles without pause. Do you believe, my dear Alfred, that either of them holds the master-clew, or that the mystery of the labyrinth will be unraveled by them? Yet each is entirely confident, and each secretly wonders at the other and despises him.

But what is the beautiful Rosamond whom we are all seeking? Is it the same, or has each his own, and are not Senex and the Sybarite equally sure of success? If I should give you my clew, and you should presently come face to face with Rosamond, might you not say that it was not at all the lady whom you were seeking, while I in turn might enter what I believe to be Rosamond's bower, and find it Circe's palace instead? I think not, my good Alfred. Rosamond is Protean, and takes the shape of individual desire, but is still the same Rosamond. Senex distrusts every body. Why? Simply that he may prosper in this world. Why again? Because he believes that kind of prosperity to be happiness. It is happiness, satisfaction, contentment, that he desires. Or why, again, does the early Christian gladly go to the beasts? Because he believes it to be his duty to confess his God, and to do his duty is the highest happiness. So the pleasant old divine—Dr. Hopkins, was it not?—exhorted his devout hearers to be willing to be damned for the glory of God. It was not the misery of damnation, but the happiness of aiding in God's glory, which was the doctor's fair Rosamond.

The mistake of Senex and of Sybaris is not in the end, but in the means. I think that their clew will break, as I think that of the pleasant old divine did. Why should a man wish to glorify a God who could require his damnation? That was the practical answer. The doctor was fine and metaphysical, logical. For if God be perfectly good and perfectly wise, and if he should desire individual damnation, that desire must be good and wise, and its gratification the furtherance of goodness and wisdom. Whew! My dear boy, that old doctor seems to me like a speculative spider spinning a cloudy theological cobweb. The tiniest humming-bird can dart through it. And even so one whiff of the sweet, cool breath of common-sense blows the web away.

I think I know who has the clew of woven silk and gold that will not break, and which will bring her through the labyrinth to the bower we seek. It is in the hand of my dear friend Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle. Senex distrusts every body, Sybaris good-humoredly despises every body, and Mrs. Margery trusts every body. I do not say that when she catches Dick Turpin picking her pocket she believes Dick Turpin to be an honest man. No; but when she hears that Una has been found in a very equivocal position, and that things look very questionable, and there are a hundred shrugs and hints and whispers and looks, Mrs. Margery says, simply, "It isn't true, and Una is as spotless as my own daughter." It is because she trusts character more than all and before all, and because she has learned how easy it is to seem guilty, because circumstances are so cruel. In George Eliot's Middlemarch do you remember that Dorothea finds Ladislaw holding the hand of Mrs. Lydgate? Even Dorothea's faith could not strive with what she saw, and she believed him false. But Mrs. Margery would have said that her faith was stronger than her sight, and that she would not believe until she knew that every thing was what it seemed. That is her clew. She trusts character, and distrusts appearance, and knows that human motives are not simple, but very complex. That is the clew by which Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle feels her way to the bower of the fair Rosamond, and I think she will find it sooner than Senex or Sybaris.

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FOX FURS.

FOX furs are the special fancy of the season for muffs, boas, and trimmings. The most fashionable and rarest of these is the black-fox fur. This is a long, soft, rich black fur which forms the skin of a little animal found in Siberia. A set of muff and boa is almost as much prized as sables, and costs about $500. The muff of these sets is usually darker than the boa, as the former is made of the soft velvet-like fur on the head of the animal, while the boa is taken from the lighter parts that are tipped with gray or white, like silver-fox fur; moreover, the light fleece, when made in a round boa, falls open, and discloses the brown ground of the black fur. Furriers have tried to prevent this by cutting the fur crosswise, but in vain.

Black-fox fur, as a trimming for velvet cloaks, is often called for by ladies, who mistake it for the fine fisher fur, which is a far thicker, heavier fleece, and trims more effectively.

The silver-fox fur is next in popularity for sets.

Hosted by Google

It is of a blue-gravish hue, with white tips, and is very long and light. The sets of muff and boa cost from $150 to $300.

Blue-fox fur of light silvery gray hue is very fashionable in Paris. The lightest shades of this fur are preferred, while all other furs are prized for their darkness. A muff of this pretty gray fleece costs $25; a boa is the same price; and the trimming is $6 a yard.

FISHER FUR.

Fisher fur is a long brown fleece that resembles Hudson Bay sable. What furriers call fisher-skin muffs cost from $35 to $50. The fisher-tail furs are far finer, and are very soft, lustrous, and black. A set of muff and boa costs $150 and upward. A trimming of these fisher-tails, we have already said, is often called erroneously black-fox fur. It is very expensive, costing from $30 to $40 a yard.

EVENING DRESSES.

Elaborate dresses for dinner-parties, the opera, and receptions are found in abundance at the modistes' at this season. White faille dresses are especially in favor. We have already mentioned the beautiful colored embroidery which forms the garniture for these. Many are also entirely white, and are trimmed with China crape flounces, over-skirt, and watered ribbon sashes as pure as snow. Another tasteful combination that is always in favor is a trimming of black lace and pink roses on white silk. A notable dress of this kind, just completed, is creamy white faille, made with a half train. There are five narrow ruffles on the three front breadths, and two wide flounces with black velvet binding on the back. A round wrinkled apron is finished by a very deep flounce of black lace, headed by a garland of roses, and the same flounce of lace is arranged in three rows to form a long over-skirt behind, where it is ornamented with branches of roses. The low pointed corsage has a bertha of white tulle folds, with a frill of black lace, and corsage bouquets of roses.

A holiday dress for a young girl just in her teens has the short skirt of rose-colored silk covered with ruffles to the knee alternately of embroidered Swiss muslin and silk. The apron has a Swiss ruffle, while the back is formed of two straight breadths of silk draped in puffs and sashes. The high waist has a belt in front and basque behind. A pale blue silk is similarly made. Another rose-colored silk has an over-skirt of white damask gauze. A dress of the rosy gray hue called aurora has five bias bands of the silk, with pink pipings extending down the front from the waist; a bias flounce widely faced with pink trims the skirt. The back is caught up in puffs by a pink sash, and the jockey basque has a pink vest.

Among the small items that go to make up "style" in dress trimmings are broad pipings or flat bindings nearly an inch wide on the edge of flounces. If two shades of one color appear in a dress, the wide flat binding is of the lighter shade; if two different colors are used, the upper part of the flounce is faced with the bright hue chosen for binding. If a hem is turned up on the outside edge of the flounce, it should be an inch wide; a piping fold at the top of the hem adds much to the beauty of the flounce; and all sewing-machine stitching is considered as detracting from it. Another fancy is to hold the fullness of flounces in double side pleats—that is, two pleats turned one way are placed near together, and a plain interval is left before the next cluster is placed. A pretty upright heading for flounces is also formed by a bias band of silk, bound on each side, and two inches wide when completed. This is then laid in clusters of three side pleats, and the middle pleat is caught down from the top to the plain space between. Pleated Swiss muslin, edged with machine-made Valenciennes lace, is placed low on the facing of light silk dresses.

Some rich black silk dresses, blended with colors, are among the latest importations. One of these has the three front breadths of pale blue silk in lengthwise puffs, separated by bands of embroidered oak leaves. The long black train is draped by a faille sash of pale blue, lined with silk the color of the oak leaves. The black basque has a blue vest with leaf embroidery, and blue facing on the jockey basque. Another French dress has a black faille trained over-skirt, with a short petticoat of the new serpent green. The over-skirt is exquisitely embroidered with jet, and is draped by a serpent-colored sash.

CHRISTMAS TOYS.

DOLLY.

Christmas is here again, and Santa Claus's pack is laden with treasures for the little folks. For the girls there are dolls that are exact copies of themselves. The wax of which they are made has the fresh pink tint of natural flesh; their plump cheeks are dimpled, their rosy lips curved as if about to smile, their dewy blue eyes are shaded by long lashes and brows, and their real hair is thickly set in the most natural manner; while over the face is an arch piquant expression, very different from the silly doll-faces that have become proverbial. There are dolls that can creep, sit down, stand alone, walk, open and close their eyes, cry, and say mamma and papa; but the novelty of the season is the waltzing dolls—a gayly dressed couple who waltz around the room, now slowly, then rapidly, until they seem to be giddy, when they reverse and spin away again with renewed speed. They can be wound up to waltz fifteen minutes, and they cost from $75 to $125 a pair. Other expensive wax dolls cost from $25 to $50, and with these is a small trunk containing a trousseau of many changes of clothing—combs, jewelry, toilette articles, fans, bonnets, shoes, gloves; and, indeed, every article of clothing worn by ladies is now copied in miniature for Dolly. Thus attired, the dolls represent babies, girls, and women. There are boy-dolls in sailor suits and à la militaire, infants in lace caps and long clothes, school-girls, young ladies in jauntiest costumes, and finally the bridal doll in wedding attire surrounded by her maids.

The new dolls of waxed rubber are chosen by careful mothers, as they are very soft to the touch, endure much hard usage, and when broken or torn have no sharp, jagged edges to hurt the child; moreover, they are as handsome as real wax dolls, and much less expensive: they cost, undressed, from $2 to $10. Dolly's dressing-cases, containing a wardrobe in perfect order, and on one shelf Dolly herself, cost from $8 to $75.

The doll-houses are also complete in a way that delights girls' hearts. A beautiful one has a drawing-room, with the pretty furniture upholstered with orange satin; vases ornament the mantel, pictures are hung, and a book-case is in one corner. For demoiselles with domestic tastes is a cabinet kitchen three feet long, fitted up with a range, cooking utensils, water-tank, and a china closet with well-filled shelves. This costs $39; smaller ones may be had for $10. Among single articles are tiny pianos of two or three octaves, worth from $4 to $9. Tin bedsteads, painted like rose-wood, have soft feather-beds, with covers and curtains of blue silk and white muslin, and cost from $2 to $6. Buffets, desks, toilette-stands, and book-cases are all admirably copied, and even a bathing-tub is provided for the mistress of the tiny mansion.

MECHANICAL TOYS.

The ingenious mechanical toys for children of a larger growth are really works of art. One of the prettiest is a music-box with a globe of gold-fish above, in which is a shell that opens and discloses a fairy reclining in a grotto. A second musical toy represents a harp, on which a most comical negro affects to play: the price is $60. In a third a monkey drinks wine, and wipes his mustache with his napkin; while a fourth is a clock with a monkey beside it playing cobbler. An opera-house has a stage, with tiny dancers that perform a ballet while the orchestra plays; and a menagerie has music, and trained animals that appear to do the bidding of their mimic keeper. A doll thrums a piano; the notes of Il Bacio are before her, and the machinery inside the piano plays the air.

GROTESQUE TOYS.

The comical toys for fun-loving little folks are theatrical moving figures representing Dundreary, Humpty-Dumpty, Grandfather Smallweed, pompous soldiers, policemen, dandies with huge heads and ridiculously attenuated limbs like stilts. Supple-jacks are of unheard-of proportions, and a surprise-box has a jumping-jack with a voice that squeaks when the lid of the box springs open.

ANIMALS.

One of the greatest improvements in Kriss Kringle's kingdom is the creation of animals with natural skins. Horses have real skins of horses; greyhounds are naturally sleek and glossy; the poodles and "Skyes" are as shaggy as possible; and goats are homely enough for real goats, instead of being "too nice for a goat," as the little purchasers used to declare they were. All the domestic animals are represented, as well as ferocious-looking lions, tigers, spotted leopards, and growling bears. These are of various sizes, and cost, separately, from $2 to $30. Hobby-horses on rockers, or else to drag, have natural skins, and cost from $6 to $15. A Noah's ark on wheels is a "three-decker," with natural-skinned animals peering through the windows. The different sizes cost from $5 to $12. Menageries with wild and tame animals are shown, and the circus horses with spotted skins are not forgotten.

FOR THE BOYS.

The "dollar steam-engine," so popular with boys last year, is now brought into practical use in very interesting ways. One is attached to a miniature ferry-boat, and propels it about in bath-tub or pond; another on a fire-engine throws a stream of water through a rubber hose, and has a shrill whistle. The latter costs from $3 50 to $6.

For boys there are also warehouses three or four stories high, having shelves packed with goods, a hatchway, etc.; forts with artillery, sentinels that go back and forth, and files of soldiers marching about on dress parade; livery-stables with natural-looking horses in the stalls, attended by hostlers; butcher shops with meats hanging on the wall, and smart butchers in their white aprons; street cars marked from "City Hall to Central Park," with new suggestions of seats on top; tiny boats on waves (of green muslin) that float about as the boat is drawn along cost from $3 to $5; soldiers' suits, with cap, knapsack, and gun, costing from $2 to $15; boxes of jugglers' tricks, with directions for performing them, are from $2 to $50; small billiard-tables are shown for boys, and games of every description; finally, there is a Punch and Judy show, with most comical figures; this, with the theatrical fixtures, costs $18.

CHRISTMAS-TREE ORNAMENTS.

A chandelier of gayly colored glass balls is made to hang above the Christmas-tree. Berries, grapes, peaches, plums, and other fruits in their natural size and color are made of transparent glass, that lights up beautifully on the boughs. Bright tin reflectors showing all the colors of the prism add to its beauty, and there are pretty little gilded ornaments for bedecking each limb, such as tiny bird-cages, Chinese lanterns, American eagles, stars, and cherubs with outspread wings. Santa Claus, with his empty pack covered with snow, stands beside the tree.

For information received thanks are due, for furs, to Messrs. C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS; for dresses and dress materials, to Mrs. CONNELLY; Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and for toys, to Messrs. STRASBURGER, PFEIFFER, & Co.; and EHRICHS.

PERSONAL.

A SHORT time since Mrs. M. V. DAHLGREN, of Washington, in view of the demands made for equal pay by the clerks of the Treasury Department, called upon President GRANT, and desired him to suggest some means for establishing its legality. The President met the question warmly, responding that through the system of "competitive examination" several ladies had already obtained clerkships equal to those of men, and that he was entirely in favor of the door being wide open, so as to allow of free competition, and also that he was prepared to further any plan looking toward such a worthy object—that is, equal pay to both sexes for equal work.

—ROBERT GRANT, a son of the President, now in the Senior class at Harvard, has just been elected class poet.

—As to JEFFERSON DAVIS, a Cincinnatian has presented to the Historical Society his veto of the joint resolution adopted by the Confederate Congress exempting newspaper men from active military duty. The Cincinnati Enquirer thinks "it was this ill-timed and ill-advised act upon the part of President DAVIS which caused the ultimate downfall of the Confederacy." Guess not.

—The CHASE family—one branch of it, at least—seems to be in luck. The great English Chancery suit of TOMLEY v. CHASE heirs, involving $200,000,000, which has been thirty years in the courts, has been decided in favor of the CHASES, about one hundred in number. Mr. B. F. CHASE, of Louisiana, received intelligence of this while watching the turning of the wheel in the late Louisville lottery.

—Mr. GREELEY'S last editorial was headed "Abiding the Issue." In it he said: "The South, we are told, has decided for GRANT by a small majority; wherefore, those of the South who were not for GRANT should conform to the judgment, and set to work to build up their section's industrial and commercial prosperity. We heartily second the motion. Let the South, like the North, accept the situation."

—Sir SIDNEY WATERLOW, the new Lord Mayor of London, began life as a printer's apprentice; went to Paris to seek work as a compositor, and was for some time employed at GALIGNANI'S. Then he returned to London, and joined his father and brother in a little shop, which gradually grew into a large and wealthy establishment.

—Captain WATSON, a Boston skipper, just returned from a long voyage, was told by a commission merchant the sad news that his wife had died. "Wife dead?" said the captain; "well, now, do you know, I didn't think she was long-lived. How's freights?"

—Mr. Justice HANNEN, of England, has just laid down with the greatest distinctness a decision that should arrest the attention of judges in this city, viz., the right of the foot passenger to cross the streets without injury to life or limb. He says people are entitled to cross the road, and drivers are bound to take reasonable care that they do not drive over any one.

—Mlle. TOSTEE, who first introduced opera bouffe into this city, is now in Brussels, playing high comedy. It is said she intends to float over hither again to resume her celebrated character of the Grand Duchesse.

—A few Sundays ago, in Edinburgh, a well-known clergyman, after reading from the pulpit several announcements referring to Christian work in connection with his own church, said he had received a great many other notices with requests that he would intimate them to his congregation, but as he was not a Sunday edition of the North British Advertiser, he declined to do so.

—Lady GEORGIANA CHATTERTON has addressed to the London Spectator a letter which seems to fix very clearly upon Lord BROUGHAM the authorship of the novel of Albert Lunel, lately published by HARPER & BROTHERS. She states that she was with ROGERS, the poet, at one of his well-known little breakfast-parties, when Albert Lunel was brought to him from Lord BROUGHAM. ROGERS gave the book to Lady CHATTERTON, charging her to read it quickly, and not to say who had written it. "I did so," she continues, "and finished it by the time I went to a dinner-party on the following day. In the evening I met Mr. ROGERS, and he told me that he had sent to my house for the book, as Lord BROUGHAM had ordered it to be suppressed, the reason (as he had heard) being that many of the characters were from real life. I have never met with any one who read it before its suppression, except the late Dean MILMAN, nor since its suppression, till within the last few months."

—Mr. ARTHUR HALIBURTON, son of "Sam Slick," who has for some time been a clerk in the British War-office, has just been offered the post of Assistant Accountant-General in India—a post worth $10,000 a year.

—The graves of MOZART, BEETHOVEN, and SCHUBERT were decorated on All-saints' Day at Vienna with wreaths of oak leaves and various decorations designed by the musical societies in that city.

—The venerable HORACE BINNEY, of Philadelphia, one of the graduating class at Harvard in 1797, has sent $1000 toward alleviating the losses of the college by the Boston fire. It has been suggested that the alumni get up a literary diamond wedding for him. Few men live to see the seventy-fifth anniversary of their college sheep-skins.

—They grow famous people in Essex County, Massachusetts. Of those who were born there (and emigrated), may be mentioned JOHN G. WHITTIER, WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, T. W. HIGGINSON, CALEB CUSHING, NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, ALBERT PIKE, LUCY LARCOM, MARY ABIGAIL DODGE (Gail Hamilton), ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, HANNAH F. GOULD, Mrs. PORTER, LUCY HOOPER, GEORGE LUNT, W. H. PRESCOTT, Professor FELTON, E. P. WHIPPLE, WILLIAM WINTER, EPES SARGENT, R. T. PAINE, THEOPHILUS PARSONS, RUFUS CHOATE, ROBERT RANTOUL, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, and MARY N. PRESCOTT.

—Mrs. Secretary FISH, according to a bright newspaper man, is "generally called the most sufficient of the ladies at Washington. She has a calm and interesting face, gracious manners, and looks the hostess. Mr. FISH, although he has the reputation of being a quarreler, is a bland, agreeable host; and the domestic side of the State Department is perhaps as bright and pleasant as we could well make it."

—Emulating the good deeds of their father, MATTHEW and JOHN GUY VASSAR, sons of the founder of Vassar College, have decided to establish at Poughkeepsie a hospital that will cost $100,000.

—THÉOPHILE GAUTIER has seven sons, all of whom are engaged in journalism in Paris.

—Mr. JOHN L. BOWES, of London, has forwarded $25,000 for the relief of Boston. "More power to his L Bowe."

—Hon. DAVID MELLISH, Congressman elect from the Ninth District of this State, was formerly from Worcester, where he learned the trade of a printer twenty-five years ago, in the office of the Worcester Spy.

—HENRY WARD BEECHER, in one of his recent lecture-room talks, said: "I used to love my father and mother, but I wasn't always bubbling over with affection. When I was away from home I used to love 'em most [with a deep sigh]. My father was one calculated to draw out affection. My second mother was not, though she was a good, kind, Christian woman. Sometimes when I was 'going along' I had no particular desire even to see my father. [Laughter.] But when things were settled, and my mischief was forgotten, I loved him very much [very softly, and dying away with a sigh]. I never said to him, that I remember, 'I love you;' yet I did for all that. And I know he loved me; for he told me so every time he whipped me. [Laughter.] Yet I was never very conscious of any love for him. But I loved to do any thing for him."

—Mlle. LIEBHART, a vocal notability recently imported by Mr. GRAU, brought with her a few necessary light little articles of apparel, which required twenty-eight large trunks to hold. They were taken to a room in Steinway Hall, and while GRAU was looking after their removal LIEBHART herself appeared, and must have thought he was examining the contents, for she struck a wild attitude, and exclaimed, "Gracious! was is dass? You breck inside my Kleidergestell!" "Oh," said GRAU, "I was looking to see which you had brought your voice in."

—THOMAS LECLEAR'S portrait of the late Rev. Dr. VINTON is an admirable specimen of art. It is difficult to see how it could have been made more life-like. The doctor's friends regard it as quite extraordinary. LECLEAR was the favorite pupil of ELLIOTT, and the writer of this "personal" has frequently heard that master of his profession express the belief that LECLEAR would become, what he has become, one of the first of American portrait painters.

—The Empress of Russia is in such feeble health as to lead to the belief that hereafter she will be compelled to live permanently in the milder climate of the Crimea.

—From a recent number of the London Court Journal we learn that on the death of Rev. ALGERNON PEYTON, the living of Doddington, at that time the richest in England, yielding an annual income of $50,000, was, under the Doddington Division acts, split into seven distinct rectories and parishes—Doddington, Benwick, Wimblington, St. Wendreda (March), St. Mary's (March), St. John's (March), and St. Peter's (March). The foundation-stones of two of the churches provided for by this division were laid recently—that of St. Mary's (March) being laid by Sir THOMAS PEYTON, son of the late rector, in the presence of the Bishop of Ely and Mrs. BROWNE, Lady RUSSELL, and a large number of the inhabitants. The foundation-stone of the Wimblington church was afterward laid by Lady RUSSELL. The Bishop of Ely made a short address, in which he urged upon his hearers not to undervalue the churches about to be erected because they were provided free of cost, but expressed a hope that the division of the living would be for the religious advancement of the neighborhood. The Bishop of Ely, Mrs. BROWNE, Sir THOMAS PEYTON, and Lady RUSSELL afterward took luncheon with Mr. RICHARDS, of Wimblington.

—The ups and downs of fortune are pleasantly illustrated in the career of Mrs. SANDS, a bright little widow who lives near Oil City, Pennsylvania. She has made a comfortable fortune in a speculation in oil lands. Representing herself as a poor woman, as she was, with a family to support, she induced a New York company owning lands near her residence to sell her 200 acres for $1800, paying a small sum down. She immediately resold a part for $10,000, put down with the proceeds what has proved one of the most successful oil wells in the territory, and now asks for the property a round half million of dollars.

—Mr. SEWARD'S house at Auburn is filled with testimonials of regard from all quarters of the world, sent to him after his retirement from public life. There are specimens of ore from Western mines; specimens from the Art Academy of Mexico; canes and snuff-boxes from all over creation. But the most curious present is a gorgeous silk banner from China, such as men of rank have borne before them in processions, with the portrait of Mr. SEWARD in the centre, his son's embroidered at the top, and around the border a grotesque crowd of hypothetical ancestors.

—The new Grand Vizier of Turkey grew up from humble beginnings. He was formerly employed in a tobacco factory, and afterward was waiter in a hotel. He still retains his simple habits, and is noted for the economy of his expenditures—a rare thing among the public men of Turkey.

—Among the men who are prominent on the London press may be named Mr. HILL, editor of the Daily News, and Mr. GREENWOOD, editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. The editor of the Standard is the son of Mr. JOHNSON, the proprietor of that lively journal—verbum sat sapienti; the editor of the Daily Telegraph is a lay figure, inspired by the high mind of Mr. EDWARD LEVY; Mr. EDWARD BORTHWICK, the editor of the Morning Post, writes none of the generally admirable but invariably day-after-the-fair leaders which appear in that paper; the editor of the Morning Advertiser, Mr. A. B. RICHARDS, was formerly a leader-writer on the Standard, and does write a leader a day, generally the first; the editor of the Globe wrote last season the "Sketches in the House of Commons;" and the editor of the Echo, Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD, usually writes the first and longest of the "Notes of the Day" in his paper, which are models of modesty, pure English, clear style, and profound thought.

363513 Hosted by Google

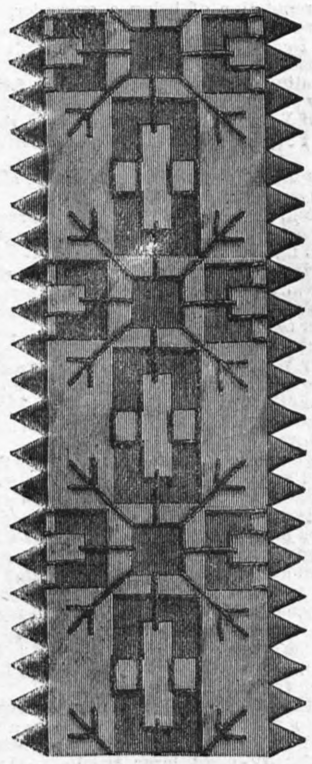

Fig. 3.—BORDER FOR WALL-BASKET.—FULL SIZE.

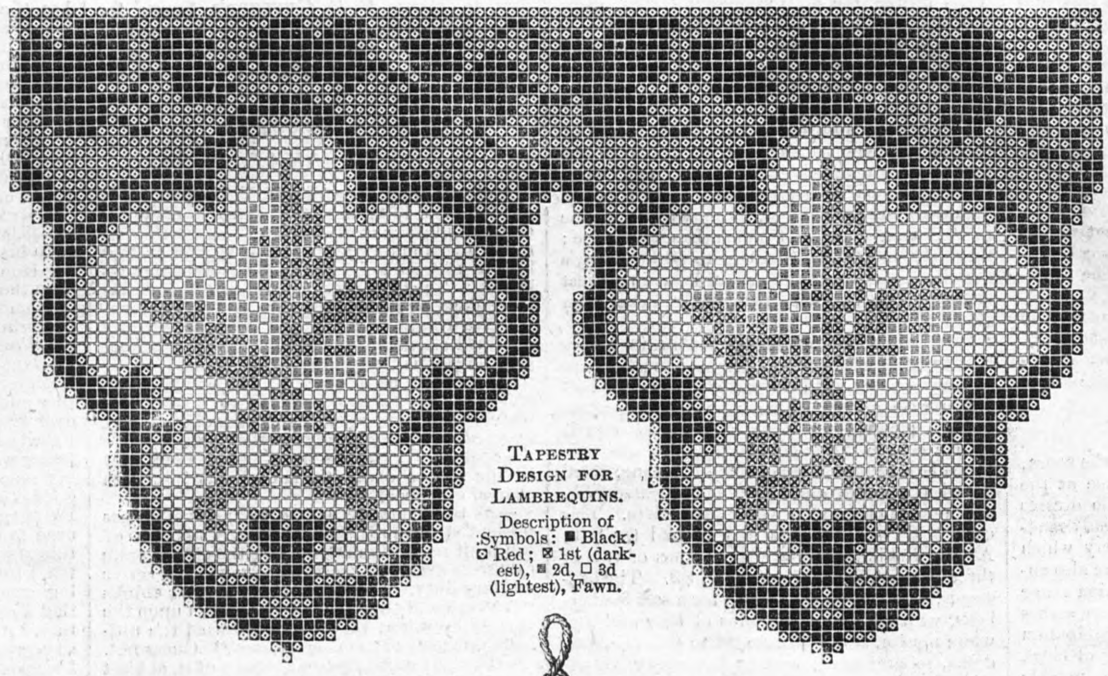

TAPESTRY DESIGN FOR LAMBREQUINS.

Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ⊡ Red; ⊠ 1st (darkest), ▣ 2d, □ 3d (lightest), Fawn.

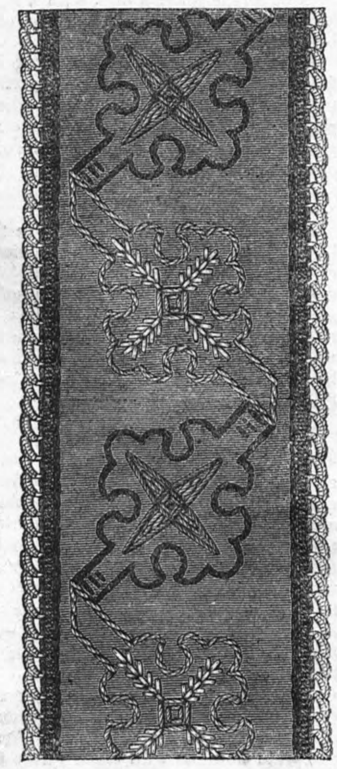

Fig. 2.—BORDER FOR WALL-BASKET.—FULL SIZE.

Tapestry Design for Lambrequins.

THESE lambrequins may be used for trimming large and small baskets, étagères, corner brackets, etc. They are worked, according to the purpose for which they are designed, on coarse or fine canvas with zephyr worsted in the colors given in the description of symbols. The design may also be worked with beads on silk canvas, varying the colors to harmonize with the furniture of the room.

Embroidered Wall-Basket, Figs. 1-3.

THIS wall-basket is of white wicker-work, lined with blue cashmere. Through the upper and under open-work edge of the front is run blue satin ribbon. The middle close part is trimmed with a strip of gray cloth an inch and three-quarters wide, which is ornamented in the design shown by Fig. 2 in half-polka stitch and point Russe with dark and light blue saddler's silk, and is edged with button-hole stitch scallops of similar silk. The design figures may also be applied with light and dark brown cloth, as shown by Fig. 1. Instead of this border, that shown by Fig. 3 may be used. This border consists of a strip of blue cloth an inch and seven-eighths wide, cut in points on both sides, on which is set a narrower strip of gray cloth cut out in the design shown by Fig. 3, and embroidered in point Russe stitches with blue saddler's silk. The basket may, of course, be trimmed in any other color to match the general decoration of the room.

FANCY-WORK BASKET.

LEATHER AND VELVET EMERY CUSHION.

Leather and Velvet Emery Cushion.

THIS pretty little emery cushion, which may also be used for a pocket pincushion by leaving off the handle, consists of a flat cushion, shaped as shown by the illustration, half an inch thick, two inches long, and an inch and seven-eighths wide, which is filled with emery, and is covered with gray pressed leather, and on the edge with violet velvet. The leather covering is furnished on the upper side of the cushion with a medallion of gray silk on which a monogram is worked with gold thread and violet saddler's silk in satin and half-polka stitch. A handle made of fine gray silk cord serves to hang up the cushion. Instead of leather, cloth or silk may be used for covering the cushion, and the trimming may be worked with silk of the same color in satin and half-polka stitch. In this case petit point embroidery on silk canvas would be pretty for the monogram.

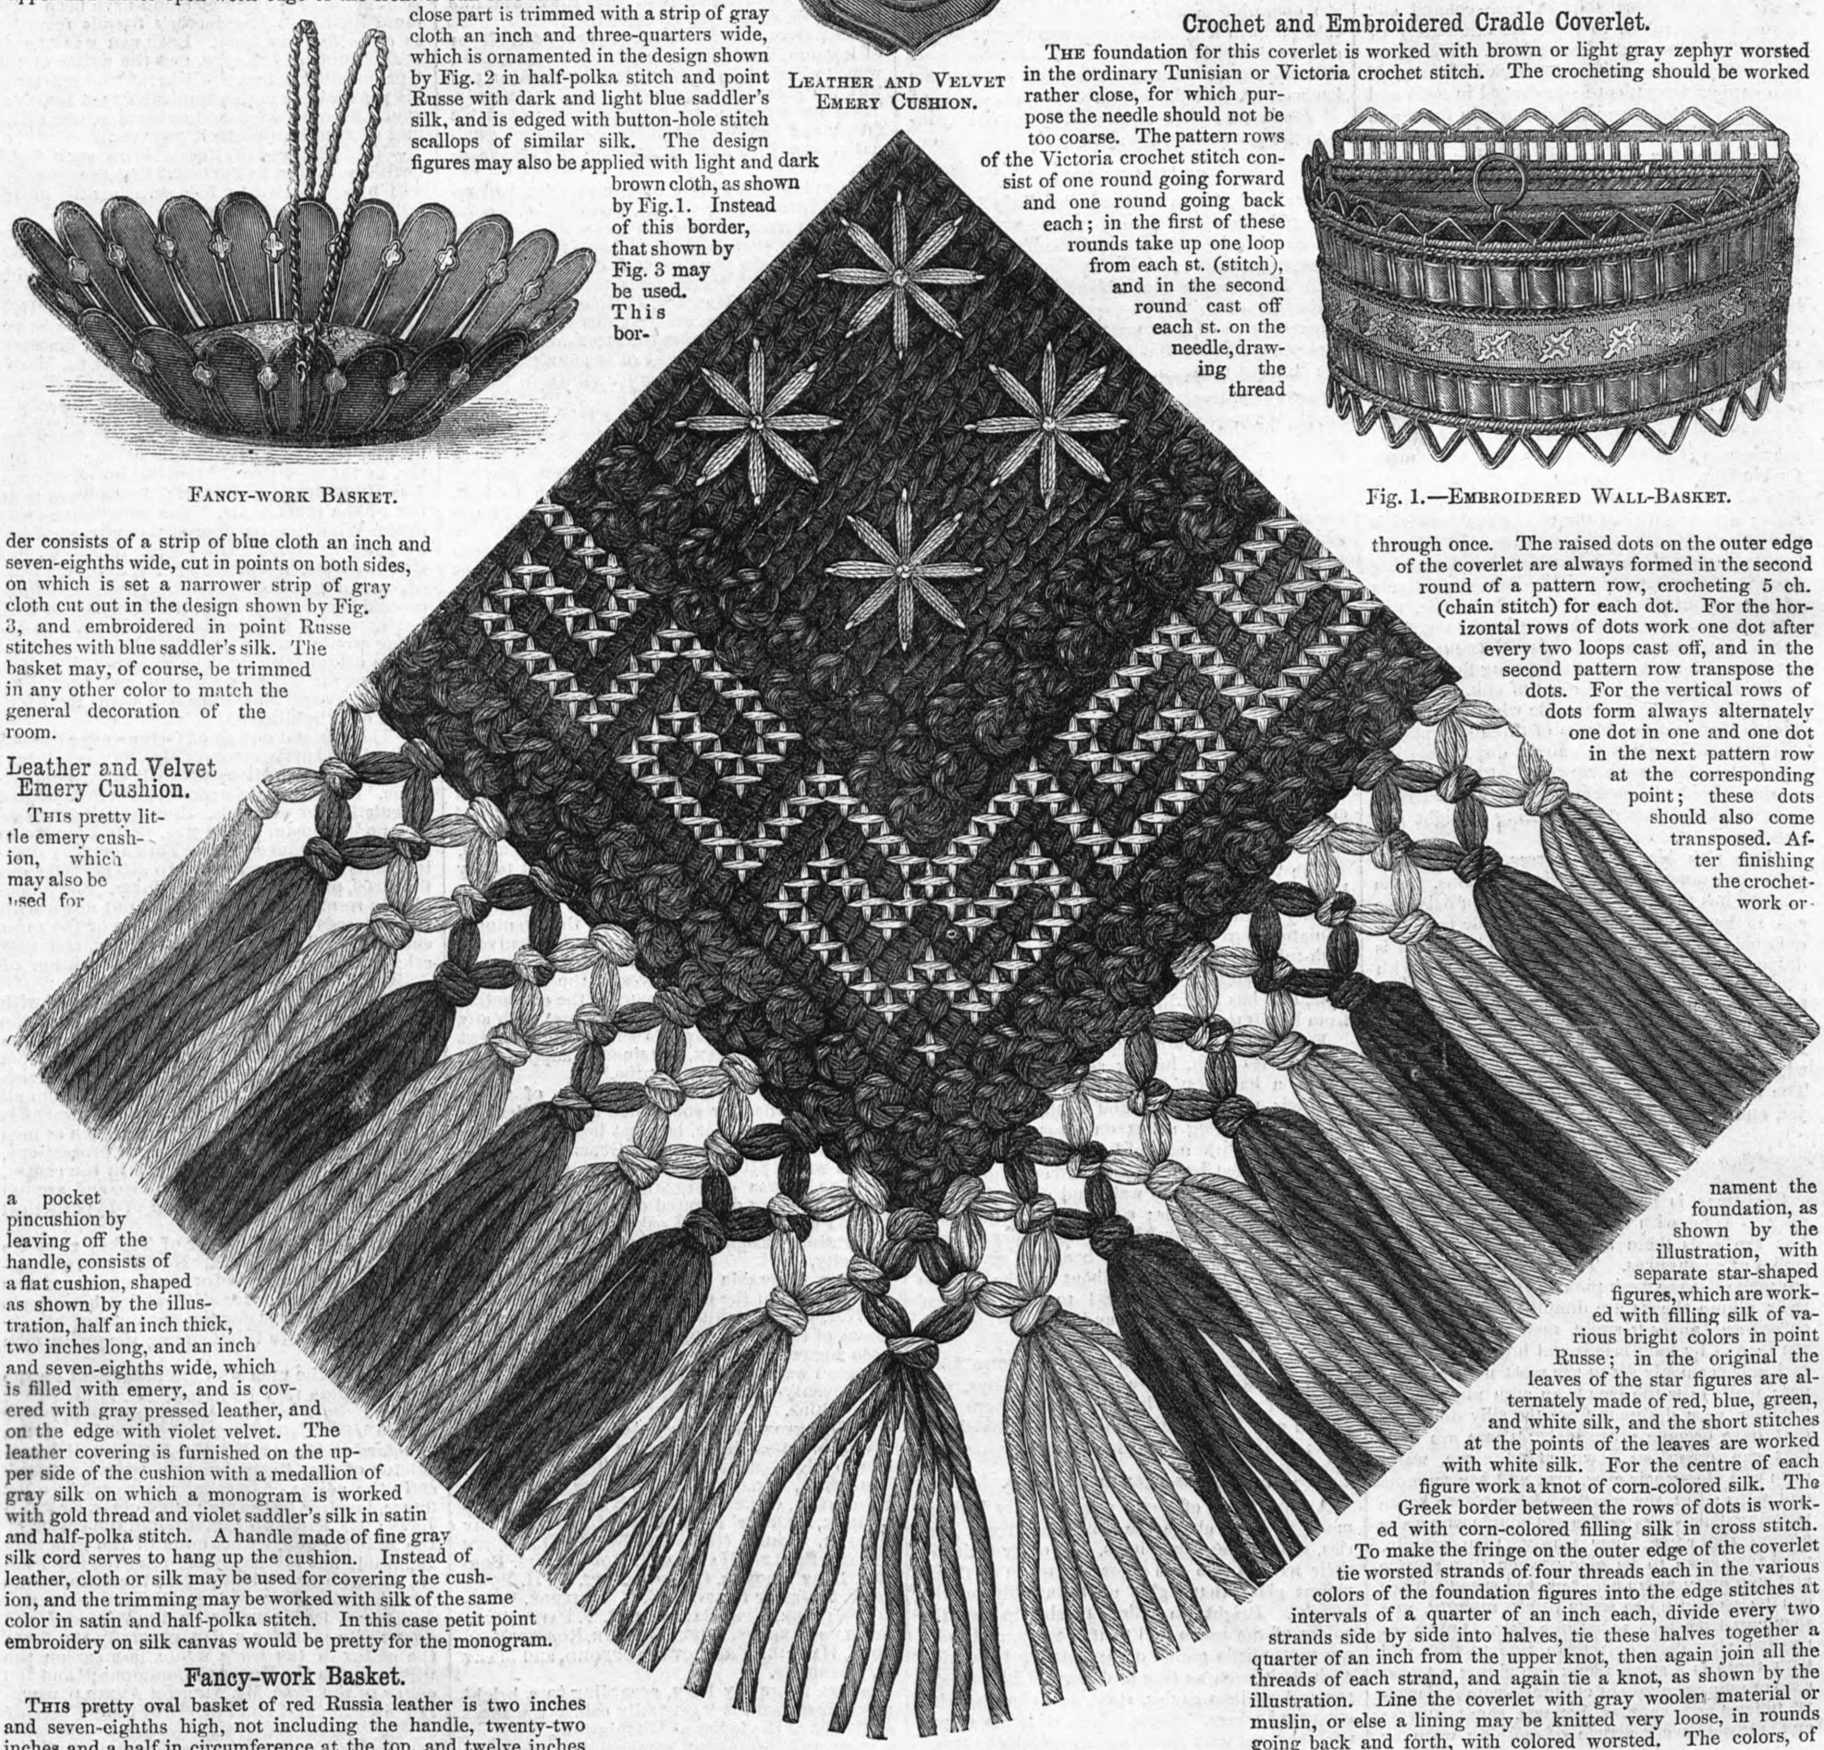
Fancy-work Basket.

THIS pretty oval basket of red Russia leather is two inches and seven-eighths high, not including the handle, twenty-two inches and a half in circumference at the top, and twelve inches and seven-eighths at the bottom. The basket consists of separate tabs formed as shown by the illustration, which are joined to the bottom at the under end, and are fastened together at some distance from the upper edge with plates of bronze as shown by the illustration; the tabs are trimmed on the inside edge with an inlaid strip of gold. The bottom of the basket is covered on the inside with light gray gros grain, and is trimmed with satin stitch embroidery of saddler's silk in various colors. The tabs may be cut of card-board in the shape shown by the illustration, and covered with colored cloth or gros grain; and the plates of bronze at the upper edge may be replaced by application figures of colored velvet. The handle should then be made of split cane strips covered with cloth or silk and wound with colored silk or gold cord.

Crochet and Embroidered Cradle Coverlet.

THE foundation for this coverlet is worked with brown or light gray zephyr worsted in the ordinary Tunisian or Victoria crochet stitch. The crocheting should be worked rather close, for which purpose the needle should not be too coarse. The pattern rows of the Victoria crochet stitch consist of one round going forward and one round going back each; in the first of these rounds take up one loop from each st. (stitch), and in the second round cast off each st. on the needle, drawing the thread through once. The raised dots on the outer edge of the coverlet are always formed in the second round of a pattern row, crocheting 5 ch. (chain stitch) for each dot. For the horizontal rows of dots work one dot after every two loops cast off, and in the second pattern row transpose the dots. For the vertical rows of dots form always alternately one dot in one and one dot in the next pattern row at the corresponding point; these dots should also come transposed. After finishing the crochet-work ornament the foundation, as shown by the illustration, with separate star-shaped figures, which are worked with filling silk of various bright colors in point Russe; in the original the leaves of the star figures are alternately made of red, blue, green, and white silk, and the short stitches at the points of the leaves are worked with white silk. For the centre of each figure work a knot of corn-colored silk. The Greek border between the rows of dots is worked with corn-colored filling silk in cross stitch. To make the fringe on the outer edge of the coverlet tie worsted strands of four threads each in the various colors of the foundation figures into the edge stitches at intervals of a quarter of an inch each, divide every two strands side by side into halves, tie these halves together a quarter of an inch from the upper knot, then again join all the threads of each strand, and again tie a knot, as shown by the illustration. Line the coverlet with gray woolen material or muslin, or else a lining may be knitted very loose, in rounds going back and forth, with colored worsted. The colors, of course, can be varied at will.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED WALL-BASKET.



SECTION OF CROCHET AND EMBROIDERED CRADLE COVERLET.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 3.—LADY'S BLACK FELT HAT.

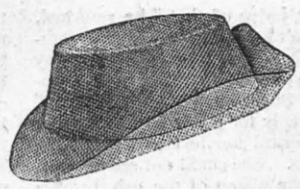


Fig. 8.—FRAME OF BONNET, FIG. 6.

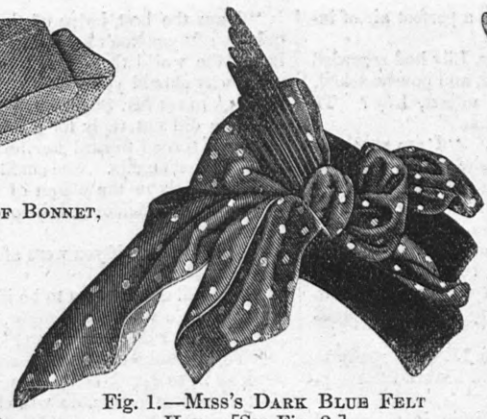

Fig. 1.—MISS'S DARK BLUE FELT HAT.—[See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 5.—FRAME OF HAT, FIG. 4.

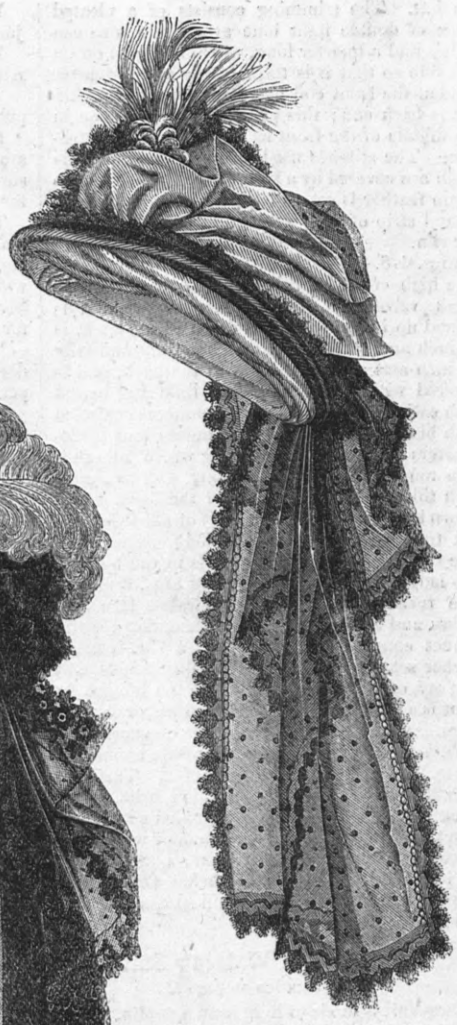

Fig. 4.—LADY'S BLACK TULLE AND FAILLE HAT.—[See Fig. 5.]

Fig. 7.—LADY'S BLACK VELVET BONNET. BACK.—[See Fig. 6.]

Fig. 2.—FRAME OF FELT HAT, FIG. 1.

Fig. 9.—MISS'S BLACK FELT HAT.

Fig. 6.—LADY'S BLACK VELVET BONNET.—[See Figs. 7 and 8.]

Ladies' and Misses' Winter Hats and Bonnets, Figs. 1–9.

Figs. 1 and 2.—MISS'S DARK BLUE FELT HAT. This hat, with medium-sized crown and turned-up rim two inches wide, is of dark blue felt. The rim is covered on the outside with dark blue velvet. The trimming consists of a bias strip of blue silk foulard dotted with white four inches and seven-eighths wide, which is wound around the crown as shown by the illustration, and a bow of the same material set on the right side. A blue feather aigrette is fastened in the knot of the bow. Fig. 2 shows the frame of the hat with the rim turned up evenly all around.

Fig. 3.—LADY'S BLACK FELT HAT. The turned-up rim of this hat is an inch and seven-eighths wide in front and seven-eighths of an inch wide in the back, and is covered with black velvet on the outside. The crown of the hat is wound with two pieces of black watered ribbon three inches and a quarter wide each, which do not reach to the middle of the back, but fall over the rim of the hat four inches and seven-eighths long, an inch and three-quarters from the middle of the back, and are caught together at the ends with a bow of similar ribbon; this bow consists of several short loops and ends, and of two sloped ends three-quarters of a yard long. A single piece of pleated ribbon covers the middle of the back of the crown. The trimming for the hat consists of two black ostrich feathers set at the right side and turned toward the back, and of two green feathers, which are set on in the opposite direction, and are finished with a bird's wing of small changeable feathers.

Figs. 4 and 5.—LADY'S BLACK TULLE AND FAILLE HAT. The frame of this hat, which is shown by Fig. 5, consists of a low, soft crown and a straight, stiff rim, which is two inches and a half wide in the middle of the front and an inch and a quarter wide in the middle of the back. The crown and rim of the hat are covered with several layers of tulle, and the rim is bound with satin, to which are joined two narrow folds of velvet. The remainder of the rim is trimmed with gathered black lace. The crown of the hat is covered with a scarf of black figured silk tulle a quarter of a yard wide, edged with lace an inch and a half wide, which is arranged so that the tulle forms a large puff on the front half of the crown, and that the lace falls in pleats over the edge of the crown. The scarf also falls in two ends each three-quarters of a yard in length over the back of

LADY'S POPLIN WALKING SUIT.

LADY'S CASHMERE WALKING SUIT.

Hosted by Google

the hat. The trimming consists of a pleated piece of double light blue gros grain nineteen inches and a quarter long, which is sloped off on one side so that it is three inches and a quarter wide at the front end and six inches and a half at the back end; this pleated piece is set on in the middle of the front as shown by the illustration. The stitches used in setting on the gros grain are covered by a knot of the same. A blue heron feather is set on back of the pleating. A wound strip of blue gros grain is set inside of the rim.

Figs. 6–8.—LADY'S BLACK VELVET BONNET. The high crown of this bonnet is covered with black velvet. The projecting rim, which is turned up in the front and down in the back, is an inch and seven-eighths wide in front and only an inch and a quarter wide in the back, and is covered with several layers of tulle and bound with satin. The crown of the bonnet is encircled with black velvet ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, with satin facing which falls in a loop ten inches and a half long, and two ends each thirty-two inches long in the back. The crown is wound also with a scarf of black figured silk tulle seventy-two inches long, edged with lace two inches wide, which falls in the back in two loops and ends, as shown by Figs. 6 and 7. The revers is covered with pleated lace two inches and a half wide. The trimming for the bonnet consists of a pink and a blue ostrich feather set on as shown by the illustrations, and a spray of tea-roses. Inside of the bonnet in front is a band of stiff lace covered with two rows of gathered lace an inch and three-quarters wide each. Fig. 8 shows the frame of the bonnet.

Fig. 9.—MISS'S BLACK FELT HAT. This hat, with flat crown and broad, rolled brim, is of black felt. The crown is surrounded with black velvet ribbon two inches and a half wide, and narrower black gros grain ribbon; both ribbons fall in loops and ends in the back. On the left side is a bow of black gros grain ribbon and several black and red feathers.

Lady's Poplin Walking Suit.

See illustration on page 5.

THIS suit is made of light brown poplin. The skirt is trimmed with a wide box-pleated flounce, and the over-skirt with fringe. The Dolman is made of black velvet, lined with lustring and thinly wadded, and trimmed with black guipure lace and a braiding of coarse black silk round cord. Brown velvet bonnet, trimmed with rolls of gros grain of a lighter shade and gros grain ribbon and feathers.

Lady's Cashmere Walking Suit.

See illustration on page 5.

DRESS with double skirt of gray cashmere; the skirt is trimmed with several flounces, which are scalloped on the under edge and bound with gros grain of a darker shade. The over-skirt is also cut in scallops. Mantilla of black cashmere and lustring lining, trimmed with satin stitch embroidery and fringe. Gray velvet bonnet, trimmed with gray gros grain ribbon, black lace, and a spray of pink roses.

(Continued from Vol. V., No. 50, page 820.)

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

LIZZIE DEEMS IT NECESSARY TO CALL CUNNING TO HER AID.

THE first thing Lily saw when she recovered consciousness was Lizzie's face bending down to hers. In that instant Lizzie began to act as all women do, upon every possible occasion. If those who enlist in the ranks of the drama would but act on the stage as they act off it, there would be no talk of the decadence of dramatic art. Every trace of anxiety vanished from Lizzie's face as Lily's eyes looked into hers, and she smiled so brightly and nodded so encouragingly as to infuse strength into the heart of her friend.

"Where am I, Lizzie?"

"With friends, my dear. The theatre was so hot that I almost fainted myself."

"Did I faint, then? How foolish of me!" A look of joy filled her eyes as they lighted on her brother. "Oh, Alfred!"

He knelt by her side, and she took his hand and retained it. By this time the theatre was fast being emptied.

"I remember now what it was that overcame me. The horrible sight of that man dying!"

She shuddered, and Lizzie said, briskly,

"Never mind; we're not going to think of that any more. It was only a piece of acting, after all. We'll go to see something more lively next time."

And Lizzie nodded emphatically at Alfred, who answered,

"Yes, we will. I didn't know what sort of a piece this was, or I shouldn't have brought you to see it."

"But Mr. Sheldrake knew," remarked Lizzie, with a sharp glance in the direction of that gentleman.

"I assure you I did not," was Mr. Sheldrake's reply. "You do me great injustice, and not for the first time to-night. I have too high a regard for Miss Lily to cause her pain. She knows that, I am sure; and so does Alfred."

"I know it well," interposed Alfred, eagerly; "and Lily knows it too. How can you be so unjust, Liz?"

"This is the first time I have seen the play," continued Mr. Sheldrake, "and I had no idea it was any thing of this kind."

He spoke the untruth with a perfect air of injured innocence.

During the passage at arms, Lily had regarded Alfred with anxious solicitude, and now he asked,

"Isn't Liz mistaken and unjust, Lily? To put the blame on Mr. Sheldrake!"

Lily turned to her friend. "I am sure you are mistaken, dear Lizzie," she said. "I'm so sorry for all this. I am the only one to blame for being so weak and foolish."

This brought Mr. Sheldrake out in full force; he was almost tender in his expressions of sympathy for Lily, and he even relented so far toward Lizzie as to hold up a warning finger to her as a caution not to be unjust to her friends for the future.

"And now," he said, when Lily was ready to depart, "I propose we go and have a little supper."

"No, thank you," said Lizzie, in a decided tone, not at all softened by the evidence of Mr. Sheldrake's magnanimity.

Mr. Sheldrake bit his lip.

"You speak for all," he said.

"I think so," replied Lizzie, gazing at him steadily. "Lily will not go without me, and of course Alfred must see me home."

"Why won't you accept Mr. Sheldrake's invitation, Liz?" asked Alfred, uneasily.

"Daddy is waiting up for me," she replied, "and we have a long way to go. And besides, Lily is unwell."

For one instant, Mr. Sheldrake hesitated; the next, he accepted the position.

"Well, it's of no use trying to persuade you. A willful woman will have her way. How do you propose we shall go home?" he asked of Lizzie, in a tone of sarcastic politeness. "Your way is different from ours."

Lizzie decided this without hesitation. They would all go in one cab, and drop Lily at the door of her grandfather's house in Soho, and then Alfred should see Lizzie home. Mr. Sheldrake made no demur to her suggestion, and the party drove from the theatre. But he stopped the cab at the corner of the little street in Soho, and said that the driver need not turn, as he could see Lily the few yards she had to go. He jumped out of the cab, and said to Alfred,

"By-the-bye, Alf, I want to say a word or two to you. The girls will excuse us for a moment."

Alfred and he walked half a dozen steps from the cab, and then he turned upon Alfred, and asked what was the meaning of Lizzie's behavior.

"I don't know," replied Alfred; "I never saw her in such a humor before."

"She'd better not show herself off often in the same light," said Mr. Sheldrake, in a threatening tone, "or she and I may quarrel. I'm not in the humor to be trifled with. Let her know this; and the sooner she knows it the better."

"I hope you don't think I am to blame for what has occurred."

"I haven't stopped to think. When a man's made mad, as I've been to-night, he doesn't think of much else but the cause. Look here, Alfred, I don't want to pry into your secrets, my boy, and I don't want to spoil your love-making. You know best whether I've been a friend to you or not—"

"You have been," interrupted Alfred, eagerly; "a true friend!"

"Well, then, I'm not going to be made to look small by any sweetheart of yours. I've nothing to say against Lizzie; but she mustn't come any of her tricks with me. Now, you've got some control over her, I don't doubt. She'll heed what you say. Take my advice. Tell her to be more civil to me for the future. If she isn't—" here he paused, and gave Alfred a significant look—"well, if she isn't, I might turn rusty. And that might be awkward for you, Alf."

There was no mistaking his meaning, and Alfred's heart sickened at the threat conveyed in the words. It suited Mr. Sheldrake not to notice Alfred's discomposure, and they returned to the cab in silence.

"I'll walk with you, Lily," said Lizzie, as Mr. Sheldrake held out his hand to assist Lily from the cab; "it's only a few steps, and the cab can wait."

But Mr. Sheldrake put a restraining hand upon her arm.

"I can see Miss Lily safely to her door," he said, politely. "You have a long way to go, and Mr. Musgrave is waiting up for you, you said. It's very late, and you'd best be moving. Eh, Alfred?"

"Yes, yes," returned Alfred, hurriedly; "we must rattle on. Good-night, Lil dear. Good-night, Mr. Sheldrake. I'll see you to-morrow some time."

Mr. Sheldrake raised his hat to Lizzie, and the cab drove away. For a few moments neither Lizzie nor Alfred spoke. Their thoughts were not in unison. But Lizzie, the more gentle nature of the two, presently crept close to Alfred and placed her hand in his. He threw it from him angrily. She resented this at first, and shrank from him; but a better feeling came upon her soon, and she asked:

"What have I done, Alfred, that you behave in this manner to me?"

"Done!" he repeated, with bitter emphasis. "Been the ruin of me, I shouldn't wonder!"

"Alfred!"

"Oh yes," he said, sullenly. "It's all very well for you to cry Alfred in that tone; but it won't mend matters. I thought you loved me—"

"Have I not proved it, Alfred?" she interrupted, in a tone of sadness.

"But I have found out my mistake," he continued, not heeding her words; "it's always the way. Mr. Sheldrake is right in what he says about women: no man ought to trust them."

"Do you think you ought not to trust me? Do you think there is any thing in the world that I would not do for your sake? Oh, Alfred, you speak blindly!"

"I am the best judge of that," he returned, quickly; "you don't know all. If there is nothing in the world that you would not do for my sake, why should you act in such a manner to-night as to set Mr. Sheldrake dead against me?"

Lizzie did not reply for a few moments; her face was turned toward her lover, as if striving to read his thoughts. She could not see his features distinctly in the gloom of the cab, but his voice was a sufficient index to the trouble that possessed him.

"You speak as if you were afraid of Mr. Sheldrake, Alfred?"

"I should have reason to be if he turned rusty. He gave me a warning to-night."

"Because I displeased him?"

"Yes, because of you. It makes me sick to think of it, to speak of it. I wish I was dead! I am the most miserable wretch in the world! If it were not for you and Lily, I think I should make away with myself."

"Don't speak like that, Alf," said Lizzie, placing her arm tenderly around him; "it breaks my heart to see you so unhappy. I know you love me and Lily. And you ought to be sure that we are better friends to you than Mr. Sheldrake can be, and that we would do more for you if it was in our power."

"That's it. If it was in your power. But it isn't, and it is in Mr. Sheldrake's; and he has behaved like a true friend to me."

"Sometimes I ask myself why, Alfred," said Lizzie. "What is his motive?"

"I know that you are prejudiced against him; and that's the reason you suspect him, and can't be civil to him. You think he wouldn't do me a kindness without a motive?"

"I am sure he wouldn't," said Lizzie, firmly; "and I am sure of another thing—that you, in your heart, do not like him. I wish you had never seen him."

"I wish I hadn't," groaned Alfred.

"And yet you have told me he was your best friend, Alfred," said Lizzie.

"Don't badger me, Liz, for God's sake! I am almost torn to pieces as it is. You ought to comfort me, and try and make things better for me."

"Ah, if I could! If I knew how to, how gladly would I! Why not confide entirely in me, Alf? Who can have a better right to your confidence than the girl that loves you with all her heart and soul?—as I do, Alf, my dear! Come now, tell me all. Who knows? Something good may come of it. What's your trouble?"

"Money."

"Yes, I know that; and that you owe Mr. Sheldrake more than you can pay. Tell me how it all came about, dear."

So by many little endearing ways she coaxed him to tell her the whole of his miserable story. How, excited by the glowing accounts in the papers of the easy manner in which fortunes could be made on the turf, he had commenced to bet, a few shillings at a time at first; how he attended races, and how one unfortunate day he won a few pounds, and came home flushed with the idea that he had found the philosopher's stone; how little by little he had been led on, with the inevitable result of losing more than he could afford; how on one important race, when the prophets and tipsters in every one of the papers had declared—in such glowing and confident terms that it was impossible to resist the temptation of making a bold plunge for fortune—that a certain horse could not possibly lose, he had used money which did not belong to him, and how the horse came in last instead of first.

"I had to make up that money, of course," he continued; "I had to get it somehow: and I did get it—never mind in what manner. You can imagine what I suffered, Liz! I thought I had fortune in my hands; and I had, but I was tricked out of it—for the whole affair was a swindle; and I shouldn't wonder if some of the prophets and tipsters were not in it. The horse was never intended to win; and they swore it couldn't lose."

He derived comfort from the confession he was making; he took no blame to himself; and he did not, when he reached this point, tell her the story of the theft from the iron box. Then he went on to narrate how he had made Mr. Sheldrake's acquaintance, and how that gentleman had lent him money from time to time, and how misfortune continued to pursue him. He would have had his pockets filled with money over and over again if it had not been that things invariably went wrong with him just at the critical moment.

"It was from no want of judgment on my part, Liz. I had got to learn as much as any of the prophets and tipsters, and yet I could never manage to turn up trumps. I saw other fellows, who didn't know in their whole bodies as much as I knew in my little finger, make hundreds and hundreds of pounds. Then there were others who had been almost as unlucky as I have been, and who all at once made a great strike, and rolled in money. It only wants sticking to, Liz. I'll make all our fortunes yet; you see if I don't! There's the City and Suburban coming on; and I know something that 'll open their eyes. And when I pay Mr. Sheldrake the money I owe him, I'll cut with him, if it's only to please you; although he's behaved like a brick to me, mind that, Liz!"

By the time he had reached the end of his recital he had recovered some of his good spirits. Lizzie listened in silence, and interrupted him only once, to ask him whether he ever made any bets with Mr. Sheldrake.

"Oh no," was the reply; "Sheldrake will never bet with me, Liz. Why, sometimes he tries to persuade me not to back a horse that I'm sweet on, and even tries to persuade me not to bet on races at all. 'It's a bad game, Alf,' he has said to me more than once, 'it's a bad game, unless you've got a strong bank at your back, and unless you can hold out for a long time.' Well, then, I ask him how it was he had managed to make his money; and he can't help telling me the truth. He was dead broke, Liz, in a worse fix than I'm in now—ay, a thousand times worse—he has told me so lots of times; but he stuck to it until on one race he had taken a bet of a thousand pounds to ten, and his horse won. There he was, all right in a minute. He was a made man directly the horse passed the winning-post. He told me how he threw his hat in the air, and how he almost danced for joy. Then the money began to roll in. That's how it is, Liz. You've only got to stick to it long enough, and to keep your heart up."

"Do you bet with any of Mr. Sheldrake's friends, Alf?" asked Lizzie.

"With one—Con Staveley."

Lizzie repeated, under her breath, "Con Staveley!" as if desiring to fix the name in her memory.

"He's a good fellow, too, is Con. He gives me long odds—longer than I should be able to get from any other of the commission agents or from any of the clubs. One of these days I shall give him a nip, as sure as fate. He has told me so, often, laughingly. 'You'll nip me one of these fine days, Alf,' he said; 'and I shall have to hand you over a big check. Well, you may as well have it as any body else.' And I mean to have it, Liz. If I don't make it out of the City and Suburban, I'll make it out of the Derby. Would you like to go to the Derby, Liz?

"And so," concluded Alfred, when he came to the end of his story, which he had told and colored in such a way as to make it appear that it was only by an extraordinary combination of ill chances that he was not "rolling in money" at the present time, "you see where my chance lies. I shall be sure to come up all right, if I go on. And I must go on, Liz; that's a fact. It's my only chance. And as Mr. Sheldrake can shut me up at any minute, I must be careful not to offend him. I want you to be civil to him, for my sake, if you won't for his own."

"I'll try to, Alf."

"That's a dear! I can't understand why you are so bitter against him. At one time you were always praising him; and you've some reason to be thankful to him. I'm sure he's been very kind to you and Mr. Musgrave."

"It looks so," said Lizzie, thoughtfully, "outwardly."

She said no more; for she was keen enough to see that many conflicting influences were at work. That Alfred was blind to Mr. Sheldrake's character was plain; and, indeed, the feeling she entertained against him was really nothing more than a matter of prejudice. But her instincts were dead against him; and she thoroughly distrusted him. There is often in woman's character a sort of unreasoning reason, to the whisperings of which she tenaciously clings, even though outward evidence almost surely proves it to be based upon false grounds. And in the majority of instances the instinct which prompts this refusal of direct evidence is correct. Mr. Sheldrake had become Lizzie's Doctor Fell; and she judged him accordingly. She saw the warm passion which he entertained for Lily, and although she was convinced that Lily loved Felix, she was puzzled by her friend's conduct toward Mr. Sheldrake. At one time Lily was cold to him, at another she was kind; and often she showed an anxious solicitude to please him. The two girls were firm and affectionate friends, and exchanged many confidences; but the one subject which Lizzie was most anxious to hear spoken of was steadily avoided by her friend. Many a time had Lizzie introduced Felix's name and Mr. Sheldrake's for the express purpose of inviting or eliciting an avowal, but Lily had invariably turned the conversation into another channel. That Lily was suffering was evident to the eyes of her friend. Lizzie had said to herself, "Perhaps it is because Felix doesn't speak." The conversation she had had with Alfred this night set her thinking more seriously. She yearned to set matters right; but turn which way she did, one obstacle started up constantly before her—Mr. Sheldrake. He seemed to hold them all in his power by the relations which existed between him and Alfred. As she thought of the terrible blow he could inflict upon them all, she began to hate him. Alfred was powerless; Lily was powerless; Mr. Musgrave was powerless. Lizzie had a large share of woman's wit and cunning, and much confidence in herself. In her musings now, Mr. Sheldrake presented himself to her in the light of a foe to her dearest hopes, as one who was weaving treacherous webs around her friends; and she found herself watching him, and looking about her for some means to break the threads, and so defeat him. "If I had some one to help me," she thought, "some man to depend upon who is not in Mr. Sheldrake's power. Felix!" She started; for the name had come so suddenly upon her, and with such vivid force as to make her almost fancy that she had really heard it spoken. Felix! The man of all others whom she would have chosen; the man of all others upon whom she could best depend. The thought of him gave her such hope and comfort that she kissed Alfred tenderly. He returned her caress, and called her a dear good girl, and told her how he loved her.

Mr. Musgrave, who was waiting up for Lizzie, heard the sound of the cab wheels, and ran to the gate.

"Will you come inside, Alfred?" he asked.

"No, thank you," was the reply. "I will bid Lizzie good-night here."

"I'll be in presently, daddy," said Lizzie, with a kiss, which sent the old man into the house with a light heart.

As the lovers stood together in the quiet night, some better influences, born of the peace which surrounded him and of the consciousness of the love which Lizzie bore toward him, entered Alfred's heart, and he experienced a genuine feeling of regret for the folly of the past. It had floated

Hosted by Google

VANITY.

IT seems to us a little hard to accuse this young lady of vanity, for she is only endeavoring to do what all women, and the majority of men, have done ever since mirrors were invented—that is to say, ever since there were brooks and ponds capable of reflecting the human face divine. Looking at one's self in a glass does not necessarily imply vanity; it is quite as often produced by what Mr. Darwin styles self-attention, a quality more commonly called self-consciousness, which is often most strongly developed in persons who have by no means an exalted opinion of their own personal or mental attractions. We suspect, however, that the young lady in our picture, from the confident attitude assumed by her elbows, is not troubled by any mauvaise honte about her charms, but merely wishes to see if she "looks nice." But who hung the mirror in that painfully elevated position? we wonder. Likely enough, some elderly virgin, once accustomed to see a blooming visage set in its frame, has hung it out of reach that she may no longer be annoyed by its tell-tale truthfulness; or, more likely still, it is placed thus to prevent buxom maids, such as the heroine of our engraving, from wasting their time in contemplating their own comeliness.

VANITY.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A new Profession.—A national Experiment.—Another Cause Célèbre.—Why we make Princes Field-Marshals.

THE arbitrators in the Geneva Treaty are, I hear—but from a person who has such "positive private information" that I can not but doubt it—to be paid £5000 a head for their services, which is to be disbursed by the losing side — that is, the English. It is not, perhaps, a greater sum than should be given for the discharge of so important an office, but I confess that I should have no objection to be a public arbitrator if recompensed at the same rate. It will doubtless become a profession in due course, and we shall see advertisements headed like those of the quack doctors: "No more blood-letting nor eruptions. Mr. Facing-both-sides, Public Arbitrator, begs to announce to nations inclined for combat that all differences and causes of offense are settled and removed by him without use of the steel, and leaving no tenderness after the operation." The Geneva gentlemen were, of course, above suspicion; but if this sort of appeal becomes common, the fear will be that arbitrators will, in the language of the turf, be "got at" by one or other of the contending parties, and secured in its interest. By-the-bye, I don't know whether the slang of your sporting circles is similar to that in this favored isle; but if it be, this answer to "Why are all bettors anomalous and inconsiderate?" will make you smile: "Because they never 'put any thing on' without wishing to 'pull it off.'"

A curious bet, made, as I understand, in Illinois, of one thousand dollars to one hundred, has lately been decided here. A discussion arose at Saybrook, in that country, between one Sergeant Bates, of the American army, and some gentlemen respecting the Geneva arbitration, wherein it was maintained that if the decision was given against England, no matter how small the damages, a very bitter feeling would be excited there against the United States. The sergeant, however, said that he knew the English well, that their sentiments were friendly to America, and that they would not be changed by such an occurrence. To prove his argument he staked the above-named wager that after the Geneva decision he would carry the flag of the United States unfurled throughout all England without meeting with ill behavior of any sort, either to himself or it. He sailed from New York to Glasgow, and on his arrival, wearing his full uniform of color-sergeant of the United States army, and with the star-bespangled banner unfurled, he started on foot from Gretna Green, on the Scottish border, and on the next day reached Carlisle. From thence he proceeded to Lancaster, Preston, Bolton, Manchester, Macclesfield, Birmingham, Warwick, and Oxford to the Guildhall of London, where his mission was ended.

A very curious scandal is now occupying the attention of one of our law courts in connection with the Vanes, a rich and titled family in the North of England. So far back as 1797 Sir Frederick Fletcher Vane "loved not wisely, but too well," a certain Hannah Bowerbank. She bore him two children, and previous to the arrival of a third she gave him warning that unless he should marry her before its birth, and thereby legitimate it, she would live with him no longer. This he consented to do; but his very alacrity in doing it was the cause of her hope being blighted, for coming in suddenly upon her with the news that he had obtained a special license, the joyful tidings brought about the premature birth of the infant Francis Vane, the father of the present baronet. A few weeks afterward the parents were married, and as the doctors informed the husband that in their opinion Lady Vane would never again present him with a living child, he brought up Francis as his legal heir. But the doctors were wrong, since ten years afterward, in 1807, another son, Frederick, was born to him, the present claimant. Notwithstanding this, Francis continued to be treated as the heir, succeeded to his father's title, married a lady of high birth, and begat a son, Ralph, who succeeded him in the baronetcy in 1842, from which time till 1866 his right was never questioned. And now, in 1872, Frederick Vane, moved thereto by "certain statements made by his mother to other persons in 1866," brings his action against his nephew for the recovery of the Vane estates after forty years of wrongful possession. This period of unquestioned enjoyment of any property is a sufficient title in English law, unless there is "concealed fraud," and with this Frederick charges his dead brother. He asserts that on his attaining his majority the truth was revealed to Francis, and also that the register of the latter's birth has been tampered with by the addition "born March 29, 1797," the real date being March 9 in that year. What a tangled skein is here! what materials for "the gentlemen of the long robe," and also for the novelist! and what a cloud of witnesses in the shape of ancient veterans and withered crones will there be!

The Prince of Wales is to be made a field-marshal, not by reason of his achievements in war, but, as it is whispered, to prevent the possibility of his having a command during the next autumn manœuvres. He was very anxious on the last occasion to manage the cavalry, and it was only with much difficulty that that arm escaped the honor, of which it was not very desirous, since on the only occasion in which the Prince did take part in these scientific proceedings he afforded a very remarkable spectacle. When the umpire decided that he was taken prisoner he set spurs to his horse, and galloped along a line of hostile foot (any one of whom could, of course, have picked him off) with a general of division in hot pursuit, shouting, "Stop, your royal highness." The Prussians had their experience of consulting the convenience of royal personages in warfare during the Austrian campaign. The old king had expressed a wish to be sent for should the enemy be advantageously brought to bay, and accordingly, when this was supposed to be effected, news was dispatched to his majesty—just as a sporting gentleman might advise his friend, "I have got six rats in a meal-tub; come and see them worried"—that all was ready. The king himself, however, was not ready, and took ten days to arrive at the scene of action, during which the Austrians had contrived to escape from the trap. In 1870, however, the Prussians were not so obsequious, and waited for nobody. R. KEMBLE, of London.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

K.—The French novel you mention has been translated, but we would not recommend it for any one's perusal. There are a number of English books on heraldry, Burke's Peerage being perhaps the most complete.

ADMIRER.—The International Exhibition at Vienna will open May 1, 1873.

MARY W.—The plays Diamonds and Saratoga were written by Mr. Bronson Howard, a young gentleman long connected with the New York press.

NORNA.—Bjornstern Bjornsen signifies bear-star bear-son, and is one of the many names that have an ursine origin. The city of Berne is so proud of this nativity that it maintains a number of bears at its own expense, and bears bears in its arms, if we may be pardoned the pun. Bernard, Bernhard, Bernardo, Bernardine, etc., all have the same derivation; so have Baring, Bahrend, and Behring, which very appropriately gives its name to our northern straits. Béranger, Berenguela, and Berengaria also take their names from the Norwegian biörn, or bear.

J.—We do not know whether the news-dealers in your vicinity sell our cut paper patterns or not; in any case, you can readily obtain them by ordering them from this office.

MRS. R. L. M., ECONOMY, AND OTHERS.—Answers to your inquiries about making new suits and renovating others have been embodied in the New York Fashions of late numbers of the Bazar. The general hints given there will be useful to you. We have not sufficient room for lengthy descriptions of costumes.

STAPLETON.—We do not know who is the author of the poem you mention.

H. E. M.—Read reply above to "Mrs. R. L. M., Economy, and Others."

LOU.—Get silk fringe for your cashmere wrap. Have a heading of passementerie.

NORMA.—Make girl's blue merino suit by pattern of Girls' Princesse Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. V. Back curls are very little used. Puffs and coils of braids worn very high are the fashion. High tucking-combs are also used.

NELLIE ORTON.—The "Ugly Girl" papers which have been published in the Bazar suggest several depilatories, without recommending any, as all must necessarily be more or less caustic, and attended with some danger. We advise you to let alone the seemingly superfluous hair, which in all probability gives individuality to your face, and has a subtle beauty of its own which an artist would discern.—You can wear a rose-colored neck-tie with your sage green dress.—Our answers to correspondents are never imaginary; but our letters are so numerous, and our space so restricted, that correspondents must be patient in waiting for replies to their many questions.

X. Y. Z. AND OTHERS.—An enterprising Briton has outdone Yankee forwardness in one respect. Alexander Ross, of London, advertises that he has a nose-machine, "which applied to the nose for an hour daily, so directs the soft cartilage of which the member consists that an ill-formed nose is quickly shaped to perfection." What an era of classic noses dawns upon us at this announcement! This benefactor reverses the custom of that French surgeon whose practice was confined to altering the features of criminals so that they could defy detection, who pared down aquiline noses into snubs, and judiciously grafted skins, and carved homely noses into high profile. These are serious facts, and not the burlesque they appear.

EUGÉNIE N.—Small fetter-locks made to fit each finger might be worn with success to reduce the size of knuckles, but a surgeon would have to fit them and direct their use. Sweet-almond oil will soften thick wrinkled skin, and keep the hands soft, if well rubbed in. To smooth hands rub with a piece of sandstone, or wash in sand and soap-suds.

THE QUEEN OF ALL SEWING-MACHINES.—In speaking of the merits of the New Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine, it is sufficient for us to say that we think the invention of this machine marks one of the most important eras in the history of this country; and when we consider the influence it has upon the social well-being of the masses, it is difficult to conceive of an invention of more importance. It has a beautiful, noiseless movement; it makes the genuine "Lock-Stitch," alike on both sides, and does to perfection all kinds of plain and fine sewing; it needs no commendation; its rapid sales, the increasing demand, and the many flattering testimonials from those who have used it, is sufficient proof of its merits. The want of a sewing-machine is deeply felt in every household, and as the Wilson Sewing-Machine, on account of its extreme simplicity and less cost of manufacture, is sold at a much lower price than all other first-class machines, it is meeting with the extensive patronage that it so justly deserves. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the U.S. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.—Miss ELLEN FERRIS, Troy, N. Y., earns annually about $700 with her Wheeler & Wilson Lock-Stitch Machine. See the new Improvements and Woods' Lock-Stitch Ripper.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS,
502-504 Broadway,
—ONLY.—
OFFER FOR THE SEASON THEIR LARGE AND EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF LADIES' FURS,
COMPRISING THEIR FINE STOCK OF
Seal-Skin Fur,
IN ALL THE LATEST STYLES.
A RICH ASSORTMENT OF
Russian and American Sables, Black, Silver, and Blue Foxes.
A FULL VARIETY IN
BLACK MARTEN and ASTRAKAN.
A CHOICE SELECTION OF ERMINE GOODS.
A FULL LINE OF CHILDREN'S FURS,
FUR ROBES,
GENTLEMEN'S FURS.
ALSO,
Fur Trimmings,
IN EVERY GRADE AND STYLE.
All at the Lowest Possible Prices.
502-504 Broadway.
N. B.—OUR BUSINESS IN ALL ITS DEPARTMENTS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL, IS ONLY AT 502 AND 504 BROADWAY.

FOR MOTH PATCHES,
Freckles, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

FOR PIMPLES ON THE FACE,
Blackheads, and Fleshworms, use Perry's Improved Comedone and Pimple Remedy—the Great Skin Medicine. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York.

TOYS
AND
HOLIDAY GOODS.
A GRAND ASSORTMENT.
All our own Importation, and offered at less than wholesale prices. Call and examine.
EHRICHS' TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 EIGHTH AVENUE,
Near Twenty-Fourth St., N.Y.
P. S.—Liberal reduction to Fairs, Sunday-Schools, Charitable Institutions, &c., &c.

NICOL, DAVIDSON, & CO.,
686 BROADWAY,
Near Great Jones Street, New York,
Offer a Quarter of a Million Dollars' worth of
REAL BRONZE CLOCKS;
MANTLE SETS, GROUPS, FIGURES;
BISQUE, PARIAN;
ENAMELED-BRONZE JEWEL-BOXES;
CHINA, GLASS;
GAS-FIXTURES AND CHANDELIERS,
in Crystal, Gilt, or Bronze,
At a small advance on cost of importation.

A LARGE, VARIED, AND ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of Ladies' solid Gold Hunting Watches, with Chains of the latest styles to match. The solid 14-karat Gold Hunting-Case Lever Movement Watch, $29 00; usual price $45 00. Solid Gold Leontine Chains, $12 00. The Gold Illustrated Circular, of more expensive goods, free. Goods C. O. D., privilege to examine. F. J. NASH, 712 Broadway, New York. "Has a good stock and is entirely reliable."—Appleton's Journal. "Whose goods are just what he represents them."—Christian Union. "Worthy of the fullest confidence."—Christian Advocate, New York.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

RENEW.—For $5 00 either of HARPER'S and THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH a year. The best and only Illustrated Health Journal published. Address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

INTELLIGENT WOMEN who wish to make money in a respectable calling, that can be pursued either as a regular business or only at intervals of leisure, write for particulars to HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers, 25 Bond St., N. Y.

AGENTS—Ladies particularly—can make money working for us, as there is no competition, and the goods are wanted by every one. Address The MCKEE MANUFACTURING CO., 309 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

TOYS
AND HOLIDAY GOODS
AT RETAIL.
Our Holiday Exhibition is now open, which surpasses any thing of the kind ever exhibited in this country. All the latest Novelties imported expressly for our RETAIL trade.
STRASBURGER & PFEIFFER,
394 BROADWAY, N. Y.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
RICH LACES
for
CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.
Black Thread Lace Pointes, Point Lace and Point Applique Shawls, Capes, Flounces, Hdkfs., Collars, &c.,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
Real Point, Applique, Chantilly, and Guipure Trimming Laces, much below the Importation Cost.
1000 Fine French Embroidered Sets, at half their actual cost.
A large line of Scotch Emb'd Sets, from $1 00 to $2 00 the set.
A large assortment of made-up Real Valenciennes Fichus, Capes, Collarettes, and Sets.
Embroidered Pin-Cushions.
Initial Hdkfs. in great variety, Damask and Tape-bordered, Plain Hemmed, Cambric, and Lawn Hdkfs., Put up in FANCY BOXES for PRESENTS.
Elegant CHRISTMAS & NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.
SILK UMBRELLAS,
of every description,
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,
All sizes and colors, Chatelaines, &c.,
AT REASONABLE PRICES.
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS AND SCARFS.
FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
A Reduction of fully 25 PER CENT. will be made on the above STOCK on MONDAY, December 16th.
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT.
Replete with every Novelty,
AT REASONABLE PRICES.
N. B.—BRIDAL TROUSSEAUX AND INFANTS' WARDROBES a Specialty. All orders filled with despatch.
HOLIDAY FURS.
Russian Sable Sets,
Sable-Tail Sets,
Silver Fox, Mink, Ermine, Grebe, Seal-Skin Sets and Cloaks,
Black Marten, &c., &c., &c.
Fur Sets for Children of all descriptions.
White Coney Cloaks for Children.
Fur Trimmings of all descriptions.
Fur-Lined Silk Cloaks for Carriage Wraps.
GENTS' AND YOUTHS'
FURNISHING DEPARTMENTS.
ALL THE NOVELTIES IN
Underwear, Hosiery, Dress Shirts, Plain and Fancy Neckwear, Robes de Chambre, Smoking Jackets, English and French Cardigan Jackets, Dressing Robes, &c.
Chosson's Celebrated Kid in all Tints and Sizes from 1 to 10 Buttons. Chosson's Lined Kid Gloves for Ladies and Gents, 1 and 2 Buttons. Chosson's Castor, 1 and 2 Buttons. "Chs. Robert's" Best Paris Dog-Skin, 1, 2, & 3 Buttons.
Seal-Skin Gloves and Gauntlets for Ladies and Gents.
Winter Gloves of every description.
Ladies' Shoulderettes, Berthas, Ties, Sash Ribbons, Roman Sashes, and a Novelty in Children's Silk Sashes.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

HOLIDAY GOODS.
USEFUL PRESENTS.
SPECIAL BARGAINS.
2 CASES BLACK ALPACAS, 50c.
A VERY BEAUTIFUL QUALITY.
BLACK SERGE, 30c., WORTH 45c.
FRENCH CASHMERE MERINOES.
EMPRESS CLOTH, VELOURS, BIARRITZ CLOTH.
TAMISE CLOTH, BRILLIANTINES.
HENRIETTA CLOTH, CRAPE CLOTH.
BLACK SILKS, &c.,
At a Great Reduction to close the Seasons' Importations; also, choice Embroideries, Cloaks, Shawls, Cloths, Suits.
Alaska Furs, Muff and Boa, $10.
JACKSON'S MOURNING STORE,
No. 729 Broadway.

A. SELIG,
Successor to S. M. Peyser, 813 Broadway, Importer of Zephyr Worsteds; Silks for Embroidering; Embroideries on Canvas and Leather—Slippers, Cushions, Light Screens, Suspenders, Strips for Oriental and Camp Chairs. Also, Guipure and Point Laces, and materials for making the same. Novelties in Fringes, Gimps, Buttons, Ornaments, and Laces. Fringes and other Trimmings made to order. All kinds of stamping done. Monograms and Crests designed and embroidered in gold, silk, or worsted, in artistic style, at the lowest prices.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' FURS
IN EVERY VARIETY;
SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,
All at the Lowest Prices.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS, 719 Broadway, N. Y.

EXTRA!!!
UNION ADAMS & CO.
Have manufactured, expressly
For the Present Season, a Splendid Variety of House Coats,
Smoking Jackets,
Robes de Chambre,
Railway Rugs,
Traveling Shawls,
&c., &c., &c.,
ADAPTED TO COMFORT.
637 BROADWAY.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.
SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.
RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.
32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.
Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.
BACK CURLS,
Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.
Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.
Established 1843. CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.
Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.
Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

CHENEY BRO'S
American Gros-Grain Silks,
IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

MAGIC FOR THE PARLOR.
Send a stamp for the new price-list.
HARTZ CONJURING REPOSITORY, 743 Broadway, New York; also at 850 Broadway, near 14th Street.

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?
WHY BE ANNOYED WITH
CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?
WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL
REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,
AT SO SMALL A COST,
BY USING WRIGHT'S
"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."
Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

SKATES.
Discount to Clubs. Send for Illustrated Catalogue.
J. F. MARSTERS, 55 Court St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

MALE and Female Agents Wanted immediately. Address with stamp, P. O. Drawer 217, Buffalo, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 2.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1872, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

HANGING BASKETS AND WINDOW GARDENS.

A HANGING garden of sponge is one of the latest novelties in gardening. Take a white sponge of large size, and sow it full of rice, oats, or wheat. Then place it for a week or ten days in a shallow dish, in which a little water is constantly kept, and as the sponge will absorb the moisture, the seeds will begin to sprout before many days. When this has fairly taken place, the sponge may be suspended by means of cords from a hook in the top of the window where a little sun will enter. It will thus become like a mass of green, and can be kept wet by merely immersing it in a bowl of water.

Another pretty and artistic arrangement for a winter greenery is to obtain from the road-side one of those peculiar excrescences which are found growing upon the stumps of decayed trees, resembling brown rosettes of several shades, and very curiously striped. One of these placed in the centre of a large shallow dish with earth around it will be quite ornamental when covered with such things as Kenilworth ivy, Lycopodium, Tradescantia, and the lovely blue Lobelia. Especially will it flourish if a shade is placed over the whole. Common evergreen ivy may be quickly rooted and made to grow vigorously if planted in a box or dish of earth with a glass over it, looking green and refreshing all winter, and in the spring can be transplanted into the garden outside, where it will cling to the brick wall of your house, and climb much faster in consequence of this early start under glass. Or the long sprays of ivy may be gathered, and the ends put into water in bottles or deep vases, and will there strike roots as vigorous as if planted in soil, the tops being trained around windows and picture-frames with excellent effect.

Window gardens are easily manufactured by those who can not afford the costly terra cotta ones for sale at florists' establishments by taking a wooden box, of a length and breadth suited to the window, and lining it with zinc or tin, adding, in the latter case, a coat of good oil-paint as a preventive of rust. The tin will be cheaper than the zinc, but not nearly so durable. Auger holes bored through the bottom will give the necessary drainage, and the outer wooden sides may be ornamented in various ways. One way is to have a projecting strip of wood—a lath will answer very well—nailed all around the upper edge, and on to this tack a covering of chintz or zephyr-work, which will hang loose from the box itself, and thus avoid danger of dampness. One very pretty style will be to make the ground-

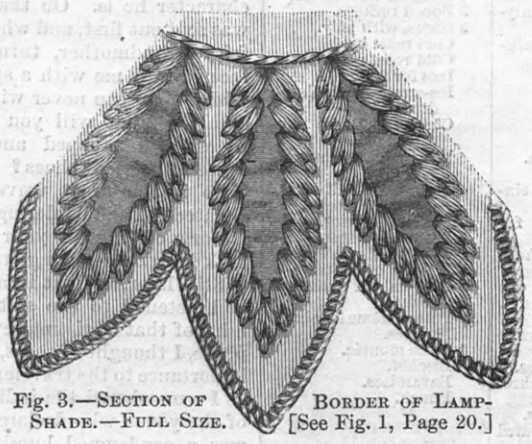

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF BORDER OF LAMP-SHADE.—FULL SIZE. [See Fig. 1, Page 20.]

Fig. 1.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 10 YEARS OLD. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—DOLL'S BRIDAL DRESS (Size, without Head, 21 Inches). For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–4.

Fig. 3.—DOLL'S WALKING SUIT (Size, without Head, 21 Inches). For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5–7.

Fig. 4.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 8–12.

Fig. 5.—DOLL'S MORNING DRESS (Size, without Head, 18 Inches). For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 13–16.

Fig. 6.—DOLL'S VISITING DRESS (Size, without Head, 18 Inches). For description see Supplement.

Fig. 7.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 8.—DOLL'S TRAVELING SUIT (Size, without Head, 20 Inches). For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 17–20.

FIGS. 1–8.—DOLLS' SUITS, AND DRESSES FOR GIRLS FROM 4 TO 10 YEARS OLD.

Hosted by Google

work of Turkey red oiled chintz, upon which is laid in appliqué a wreath of ivy leaves or fern leaves cut out of some black material, either all-wool delaine, cashmere, or gros grain silk, the edges all around the top and bottom being finished with gimp. Or take buff chintz, and ornament it with fern leaves, done in spatter-work, according to taste, and trim the edge with either a black or maroon border. Or the box itself, if smooth and of white wood, can be painted to imitate inlaid-work by tracing a pattern of vines and flowers in pencil, and then filling up all the surface outside the pattern with black paint, leaving the design in white wood. The full directions for this inlaid-work were given in a previous number of the Bazar.

1873.

A PHANTASY.

THE New Year lay a-listening
Amid the drifting snow,
That would not heed
And could not speed,
And knew not where to go.
"Fair Earth," said he,
"If I should come
And make my home
Erewhile with thee,
What precious boon,
By night or noon,
Hast thou for me?"

"Flowers and blight,
And song and storm,
And wintry night
And mid-day warm,
Delight and dole
With love and strife,
Heart and soul
And busy life—
These, good Year,
I'll gift to thee.
And now, sweet Year,
What hast for me?"

Low laughed the Year:
"'Tis well to give
The things I bring
That thou mayst live.
Now tell me, Earth,
Which gifts are thine,
And which are mine,
By right of birth?
And what were I,
Still lacking thee?
And what wert thou,
Bereft of me?"

The Earth had not
A word to say,
But rolled along
Its steady way;
And still the Year lay listening
Amid the drifting snow,
That would not heed
And could not speed,
And knew not where to go.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1873.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of Skating Suits for Lads and Misses from 4 to 15 Years old; Ladies' Evening and Ball Dresses, Walking Suits, House Dresses, Breakfast and Dress Caps, Lingerie, etc.; Girls' Knitted and Crochet Hoods; Sewing-Weights, Blotting-Cushions, Emery Bags, Card-Baskets, Toilette Cushions, Wall-Pockets, Purses, Embroidery Patterns, etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

BILLS OF FARE FOR SUPPER-PARTIES.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

FOR the benefit of persons who desire to give large supper-parties we give other and more extended ménus than those contained in our last article on the subject:

SUPPERS FOR FIFTY PERSONS.

150 Fried oysters.
200 Stewed oysters.
100 Sandwiches, assorted.
Chicken-salad for thirty-five.
Lobster-salad for fifteen.
2 Boned turkeys, or
4 Boned chicken, or
4 Boned grouse.
2 Tongues en Bellevue.
1 Ham, with jelly.
Ice-cream for twenty-five.
Charlotte-Russe for fifteen.
Wine jelly for twenty-five.
30 Éclairs.
20 Cream-cakes or choux.
2 Baskets of assorted cakes.
2 Baskets of fruits.
2 Baskets of candies.
Mottoes.
Bavaroises for thirty.
Punch for twenty.

200 Fried oysters.
200 Stewed oysters.
100 Sandwiches, assorted.
Chicken-salad for thirty.
Lobster-salad for twenty.
Ice-cream for forty.
1 Basket of assorted cakes.
1 Basket of candies.
2 Baskets of fruits.
Mottoes.
Bavaroises for thirty.
Punch for twenty.

SUPPERS FOR ONE HUNDRED PERSONS.

300 Fried oysters.
400 Stewed oysters.
160 Sandwiches, assorted.
Chicken-salad for seventy.
Lobster-salad for thirty.
3 Boned turkeys.
4 Boned grouse.
2 Tongues en Bellevue.
2 Hams, with jelly.
2 Pieces of cold roast beef.
2 Pâtés of game.
Ice-cream for sixty.
Ices, assorted, for forty.
Charlotte-Russe for forty.
Wine jelly for sixty.
2 Babas.
2 Brioches.
2 Cakes, Napolitain.
3 Pyramids of small cakes.
2 Baskets of candied fruits.
4 Baskets of candies.
4 Baskets of fruits.
Mottoes.
Bischof.
Bavaroises.
Punch.

250 Fried oysters.
300 Stewed oysters.
160 Sandwiches, assorted.
Chicken-salad for forty.
Lobster-salad for twenty.
1 Boned turkey.
1 Fillet en Bellevue.
1 Ham.
1 Cold roast turkey.
1 Pâté de foie gras.
Ice-cream for fifty.
2 Baskets of small cakes, assorted.
Candies.
Fruits.
Mottoes.
Bavaroises.
Punch.

SUPPERS FOR TWO HUNDRED PERSONS.

Consommé for forty.
500 Fried oysters.
600 Stewed oysters.
2 Salmons, Génevoise sauce.
300 Sandwiches, assorted.
Lobster-salad for sixty.
Chicken-salad for one hundred and twenty-five.
2 Fillets of beef en Bellevue.
4 Boned turkeys.
2 Hams, with jelly.
2 Pâtés of chicken.
2 Pâtés of game.
Cold roast turkey.
Cold roast chicken.
Cold roast beef.
Ices, assorted, for sixty.
Charlotte-Russe for sixty.
Ice-cream for one hundred and forty.
Wine jellies for one hundred and twenty.
3 Large brioches.
3 Large Savarin cakes.
3 Large biscuits.
3 Large sponge-cakes.
3 Large Pithiviers cakes.
2 Baskets of éclairs.
4 Baskets of candies.
4 Baskets of candied fruits.
4 Baskets of fruits.
Compotes.
Mottoes.
2 Pieces montées.
Pastillages.
Bischof.
Bavaroises.
Punch.

Riz au lait for forty.
400 Fried oysters.
500 Stewed oysters.
300 Sandwiches, assorted.
Lobster-salad for fifty.
Chicken-salad for one hundred.
4 Tongues en Bellevue.
3 Boned turkeys.
3 Hams, with jelly.
Cold roast beef.
Cold roast chicken.
Ices for fifty.
Ice-cream for one hundred.
Charlotte-Russe for fifty.
Wine jellies for seventy-five.
4 Baskets of small cakes, assorted.
1 Basket of kisses.
1 Basket of macaroons.
2 Baskets of candies.
2 Baskets of fruits.
2 Baskets of candied fruits.
Pots of crème for sixty.
Mottoes.
1 Piece montée.
Bischof.
Bavaroises.
Punch.

Our readers will see by the above models that we give quite a variety and an abundance, for the reason that it is easier to omit than to add dishes. The following list, combined with a glossary, will enable them to make bills for suppers, and to vary them according to taste or fancy.

WARM DISHES AND WARM DRINKS.

Consommé.—Rich beef broth.

Consommé de volaille.—Rich broth made with chicken.

Chicken Soup.—Chicken meat cut in small pieces and mixed with rice and broth.

Barley soup.

Riz au lait.—Rice cooked in milk and sweetened.

Riz au gras.—Rice cooked in beef broth.

Oysters, fried, roasted, stewed.

Oysters, scalloped, served either on oyster-shells or on silver shells.

Salmon, Génevoise sauce.—A boiled salmon, served with a Génevoise sauce.

Capon, roasted, served with gravy. Water-cress may be placed around the dish.

Chicken, roasted, served as the above.

Chicken, with rice. Cooked and served with the rice around.

Fillet of beef.—A tenderloin of beef, served with or without mushrooms or truffles, and gravy or sauce.

Fillets of birds.—The breast of birds, or fleshy part on both sides of the breast-bone. When carefully detached they make two appetizing pieces.

Fillets of chicken.—The same as the above.

Lamb-chops aux petits pois.—Lamb-chops served with green pease.

Grouse, roasted, served with gravy, and water-cress around.

Partridges, roasted, served as the above.

Pheasants, roasted, served as the above.

Quails, roasted, served as the above.

Fritters of apples, bananas, pine-apples, or any other fruit. The latter may be flavored with extracts.

Petits pains.—Small cakes of the shape of French loaves, made with flour, butter, sugar, eggs, and yeast. They are generally served with the bavaroises.

Rice pudding is served warm at supper.

Tea, coffee, and chocolate are served with warm or cold milk.

Bavaroises.—Chocolate and milk, flavored with extract of orange-flower water (eau de fleur d'oranger), and sweetened with sirup made with loaf-sugar, served as warm as possible in glasses.

Bischof.—This delicious beverage is made with white or red Burgundy wines or with Champagne, flavored with Seville oranges, cloves, cinnamon, coriander, and nutmegs; served hot in punch-glasses, with a slice of lemon in each glass.

Punch.—To serve punch warm it is placed on a slow fire when the rum is added. It must not be boiled.

COLD DISHES AND COLD DRINKS.

En Bellevue means one or more pieces inside of meat jelly. Every dish served en Bellevue is kept on ice, and not placed on the table until just before the supper is served. The temperature of the dining-room, which should be about 66° Fahrenheit, would melt the jelly, destroy the appearance of the dish, and spoil its taste, if kept at so high a temperature for some time.

With jelly means one or more articles of food served with meat jelly on top or around them, or both ways. The jelly is generally cut in fanciful and tasteful shapes. Like the preceding, it must not be put on the table until just before the supper is served. When two or more dishes are served with jelly it is better to have one Bellevue, and the other with jelly in pieces.

Buisson.—Buisson of —— means served in the shape of a dome more or less flattened on the top, according to the article served. To facilitate the building of the dome, the soft part of two, three, or four loaves of bread is cut of the shape desired, and united as closely together as possible by means of butter spread on the flat sides, so that they will adhere together. The bread is also buttered all around to cause the pieces making the buisson to adhere to the bread, so that when the pieces are tastefully placed around it makes an elegant dish. Croûtons, cut in fancy shapes, may also be placed all around the border of the dish.

We shall continue this glossary in a future article.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Pinching Shoes.

MY DEAR TIMOTHY,—One Christmas-eve long ago, at Andrea's, in the country, we played games all the evening, and hung up a sprig of holly for want of mistletoe, and your ample grandmother was the fairy whom we all sought to bring to judgment under that green bough. But when, tired of romping, we settled into more tranquil amusements, I remember that we played at "famous people." This is a game in which one person goes out, and those who remain agree upon some historic or fictitious character, and the absentee upon his return must guess, from the questions asked, what character he is. On that old Christmas I was sent out first, and when I returned, your fairy grandmother, turning her laughing face toward me with a sparkling sweetness which time can never wither, asked me solemnly, "What will you take for your old shoes?" I stopped and thought. Who especially need shoes? Travelers, surely. Who is the great traveler? Instantly I shouted, "The Wandering Jew;" and amidst a storm of laughter your fairy grandmother took her turn in going out.

Still later, as I sat in a corner of the sofa and listened to the soft music which the fairy of that Christmas-eve played upon the piano, I thought of shoes, and of their prime importance to the traveler, and I laughed out as I remembered the indignant exclamation of the youth who declared that Mont Blanc was a condemned humbug, but afterward confessed that when he saw it he was undergoing the torture of the tight boot. Indeed, the pleasure of travel is at the mercy of shoes. In those bright days when I walked through Switzerland—Switzerland, which lies forever in my imagination bathed in dewy morning air, because I saw it in unclouded youth—in those bright days a peg, or a chafing point, or a pebble in the shoe would have wrecked the perfect vision and blurred my memory. Those trusty friends, those comfortable strong shoes, may St. Crispin forget me when I forget them! They hang in my closet still. I touch them with these old hands, and once more I hear the jödel and the avalanche, and "I am the boy of the mountain."

On the walls of my chamber, also, you may have seen the pretty portrait of a fair-haired girl with soft, round cheeks and wondering eyes—those eyes of wonder and expectancy which so often I see in dear children. Is it sad to see them? Why should it be? All the long ages of woe and tragic disappointment, all the world full of sorrowful faces—and lo! they come, those clear, inquiring eyes, looking out from under unwrinkled brows, full of hope and faith and love; yes, believing all things, hoping all things, while we know the shadow and the disappointment which they do not suspect! Is it this knowledge which makes those wondering eyes so sad? Is it the tenderness of pity which softens our hearts toward children? No no: it is not our superiority, but our humility. We came into the world, too, with that blithe triumph of expectation, and we have succumbed; we have been conquered. And now when our successors appear, with the conquering mien and the eyes of expectation, we speak to them as the hapless victims of the Inferno spoke to Dante and his guide. Our hearts cry out, "Oh, never sink to this, ye living, happy ones! Oh, win the victory that we could not!"

So my thoughts wander as I see that picture of the fair-haired girl. It is my little aunt Mildred, whom you remember, perhaps, as a wan old lady in deep black, who

"Lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave—and oh!
The difference to me!"

As I sat in the sofa corner reflecting upon shoes, I laughed again as I thought of my little aunt. Her father was a man of grave and even severe deportment: one of those who seem to have been born respectable middle-aged people, from whose natures and experience all the gay frivolity of youth has been eliminated. Yet they are not really cold and hard, and half of their seeming gravity is due to their conscious incapacity not to seem grave, and their equal consciousness that they are therefore less beloved by those to whom their own hearts are utterly devoted. Is it only in fairy stories that you find enchantment? I see much more in my experience than I ever found in the stories.

My grave grandfather was very fond of his children, but he would not easily show it. They were a little afraid of him, and that again made him still graver and them more timid. The little Mildred was especially the charge of her next older sister, Oriana, and it is a family tradition that on a certain Sunday the two went to church, and Mildred was so restless that after the admonitory nods and winks and nudges and scowls from Oriana, which were of no avail, the elder sister turned and whispered to her, severely, "Very well, miss, I shall tell papa when we go home." Poor little Aunt Mildred sat in fearful expectation, but could not sit still. The return from church was like a funeral procession, or a march to condign punishment. What tremors shook that little heart! What visions of awful penalties! It was natural but unjust, and when the rigorous Oriana kept her word and told the tale, little Mildred exclaimed, piteously, with a burst of agonized tears, "But, dear papa, my new shoes pinched so!"

"There, Oriana," said my grandfather, "of course the poor child has been suffering tortures. See that she has a new pair of shoes immediately."

They are all gone, Timothy, but I remember the pinching shoes, and often, since then, that exclamation of my little aunt has saved many a man in my judgment. If he misbehaves, I have but to reflect that his new shoes pinch so! and wrath dissolves in pity. How often Harry comes in late from the shop where he has been working hard all day, and he has had vague thoughts that if the rainy day should come suddenly, there is not much of that "provision" which we are all exhorted to make for it; and a wandering pain somewhere has seemed to his excited imagination a scout of the last enemy. Lucy's welcoming smile only deepens more painfully the sense of uncertainty and the possible tragedy. Harry is silent, abstracted, moody. Lucy is startled, mortified, unhappy. 'Tis a whim only upon his part. 'Tis nothing that he could name. Mistress Lucy, be patient—patient! Harry is not wantonly restless and troubled. His shoes pinch him sorely.

Or it is Lucy who has asked a few friends to dine, and there will be a very modest feast, as befits the family purse. She is the best of housekeepers. Her glory is the neatness of her household detail. The table linen, you will observe if you dine there, is not damask, and the cookery is not French, but it is most toothsome. To-day Lucilla is to be one of the guests, and she is not less notable than Lucy for the precision of her house. It is a gay little party in the little parlor. I see no diamonds. I see no air of condescension upon the part of Mrs. Wholesale toward Mrs. Retail. There is a gentle hum of pleasure, and I know that Lucy is thinking placidly of that fish which will be so cooked that Apicius would gladly have foregone the gold service at the Midases' could he only have been invited to Lucy's. Presently we descend to the table. It is neat, not splendid, and there is a nameless promise of enjoyment. Lucy is very bland, and as Lucilla is helped to fish Lucy can not forbear to look at her in good-humored expectation. As Lucilla tastes there is an undefinable expression upon her face, so undefinable that Lucy is impatient to taste also. She smiles in conversation with Adonis as she does so—and lo! the fish is burned in the cooking! Harry wonders why Lucy is so restless, so troubled. The poor fellow perceives that it is not a pleasant dinner. He looks at Lucy as Oriana looked at my little aunt Mildred. My dear Harry, don't be angry. Poor Lucy can not sit still and attend, for her new shoes pinch dreadfully!

But there are some of our fellow-travelers who plod steadily on with their feet actually crushed in their shoes. They smile so airily and sweetly that you suppose they are thinking only of the beauty of the landscape. Yet they are really conscious only of their suffering. When I was a younger man Dolcio was the famous and favorite singer. The public thrilled with every note, and his private friends thought him the most enviable of men. The ladies of beauty and of fashion hung his portrait in their bowers, and sang his songs merely to renew the delight of hearing the notes that he warbled. Dolcio seemed to enjoy it all with placid satisfaction, and as he stood upon the stage one evening Publicola said to me, "What a happy man!" And I answered, "Yes; his shoes, at least, don't pinch!" Yet I afterward knew that he had been accompanied to the theatre by constables and by his terrified wife; and that even while the theatre thrilled with delight as his marvelous voice rose and fell in cadences endlessly sweet, the constables had him in full view from behind the scenes that he might not escape, and his wife, with clasped hands and breaking heart, sat in his dressing-room, a statue of woe.

Debt of every kind was ambushed all around him. He was never sure that he would not be arrested just as he was stepping amidst rapturous applause to the footlights. His wife's life was a prolonged terror. But how placid he was! How calmly he smiled! His shoes pinched more cruelly than my little aunt Mildred's, but he sat very still; and Dolcio was the one man of whom, from all that appeared, it would have been said that his shoes were perfectly easy. You see how it is, dear Timothy: we are all travelers, and our travel is as endless as that of the Wandering Jew. We must wear shoes; and which of us do they not pinch? I open my eyes in these Christmas mornings upon the wondering eyes of my little aunt Mildred, and as I dress myself, thinking of her cruel shoes, I go down to breakfast disposed to think, when I see a sour face or hear a cross word, "Poor fellow, I pity him. How his shoes must pinch!"

Hosted by Google

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

IRISH POPLINS.

IRISH poplins are very fashionably worn abroad. Twilled fabrics were in marked favor in Paris for several seasons before they became popular here, consequently the fickle Parisiennes are beginning to weary of them, and in their love of variety are again using fine heavily repped goods, such as Sicilienne, cashmere, and Pim's Irish poplin. The probability is that all repped goods that are sufficiently soft to drape gracefully will soon be restored to favor, and in view of this fact careful purchasers are supplying themselves with the fine poplins of Pim's best qualities, that are now sold for $1 50 a yard. All the quaint colors now in vogue are found among these goods; but as all peculiar shades have but transient popularity, it is safer to purchase a black poplin, or dark blue, or else one of the clear silvery gray hues that make up so handsomely. A jet black poplin, trimmed with jet and fringe, is as stylish a dress as a rich gros grain. The creamy white poplin, when well made, and trimmed with white velvet (not satin), looks like heavy Ottoman silk, and makes an elegant and comparatively inexpensive wedding dress. The skirt of such a dress should be without flounces. Velvet bands and a thick cord of passementerie should trim the train. A frill of point appliqué lace, with velvet piping for heading, is the garniture for the corsage.

WAISTCOATS AND VESTS.

As the season advances it is evident that the favorite corsages are basques, with the sleeveless jackets called waistcoats. These waistcoats are of different material, or else a darker shade than the coat sleeves of the basque. They may be made as part of the garment, or else separate and added after for warmth. The latter plan is adopted for very slight figures. Velvet waistcoats on silk basques are especially admired. The only trimming admitted on the waistcoat is one or two thick cords of silk as an edge for the garment. Waistcoats with very long fronts that form a sort of tablier are worn with polonaises.

Colored silk vests are much worn with black dresses. A vest of cherry silk brightens up a dinner dress of black silk for a brunette; a delicate shade of lavender gros grain is chosen for the vest of a black suit worn by a blonde. Black cashmere over dresses, basques, and polonaises have also colored vests. White or black moiré antique vests are considered stylish with black dresses, and a vest of turquoise blue moiré is also shown with jet buttons down the front. Watered ribbon bows and belt, with buttons of oxidized silver, accompany black moiré vests.

These fanciful vests offer a good plan for remodeling a dress that is too narrow across the chest. The sleeveless jackets just described are also useful for freshening a corsage that is partly worn or soiled.

Pointed bodices for elaborate dresses are introduced in Paris. These have a deep point under each arm, as well as in the front and back. Pendent ornaments, such as tassels or fringe, edge these points. This corsage is a variation of the antique chatelaine bodice that French modistes are attempting to revive.

VELVET SKIRTS AND COSTUMES.

With the return of midwinter a few black velvet costumes appear on the Avenue. These are invariably made with a polonaise and single skirt, trimmed with jet, faille, and lace, or else with bands of dark fur, such as the black fox, black fisher, or the silver-fox. The costume, however, most frequently seen on elegantly dressed women consists of a velvet skirt with a camel's-hair polonaise, made in the fashion set forth in the Bazar early in the fall. Black, brown, olive, and sea blue suits are the most stylish. Velveteen with silk face is often used for these skirts, and also for waistcoats. The best qualities of brown velveteen are almost as handsome for this purpose as silk velvet; the difference between black velveteen and velvet is far more evident.

EMBROIDERIES.

A novelty in fancy-work is shown among the many pretty things prepared for holiday gifts. This is gray linen, or else Turkish toweling, cut in open arabesque designs, embroidered with silks of the same color, and placed as a tidy-cover over sofa-pillows or cushions of crimson or blue velvet. When completed it looks like rich appliqué-work, and produces a beautiful effect. Stripes for the back of chairs are made in the same way.

Another novelty, a suitable gift for a gentleman, is a foot-rest, beneath which is a spring which, when touched by the foot, throws up the cushion and discloses a spittoon. Egyptian heads, well shaded, are wrought in fine petit point stitches on these foot-rests, or else the owner's monogram is the ornament. They are mounted on benches of gilt, walnut, or black wood, which cost from $7 50 to $12 each; when completed by the embroidery, the price is from $15 to $25. A slipper-rest and boot-jack combined is also another convenient and pretty article for a gentleman's room. The case for the slippers is embroidered, and hangs from a black-walnut frame, to which the boot-jack is attached. Shaving-paper stands and small light-screens are leather banners, stamped with fern leaves, and mounted on gilt frames. Waste-paper baskets for the library, and scrap-baskets for a lady's sewing-room, are of bamboo or of willow, lined with silk, and trimmed with little lambrequins of embroidered cloth: price from $9 to $25. Work-baskets, music-stands, round boxes for collars and cuffs, long boxes for combs and brushes, and nécessaires holding toilette articles, are among the gifts that are ornamented with needle-work.

FANCY GOODS FOR HOLIDAY GIFTS.

The present love for the antique is shown in the partiality for black bronzes. This dark bronze, slightly relieved with green, appears in the various ornaments, Roman and Greek heads, statuettes of mythological characters, clocks, and mantel-pieces. Finely chased silver bronzes are also among the choice fancies. The pale green bronze called verd antique is now most seen in the bird and animal pieces, and it is said will soon be thought passée. Mantel sets for drawing-rooms consist of a statuette for a centre piece, with vases on each side; boudoir and library sets have a low clock in the centre, with side pieces that do duty as drop lights. Very small pairs of clear bronze vases can be bought as low as $30; larger ones range from $90 to $200.

Low mantel clocks—a gift prized by housewives—are shown in the dark red brocatel marble now so sought after. The mountings are of green bronze and gilt. Black marble clocks are also shown, with mountings in quaint devices.

While the sombre classic bronzes abound in the library and other stately rooms, the bright-hued bisque figures are chosen for cozy boudoirs and sitting-rooms. Among these are statuettes artistically colored representing peasant women, water-carriers, Neapolitan fishermen, flower-girls, and also animals and birds. A golden pheasant, life-like in color and size, is $90; a slender greyhound, crouching in a natural and graceful position, attracts admiration, and is marked $100.

Vases of majolica and other wares are also in odd designs, representing pannier mules, camels, and elephants, with their baskets and pack-saddles filled with flowers. A curious vase for the centre of the table is a long gondola, manned with tiny gondoliers, and placed on a glass platter that reflects it on every side.

New jewel-cases are of thick transparent crystal, with gilt mountings. In the bottom of the box is a satin cushion, on which the jewels are displayed. Glove and mouchoir boxes are also shown in crystal and gilt: price $50. Among the beautiful Russia leather goods are jewel-cases with various trays cushioned with satin, that is visible through the crystal top: price $40. Glove-boxes of red Russia leather with crystal tops are $35. Photographic albums of red Russia leather have quaint little music-boxes attached, and cost from $25 to $35. Smaller musical albums of plainer materials are from $7 50 upward. English goods are represented by desks of Coromandel, walnut, and ebony woods, worth $35 to $60. Book-racks to correspond with these have malachite and porcelain settings, and cost from $15 to $25.

The newest card-receivers are of gilt bronze, with fine porcelain centres in bright colors. A fanciful pair of gilt bronze candlesticks for holding decorative wax-candles is a suitable present for the Christmas season. Jewel-stands, cigar-stands, ash-receivers, inkstands, scent-bottles, and tiny call-bells of silvery note are displayed in this finely polished bronze. The bells cost from $3 to $8.

Oxidized silver forms part of the ornamentation of two-thirds of the fanciful things shown. It appears as part of the table plate, it ornaments bronzes, and is worn as jewelry in the shape of chatelaines, sleeve-buttons, etc. Gifts of this metal are decidedly a feature of the season, but the fancy for it will, it is predicted, be transient. Chatelaines of this silver are sold as low as $2; other elaborate chains have ivory tablets and flagons for perfume attached.

Opera-glasses of smoked pearl are most appreciated this winter. They are also mounted in tortoise-shell and red Russia leather. Charming holiday gifts are the fine bonbonnières of enameled gilt and of crystal. Candy-bags of painted satin are also shown: price $6. Boxes representing grotesque figures, birds, and animals are filled with bonbons.

Among Japanese goods are glove-boxes of lacquered ware, worth $2, and fanciful cabinets of various sizes. For school-girls are plain writing-desks with lock and key: price $3. Small musical boxes that play two airs are $5. Neatly fitted work-baskets of willow, with gay silk linings, cost $3; with tinted leather linings these are $9. Traveling-clocks scarcely four inches high, with crystal sides and gilt frames, tick cheerily and sound a loud alarm: price from $30 upward. For the hearth are fire-iron stands—dogs or cats, natural-looking in size and color, painted on sheet-iron, to which a stand for the fire-irons is attached: price $10.

For information received thanks are due, for dresses and dress goods, to Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; A. SELIG & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and for holiday gifts, to Messrs. SHEPPARD, LE BOUTILLIER, & Co.; DAVIS COLLAMORE & Co.; and NICOL & DAVIDSON.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev. MATTHEW HALE SMITH, who writes good letters to the Boston Journal, says that, among his other peculiarities, HENRY WARD BEECHER never furnishes his choir with the hymns. He told Mr. CAMP, the leader, that he didn't know when he went into the pulpit what he was going to preach; how, then, could he furnish the hymns? "Can't you give me some clew?" "If I did that, you would know what I was going to preach; and if you knew that, I would not preach it." He has no idea what hymn he will sing when the sermon is ended; so the Plymouth choir sing without the slightest rehearsal. While it is true that Mr. BEECHER prepares most of his sermons on Sunday—for he says he "likes his bread hot"—he not unfrequently changes his whole plan after he gets into the pulpit. The Sunday papers often furnish him with a theme for discourse. Mr. BEECHER is one of the finest talkists in the world, and he can talk as well on one subject as another, with warning or without.

—When SOUTHEY was offered a half share in two newspapers, the Morning Post and the Courier, by which he could probably have secured $10,000 a year, he replied, "I will not give up the country and the lazy reading of old folios for two thousand times two thousand pounds: in short, beyond £350 a year, I consider money as a real evil."

—Speaking of ANTHONY TROLLOPE, what a nice bit this of his in the Eustace Diamonds. Speaking of Lucy, he says: "She believed in herself, thinking of herself that should it ever be her lot to be a man's wife, she would be to him a true, loving friend and companion, living in his joys, and fighting, if it were necessary, down to the stumps of her nails in his interests."

—Mrs. MILLINA FAIRCLOTH, of Mitchel County, Iowa, is one hundred and sixteen years old, and so sprightly that there is thought to be a fair prospect of celebrating her Millina-ry.

—EDMOND ABOUT received $2000 for writing an account of his recent imprisonment by the Germans at Strasburg—which is about all that it's worth.

—The leading actors at the theatres in this city are by no means badly paid. JOHN BROUGHAM has a weekly salary of $300, and a handsome income besides from his many plays; Mrs. JOHN WOOD gets $600; ROSE HERSEE, $500; STUART ROBSON, $150. These are at the Grand Opera-House. At the Fifth Avenue Theatre Miss DAVENPORT (whom BOUCICAULT pronounces one of the best light-comedy actresses of the day) gets $150; GEORGE CLARK, $125; JAMES LEWIS, $125; PLESSY MORDAUNT, $80; JENNY LEE, $60; EMILY MESTAYER, $50. There are very many others receiving salaries ranging from $30 to $60 a week. Most of these are prudent, money-saving people, regular visitors at the savings-banks.

—Dr. WATERS, of Holton, Maine, is a careful man with his money, though a little forgetful. Not long since he threw aside one of his old coats to be converted into carpet-rags, and a few days ago, as his wife was tearing it to pieces, she found thirty-five dollars in greenbacks in the lining. Every married woman in that town is now tearing up old clothes with an ultimate hope of greenbacks.

—Mr. FROUDE observed to an interviewer, "I pronounce the ou in my name like oo in fool." The inter man thought F. might perhaps mean to be personal; but he didn't say so.

—Professor MARSH, of Yale, who went off to the Rocky Mountains with two or three students to see what he could ferret out in the way of fossils, has got back, and says he made a good thing of it.

—The late Lord DERBY, when Prime Minister of England, boasted that of the thirteen members of his cabinet six were educated at the same public school (Eton) with himself. Five out of the seven officers (not princes of the blood royal) who rose to the rank of field-marshal—the highest position in the British army—between 1810 and 1856, were educated at the same public school (Westminster).

—"George Eliot's" new novel, Middlemarch, which is universally conceded to be a masterpiece in the literature of fiction, is just issued by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS in two handsome volumes, at the moderate price of three dollars and fifty cents. The English edition will be in four volumes, and the price nearly twelve dollars. The difference is very suggestive. In England this novel can be read only by the few, while in this country it will be the delight of thousands of households. English authors have, in fact, more readers in this country than in their own.

—This of Mr. GREELEY: A young autograph-hunter, and a poor penman withal, residing in Central New York, wrote to Mr. G. some years ago, requesting his autograph, and received by return mail his own letter with the following indorsement: "It gives me great pleasure to comply with the wish of a young man who writes worse than I do.—H. GREELEY."

—Regarding the operatic season just closed in this city, the following facts may interest musical people: The ten performances at which Miss KELLOGG was the attraction gave a return of $21,620, while the thirty in which LUCCA appeared brought $128,793, making a total of $150,413. This exceeds by nearly $30,000 the sum that NILSSON brought to the treasury last year.

—The first lady who ever had the high felicity of dining with the Prime Minister of Japan was Lady HORNBY. She did that a few weeks ago.

—The funeral of EDWIN FORREST took place in Philadelphia on the 17th December, and was largely attended. The pall-bearers were Colonel J. W. FORNEY, GEORGE W. CHILDS, DANIEL DOUGHERTY, Colonel JAMES PAGE, and JAMES OAKES. With the exception of an annuity of $2500 to his intimate friend JAMES OAKES, of Boston, $5000 each to DANIEL DOUGHERTY and JAMES LAWSON, $10,000 to Miss ELIZABETH WELSH, daughter of JOHN R. WELSH, Esq., and two or three smaller legacies, all his property is to be devoted to the founding and endowment of the "Edwin Forrest Home," for the support of actors and actresses decayed by age or disabled by infirmities. Mr. FORREST'S superb library is to be located in the Home, which shall also contain a gallery for his pictures, and a neat theatre for private exhibitions and histrionic culture, to which pupils shall be admitted.

—Sir JOHN BOWRING, recently deceased, who has been before the world as author and politician for sixty years, is spoken of by one of the leading literary papers of London as a "considerable linguist, though in the judgment of many scholars a slatternly one, and as his foible was omniscience, he frequently attempted enterprises which he needed assistance to carry out. He was a good statist, and had considerable imagination, which in the East influenced his politics. There exists among Lord CANNING'S papers a letter from Sir J. BOWRING, written about the beginning of 1857, in which he laid before the viceroy a very remarkable proposal, which, had it been accepted, would have ended in the conquest of Southern China. It is quite possible that Sir JOHN BOWRING missed his vocation, and that as an Indian civilian he might have been a great success, the great men of that service having, from HASTINGS downward, often united high practical capacity with feeble literary ambitions."

—Princess LOUISE, the Marchioness of Lorne, has been elected president of the British National Union for improving the education of women.

—The leading generals of France are of foreign descent. M'MAHON comes of Irish parents, L'ADMIRAULT'S father is a Spaniard, DE CISSEY is from Belgium, DUCROT'S grandfather was a German, and LAFOREST'S grandfather was a Swiss from Geneva.

—Mr. PETER HENDERSON states, after repeated and thorough experiments with pure water, sawdust, charcoal, anthracite, brick-dust, and sands of all colors and textures, that cuttings placed in each, in the same temperature, rooted almost simultaneously and equally well.

—SHAKSPEARE produced all his plays with about 15,000 words; MILTON'S works are built up with 8000; and the Old Testament says all that it has to say with 5642 words.

—Of CHARLES DICKENS it is related that, somewhere about the middle of the serial publication of David Copperfield, happening to be out of writing-paper, he sallied forth one morning to get a fresh supply at the stationer's to begin work on his next number. He stood aside a moment at the threshold to allow a lady to pass in before him. As he entered he overheard the lady asking for the new green number. When it was handed to her she said, "Oh, I have read this; I want the next one." "Listening to this unrecognized," Mr. DICKENS afterward said, "and remembering that not a word of the number she was asking for was yet written, for the first and only time in my life I felt frightened."

—The ex-King of Naples has received an intimation that his private fortune will be restored to him on condition that he will hereafter abstain from all political intrigue, conspiracies, and objectionable little caucuses of all sorts.

—JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, ex-United States Senator from Louisiana, has achieved such distinction at the English bar that it is not unlikely that he will be elevated to the bench. Such an event is talked of as more than probable. His practice is already very large and growing.

—One of the principal topics of gossip just now in London is the marriage of Mr. T. A. MITCHELL, a member of Parliament, to a London bar-maid. The bridegroom is a wealthy merchant, and a member of the leading clubs. The bride is a young woman of great personal attractions, who has filled the useful position before mentioned, and is the daughter of the hall porter of the Duke of Leinster. It is said that he was induced to this by the events that followed a casual visit to the house where the lady officiated. The attentions then given and the commiseration shown in a temporary illness that required a stimulant, so won the gentleman's heart that he sought and obtained her hand and the consent of her astonished parent. In addition to the position to which the lady has now attained she will have, so runs the rumor, a settlement of $50,000. The ceremony was performed by special license at St. James's Church, Piccadilly, shortly after eight o'clock in the morning, the early hour having been chosen in order to avoid the crowd which always attends a mid-day wedding at a West End church. As an additional precaution the venue also was changed at the last moment. When it was expected that the ceremony would be performed at St. George's, Hanover Square, the church was half filled with bar-maids. The "best man" was the bridegroom's medical attendant.

—Mr. HENRY DICKENS, a son of the novelist, has been admitted to the bar. He graduated with honor at Cambridge. We shall see what he will do as a Chancery man when he gets something in the Jarndyce v. Jarndyce way.

—There were some naughty things done by the failure of the BOWLES BROTHERS—especially wrong and shabby toward the ladies. Two Canadian ladies, teachers, had just arrived in Paris, having, after several years, saved money enough to visit Europe to obtain the Parisian accent for their French. They banked with BOWLES, and now find themselves penniless. The wife of Father HYACINTHE is said to have lost a large part of her fortune in the concern. A New York lady in Paris found herself compelled to pawn one of her diamonds to raise money to pay for a cable telegram to New York for a remittance, etc., etc.

—"Chum," the NAST of Paris, advises that the desk of the tribune in the French National Assembly should be covered with pieces of broken bottles, like garden walls, in order to prevent the orators from continually thumping it with their fists. M. GAMBETTA is considered the greatest sinner in this respect.

—The Rev. HUGH STOWELL BROWN, one of those clever English preachers who have beamed upon us during the last year or two, has returned to his native Liverpool, and given the Liverpoolians a lecture on "The People of America"—a somewhat numerous topic for an hour's talk—in which he said that in America the proportion of tall men was much greater than in England, although it was very rarely that a jolly-looking face was to be seen in the United States. (Which is good. "Let us all be unhappy together!") The people of America he considered, were distinguished for their sobriety, but we were especially weak on the subject of finery. In personal cleanliness the Americans seemed to him superior to the English; and as for affability, England was nowhere!

Hosted by Google

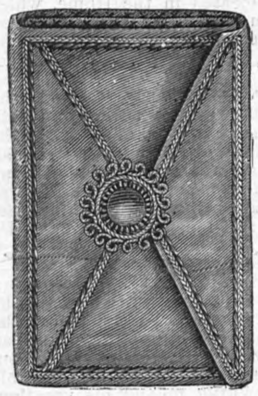

Fig. 1.—PHOTOGRAPH CASE.—CLOSED.
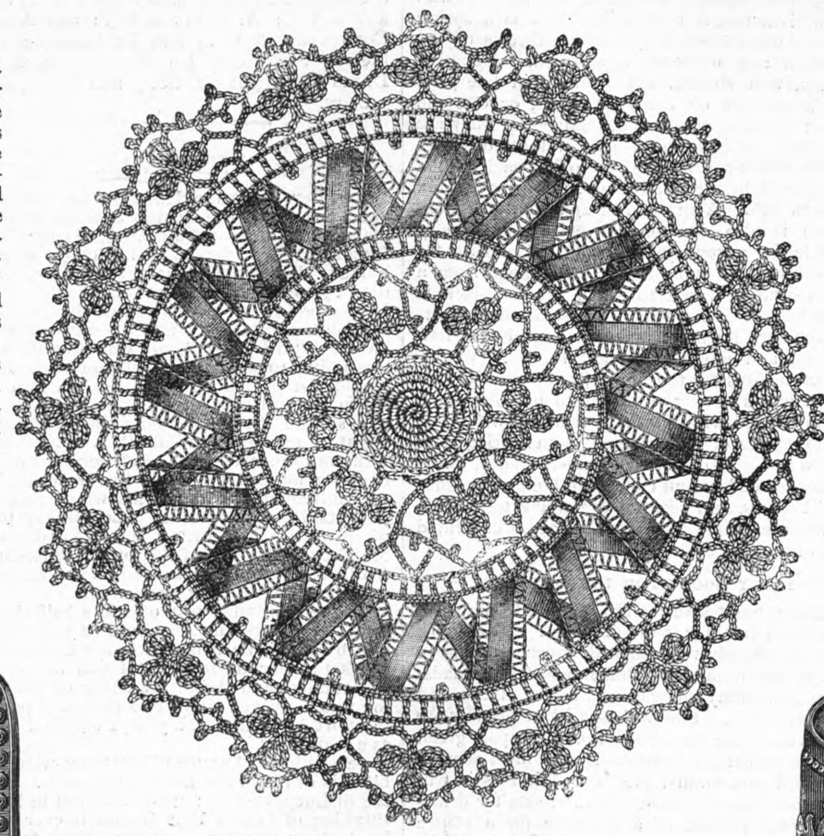
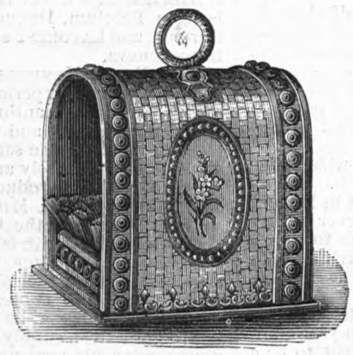
[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 54.

Point Lace and Crochet Rosette.

THIS rosette is suitable for setting together covers, trimming toilette cushions, etc. It is worked with point lace braid and twisted crochet cotton, Nos. 40 and 80. Begin the rosette in the middle, and crochet with the coarse cotton on a foundation of 4 ch. (chain stitch) closed in a ring first six rounds of sc. (single crochet), in doing which always insert the needle in both upper veins of the stitches, and in every round widen so many stitches that the 6th round counts 36 sc. 7th round.—∗ 5 ch., pass over 2 st. (stitch), 1 sc. on the next st., 7 ch., then for the first leaflet of a three-leaved figure work 3 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) on the first of these, 1 sc. on the lower vein of this dc., 1 dc. on the same ch. on which the preceding dc. was worked, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the 2 dc. were worked, inserting the needle in both upper veins of this ch. This completes one leaflet. Now crochet two similar leaflets, but before and after the next leaflet work 1 ch.; for the stem of the three-leaved figure work 5 sl. (slip stitches) on the next 5 ch., then 2 ch., 1 sc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. At the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last sc. of the 6th round and fasten the thread. 8th round.—With the finer cotton ∗ work 1 dc. on the middle st. of the middle leaflet in the next figure, 8 ch., 1 p. (picot) turned downward; to do this crochet 5 ch., draw the needle out of the st., insert it in the first of the 5 ch., and draw through the dropped st.; 7 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next leaflet of the same figure, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the following ch. scallop, 2 ch., 1 p. turned upward, that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these; 2 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the first leaflet of the next figure, 7 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 2 ch., fasten to the large ch. scallop opposite; to do this drop the last st. from the needle, draw it through the third ch. before the sc. which was worked on the last leaflet of the preceding figure, work 1 ch., again draw the needle out of the st., insert it in the second following ch. of the same scallop, and draw through the dropped st. Now crochet 14 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. after the p. of the ch. scallop previously worked, 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 8 ch., and repeat from ∗. Finally, fasten to the first dc. of this round with 1 sl. After finishing this centre take point lace braid, arrange it in 16 points as shown by the illustration, and with the finer cotton crochet on one side of the braid two rounds as follows: 1st round.—On the extremity of each point work 10 sc., between these always 4 ch., at the end of the round work 1 sl. on the first sc. 2d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then always alternately 2 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st. of the preceding round, after every fourth dc. fasten to a ch. scallop in the last round of the centre of the rosette, as shown by the illustration. Finally, work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. On the other side of the point lace points crochet four rounds, the first two with the finer cotton as follows: 1st round.—On the extremity of each point work 10 sc., and between these always 4 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 4 ch. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 dc., 2 ch., with these always pass over 2 st. 3d round (with the coarser cotton).—Crochet, as shown by the illustration, and similar to the 7th round of the centre, always alternately ch. scallops, sc., and three-leaved figures; the latter, however, are separated each by 3 ch. scallops, each of which covers 4 st. of the preceding round, and before the first leaflet of each figure work only 8 ch., and after the last leaflet work for the stem of the same figure 3 sl. on the corresponding ch. 4th round (with the finer cotton).—∗ 1 sc. on the middle st. of the middle ch. scallop between two three-leaved figures of the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 dc. on the middle st. of the next leaflet, 6 ch., 1 p. turned upward (all picots of this round are crocheted upward), 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fifth of the 6 ch. before the p. before the last, so that a loop is formed, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 6 ch. previously worked, 2 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the first dc. of the middle leaflet of the next figure, 1 ch., 3 p. separated each by 1 ch., 2 ch., 1 dc. on the last dc. of the same leaflet, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 p., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the middle st. of the third leaflet of the same figure, 4 ch., and repeat from ∗; always fasten the middle st. of the loop to the second p. of the ch. scallop to the right, as shown by the illustration. At the end of the round, however, fasten the corresponding p. to the loop worked in the beginning of the round.

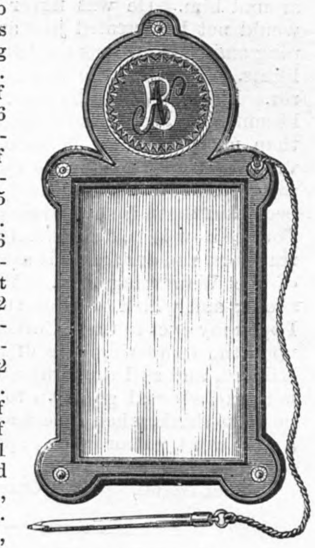


POINT LACE AND CROCHET ROSETTE.



EMBROIDERED PEN-WIPER.

Fig. 2.—PHOTOGRAPH CASE.—OPEN.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 54.



EMBROIDERED TABLET.

EMBROIDERED NAPKIN-RING.

Embroidered Tablet.

THIS tablet consists of light silica. The back of the tablet and the frame are covered with red Russia leather; on the upper side of the frame the cover is trimmed with small buttons and plates of bronze and steel. The medallion at the middle of the top of the frame is of silver gray silk ornamented in point Russe embroidery, and a monogram worked in satin stitch with red silk and gold thread, and is edged with fine gold cord. Instead of a monogram, petit point embroidery on paper or silk canvas with silk of various colors may be used for the medallion. Instead of the Russia leather cover, a cover of brown or dark gray enameled cloth may be made. A leather-covered pencil fastened to red silk cord completes the tablet.

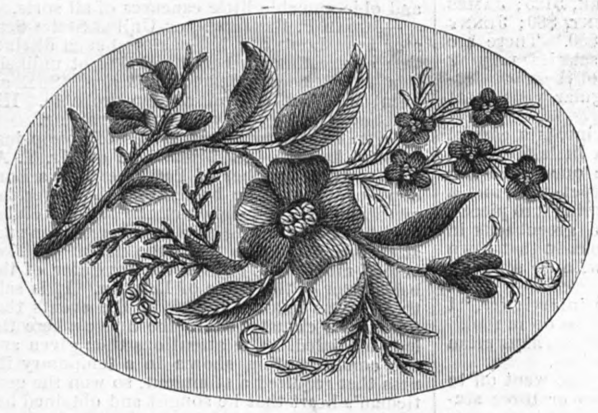


Fig. 1.—SATIN STITCH MEDALLION.

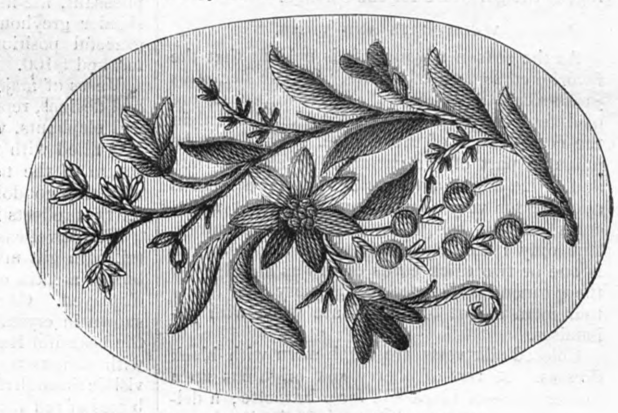

Fig. 2.—SATIN STITCH MEDALLION.

Photograph Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

To make this case cut of brown silk and brown enameled cloth one piece each from Fig. 54, Supplement, for the outer cover, leaving half an inch extra material all around the piece of silk. For the inside of the case cut of card-board three pieces of equal size, each of which corresponds with the larger spaces edged by dotted lines on Fig. 54, and one piece which reaches from the point of the flap to the next dotted line. Cover the card-board designed for the flap with brown silk on one side, paste white watered paper on the remaining three pieces, and baste the frames made of brown silk and lining as shown by Fig. 2, and ornamented in point Russe and knotted stitch embroidery with light and dark brown silk, on the outer edge of these pieces, excepting one lengthwise side; the frames are left unfastened on the side mentioned, so as to slip in the photographs. After fastening all the card-board pieces ornamented in this manner on the right side of the enameled cloth as shown by Fig. 2, furnish the silk designed for the outer cover with a monogram of gold cord on one of the outer sides, and with fine gold braid and half-polka stitches of brown silk on the other outer side and on the flap, as shown by Fig. 1. To close the case set on a small circular piece covered with silk and edged with button-hole stitches and gold cord, as shown by Fig. 1, which cov-

Fig. 1.—GIRL'S CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 48-50.

Fig. 2.—BOY'S BARATHEA BERET.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 51.

Fig. 3.—GIRL'S SILK HOOD.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

FIGS. 1-3.—HOODS AND BERET FOR CHILDREN UNDER ONE YEAR OLD.

Hosted by Google

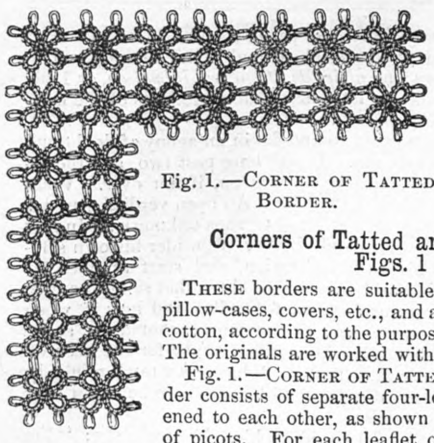

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF TATTED BORDER.

ers the slit through which the tab of the flap is drawn. Finally, baste the silk on the enameled cloth, and fasten the edge of the material folded on the inside with a cross seam of brown saddler's silk, as shown by Fig. 2.

Corners of Tatted and Crochet Borders, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for trimming handkerchiefs, pillow-cases, covers, etc., and are worked with coarse or fine cotton, according to the purpose for which they are designed. The originals are worked with twisted cotton, No. 100.

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF TATTED BORDER. This simple border consists of separate four-leaved figures, which are fastened to each other, as shown by the illustration, by means of picots. For each leaflet of the first figure work 5 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. After finishing four such leaflets tie the ends of the working thread together and fasten them. In the following figures, instead of forming one or the other p., fasten to the figures previously worked, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF CROCHET BORDER. This border is worked in two equal parts, each of which counts four rounds. 1st round.—Always alternately 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 p.—that is, 6 ch. and 1 sc. (single crochet) on the first of these. 2d round.—On the other side of the preceding round, so that the picots are turned downward, work 1 sc. on each ch., and always 1 sc. on that st. (stitch) on which the sc. of the p. was worked. 3d round.—* 1 sc. on the next sc. over a p. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 2 stc. (short treble crochet) separated by 2 ch. on the fourth following st., 2 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the same st., 2 ch., 2 stc. separated by 2 ch. on the same st. on which the preceding three bars were worked, 1 ch., pass over 3 st., and repeat from . 4th round.— 1 sc. on the middle tc. of one scallop of the preceding round, 5 ch., 1 p. turned downward—that is, 6 ch., draw the needle out of the st., insert it in the first of the 6 ch., and draw the dropped st. through; 5 ch., and repeat from *. This completes one-half of the border. Crochet the other half in a similar manner, but in working the fourth round fasten to the completed half as shown by the illustration. Work the corner of both halves as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—SEWING NÉCESSAIRE.—CLOSED.

Crape Lamp-Shade, with Application Embroidery, Figs. 1–3.

THIS lamp-shade consists of six sections of double green crape, which are cut separately, each in one piece, from Fig. 55, Supplement. Cut the oblong figures for the border and the round dots for the foundation figures of green silk as indicated on Fig. 55, paste these silk figures between the double layer of each section as indicated, and surround them with point Russe stitching of green filling silk as shown by the illustrations Figs. 2 and 3, which give full-sized sections of the foundation and border. Button-hole stitch each part closely along the outer edge with similar silk, and join the sections as shown by Fig. 1.

Fig. 1.—CRAPE LAMP-SHADE WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 2, and Fig. 3 on First Page.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 55.

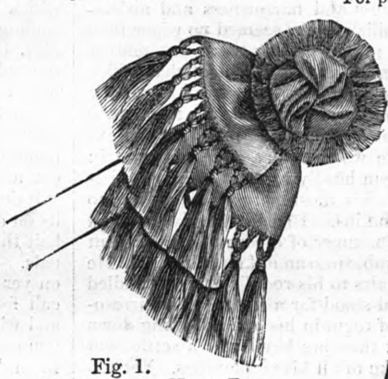

Fig. 1.
BLUE SATIN HAIR BOW.

Fig. 2.
BLUE SATIN CRAVAT BOW.

PERCALE KITCHEN APRON.—[For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 52 and 53.]

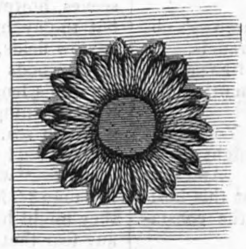

Fig. 2.—FOUNDATION FIGURE OF LAMP-SHADE. FULL SIZE.

Sewing Nécessaire, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS egg-shaped sewing nécessaire of red Russia leather is trimmed with a strip of red silk, on which a Greek border is worked with fine gold cord, as shown by the illustrations. Small bows of leather strips inlaid with gold form the remaining trimming of the nécessaire. The handle is wound with similar strips. On the inside of the nécessaire is an oval part of similar leather, furnished with bands, which is designed for holding the requisite sewing utensils.

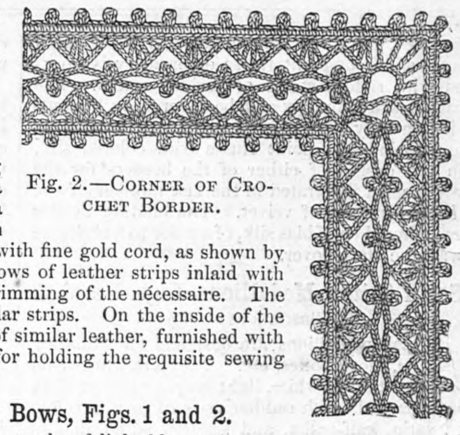

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF CROCHET BORDER.

Hair and Cravat Bows, Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH of these bows are made of light blue satin on a stiff lace foundation, and consist each of a knot of double material, arranged as shown by the illustrations, which is surrounded by a box-pleated satin strip an inch and three-quarters wide, fringed out to one-half its width. To the knot are joined two fringed ends two inches and seven-eighths wide each, which are also made of double material. The fringe is separated into tassels, and knotted as shown by the illustrations. A long hair-pin is fastened to the foundation of the hair bow.

Embroidered Pen-Wiper.

See illustration on page 20.

THE foundation of this pen-wiper is of cardboard two inches and seven-eighths high and two inches and three-quarters wide. It is covered on the outside with maize Java canvas, and on the inside with brown shagreen paper. The binding consists of an inlaid strip of dark brown leather. The front of the pen-wiper is trimmed with a small medallion of gray silk, which is ornamented in satin stitch embroidery with saddler's silk of various colors as shown by the illustration. The bottom of the foundation consists of an open square card-board box three-quarters of an inch high, into which is fastened a brush for wiping pens. A bronzed handle, fastened on the middle of the top, completes this pretty pen-wiper.

Fig. 2.—SEWING NÉCESSAIRE.—OPEN.

Embroidered Napkin-Ring.

See illustration on page 20.

THIS napkin-ring consists of a card-board ring an inch and three-quarters wide, which is covered on the outside, excepting the medallion, with violet velvet, and on the inside with white watered paper, and is furnished with a binding a quarter of an inch wide of maize kid. For the foundation of the medallion, which is surrounded by a rim of inlaid leather, either gray or light brown silk may

Fig. 1.—SILK AND TULLE OPERA HOOD.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 46 and 47.

Fig. 2.—SILK AND TULLE OPERA HOOD.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 46 and 47.

Hosted by Google

be used, on which the monogram or a small satin stitch or point Russe embroidery is worked with saddler's silk of various colors. The card-board ring may also be covered on the outside entirely with colored cloth, ornamented in application and point Russe with colored silk, in the design of either of the borders for the wall-basket illustrated in the last number of the Bazar, instead of velvet. The binding in this case should be of bias silk, of a color to harmonize with the cloth cover.

Satin Stitch Medallions, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 20.

THESE medallions are designed for trimming baskets, glove-boxes, etc. They are worked on a foundation of white, light gray, or brown cloth or gros grain with saddler's silk of various colors in satin, half-polka, and knotted stitch, and in point Russe.

TO THE BITTER END.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "THE LOVELS OF ARDEN," "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.—(Continued.)

"YES, BROTHER, CURSE WITH ME THAT BALEFUL HOUR."

THERE was a short silence. It was so impossible to say any thing of a consolatory nature—a death so sudden, so awful—a man stricken down by an unseen hand in the very flower and pride of his life—there seemed no room for comfort. The common phrases, the pious banalities with which friends try to beguile the mourner, would have been worse than idle here. As well might the consoler have approached Calphurnia while her dead Cæsar still lay bundled in his bloody mantle at the base of the statue as seek to murmur soothing sentences to this lonely woman whom sudden doom had widowed.

"It is very hard to be obliged to speak of this, Mrs. Harcross," began Sir Francis, hesitating a little, although he had come prepared to speak of this very thing; "but there is the question of the funeral to be decided, and promptly. Where would you wish your husband to be buried?"

She gave a little cry of anguish, and covered her face with her hands; but, after a few minutes, replied very calmly,

"In our family vault at Kensal Green; there is no other place. My mother is buried there. I hope to be buried there myself."

"He has no family grave of his own—with his own people, I mean—where he would have wished to lie?" Sir Francis inquired.

"No."

"And you would not like him to be buried at Kingsbury, where the Clevedons, except my father, are all buried?"

"Oh no, no."

"That will do, dear Mrs. Harcross. I need torment you with no farther questions. Mr. Vallory—your cousin Weston, I mean—has been most indefatigable; and I know you will trust him and me with all minor details."

He lingered to say a few words in praise of the dead man, touching gently on his social and professional value, and the manner in which his loss would be felt, and then begged most earnestly that Georgie might come to sit with the mourner.

"You know you have always been fond of her," he said, "and she is devoted to you, and is really made quite miserable by your refusal to see her. I do not say that she would comfort you, but her company would be better than this awful solitude. Or if you would come to her room—that would be better still."

"You are very good; but I would rather be alone—I'd rather be with him." This with a piteous glance toward that darkened chamber where the dead lay.

"But, dear Mrs. Harcross, you would be so much better away from these rooms. There will be people coming by-and-by—the coroner and others—people who must come. Pray be persuaded."

"No," she answered, doggedly; "nothing can make his death seem worse to me than it does now. I would rather stay."

Sir Francis pleaded still farther, but in vain, and finally left her, full of pity, and painfully impressed with the futility of all endeavor to console.

He went away, and in the corridor met Georgie, whom he had scarcely seen since yesterday's luncheon. He had been up all night in conference with the police and other local authorities, or talking over the details of the night's tragedy with Captain Hardwood and two or three others who had congregated in the smoking-room, averse to the solitude of their own chambers.

"Poor Harcross! the last kind of fellow you'd have expected to go off in that way," said the Captain, as if Mr. Harcross had died of apoplexy.

"Have you seen her?" asked Georgie; upon which Sir Francis described his interview with Augusta.

"Poor soul! Oh, Francis, it is so dreadful for her, and it is doubly dreadful to me." They were standing in the morning-room, where they had gone while Sir Francis was telling his story, the room in which she had waited for her husband vainly yesterday evening, longing for that explanation which had not yet come.

"My darling," said Sir Francis, tenderly, "I know it is a hard trial for you; but how much harder it must be for her!"

"Oh, Francis, if it had been you!" That was a position which he was hardly able to imagine; so he only shrugged his shoulders with a melancholy air. "And it might have been you," his wife went on, "it might have been you."

"Well, I really don't see how I could have been the victim, my dear. There must have been some motive, you know, however inadequate. Poor Harcross must have done something to provoke the scoundrel's animosity—some man he had unwittingly ruined, perhaps, by winning a lawsuit against him. There are fellows capable of brooding upon an imaginary wrong of that kind till they lash themselves into madness."

"What if he were the victim of an error, Francis? What if the murderer mistook him for you?"

"Mistook him for me, Georgie? What are you dreaming about? Why should any body want to murder me?"

"Have you never done any thing to provoke any one's hate, Frank—years ago, when you were more reckless, perhaps, than you are now? Is there no secret of your past life that occurs to you with alarm at such a time as this? have you nothing to fear, nothing to regret? You have said sometimes that you have told me all the history of your life: but was there not one page you kept hidden, one sad, dishonorable passage that you could not bear me to know? Oh, my dearest, be truthful to me! Nothing that you have done in the past, no sin of the past or of the present, could lessen my love for you. Tell me the truth, Frank, even now, late as it is!"

"Upon my word of honor, Georgie, I don't in the faintest degree understand the drift of all this. I have told you every thing about myself. I have never kept a secret from you, either great or small."

"Then you have never provoked the hatred of Richard Redmayne? You were never at Brierwood?"

"Where is Brierwood? I don't even know that."

"Oh, Frank, your face looks so true, and yet it was the face in the locket that man showed me; the face of his daughter's lover."

"What locket? what daughter? Really, Georgie, it is rather too bad to bewilder me in this way."

"Mr. Redmayne accuses you of having run away with his daughter, and he showed me a locket with your miniature."

"Accuses me of running away with his daughter! And when, pray?"

"Five years ago."

"And from Brierwood, in Kent, I suppose. When you ought to know that I was never in Kent at all till I came home last year, and never had a miniature painted before the one that was done for you! Upon my honor, Georgie, our domestic life is not likely to be very pleasant if you are going to spring this kind of mine under my feet occasionally."

For some minutes after this Sir Francis Clevedon was inclined to be angry, and Georgie had to be apologetic, and to assure her husband that she had never doubted him, no, not even for a moment; only—only she had been very unhappy, and that dreadful man had seemed so positive, and to have such strong grounds for his accusation, and the miniature was the very image of her darling Frank.

"It may have been poor Harcross's picture," suggested Sir Francis.

"Oh no, it was much too handsome, and much too young."

"But it was painted when he was five years younger, you see, Georgie, and it might have been a flattering likeness then."

"It may," said Georgie, doubtfully. "But it was your face, looking at me with dreamy gray eyes. Oh, Frank, think what I must have suffered!"

"Then you must have doubted me, Georgie, and that was a crime—matrimonial high treason. But, for Heaven's sake, tell me all about this man Redmayne, and his accusation. The clew to this murder may be in that."

"I know that he was dreadfully angry," answered Georgie, "and that he seemed desperate, like a man who could do any thing."

Questioned closely by her husband, Georgie described the scene in the library, repeating as faithfully as she could every word that had been spoken by Richard Redmayne.

"This would fairly account for Harcross's objection to come here," thought Sir Francis.

He kissed his wife, and gave her a free pardon for that offense which he had called matrimonial high treason.

"But don't do it again, Georgie. You might take up some other delusion, and I might not be able to prove an alibi quite so easily. And now I must go and talk to Vallory about this business, and perhaps to Mr. Rufnell, the constable."

"Oh, Francis, will they hang that poor farmer?"

"Inevitably, I should imagine, if he shot Harcross."

"But he had been so badly treated—his daughter tempted away from him."

"Granted, my dear; but the law does not recognize the shooting of seducers."

"Oh, Francis, I should be so sorry if that poor man were hung. I felt for him so deeply when he told me his story, even though he was accusing you."

"I am sorry for him too, Georgie. It is a bad business altogether. But I have only one duty in this matter, and that is to see my guest avenged."

He went down to his study, a soberly furnished, business-like apartment in an obscure portion of the house, abutting on the offices—a room in which he was wont to receive Mr. Wort, and which had now been made the head-quarters of the committee of investigation—a room to which they could come freely at any moment. Sir Francis found Weston there, in thoughtful solitude, smoking a cigar by the open window, which, as it looked only upon the stable-yard, had not been darkened.

To him Sir Francis repeated the conversation reported by Georgie, particulars which were not new to this gentleman.

"Yes," said Weston, throwing away the end of his cigar, after he had smoked it out with a meditative aspect, "yes," he repeated, with exceeding deliberation, "I don't think there's room for a doubt. Redmayne's the man."

"But do you suppose there was any truth in his notion about his daughter?"

"Unquestionably. Harcross had spent a summer at Brierwood—just five years ago—and was uncommonly shy upon the subject: never would talk of it, or even tell the name of the place till it was dragged out of him. I felt very sure there was something; but I did not know it was any thing so serious as this."

Mr. Rufnell, the constable, came in while they were talking, with an important air, as of a man whose genius had coped with stupendous difficulties, and emerged victorious from the struggle.

"I think we've got a clew, Rufnell," said Sir Francis, gravely.

"Have you, Sir?" said the constable, with a saturnine smile. "Very likely, Sir; but I've got the man."

"What, you've found out—"

"I've got him, Sir; leastways, I've got his gun, which is pretty much the same thing. The man is Joseph Flood, your groom; and we've got as neat a chain of circumstantial evidence agen him as was ever laid before a jury."

CHAPTER XLIV.

"SOME INNOCENTS 'SCAPE NOT THE THUNDERBOLT."

RICHARD REDMAYNE went home with that innocent blood upon his head, a miserable man. The burden of his crime had sat lightly enough upon his conscience so long as he believed that he had slain his daughter's false lover. Indeed, in his judgment the act had been no crime—only a just and reasonable revenge.

But to have murdered a man who had never injured him—to have shed innocent blood! That was different, and the burden of this fatal unnecessary deed weighed him down to the ground.

He went home to Brierwood, but not to rest. There was a nameless horror in the place—a horror of stillness and narrowness and airlessness. The familiar rooms seemed no wider than a prison cell; in the garden there was neither air nor freedom—only a sultry heat that stifled him. The sound of Mrs. Bush's voice droning some ancient ditty, with a quavering turn at the end of each line, jarred upon his nerves to excruciation. He was in that state of mind in which a man can hardly support his own existence—in which his most natural impulse is to blow out his brains. Richard Redmayne had thought of this manner of escape from a present that was intolerable into an unknown future. He had gone up stairs to his room and had handled his pistols; had stood for a few moments irresolute with one of them in his hand, looking down the barrel, and thinking how swift a settlement that might make of all his perplexities. Yet after that brief deliberation he put the revolvers back into their places.

"I must see the end of this business," he said to himself. "It would be a cowardly thing to turn my back upon it."

Had it not been for this thought—had it not been for the apprehension that some innocent man might be charged with his crime—how gladly would he have fled from that narrow world to the wide pastures and broad blue lakes of his beloved Gippsland; to that newer, wilder life beyond the fern-tree scrub, among the waters of many rivers winding down from breezy mountain-tops; to that fresh, untrodden world where he could wander with his gun from sunrise to sunset, shooting wild duck or bandicoot—where he had the freedom and the power of a savage king! For all the days of his life until now he had loved his Kentish homestead with an abiding affection—had preferred it above all other scenes, however glorious in their wilder beauty; but to-day his heart sickened at sight of the narrow fields, the patch of fertile landscape shut in by woods and hills that seemed to be within his arm's length. To-day he was seized with a wild yearning for that other home beyond the southern sea.

"O God! why could I not wait?" he asked himself—"why could I not wait to be sure of my man? My wrongs had kept so long, that they might have kept a little longer. Was there any fear that my hatred would grow cold? And to fire like that—at random—in the dark! Yet I could swear that it was his face I saw: it was a trick that the devil played upon me, perhaps. And I might have drunk more than usual yesterday—I dare say I did. My brain was on fire after I had seen him, and I may have drunk a good deal without thinking what I was doing. Yet my senses were clear enough when I fired that gun, and I can swear that it was his face I saw in the moonlight."

He was not a superstitious man—was, indeed, too unlearned for much superstition. But he had heard country folks talk of witchcraft, and began to think he had been the dupe of some diabolical influence, so very certain was he that the face in the miniature was the face of the man he had slain.

He walked up and down by the broad flower border where the roses were still blooming—the roses she had loved and cared for; not slim aristocratic standards, but broad spreading bushes or veritable trees straggling upward in unkempt profusion. There were many of them older than himself—bushes from which his young wife had gathered nosegays for the Sabbath-day adornment of the best parlor; old-fashioned cabbage and maiden's-blush and white and red moss-roses; no gloire de Dijon, or Malmaison, or Lady Banks, or later fashionable products of the floriculturist's art.

He paced to and fro in an agony of doubt and expectation. It was long past two, and the inquest at Clevedon was on, if not over. What would be the result? An open verdict, perhaps—by some person or persons unknown! In that case what should he do? Consider his own safety, his own inclination, and start at once for Brisbane? How if he chose that selfish course, the natural course for guilt; and how if, when he was gone, circumstances should so shape themselves as to weave a halter for the neck of an innocent man? A luckless wretch might be suspected, tried, and hung before he could hear of it yonder.

"No," he said to himself, resolutely; "I'm not such a scoundrel as that! I'll stand to my guns. So long as there's no mistake made, I'll hold my tongue. But if an innocent man should be in danger, I'll give myself up."

He thought of the result of that act. It would be a hard thing to die a shameful death before the eyes of the people who had known him, and respected and liked him, from a boy; to bring the name of Redmayne, the good old name for whose redemption from the stain of debt and difficulty he had worked so hard out yonder; to bring that time-honored name under so deep a disgrace that no future generations of honest Redmaynes could ever wash the foul blot away. To stand confessed before the world as a midnight assassin, a wretch who had not even given his foe a chance of defending himself, a purposeless shedder of blood, whose crime bore a double odium for having been a blunder! He fancied himself hooted upon the scaffold, and jerked into eternity amidst the execration of his fellowmen. He fancied what Jim and Mrs. Jim would say when the hideous news came to them, and a vision of that fair home which he was never to see again, and of all the things that he might have done there in years to come, arose before him. Those future unknown years seemed strangely sweet to him now that he had forfeited the right to live them.

He had eaten nothing since yesterday, but he did not get through these dismal hours of suspense without an occasional "nobbler." A slow fever devoured him, and his dry lips needed to be moistened now and then, although the spirit which he drank raw to-day did not exercise a cooling influence upon his system. In vain did Mrs. Bush urge him to pick a bit of a savory roasted spare-rib of pork with sage and onions, which she had prepared as an appropriate dinner for a sultry summer's day; "somethink light and tasty," as she remarked, when recommending it to her employer. "Do-ey try and eat a bit, now, Mr. Redmayne," she pleaded. "It don't do nobody any good drinking raw spirits on a hempty stomick. A glass of brandy's not half the harm if yer inside's lined with good victuals. But to go on pouring that burnin' stuff on yer emptiness is regilar sooicide. There's no call for you to be upset by this here murder; and when your spirits have had a turn like that, you seem to want something substantial to settle them."

Mr. Redmayne declined the spare-rib, however—nay, would not even sit down, or make any pretense of eating his dinner. He paced the garden, listened to the striking of the distant church clock, and waited for tidings of the inquest. Somebody would surely bring the news he longed for and yet dreaded.

Somebody did. At half past five Mrs. Bush's goodman came home to his tea, a cool and pastoral meal of bread-and-butter and green stuff, which he took in the backest of back kitchens, among Mrs. Bush's pails and mops and brooms and black-lead brushes, that industrious matron holding her principal kitchen, with its snow-white hearth-stoned flags and shining range, a chamber far too sacred for the defilement of daily meals, and preferring to eat and drink, as it were, on the outskirts of Brierwood. Very quiet was Mr. Bush's usual return from his afternoon labor; nay, indeed, somewhat furtive and sneaking of aspect was Mr. Bush in a general way, as of a man who had never solved the mystery of his own existence, and felt himself more or less a mistake or superfluous atom in the scheme of creation. To-day, however, he approached the back kitchen with a victorious air, full to the brim and overflowing with startling information, and, unduly elated by the sense of his abnormal condition, no longer a man to be curtly told to eat his tea and look sharp about it, as Mrs. Bush wanted to clean herself, and wasn't going to have her back kitchen cluttered up with tea-things all the evening; a man to be deferred to, rather, as the possessor of a treasure which it was in his power to impart or withhold.

"Well!" he began, with a pompous air, seating himself at the narrow window table beside the window-ledge, where the blacking-brushes lived, and whence came a pungent odor of Day-and-Martin diluted with vinegar.

"Well, what?" cried Mrs. Bush, sharply, as she hewed the big loaf with a broad kitchen knife. "Lord! how the man do stare! Don't sit with your mouth open like a scarecrow. What's the matter now?"

"Oh, well," growled Mr. Bush, "if you don't want to hear nothink, I don't want to talk. There's no call to take me up short like that, as if you was a-going to snap my nose off."

"It ain't handsome enough to tempt folks snapping at it," the matron replied, contemptuously; "you look as big and puffed out as a Christmas turkey this afternoon. I suppose you've been loitering about Clevedon way instead of doing your work, and have heard somethink more about the murder."

"I haven't been loitering nowheres; but I may have heard somethink for all that," returned the outraged Bush, with a wounded air.

Hosted by Google

"If you've got any thing to say, say it," exclaimed Mrs. Bush, with supreme disgust: "if there's any thing in this mortial world as I hate, it's shilly-shally."

"Well," said Mr. Bush, solemnly, with his mouth half full of bread-and-butter, and a Cos lettuce in his right hand poised over the salt-cellar; "the inquis is over; and as I come along the road home who should come up along of me but Sam Grinway, and says he, 'Well, Bush, have you heard this here about the inquis?' and says I, 'No, Samuel; is the inquis over?' and says he, 'Yes, and I bin up by the west lodge and heerd all about it. They've brought in a verdick again Joseph Flood, Sir Francis's groom, and they've took him; and it was all along of Bond's daughter as he was jealous of, and she'd been carrying on shameful with this here Mr. Arkwright, which was a swell from London; and Joseph went proling about after dark with his gun—and took and shot him!'"

"A bold-faced hussy!" cried Mrs. Bush, indignantly. "I allus said she was no good, flaunting and flaring with her starched print frocks and neck-ribbons, in spite of her father being as pious a Primitive Methody as you'd find between here and Maidstone. Why it's her that ought to be hung, if there was any right or reason in the law of the land, and not the young man as did it."

Mr. Bush chumped his green stuff meditatively, and responded to this proposition only by a dubious shake of his head. This tracing of criminal acts back to their first causes was an advanced idea which he hardly saw his way to.

"Joseph Flood did it," he said, "and Joseph Flood must swing for it. The gal may ha' been flighty, I won't say as she warn't, but gals will be gals; they've as good a right to that saying as b'ys has to be b'ys."

"Hah!" exclaimed Mrs. Bush, with suppressed contempt, "if a gal happens to be good-looking, every fool in the parish will stand up for her.—Lord a-mercy, Mr. Redmayne, what a turn you did give me, to be sure!"

This ejaculation was evoked by the apparition of Richard Redmayne looking in at the open lattice. He had come to the window in time to hear the news about Joseph Flood.

"Is Flood in prison?" he asked, with an ashen face which struck terror to the soul of Mrs. Bush.

"Yes, Sir; they've put him in Kingsbury lock-up, if Samuel Grinway speaks the truth, and I never knowed Samuel to tell a falsehood."

Mr. Redmayne waited to hear no more, but walked away from the window, went into the house to refresh himself with a final nobbler, and then set his face toward Kingsbury. No innocent man should lie in durance for his sin.

"Lor, Bush!" cried the matron, in a feeble voice, as if ready to sink swooning on the back-kitchen bricks; "did you ever see any one so gashly pale as master was when he looked in at that winder? If Joseph Flood had been his own son he couldn't have looked more took aback."

CHAPTER XLV.

"BY THE SAME MADNESS STILL MADE BLIND."

RICHARD REDMAYNE skirted the fields once more by the familiar track, beholding the free and happy barley with indifferent eyes, all his agricultural instincts in abeyance, with no room for any other thought in his mind than that he was going straight to his death. Not once did the steady course of his thoughts swerve from that direct line; not once did he speculate on remote possibilities of escape from the law's worst penalty. He was going to give himself up to justice; he was going straight to his death.

Strange how his thoughts fled yonder, even in this dire hour, over the width of half the world, to that other land where the skies are brighter and bluer, and the very air has an influence which makes men glad. O fair Gippsland! never more should he wander on her plenty-yielding plains, or climb her mighty mountains; never more should he shoot wild duck on her inland seas, or follow the winding river from its upland water-shed, or spend adventurous nights hunting for strayed sheep; or sleep away the summer noontide in the deep shade of a fern-tree gully, while his weary beasts enjoyed their spell close by; or short-hobble his horses under the moon on that liberal half-mile margin of pasture which the squatter's generous rule allows to the traveler's cattle. All that bright, free, open-air life was lost to him; and it seemed to him now, in this sudden darkness which he deemed the shadow of a swift-advancing doom—it seemed to him now that he might have been happy at Bulrush Meads even without Gracey, with a lessened happiness, of course, but still with a heart-felt appreciation of that bounteous land and all it could yield him.

By one hasty mistaken act he had cut himself off forever from these things. It would have been sad, even dying peacefully on his bed at Brierwood, to consider that he should see that new world no more. How much harder, then, to face the horror of an ignominious doom; to know himself the destroyer of that good old name which he would have given his life to uphold! And while suffering all this loss, to know that he left his daughter's tempter triumphant, his daughter's early death unavenged! That was the sharpest sting of all.

He walked slowly, and lingered now and then on his way, sitting down to smoke his pipe and think over his position. He was scarcely in a situation in which a man would care to hasten his steps. The sun was going down; the ripe corn melted into a sea of gold where the edge of the uplands met the western sky. It was a very beautiful world, on a small scale—a baby-world that had never attained to the vigor and grandeur of manhood, but had kept its infantine graces and childish dimples and smiles.

He looked at the peaceful scene fondly, with mournful, loving eyes. How hard he had labored that he might keep Brierwood and his own good name! And now both were gone—his name rendered forever execrable, his estate confiscated as the property of a felon.

It was growing dusk as he crossed Kingsbury common. He had waited for that, not wishing to face the light of day when he should leave John Wort's cottage, like Eugene Aram, "with gyves upon his wrists."

Very peaceful was the aspect of Kingsbury this calm summer evening. The unwonted bustle and excitement of the morning had worn itself out. There may have been a few more gossips than the nightly conclave in the tap-room of the Coach and Horses, but that was all. A murder is an appalling event in the records of a country village; but people can not stand still to talk about it forever; there must come a period of exhaustion.

Richard Redmayne went straight to the little office tacked on to Mr. Wort's dwelling, lifted the latch, and went in. He had a notion that the steward would be at work here to-night; but the office was empty—a dismal chamber to look upon in the dusk, with its unpainted match-board walls, against one of which hung a dilapidated map of the Clevedon property, much scored about with a red pencil, its ink-splashed deal desk, and battered office-stools. These shabby surroundings had the true business flavor to John Wort's mind. He could not have worked in a room with easy-chairs and a Turkey carpet, like Sir Francis Clevedon's study. His business faculties would have been stultified by a morocco and mahogany desk on which he could not splash his ink freely.

Mr. Wort's housekeeper heard the door open and shut, and looked into the office from a door communicating with the kitchen.

"Is your master at home?"

"No, Sir. He's been at Clevedon all day—not been home for a bit of dinner even. But I expect him at any minute."

"I'll wait, then," Richard answered, shortly. "You don't mind my pipe, I suppose?"

This was almost a superfluous question, since the office reeked with stale tobacco.

"Oh dear, no, Sir. Master's a rare one to smoke."

The housekeeper retired, and Richard took out his blackened cutty-pipe. He smiled grimly as he filled it. How long would he be allowed this constant comforter? Would they let him smoke in prison?

He filled and refilled his pipe, and sat smoking on as the shadows deepened, till the wooden wall opposite to him was veiled in darkness. The woman peeped in and asked if he would like a light, but he answered in the negative. He would rather sit in the dark, he said.

By-and-by the moon began to climb the heavenly zone, and the first glimmer of her silvery light sent a shudder through Richard Redmayne's frame. That soft, fatal radiance brought back the horror of last night.

"The moon's always been mixed up with witchcraft," he thought; "and there was something worse than witchcraft in last night's business. I am not such a fool as to take one man for another in a light that I could have read my Bible by, if the devil hadn't blinded me."

It was past nine o'clock and broad moonlight when John Wort came home. He came in at the office door, his habitual practice, as he had generally letters or memoranda of some kind to deposit in his desk before he could settle down comfortably to his evening meal; sometimes even a letter or two to write for the night post, or for hand-delivery to some defaulting tenant. He came in to-night with a very weary air, and recoiled with a start at sight of the seated figure, half in moonlight, half in shadow.

"What's the matter now?" he asked, sharply, not recognizing his visitor.

"A good deal," answered Richard Redmayne.

"Redmayne! Why, what brings you here again to-night? I thought you'd cut me."

"I'd good reason to do that, John Wort, for it was your lies that brought misery and death upon my poor child."

"My lies! What do you mean by that?" asked the steward, quietly.

He was not going to put himself in a passion with Richard Redmayne, a man whom he had liked—whom he pitied with all his heart.

"What do you mean by calling me a liar, Rick? I never told you a falsehood in my life."

"What? Not when you brought your master to my house under a false name?"

"My master! Why, man alive, what madness is this?"

"Your master, who had a fancy for coming to our neighborhood on the sly, and stealing a look at his own estate, like a prince in disguise; or like a sneak and a liar, as he is by nature, and as he proved himself by his acts. 'Twas you who brought him to Brierwood, John Wort; 'twas you who lied about him to my sister-in-law. She would never have opened my doors to a stranger but for your recommendation."

"My master! My master at Brierwood!"

"Your master, Sir Francis Clevedon."

"Now, look here, Rick Redmayne," cried Mr. Wort, folding his arms upon the desk, and facing the farmer steadily in the moonlight, "make an end of this madness at once and forever. Sir Francis was never in Kent, to my knowledge, until he came home to take possession of his estate just a year ago."

Richard Redmayne laughed aloud—a scornful, strident laugh.

"What! you'll face it out, will you? He never came to Brierwood? You never brought him there, and planted him on my foolish, money-grubbing sister-in-law as Mr. Walgry? Sir Francis Clevedon and your Mr. Walgry are not one and the same?"

"As there is a God above me, they are not!" answered Mr. Wort, firmly. "Hubert Walgrave lies dead at Clevedon Hall. He changed his name to Harcross when he married an heiress."

Richard Redmayne started to his feet.

"What!" he cried, "is that the truth? Is it this man's likeness I've got here in my waistcoat pocket, the miniature that was sent to my girl? Why, it's the image of Sir Francis Clevedon! Do you mean to tell me that two men—strangers—could be so much alike as that, as much like each other as twin brothers?"

"There was a striking likeness between Sir Francis and Mr. Walgrave, though not such a close resemblance as you make out."

"Get a light, and let me show you the miniature," answered Richard Redmayne.

The steward struck a lucifer, and lighted an oil-lamp that hung over the desk. Mr. Redmayne put the open locket into his hand without a word.

"Yes," said John Wort, looking at it gravely, "this is a portrait of Hubert Walgrave; very much flattered, I grant, and making him pretty near ten years younger than he looked of late years; but not by any means a bad likeness for all that."

"His portrait!" exclaimed Richard, with suppressed exultation; "the likeness of the man who lies murdered at Clevedon Hall?"

"Yes," answered the steward, impatiently. "How many times must I tell you the same thing?"

"Then God is just," cried Richard Redmayne: "I killed the right man!"

"You killed!" exclaimed Mr. Wort, aghast, staring at the farmer's triumphant face with unutterable horror in his own. "You killed him! You a murderer! Rick Redmayne, you must be mad!"

"No, John, not mad—not mad now, or mad then; never saner than when I fired that shot. Why, when I came home from Gippsland I meant to kill him."

"For God's sake, don't tell me that! What, you, Richard Redmayne—a man we've all liked and respected—you that any body in Kingsbury would have trusted, or stood by, through thick and thin—you confess to a dastardly murder?"

"Not a dastardly murder. I tell you, I meant to have his life; was there any thing less that would have wiped out the score between us two? If I'd asked him to fight me—as gentlemen used to fight each other thirty years ago—do you think he'd have done it, or listened to me? I tell you there was no other way of settling that account. I was bound to kill him."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN the whole round of the year New York presents no gayer aspect than during the Christmas holidays. Always full, the city then seems overflowing. Added to the usual throng of business men and stylish promenaders, there are crowds of strangers who take this festive time to see the lions of the great metropolis; and flocks of children, let loose from school restraints, assert their rights in street and shop. Ah! the shops! They are a bewildering sight even to accustomed eyes—seemingly containing every rare and beautiful thing that fancy can conceive. And then the clerks are so peculiarly obliging: it is no trouble for them to show their goods: they are as patient as the days are long. By-the-way, if proprietors of shops only knew how much more is sold in ordinary times by an accommodating clerk than by a snappish one, they would pay a premium for good humor. If people are making purchases they want to be suited, of course; and it must be dreadfully trying to bear with all the vagaries and vacillations of customers. But the policy of the matter—if politeness alone wavers—might well be considered. During the holidays, however, clerks and every body else are good-humored—or supposed to be. The festivities of Christmas are fresh in the mind; the waning year admonishes that all unkindness in the past should be forgotten and forever buried; the coming New-Year bids us give the friendly hand in love and hopefulness. A genial spirit pervades the whole community, which, combined with the general display of beautiful articles of every kind, renders the Christmas holidays the most attractive and charming episode in the year.

We are glad to believe that every year lessens the number of those who thoughtlessly place temptation before the young men who tender to them the kindly greetings of the New-Year. Time was when New-Year's evening witnessed many disgraceful scenes—and sad ones. Every lady should use her influence to prevent the spread of any custom which has been proved to be injurious. The lady who on New-Year's Day supplies her tasteful table with the usual delicacies of the season, and good coffee, tea, or chocolate, has provided enough. Let wines and spirits be banished. Few young men who taste any intoxicating beverages on New-Year's Day know when the line of immediate danger is reached. And we think few ladies, whatever may be their views on the temperance question, will not readily perceive the hazard of taking glass after glass as a matter of courtesy, and shrink from placing the temptation on their New-Year's tables.

The library of Mr. Edwin Forrest was a complete store-house of dramatic literature. Yet his knowledge was not confined to that class of literature. He was a good classical scholar, and well read in the arts and sciences. His library was his home—a resting-place he loved.

In Richmond, Virginia, there has turned up a rare old miniature of Mary Queen of Scots, said to be a perfect likeness, and beautifully executed. This miniature was formerly the property of a Scottish lady who came to this country, and lived in Richmond until her death, which occurred about thirty-five years ago, when she was ninety years old. She left the picture to her friend and attorney, informing him that it was an heir-loom in her family of many generations. Her only child was insane, which may account for this disposition of a picture which she valued highly. The miniature is very beautiful, and as a work of art possesses a high order of merit.

The river floods in France have produced most disastrous results in many sections of the country, and the suffering is very great.

The Swiss Times tells a comical story of a couple of lovers who a few days ago attempted to commit suicide in the Lake of Zurich, near Rüschlikon, because the young lady's parents refused their consent to their marriage. In order not to be separated in death, the young lady tied one of her feet fast to one of her lover's, and they thus threw themselves into the water. But the young man does not seem to have been as courageous or as desirous of leaving this world as his companion, and shouted for help at the top of his voice. Help was fortunately at hand and they were both dragged out of the water and handed over to the police, who provided them with dry clothes and put them under lock and key.

A California judge recently went to San Francisco to seek relief from a singular malady that had baffled the skill of the physicians in his town. The symptoms of the disease were peculiar. The little finger of the right hand was first affected, turning green at the tip, and causing such intense pain that the sufferer was unable to sleep without the aid of narcotics. The same unaccountable phenomenon appeared and disappeared successively from one after another of each of the other fingers on the left hand, passing afterward into the second toe of the left foot, and finally seating itself in the extremity of the middle finger of the left hand, always accompanied in its eccentric removals by distressing sensations which rendered every thing like rest or repose not superinduced by drugs impossible.

The Bethnal Green Museum seems to have been an entire success. Although established in one of the poorest and busiest districts of London, it has been visited during the past three months by more than seven hundred thousand visitors. Its influence in that section is regarded as excellent.

The girls in the first class of the High School in Portland, Maine, have made a decided movement in favor of simplicity in dress. The class, between thirty and forty in number, have almost unanimously agreed to adopt for school wear dresses of plain, substantial, and inexpensive material. Fanciful ornaments and jewelry are to be used only to a limited extent, which is specified and fully understood by the girls. Many pupils in the lower classes are following their example. Any movement to cause the young girls in America to dress simply is worthy of highest commendation. It is painful to see those who are fresh and young, and who are ostensibly occupied in gaining an education, so dressed as to show plainly that their thoughts are largely spent upon outward adornments.

Giovanni Batista Falcieri is one of the few connecting links between the poet Byron and the present time. He was the personal attendant of Lord Byron, in whose arms the poet died at Missolonghi, on April 19, 1824. At present he holds the post of senior messenger in the Ionian Office, being a hale old man of seventy-five years of age. He always speaks of his master with love and respect.

The reading of our ordinary daily newspapers is becoming a terrible strain upon the mind and sensibilities. Few, of course, pretend to read the whole of a newspaper nowadays; but the mere headings of the articles are enough to send a thrill of horror through the heart. Open the morning paper on almost any day—there is a record of hurricanes, shipwrecks, fires, murders, suicides, executions, and casualties and crimes of every nature enough to appall the most insensible. Newspapers are not restful reading in this age of the world.

Hotel accommodations have never been better in Washington than now. All the old established houses have been "enlarged and greatly improved," and new ones promise the best of "good cheer."

Fears are entertained that the failure of the potato crop in England will cause an epidemic of scurvy. Many substitutes for potatoes have been suggested as antiscorbutic—such as pease, beans, and rice; but it is stated that those articles are not effectual. The Lancet mentions as among the vegetables which may be used advantageously the various forms of cabbage, lettuce, oranges, lemons, onions, mustard and cress, dandelion, and sorrel.

"Missing!" It is not an uncommon announcement, though the fact never ceases to be fearfully mysterious, that out of the various ranks of society one and another drops, no one knows where. "Missing" is all that can be said of them. A short time ago there was published in one of our daily newspapers a list of over fifty persons who, within less than three months, had mysteriously disappeared from New York and vicinity. Some, doubtless, had absconded for reasons of their own; many others, young boys and girls, were probably kidnapped or enticed into secretly vicious ways of life; while concerning others not even a probable conjecture can be made. Such a record is extremely startling, and to friends there is no more agonizing suspense than that conveyed in the simple word, "Missing!"

The reference library and reading-rooms of the Free Public Library in Worcester, Massachusetts, have been opened to the public on Sundays.

The Public Library in Boston contains two thousand American and English newspapers giving accounts of the assassination of President Lincoln.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—Serge Walking Suit.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 21–25.

Fig. 2.—Suit for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—Flannel Walking Suit.—Back.—[See Fig. 4.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—Flannel Walking Suit.—Front.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—Poult de Soie and Cashmere Walking Suit.—Back.—[See Fig. 6.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 26–29.

Fig. 6.—Poult de Soie and Cashmere Walking Suit.—Front.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 26–29.

Fig. 7.—Suit for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 56–58.

Fig. 8.—Cashmere Walking Suit.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 9.—Suit for Child from 3 to 4 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 10.—Walking Suit for Elderly Lady.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30–36.

Fig. 11.—Gros Grain Walking Suit.—Front.—[See Fig. 12.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 12.—Gros Grain Walking Suit.—Back.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 13.—Gros Grain and Cloth Walking Suit.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 37–45.

Figs. 1–13.—Ladies' and Children's Walking Suits.

Hosted by Google

A PANTOMIME.

THE streets were filled with passers-by;
The summer sun sank down,
With slanting beam and mellow ray,
Behind the busy town;
Across the street from where I sat
A window, open wide,
Was partly draped by curtains,
Sweeping back on either side;

And thus the window-sill appeared
All broad and white between,
And resting kindly on its edge
A pair of hands were seen;
A pair of quite uneven hands,
If balanced in a scale,
For one was very muscular,
The other very frail.

But, judging by the sequel,
I concluded that, of course,
The smallest of the hands I saw
Had most magnetic force:
Because the large and sunburned one
Had such an easy way
Of ever moving near it,
As it on the window lay.

They touched—of course it was by chance,
And done with easy grace—
The little hand slid coyly back,
And hid beneath the lace;
Then peeping out, as though to say
That must not happen more,
It looked just twice as tempting
As it had looked before.

So, after much of skirmishing,
Advancing, and retreat,
The two in some peculiar way
Again had chanced to meet.
This time, with easy confidence,
The brown hand held the white,
And clasping it about so close
It hid it from my sight,

Except one finger, which appeared
So fair and tapering,
On which a third hand came to place
A slender diamond ring.
The sun had long since hidden
Behind the western trees;
The curtains o'er the two clasped hands
Moved idly in the breeze.

I had seen the old, old story told
In many and many a way—
By eyes, to eyes that spoke again,
And in Shakspearean play;
But never yet had I beheld
A tableau half as fine
As this enacted o'er the way
In living pantomime.

God bless you, hands! hold fast and true
Through all the coming years,
Clasping in love and sympathy
Through all your smiles and tears;
And when you ford the river,
Running cold and dark and still,
Clasp you each other just as close
As now upon the sill!

THE RAPALLS' NEW-YEAR.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

NEVER did a year close on a more forlorn household than on Mrs. Rapall's that bitter December—a household consisting of the mother, Helen, the deformed daughter, some twenty years old, and little Jane.

Not much more than a week ago there had been a father too, but the clods of the churchyard had since then been placed above him, and the house was only just rearranged from the funeral—a thing which the deformed girl had crept out of bed to lock the door and hinder kindly disposed neighbors from doing while her mother and little Jane were absent; for any one who had performed that task would full soon have discovered the emptiness of the house. Her mother sat, when she had come back, at the bed, and looked at the beautiful face of the girl, who had fallen asleep at last, as if a load of pain and trouble had been lifted, and wondered what meaning there was in the dark ways of any Providence that had brought such suffering on so beautiful and so holy a creature; for the face of Helen as she slept was the face of a glorified saint shining in an aureole of gold; but the body had been withered from the day, now half a dozen years ago, when she had been struck to the floor with a brutal blow.

Yes, a load of pain and suffering had indeed been lifted not only from the sleeping girl, but from the other two as well—for cold as the frozen clods above him were, they were no colder than the heart of Dean Rapall had been for many years. With him self-indulgence had checked the fountain of human kindness at its source, and he had seen his wife and children in want of every necessary of life, and had only murmured that he was in want of luxuries.

Yet when she was a girl, and Dean Rapall sought her hand, Marian would have resented as the rankest insult any insinuation that he was not an instance of manly perfection. If man were something a little lower than the angels, then it seemed to her that Dean Rapall was something more than man. For, in the first place, the beauty of his face and form had been glorious enough to blind her eyes to flaws; and in the next, his assumption of generosity and chivalry was so fine that it even deceived himself. He had seen the handsome heiress, and had resolved to distance competitors and possess her, and had done so with no difficulty—deserting without a day's hesitation the girl to whom he was already pledged. But Susan Sterling had never really won him; and Marian's sweetness and stateliness had been all the time attractive and provoking, and the first time that he clasped her to his breast it seemed to him that he was a stronger and nobler man than he had ever been before.

But neither Dean Rapall's strength nor nobility was a permanent outgrowth. Marian had not long to wait before she discovered that she had married a man of fierce appetites, of appalling selfishness, of unblushing vices. She was not able, in the midst of her fresh love for him and her gradual experience of his nature, to generalize so strongly as that all at once. Sometimes there would be days when he was gentleness itself; when his blandishments won her again as they did in the beginning; when she was indignant with her recent thoughts, and could have humbled herself before him, and adored him as she used to do—days too quickly followed by periods of neglect and cruelty. Rumors reached her, as rumors will, of her husband's whereabouts in the seasons when he left her alone, when no one saw him at home; she regarded him as a martyr to them. Though one by one they verified themselves to her, she still clung, if not to her old faith in him, at any rate to her old love; for it was not till he had spent the last dollar of her property that he threw off the mask entirely, and let her see him as he really was.

It was one night then, when the Champagne was still lively in his brain, that he told her about his old passages, as he called them, with Susan Sterling, laughing gayly the while at the drama they had involved, for Susan Sterling had been Marian's dearest friend. She had been silent as to her engagement with Dean Rapall only at his request, and had simply drawn away with her heavy heart at the end, and had let her friend see nothing of her sorrow, as she had known nothing of her joy—had hidden herself with her work as far off as she might.

It was a subject which, of course, Marian could not mention to Susan, but when she had accustomed her mind to the pain of it she sought out her old friend, the teacher now of a little day school, and proposed to her a plan for a seminary in buildings just beyond the town. She lent her own name as security for the rent to the owner, who did not know of the squandering of her fortune, of which neither was she herself aware as yet. She engaged masters and matron, went about among her wealthy friends procuring an abundance of pupils, and did not rest, in fact, till she had planted Susan upon the road to ease and fortune. Sure that Marian had been ignorant of the injury she had once done her, and believing that she had but just learned of it, Susan accepted all her kindness as magnanimously as it was given. And there, forbidden by circumstances to see each other subject to Dean Rapall's interruptions, they had parted.

But Marian, high-minded as she was, would have had her hands more than full had she undertaken to right all the wrongs that Dean Rapall inflicted. Once, indeed, and all unknown even to the one she helped, she set upon his feet again a young man whom her husband had ruined at the gaming-table. But just as by her means those whom she hired to do so were nursing back to health and life one for whose sake her husband had tired of her, and who had been forsaken by him in turn, the news came that her fortune was all gone: her husband's had been gone long ago.

Of course Dean Rapall had specious stories to cover up the occasion of their disasters, and glad would Marian have been to believe them. She did her best; she even pretended to herself that she did believe them. She did not expect him to confess his sins, but she was confident he must regret them; and she forgave them, and still loved the sinner. The loss of luxuries, the absence of old pleasures, made no difference to her so long as her husband was left, so long as she thought he loved her. It was only by slow degrees that she came to the full understanding of what he was. She could pardon him his treatment of Susan Sterling, because it was for her own sake that he had done as he did; she could hope that other pleasures would replace his love of gaming, that time would abate his more serious errors; trusting she might yet reclaim him, she could even pardon all that profligacy that had once penetrated her with shame and grief, believing that his best qualities left him more peculiarly open to temptation than another: it required years to learn her mistake, to learn that he had no best qualities. She gave up her carriages and horses without a thought sent after them; she moved into a smaller house without a murmur; she dismissed her servants and never sighed about it; she remade her old wardrobe, and replaced velvets with stuffs and silks with prints, and wore the cheaper things as a happy princess might wear her purple, thinking that perhaps, in their altered circumstances, Dean's old habits had become impossible to him; but thinking so unconsciously, only saying to herself that she was a happy woman to have her husband back again.

But poverty is a wonderful illuminator of character, if a harsh one; and so, when a single year had passed, had Marian found it to be. Dean Rapall, elegant in evening dress, amidst the sumptuous surroundings of his dining-room, gay with the good humor of his enjoyment, and flushed with the sparkle of wine, was a very different being from Dean Rapall in shabby and frowzy garments, surly over his misfortunes, and stupid with his beer. Little sins that Marian had hardly seen when they were clothed about with splendor became disgusting when stripped as poverty stripped them; little faults grew into vulgarities; selfishness, unnoted in the old days when it inflicted deprivation on none, taken then as an expression of elegant pessimism, if not of a loftier view of life, indeed, became hideous when reduced to action by poverty.

But by none of all this was Marian entirely awaked. Her love for Dean was like those things through which the fire has passed, but which still retain their shape till a touch crumbles them to ashes. But the touch came—a rude touch, a dreadful one. It was the blow by which Dean Rapall crippled his elder daughter—when, thick-tongued and angry, he felled her by a stroke whose marks remained with her for life. Dean Rapall had developed his vulgarity, had exercised his selfishness, had unveiled his dissolute life, and Marian had forgiven him; he had forged his wife's name to the deeds which beggared her, and she had forgiven him; he had stolen her jewels and sold them, to use the proceeds on his pleasures, and she had said to herself that they were one, what was hers was his, there was no reason why he should humiliate himself to ask, and his necessities were dire, and she had forgiven him; he had ruined all the hopes, all the comfort and peace of her life, and she had forgiven him. But now he had ruined her child, and she could forgive no more. Her eyes were opened, and she saw the truth; love went; a slow dislike came, that only wanted fresh outrage to deepen into hatred; and when little Jane, who was but a month old on the day that Helen fell, came to powers of perception she noted that she never saw a smile upon her mother's face when turned toward her father.

The doctors pronounced Helen's case hopeless, and sent her mother a receipted bill. They might well do that: she had nothing to pay it, unless she sold her little remaining silver. How they lived themselves alone knew. They had removed from the town where Marian's happier years had been spent—for even that time when she was slowly learning her husband's short-comings seemed happiness compared to this. One thing after another, all the household equipments of any value had gone or were going. Sometimes Dean brought in money; Marian had reached such a pass through her children's needs that she dared not ask him where or how he had gotten it. Sometimes they sold a picture or a book; sometimes they had enough to eat; sometimes they went without.

As for Marian herself, she had no ability to earn. Her education had been a desultory thing, as the education of women in easy circumstances is apt to be—a little of every thing, but nothing exhaustively—and she was unfit to teach; she could not paint well enough to sell her sketches; she had never learned to use her needle on any thing but the most useless embroidery. Even if she could have done any thing to add to their means of subsistence, she had no time to spare from her household work and Helen's sore aches and ails.

But from day to day she wrought and cleaned, and pieced and patched, and earned a rest in heaven for her endeavor to hide her poverty and her husband's shame from the world—the world, that is, which she knew; there was another, darker under-world where Dean Rapall lived, and that world, though it knew all about him, could have known but little of her.

But one morning at daybreak Dean Rapall was brought home to her on a shutter: he had been wounded in a night brawl. A few days afterward the physician found it necessary to amputate the wounded limb; but that did no good; the amputation never entirely healed, and his life was slowly sapped away there.

If ever wife was faithful, Marian was faithful then. Her heart was at first full of pity for him; she waited on his every need; she denied herself food that she might enrich his portion; she dressed him, upheld him as he hobbled about, read to him, talked to him, helped by the same divine patience that descended on Helen, and made the girl endure her pains with heavenly silence; and every day Marian bathed and cleansed the wound that sickened her as she did so. One only revenge did she take on Dean: she refused to give him the indulgence the doctor forbade, and that their purse forbade too. He had brought home on his person from that brawl a couple of hundred dollars. Whether he had won it at faro, had found it in the street, had begged, borrowed, or stolen it, Marian did not know; she did not ask. By careful dole and stint she stretched it through the year; but she would not spend a cent of it for the fiery stuff he craved, and her refusal kept him furious with rage. There was nothing too vile for him to call her, nothing too taunting for him to say. He would summon little Jane to him and box her ears on both sides of her head for no reason under the sun save to hurt her mother, and the good little thing always went at his call, till Helen courageously bade her not to go—courageously, for more times than one he had struck Helen with his stick as she lay in bed. When he grew too feeble to move about, that stick was his great ally; he struck at the poor cat with it, he struck at little Jane with it, he struck at whatever crossed its arc with it, he struck at his wife with it, till she put it in the fire. Whenever she knelt to dress his wound she did it with an inward cringing, sure not only of the unfailing vituperation, but of pinched and twisted flesh, of shoves and blows. And when at last one stormy night the tortured soul left its body, amidst such blasphemies that poor Helen cowered beneath the bedclothes and held little Jane beside her, the mother could only be glad. But she sat beside her husband; she lifted his head and held it on her bosom; she bathed his brow and moistened his lips; she pitied him so that she forgot herself. In the midst of the shocking scene a part of her old love, a faint reflection of it, seemed to return to her. She bent and kissed his forehead, but even as he died he cursed her. And when she had laid him back dead upon his pillow she sat down and wrapped her shawl about her and wept her fill: not for the loss of him—oh, not for that! That was unspeakable relief! But for the twenty wasted years of life, the pity of it, the despair; for the loss of love, for the loss of the lover; reliving the old sorrow, enduring again the old pain; wept over the blight that had fallen on the soul she had reverenced and adored; wept for the ruin that had overtaken it; wept till the weeping ceased in shuddering at the blasphemies with which that soul had gone out into the darkness.

But with the morning, the Christmas morning, there were other things to do. Dean Rapall was to be buried, and there was not a dollar in the house. His widow must needs bestir herself as few other widows have ever been obliged to do. She had nothing left but a little of her old wedding silver. She took her spoons and her forks, bent them back and forth till she broke them, rubbed the new breakage in the ashes that they might look like the refuse of many years' accidents, and sold them for their weight, conscious all the time of the transaction that the silversmith took her for a thief.

The money buried Dean. The elegant and courtly fellow whom men had once admired, and women loved, and crowds followed—only two people followed him now to his grave, and they came back to their home with lighter hearts because he was gone out of it. The money buried Dean; and when a week had passed they had spent the last of it, and there was not so much as a measure of oil in the house.

Marian had been alone in the world when she married. She had separated herself from her friends as Dean's career had carried her into trouble. She could not bear to have the prosperous companions of her youth see her failure and want, or to expose her husband's wickedness before them. When they had come to call on her she had excused herself; gradually she had made herself a stranger to them; and now, in a distant town, she had completely lost sight of them, and there was not a soul in the world to whom she could apply for help in her need.

But something must be done, for presently her children would be starving. She could not sleep at night; she walked the floor all day, trying to devise some means of escaping this fate of hers. It seemed only a just retribution, so far as he was concerned, that Dean Rapall's children should suffer and starve—children of the man who had done so much injury to others; but what had she done that her children should be visited, she who had been faithful and untiring? But what justice was there in the retribution, asked the weary woman, that tormented the patient and heavenly child whom he had crippled; that deprived her of the appliances that might reduce her pain; that weakened her power of resisting that pain day by day; that forbade her all the small and innocent pleasures within reach of the bedridden; that obliged her to see her mother and sister hungry?

It was the day before New-Year's. People were hurrying to and fro in the streets; glad mothers were hastening home, with their muffs betraying the morrow's surprises beforehand; maidens of Helen's age went by demurely with the little tissue-wrapped fineries that were to complete the toilette for the dazzling of beholders; children, important with the secrets of their New-Year's gifts, went laughing along; grocers' boys were running from house to house with the dainties that were to refresh to-morrow's callers. But Marian had no gifts for her children; her children could have no secrets to be disclosed on New-Year's morning for her; no callers would be welcomed in that house, no New-Year's table spread there—no table at all would be spread there!

Marian walked the floor, I say, in misery. She paused at every turn to look out at the window at the crisp, clean snow, at the clear weather of the closing day of the year. It seemed to her as if help must come. And if help did not come what was she to do? There was not a crust on the shelf, there was only enough wood for the day's fire; the landlord held their scanty furniture for the arrears of rent. To-morrow, unless she would let her children perish, she must beg. Ah, what a close, what a beginning, of the year!

It would have been easier to Marian herself to perish than to beg; she thought it would have been easier to have her children perish; but when she looked at Helen's white face, and when she saw little Jane sitting beside the fire-place and gazing at the brands, frightened and awed, but uttering no word of complaint, her heart gave her a fresh pang, a pang that was agonizing, and she felt that she must not lose an hour in going out and asking help of any that could give it.

But she waited. Perhaps it would not be so hard to do when it was dark. It would soon be dark, though: the clear western light was turning to a ruddy glow across the snow even now, and the north was already purpling; soon the evening-star would be shining in her eyes; soon the bells of the little church a square away would be ringing out their glad bidding to the love-feast—glad bidding to every one but her. For as for her, she said, God had forgotten her. Poor Marian! Her trouble hindered her from recognizing that the same glad bidding came to her as to all—bidding to no material feast, but to communion with the Eternal Love. It had seemed to her long ago that God had forgotten her; she had wearied of praying prayers to which no answer came; she had grown to believe that she was under ban, and had ceased to remind Heaven of her existence.

Marian had paused a moment again in her tireless pacing to and fro to cover the bedclothes more closely over Helen's shoulders. As she did so the girl smiled up sweetly in her mother's face; and it was just as Marian kissed the dear mouth that the door-bell rang, and little Jane, filled by the sound with some wild childish hope, had sprung to the door before her mother, who shivered at every noise, had turned, and Marian heard the words, "Does Mrs. Rapall live here? Are you her little girl? Tell your mother, dear, that an old friend has come to pass the night with her."

Hosted by Google

"Oh, my God!" cried the proud woman as she heard, "is there any thing more to come!" For the swift vision of her humbled pride flashed before her; the exposure of her condition to this old friend, whomsoever it might be; the display to the world of the disappointment that had overtaken all her hopes; the blazoning of her husband's ruin! It must all have come had she gone out to beg, she knew, but now it had come indeed. And how could she go out to beg? All along her pride had held her up, and here her pride must crumble with a crash. She must not only know of the exposure, but must meet it face to face, as it were, and put the knife to her own throat. It seemed to her for a moment that she was going mad, and then she fell upon her knees beside Helen's bed. "Oh, my God!" she cried aloud again, "come to me, help me; I can bear no more! Lift my burden, or give me strength to carry it! Remember me; have mercy on my children!"

And there little Jane came running in. "She is in the other room," the child explained. "She is beautiful, she smiles so, and her cheeks are like a rose. And she kissed me—for my father's sake, she said."

For her father's sake! Who was there would do that? Could it be—Susan Sterling? Dimpled and rosy—ah, well, she had not married Dean Rapall! And Marian glanced at herself in the glass, looked at the waxen pallor that made her once haughty and beautiful face seem like one chiseled out of marble, at the lines round the still dark and starry eyes, at the ripples of the silver hair which she was so hastily smoothing away, and knew that it was Dean Rapall who had wrought that wreck—a wreck it seemed to her: to a stranger it would have seemed the still magnificent and queenly thing she was. She opened the drawer of the bureau, for the room was Helen's bedroom, to take out the shawl—the one black thing she owned—for she could not sit in the other room, where there was no fire, without it, and then, as she did so, there fluttered to the floor a bank-note. She started and gazed at it bewilderedly.

"Mother!" exclaimed Helen, "God has remembered us, you see. He has answered your prayer. Look there!"

It was a two-dollar bill. How it came there no one could tell; whether Marian had hidden it there from Dean some day, and had forgotten it in any fresh trouble, whether it had dropped from her purse and been pushed beneath the paper, or whether it was a miracle. Marian only knew that there was little Jane holding it between her fingers as if it were a red-hot coal; and while she still held it the door of the kitchen opened, and a woman, a neighbor, entered with a dish in her hand.

"You mustn't think, Mrs. Rapall," said a timid voice, as Marian hastened to meet the woman in the ice-cold kitchen, "that I've forgotten your kindness when my boy died. And I should have baked something neighborly to send in for the funeral, but our chimney was down. And the minute our fires were going again I made this chicken-pie for you." And to the good woman's amazement the proud Mrs. Rapall had stooped and kissed her cheek before she closed the door behind her.

"Run quick, little Jane," said her mother then, "and buy some tea—a quarter of a pound—and some sugar, with this bill; and buy some buns and bread. We can light a fire in the kitchen with that broken chair—that is ours, at any rate. At least we can live till to-morrow and the day after now." And then she went in to meet Susan Sterling.

"Marian," said Susan, hurriedly, after the first greeting, "once you were very good to me. I want you to be the same again. As soon as I saw Dean's death"—here her voice choked a little—"oh, that was dreadful news!" she said; "and as soon as I thought how you were probably left, it seemed as if Providence had given you to me—oh! I am in earnest—to me, who haven't had all I wanted in this life. For, to tell you the whole story at once, my matron had to be married last month, Heaven knows why! and though my school flourishes, it would fall in pieces without a matron. And now, though I am an excellent teacher, I know, and a good administrator of the school affairs, I am nothing as a housekeeper—and such a fat, dowdy little thing to see strangers! And a poor housekeeper, you know, would ruin any establishment. But you, with your superb bearing and manners, to meet parents and guardians, and to hold servants in awe—you would make my fortune over again! And if you can come, Marian dear—to-morrow, say—your two children shall have their home and education with us, and you shall have just what my other matron had, a thousand dollars a year, and there is the first quarter in advance—and do come, do!" said the breathless Susan. "I should be so happy with Dean's children. For, oh, Marian—you don't care now?—I was always so fond of Dean!" And Susan was crying with hearty sobs, and Marian was wiping the little woman's eyes. She was willing any one should care for Dean who could, and the children would be, at all events, a bond between them.

That night, as Susan sat holding Helen's hand, and telling her and little Jane pleasant things of their father's boyhood and youth, the love-feast bells began to chime out on the frosty starlight—sweet and sonorous bells, whose peal always trembled till the heart answered it. The others were not listening, but Marian heard them, and went up stairs to an empty room, and threw herself down before an open window to pour out a thanksgiving. Oh, glad, glad things indeed they were sounding at last! Had Dean Rapall's heart been hard? Hers had been harder yet! Hers, that had been insensible to these assurances, which all at once it seemed as if she heard for the first time, that though suns ceased to shine and waters ceased to flow, God still ruled in His heaven! And she reproached herself bitterly, and begged Heaven's forgiveness for the ingratitude that had hindered her from realizing the blessings that those bell-notes were still declaring, as their tones fell through the clear air of the sparkling night, and wandered away on the wind, calling their listeners to watch with thanks and prayer the old year out and the new year in.

"I am sure," said Susan, as they dressed for their short journey the next day, "I am sure I wouldn't miss the example of that patient child's angelic face among my girls for any price! I can see them now, going and coming about her little bed, and listening as she repeats that psalm she said last night—she will make saints of every one of them!"

As for Susan, Marian thought, in her infinite relief, that she was nearly a saint herself—a little silly about Dean Rapall, perhaps, but of that she could not speak; indeed, she never could speak of him again. And the only shadow that ever fell between her and her friend was a suspicion in Susan's mind, a suspicion she hardly breathed to herself, and never to another, that noble and beautiful as Marian was, she had never loved Dean Rapall quite enough!

MRS. PALLISER'S DREAM.

I PROPOSE to relate Mrs. Palliser's dream, because it brought about a marked change in her life.

Great as is the liberty generally allowed to a dream, nevertheless I apologize beforehand for Mrs. Palliser's dream. It is not a conventional good-society dream. I admit it. I protest against any damaging inferences about Mrs. Palliser. She is a dear, good, pious little woman; but I leave the dream to its own merits. I will not even attempt to tell it in a roundabout style, but just say, plumply, Mrs. Palliser dreamed that, sitting in church, she saw Satan sitting near her, quite at his ease, listening with an air of artistic enjoyment to the singing, and with an expression of proprietorship and interest in what was about him that made Mrs. Palliser so horribly uncomfortable that she could not follow the services.

When a dream begins like that, of course you may expect almost any thing to come next. Mrs. Palliser in her dream was more curious to know why he came there, and how he could sit there, than ever was Eve about the apple; and her curiosity grew so intolerable that, the service being over, she touched him on the arm and asked him.

"My dear madam," he answered, blandly, "I often come here. I view this and one or two similar establishments something as a man does his pet country-seat, and when I get a fit of the blues I come here to refresh my faith—in myself. And for the question in your thoughts, madam, that you are too polite to frame in words, your Christ, to whom you have erected this temple, is not here."

"You are a liar, and the father of lies!" retorted Mrs. Palliser, with more zeal than politeness.

"Granted! but the devil can quote Scripture. What did He tell you himself of some who shall begin to say, 'We have eaten and drunk in Thy presence, and Thou hast taught in our streets; but He shall say, I know you not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity.' I wonder, Mrs. Palliser, if the prophecy was confined entirely to those wicked Jews, or if among them will be found any body who sits here, for example."

Now, coupled with his words, there was something so unspeakably awful in the smile with which he looked down into Mrs. Palliser's wondering face that the little woman's heart stood still. She struggled and woke.

This absurd and irreverent dream made a terrible impression on Mrs. Palliser. She was unable to forget it. She told her husband, and he pooh-poohed it as nonsense. That was conclusive, but not satisfactory. She consulted her pastor. He smiled, and told her that "a dream cometh through the multitude of business." "But not such dreams," murmured Mrs. Palliser. She grew thin and worn, and her husband called in the doctor. The doctor demanded her symptoms, and Mrs. Palliser told her dream. The doctor said something about nerves, gave her a prescription, and privately advised Mr. Palliser to take his wife into society, and try and distract her thoughts: this persistent dwelling on one looked a little like mania.

Winter came—two-faced, as usual. To the rich and the well-to-do it brought the "season" and all its splendors and pleasures: lectures, operas, sleigh-rides, rinks, red cheeks, quick-leaping blood, long, bracing walks in the clear air; spring, sparkle, elasticity; cozy curtained rooms, twilights with soft warm air, red firelight, and just a glimpse through the clear panes of the dying winter's light for contrast; long evenings close around the hearth, all the cozier for the raving wind and driving sleet without; Christmas-trees, New-Year's boxes, wine, velvet, gold, fur—all these for the rich; but for the poor—lower your voice and change your note. Winter is a mighty hunter: the poor are his game, and he hunts them hard, and to the death. This winter was no exception. It was a bitter one. The charitable were busy; busiest of all Mrs. Palliser, but she still asked herself why Christ should not be in His church.

In an alley lived Madge Allen, on the third floor of a rear tenement building. She was by no means a model poor woman. Her temper was bad. She was sometimes drunk. Mrs. Palliser's cook vowed that she stuffed her pockets with tea and sugar. But, however that might be, she fell sick. Mrs. Palliser found her looking not only ill, but gaunt and starved. So did her children. There was no quilt on her bed; no fire; no bread; no tea-kettle; not even a whole dish. One by one, every thing had gone to the pawnbroker's. Winter had hunted them down, and was worrying them now in their miserable attic till the landlord should turn them out, as he intended to do the day after to-morrow, when he would finish them.

Madge told these things in a dry, hard voice, and with no sign of emotion, although the soft-hearted Mrs. Palliser was in tears. You see, Madge lived only a block and a half away, and that aggravated the case, to Mrs. Palliser's thinking. She could hardly await the end of the story to fly into the street, order coal, wood, and groceries, confiscate the whole Palliser dinner, and send around a load of blankets, quilts, flannel, dishes, etc. She paid the landlord; she brought the doctor; she nursed Madge herself—the best and tenderest of nurses. In all this glow of kind feeling Madge thawed a little, and one day she said,

"I thank you, I do thank you, Mrs. Palliser. I don't see why you ever took so much trouble for one like me."

"For Jesus' sake," answered Mrs. Palliser, softly and quickly, glad of the opportunity to say so.

An ill-omened light sparkled in Madge's eyes.

"Whose sake did you say?" affecting sudden deafness.

"Our Lord and Saviour's," replied Mrs. Palliser again, trembling a little.

"And why on His account?" asked Madge, mighty dryly.

"Because He— Why, surely you know, Madge. He told us to do so. He was poorer once than you; He had not even a place to lay His head."

Madge threw up her head scornfully. "Now I wonder, Mrs. Palliser, to hear you talk like that. I have heard that story a dozen times from them as likes to set themselves up and preach; but you are another sort. You are a good woman, you are; and why do you want to stuff me with a story like that?"

Mrs. Palliser was still with surprise.

"Now, see here," continued Madge, rapidly. "I don't want to say nothing saucy to one that's been good to me and mine. But poor folks ain't fools. When we see ice it is no use telling us it's dog-days, because we know better. Now you say our Lord was so poor Hisself, and so He had a feeling for the poor folks, and wants Christians to have it too, and He counts us all His brothers and sisters. Oh, I know the rigmarole; I've heard it often enough. Now just let me tell you how a few of these brothers and sisters are getting on. The woman overhead has two little children. She is honest, and works her fingers to the bone to keep them, and in five days they have had three loaves of bread. The decent man below is a carpenter. He is out of work. He was too poor to buy stuff to make things for hisself. He has a wife and three children—babies, you may say, all of them. They have pawned all they have. He is so poor-looking now I don't suppose they'd trust him with work if they had it. She is down with rheumatiz: no flannels, no fire, no food, is too much for her. They are clean beat out, and last week they would have starved to death but for what we poor folks brought them. In yonder the children is crying with cold and chilblains, and never a shoe to their foot. Their mother goes around with a basket and sells what she can, but you know how it is, ma'am—where one will buy, twenty will pass on and never look at her, Oh"—and the woman's black eyes kindled—"I wish I could make you, and every one that is warm and full, feel what it is to be starved all over, dizzy and faint, and the wind searching through every bone, and no hope of any thing better, and folks going by you as if they was angels and you was vermin, for the way they look at you, and plenty to eat and drink, and warm rooms every where in the houses that would no more open to you than the kingdom of heaven, if there was one. Keep this in your mind, ma'am, as I have done when I watched you fine folks come out of your church. The price of the lace on your cloak would take that carpenter's clothes and tools out of pawn, and start him again. Them ladies behind you cost more than would make us all happy here. While your Lord's brothers and sisters are starving, you brush by us with the price of what would save us to go and pray to Him, and then you go home, easy and careless and happy, and think well of yourselves if you send us out twenty-five cents by the servant. Mind, I think folks is right to use their own, and it's natural to want to look fine and handsome; but there's enough piled on just for show, and that does no good to nobody, to make us all easy. Give us a chance, anyhow. And then you say He is in there listening to you. Why, if He was, and He is what you make Him out— I can read, and I read once how He drove the peddlers out of the Temple for buying and selling, and what is that to leaving His own to perish, and never thinking or caring? Don't tell me. He isn't there, Mrs. Palliser, and what is more, you don't none of you believe it, really, or expect Him, as you say you do. For what did He tell you? Oh, I have not been to Sunday-school for nothing. I can answer folk back when they come preaching at me;" and with an air of triumph she repeated: "'When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: and thou shalt be blessed; for they can not recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.' Now, there's a lot of Christians living in our neighborhood—the regular A No. 1 sort. But I don't see no invitations coming down our alley. They was a different sort as drove up to your house t'other night, Mrs. Palliser, and that will come scraping in New-Year's Day to drink your wine and wish you merry; and suppose on that day He came too, and when He'd looked around, and see none of the poor and the sick, He said to you, as it says in your book, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me!' And that is what He would say, according to your own story, and if you believed it, wouldn't you all be sick for fear, and trying to do different? That you would. You are a kind woman, Mrs. Palliser, but drop that church talk with me. It's no good. He isn't there"—pointing toward her window, from which one could just see the church spire.

"Oh! Madge, He is," cried Mrs. Palliser. "Don't believe it. Don't think it. It is true, what you say, but the human heart is so hard that so long as we were warm and fed we would never care at all, and we wouldn't do even this little, only for Jesus' sake. It is He who sends us, and it is we who, like thoughtless and unwilling children, do as little as we can, and then run off to our sport. The blame is ours—mine, Madge. But, please God," she continued, rather to herself than to Madge, "I, at least, know now where to look for my Lord."

That evening Mrs. Palliser informed her husband that she had found out the meaning of her dream. Madge Allen had told her.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Bettors and their Betters.—Dickens and his Biographer.—Where are the Police?

THE government of William Ewart Gladstone may not supply the people, as the Roman emperors did, with "bread and circuses," but if giving them plenty to talk about can satisfy a nation, we Britishers ought just now to be very happy. A whole week is never permitted to elapse without some piece of political gaucherie being enacted for the public amusement. This week it is the prosecution of the frequenters of certain betting houses in this city, which in a humble rank are the counterfeit presentments of that famous Tattersall's where for half a century, throughout the racing seasons, lords and gentlemen meet for no other purpose than to bet and gamble. Although politically the "upper ten" are by no means so powerful as they were, they are socially as strong as ever, and hence this disgraceful inconsistency. Gladstone is afraid to meddle with even the vices of the swells, and when twitted with his inaction is said to have quoted episcopal authority for it. "I put down vice where I can," says he, "but I must decline to enter into the general question." State the truth, but do not state the arguments against it, or let them be stated, if you can help it, since, even with the best intentions, they are sometimes difficult to refute, was the advice of the late Bishop of London to his clergy; and it was founded upon practical experience. In his first curacy he had preached a sermon on the text, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God," during the course of which he had quoted all infidel writers from Voltaire to Volney, and, he thought, satisfactorily disposed of them. When the sermon was over he overtook one of his congregation, a farmer, on his way home, and asked him how he liked the sermon. "Oh, very well, Sir," was the reply. "But did you understand it?" "Oh yes, I understood it well enough, Sir; but for all you did say, I do still believe that there is a God."

And so our government prudently confines itself to stating its intentions and acting upon them, without entering into the question of their wisdom. The fact of Tattersall's being permitted to pass unnoticed is, however, a most flagrant piece of favoritism. It was urged against closing our public-houses at eleven P.M. that the clubs were open long after that hour, and that therefore the law was one that annoyed the poor and not the rich; but nobody could affirm that the clubs were used for the same purpose as the public-houses, or that the same excesses were committed in them, whereas between Tattersall's and the common betting houses there is an exact parallel, except in the extent of their transactions, which are by far the greatest on the unpunished side.

Talking of aristocratic gambling, the committee of the Hurlingham Club, whose calling in life is to succeed to titles and shoot pigeons, have rather an unpleasant business on hand. They are sitting in judgment upon a case of "calling names," which is really funny. A certain member of the club whom we will call Jay (and his name has really the same sound as a single letter) is not very popular there, although he is a Victoria Cross man (or, perhaps, since personal distinction is not thought much of by the hereditaries, because he is so). On a certain day when pigeons were being shot at, and the names of the marksmen called out as usual, that of R. A. Jay, V.C., was followed by these other four letters, very distinctly enunciated, S.N.O.B. At first it was hoped to be only an echo; but as the sentiment was also echoed—received, I am sorry to say, with shouts of laughter—the committee have been obliged to give their ear to it.

In literature nothing is talked about so much as the second volume of Dickens's biography. That he should at one time of his life have seriously contemplated being an actor surprises nobody, for every one who has seen him act will testify to his fitness for such a calling; but that it should ever have entered into his mind (and that in middle age too) to become a police magistrate (!) astonishes folks a good deal. Imagine the author of Oliver Twist a "beak," and sitting in Bow Street in judgment upon our Charley Bateses and Artful Dodgers! His biographer endeavors to explain the matter by the fact that Dickens was just at that period on the eve of conceiving another book, at which time, he hints, the great author was apt to be very restless and fanciful, like a lady in an interesting situation. This Life of Dickens is, of course, universally popular, but it is a common complaint that it has too much of the Forster-father in it; that other friends of Dickens are kept in the background in order that the figure of the biographer may be the more prominent. Whether this be so or not, a curious proof of the very extraordinary regard in which Dickens did hold Forster occurred within my own knowledge. Twenty years ago a literary friend of mine, and one very intimate with Dickens, had sent him a book of his own entitled the Foster-Brothers, in acknowledging which—the letter now lies before me—Dickens spells the word "Forster," and apologizes for it in the postscript on the ground of "being so constantly with his friend Forster." Again, just before Dickens's death, my friend received a letter from him, written under circumstances which had much moved his great and tender heart, and as though when thus excited his mind naturally reverted to him in whom all his joys and sorrows were reposed, he actually signs it, not with his own name, but with that of his fidus Achates, "Yours affectionately, John Forster." The only thing, except the sad episode of his early career in the blacking manufactory, which Dickens seems to have hidden from his friend was this application for a police magistracy, which perhaps his own sense of humor forbade him to reveal.

Hosted by Google

Talking of police, some hundreds of our London constabulary refused to go on their beats the other night without a rise of wages. This is surely the very reductio ad absurdum of "strikes," that those should strike a blow at order whose mission it is to uphold it! Moreover, they did not give in, and have in consequence very justly been dismissed "the force," since, whatever their grievances, they had no right, at such a time and place as London at night-fall, to urge their claims, and threaten the innocent public with robbery and rapine should they not be conceded. Imagine what might have been the consequences if in those particular districts of the town messieurs the thieves had been conscious of this proceeding of their natural enemies, and had taken advantage of their absence to work their own wicked will! Conceive, for instance, Mr. Editor, if in the fashionable quarter in which your special correspondent resides such a catastrophe was to take place, and all his jewels and splendid furniture, not to mention the magnificent services of plate which from time to time you have presented him in acknowledgment of his literary services, should become the prey of a lawless rabble! It is true, you will (probably) say, "In such a case I should feel it a privilege to reimburse you;" but still the shock of such an occurrence to my system, which is delicate, and to my nature, which is sensitive to the very verge of pusillanimity, would be very great. "Strike, but hear," may be an excellent motto; but "Strike, but not here," is the observation that I would respectfully address to the guardians of the public peace in my vicinity.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

BLACK VELVET COSTUME.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

"WHAT delicious little dresses those cheap stuffs would make, if one only could have them made up by a reasonable dress-maker!" How often have we all uttered this exclamation before the lovely array of silks and gauzes and muslins draped like a softly glowing kaleidoscope in the front of the great stores on their "exposition" day, and how pathetically it has been echoed by the friend beside us, and how vainly we have turned to her, as to scores of others previously and subsequently, with the despairing cry, "Do you know of a cheap dress-maker, or a clever girl, who has a good cut, and would come and work for a few days in the house with one, and make up a cheap gown without taking four times its cost for the making?" And how invariably the answer has been, "My dear soul, it is the dream of my life ever since I have been in Paris to find such a person, and I have never found her." Yes. It is quite true. The race of petites couturières, as they were called, has disappeared. They have not died out, like a fashion, but they have soared above their former sphere, floated up out of our reach into the realm of great couturières. They no longer perch on a fifth floor, and console us for the panting manœuvre of climbing to their aerial heights by the reflection that though it is a little fatiguing, the operation is well rewarded, seeing that our bargain which cost fifty francs, a delightful remnant, worth double the money in ordinary circumstances, will be made into a fascinating costume for twenty or twenty-five francs. Alas! where again are they, those precious girls dubbed ouvrières en journée, who came to you by the day for two francs and their food, or three francs without it, and cut out your new bargain, and trimmed and fitted it so daintily, and who turned your old ones—that dear last-winter gown that is such an invaluable aid-de-camp for the present campaign—and who ran up a tidy little bonnet out of odds and ends of ribbon and lace for shopping and morning trots or wet days, who made money go so far and so satisfactorily—where are they? Echo answers "where!" They, too, have disappeared. They have set up at home as regular dress-makers, with a brass plate on their door setting forth their capabilities as fabricators of "robes et manteaux de cour," and if you trust your silk to them, supposing them kind enough to accept it, woe be unto you! If you have any visions of perfect fits and economy, they will melt like the baseless fabric that they rest on. What are we to do, then? I hear you say. Is there nothing for it but to go to Worth's and spend two hundred dollars on a costume? Surely somebody buys the pretty cheap stuffs set out in the windows, and if she buys them she wears them, and to wear them they must be made up. Yes. Somebody does buy them, and wears them, and has them made up. But those dreadful Americans don't. Or if they do, they gnash their teeth over it, and say, what idiots they were to fancy they were getting a cheap dress when the bill comes in and they have about four times the price of the dress to hand over to the artiste who has condescended to take their bargain and do for it.

The fact is, the expansion of little mantua-makers into big ones, their rise, in a logical though inverse sense, from the perch on a fifth floor to a spacious suite of rooms on a first, and the total disappearance of ouvrières en journée of the old accomplished sort, are owing—yes, swear at me, shake your fist at me, call me a vile traducer; I will say it still—are owing mainly to the dreadful Americans. They have completely spoiled the two races, and serve them right if now and then they feel the inconvenience of their iniquities. It is not often, I grieve to say, that their sin finds them out; it is mostly we poor natives who pay for it; still, one occasionally has the comfort of seeing an American stranded with a bundle of pretty bargains that she knows not what to do with.

Well, if you promise to be good, to mend your ways a little in these respects for the future, I will give you a helping hand in the shape of a few hints. As a rule, avoid second-rate dress-makers. If you go to a really good one, don't bring your own stuff. Indeed, a really good one will not take it, unless, perhaps, you go recommended, or, as the phrase now is, introduced to her, by some old customer, and if she does you the favor of taking it, you will pay for it some way or other; she will run it up on the trimmings, and you will not have saved a dollar in the end. In the next place, you have no redress if your gown misfits or is otherwise not to your taste, whereas if you let her supply the material you can throw it back on her hands should the result prove a failure. It is noticeable also that dresses provided by the dress-maker are much less frequently failures than those given by the customer—a fact to be traced, perhaps, to a natural and obvious reason. Unless you have already procured a dress-maker of your own, if you come to Paris at present I should strongly advise you when you want a good dress to go either to an out-and-out extravagant fashionable house or to one of the great stores where dresses are of late made on a very large scale, and very successfully. The Louvre and the Bon Marché are perhaps the two establishments that are worthy of recommendation. Hundreds of dresses are turned out every day from both; they have an immense staff of hands, the best choice of materials, and if a dress misfits in the slightest degree there is no hesitation made about making a fresh one for you; the one that has misfitted you is sure to suit some one else; the demand is so enormous and so continual that the mantua-maker makes no complaint of taking it back. Until very recently no one in "society" dreamed of going to such an establishment for a dress, or if they did, they took care to hide the shameful fact. But within the last year this prejudice has quite vanished. French-women who frequented expensive dress-makers' until they were shouldered out by those dreadful Americans now go boldly to the great shops and select their materials and order their costumes in the light of day. The dress-makers' bills attained at last to that point which is known as the unbearable, so their native customers abandoned them, and took refuge, first, in home-made dresses, and now of late in the ateliers of such houses as those I have mentioned.

But for the making up of bargains the difficulty still remains, for, of course, no large house will take them. Well, though it is difficult to find a worker by the day, still such a treasure is yet to be had if you go to work in the right way to discover her. She has raised her prices considerably, thanks to you, dear friends. She charges now three francs with her food. But it will be cheaper for you to give her almost any thing she asks without the food, for she will never be satisfied with what you provide for her; moreover, if she has her meals in your kitchen, it is a pretext for wasting hours of her time, which are taken from the "bargain" and less profitably spent in gossiping with your servants, and inquiring into all your family affairs, which will be more or less veraciously retailed to the servants of her next employer. Let her, then, bring her food in a basket in the old-fashioned way, and eat it at noon, the usual hour, when she is entitled to a full hour's respite. She should come at eight in the morning and stay till eight in the evening. In the autumn there is a rule among them that they should not work by candle-light; so in the month of September, when the days are growing short, they come an hour earlier in the morning to make up the difference. When they feed themselves they never take but one meal; if you feed them, they must have dinner before they leave. When you want such a person as this, don't ask your banker or some fashionable American friend, but go to one of your trades-people, your grocer or butcher, whose wives dress admirably well, and who employ these itinerant artistes, and will lend you one of them, if they are agreeable. While she is in the house be with her as much as you can; half the profit depends on your helping her on with the work and keeping an eye on its progress. This enables you also to see how much stuff is really wanted and used for the various articles. Thus you may find that your bargain is really a bargain, making and all.

COMET.

BLACK VELVET COSTUME.

THIS handsome costume for the street is of black Lyons velvet, trimmed with bands of sea blue faille and ball fringe. The skirt of walking length has a box-pleated flounce headed by four bias bands of faille. The polonaise has three narrow bias piping folds, from which balls are pendent. Large jet buttons trim the front. The sash is of the new yellowish tint called serpent-color. Black velvet bonnet with blue faille trimmings and ostrich feathers. Muff of black-fox fur.

Hosted by Google

3 – MISS SHARPCHINS TEACHINGS
4 – STUDY OF DEPORTMENT UNDER MISS SHARPCHIN.
5 – THE DANCING LESSON.
6 – THE RIDING LESSON.
7 – THE MUSIC LESSON.
8 – THE FIRST WALTZ DEDICATED
№ 1 – BABYHOOD

9 – THE FIRST LONG SKIRT.
10 – THE FIRST LOVE
11 – THE FIRST INTRODUCTION TO THE WORLD
12 – A GREAT DEAL OF SUCCESS MANY ADMIRERS
13 – THE CRITICAL MOMENT. THE PROPOSAL FOR MARRIAGE
14 – THE FIRST LOVE LETTER
№ 2 – MISS LUCY AND HER DOLLS

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ADMIRER.—Dark hair is not dyed white, but is bleached and ruined by a strong wash of chloride of lime. But you will be senseless to change your hair in any way except by brushing and keeping it well.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The lady of the house is not required, happily, to eat and drink with all her guests on New-Year's Day. If she were, her condition at evening would be pitiable indeed.

MRS. S. A. H.—It will be perfectly proper for you to invite the husbands of your friends to call on you on New-Year's Day.

LEARNER.—The coronets of the British peerage show the rank of the wearer by the ornaments on them. Dukes have eight golden strawberry leaves; marquises, four strawberry leaves and four pearls on gold points; earls, leaves and pearls set on even line; viscounts, eight pearls; barons, four pearls. Baronets are not entitled to coronets.

MRS. C. B. W.—Your brown striped poplin will look well made in the Louis Quinze style.

L. E. T.—The flounce with single box-pleats without the narrow ruffles will look very well.

LOUISA.—Eighteen or twenty yards of goods three-fourths of a yard wide will make a Louis Quinze suit very plainly trimmed. We can not give you addresses.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—R. S. V. P. are the initials of the French words répondez, s'il vous plait. The English phrase is, reply, if you please.

L. H. B.—Your sample is épingeline, and would look well made by the Louis Quinze pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

S. S. L. P.—An advertisement in our columns will tell you where to send for point lace materials. For $50 you can buy a mink collar and muff, or else a boa and muff of black marten or of seal-skin. The first-mentioned would probably be the best choice for an elderly lady.

A FRIEND.—High-necked dresses are most worn for dinner-parties; both low and high necked dresses appear at large full-dress receptions. Dress skirts trimmed to the waist are worn in the house. The adjustable demi-trained skirt is long enough for the house.—We can not tell you how to bleach your Parian-ware.

BESSIE.—Your sample is watered Japanese poplin of very poor quality. Make it up very simply. It does not seem worth a velvet vest and trimmings.

L. M.—Your sample did not reach us.

MRS. E. K. W.—A facing of thick silk or velvet, or else bias bands of silk with fringe, is the trimming for your cashmere suit. Read New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 41 and 42, Vol. V., for hints about cashmere suits and their trimmings.

MISS C.—We have not the pattern you want.

AMY.—Make your suit by the Louis Quinze pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. Trim with corded silk of the same shade instead of velvet; omit the lace, or else use yak lace. Make coat sleeves with silk cuffs instead of the open ones illustrated, and let the pockets be entirely of silk.—Thanks for your appreciative letter.

VELVETEEN.—Make your black velveteen skirt over, trimming with lengthwise pleats of black silk; then get a cashmere polonaise, and make an over-jacket of the velveteen. This seems to us the best plan, though your idea of a sleeveless basque and apron is good. The objection is the weight and expense of the ruffles in the back.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The kilt suit illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. V., is the model for your boy of three years. Get plaid goods and black velveteen for him. Children of six months old, and girls of one and two years, wear white all winter.

MRS. J. D. B.—Boys of four years wear kilt skirts and jackets, or else knee-breeches, with a vest and jacket. We can furnish you patterns of each suit. Double-breasted sack overcoats are worn by small boys. We have no pattern of this garment.

A CONSTANT READER.—You can wad the jacket throughout. Oxidized silver buttons and braid are sold at the furnishing stores.—We can not give addresses in this column.

MRS. E. I.—Make your black silk by the Louis Quinze pattern sent you. See the illustration in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and trim with velvet and lace, or else jet fringe. Let the vest be of velvet.

AN APPRECIATIVE FRIEND.—The Dolman and the poionaise are equally fashionable this season. It is impossible to say how long they will continue in favor, but they are certainly the latest popular styles.

MRS. J. J. P.—Instead of heavy beaver cloth you should get lighter ladies' cloth for a redingote. You will require three and a half or perhaps four yards of cloth.

A THING NOT TO BE MISSED.—No lady in the city or country should fail to see and examine the New Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine. This machine stands in the very front rank of first-class sewing-machines. It does every kind of work beautifully on every kind of material. In proof of this we urge every lady to visit the Wilson Sewing-Machine rooms, and examine the beautiful specimens of work there displayed. Look at them closely, they will bear it. You will see that whatever the material, the Wilson makes a firm, even, elastic seam, which no machine has ever surpassed. Best of all, this superb machine costs but fifty dollars, and at once establishes the fact that a first-class sewing-machine can be made and sold at a price that the people one and all can easily afford to pay. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, N.Y., and in all other cities in the U.S. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.—Mrs. Rev. W. V. MILLIGAN, Cambridge, Ohio, has saved with her Wheeler & Wilson Lock-Stitch Machine hundreds of dollars in the last ten years, without a cent for repairs. See the new Improvements and Woods' Lock-Stitch Ripper.—[Com.]

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION of Boston is a thoroughly wide-awake paper, having among its contributors such writers as Prof. De Mille, Louisa M. Alcott, Sophie May, Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis, and Mrs. Louisa Chandler Moulton. No writers more attractive in the country, and no publication for young people more enterprising and useful.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS,

502-504 Broadway,

—ONLY.—

OFFER FOR THE SEASON THEIR LARGE AND EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF

LADIES' FURS,

COMPRISING THEIR FINE STOCK OF

Seal-Skin Fur,

IN ALL THE LATEST STYLES.

A RICH ASSORTMENT OF

Russian and American Sables, Black, Silver, and Blue Foxes.

A FULL VARIETY IN

BLACK MARTEN and ASTRAKAN.

A CHOICE SELECTION OF

ERMINE GOODS.

A FULL LINE OF

CHILDREN'S FURS, FUR ROBES, GENTLEMEN'S FURS.

ALSO,

Fur Trimmings,

IN EVERY GRADE AND STYLE.

All at the Lowest Possible Prices.

502-504 Broadway.

N. B.—OUR BUSINESS IN ALL ITS DEPARTMENTS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL, IS ONLY AT 502 AND 504 BROADWAY.

FOR MOTH PATCHES,

Freckles, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

FOR PIMPLES ON THE FACE,

Blackheads, and Fleshworms, use Perry's Improved Comedone and Pimple Remedy—the Great Skin Medicine. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York.

NICOL, DAVIDSON, & CO.,

686 BROADWAY,

Near Great Jones Street, New York,

Offer a Quarter of a Million Dollars' worth of

REAL BRONZE CLOCKS;
MANTLE SETS, GROUPS, FIGURES;
BISQUE, PARIAN;
ENAMELED-BRONZE JEWEL-BOXES;
CHINA, GLASS;
GAS-FIXTURES AND CHANDELIERS,
in Crystal, Gilt, or Bronze,
At a small advance on cost of importation.

A LARGE, VARIED, AND ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of Ladies' solid Gold Hunting Watches, with Chains of the latest styles to match. The solid 14-karat Gold Hunting-Case Lever Movement Watch, $29 00; usual price $45 00. Solid Gold Leontine Chains, $12 00. The Gold Illustrated Circular, of more expensive goods, free. Goods C. O. D., privilege to examine. F. J. NASH, 712 Broadway, New York. "Has a good stock and is entirely reliable."—Appleton's Journal. "Whose goods are just what he represents them."—Christian Union. "Worthy of the fullest confidence."—Christian Advocate, New York.

"HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?"

If you would be well and strong, read THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. The best and only ILLUSTRATED HEALTH JOURNAL, not being the organ of any person, business, or institution, but an independent earnest Teacher of the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH; showing how to regain and preserve HEALTH. Only $2 00 a year; single numbers 20 cents. Clubbed with either of Harper's for $5 00. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

REAL LACES

CLOAK VELVETS, FINE FURS, &c. Cheapest in the country. Send for full Winter Price-List to

EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N.Y.

FALL and WINTER SAMPLES now READY.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. MRS. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?

WHY BE ANNOYED WITH

CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?

WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL

REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,

AT SO SMALL A COST,

BY USING WRIGHT'S

"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."

Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

THREE PAIR of BEST 2-BUTTON KID GLOVES for $2 75. All Colors and Sizes. Single pair sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1 00. Also, a large and varied stock of Real Yak and Guipure Laces, Fringes, and other Dress Trimmings, at J. TAYLOR'S BAZAAR, 353 Eighth Ave., N. Y. Samples sent free on application.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,

Will continue to offer for the balance of the

HOLIDAY SEASON, GREAT BARGAINS

In all descriptions of goods suitable for CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.

UNUSUALLY ATTRACTIVE LINES OF RICH FABRICS,
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS & SCARFS.
ELEGANT SILKS FOR EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES.
REAL POINT AND APPLIQUE LACES.
PARIS-MADE WALKING AND CARRIAGE COSTUMES.
PARIS-MADE EVENING & RECEPTION DRESSES.
OPERA CLOAKS AND RICH SABLE, FOX, AND MINK FURS.
BLACK THREAD LACE SHAWLS.

Elegant CHRISTMAS & NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH
SILK UMBRELLAS,
of every description,
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,
All sizes and colors, Chatelaines, &c.,
AT REASONABLE PRICES.

LADIES' & GENTS'
FURNISHING GOODS,
ENGLISH AND FRENCH CARDIGAN JACKETS,
DRESSING ROBES, SMOKING JACKETS,
PLAIN AND FANCY NECK-WEAR,
PLAIN AND EMB'D SHIRT BOSOMS,
The Celebrated
CHOSSON'S KID GLOVES, 1 to 10 BUTTONS,
CHS. ROBERTS' BEST PARIS
DOG-SKIN GLOVES, 1, 2, and 3 BUTTONS,
SASH RIBBONS, ROMAN SCARFS,
INITIAL, EMB'D, & PLAIN L. C. & LAWN HDKFS.,
(In Fancy Boxes.)
An Endless Variety of made-up
VALENCIENNES LACE GOODS, EMBROIDERED
PIN-CUSHIONS, &c., &c.

SMYRNA CARPETS,
LACE CURTAINS,
AND
UPHOLSTERY GOODS,
In Great Variety, and at Attractive Prices.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,

IN BLACK STRIPES,

AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,

Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

A. SELIG,

Successor to S. M. Peyser, 813 Broadway, Importer of Zephyr Worsteds; Silks for Embroidering; Embroideries on Canvas and Leather—Slippers, Cushions, Light Screens, Suspenders, Strips for Oriental and Camp Chairs. Also, Guipure and Point Laces, and materials for making the same. Novelties in Fringes, Gimps, Buttons, Ornaments, and Laces. Fringes and other Trimmings made to order. All kinds of stamping done. Monograms and Crests designed and embroidered in gold, silk, or worsted, in artistic style, at the lowest prices.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.
" " Chamois, $4 00, $5 00, $6 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

1860 TO 1872.

R. A. OLMSTEAD,

Manufacturer of and Wholesale and Retail Dealer in all grades of

HOOP-SKIRTS, CORSETS, &c.,

781 BROADWAY, near 10th St., N. Y.,
Opposite A. T. Stewart & Co.'s, Entrance at Side Door.

HEADQUARTERS FOR ALL THE NOVELTIES.

ORIGINATOR OF THE CELEBRATED

"PANIER MUSLIN FRONT HOOP SKIRTS,"

And the only manufacturer of a practical skirt of this kind. Beware of IMITATIONS of our goods.

MAGIC FOR THE PARLOR. Send a stamp for the new price-list. HARTZ CONJURING REPOSITORY, 743 Broadway, New York; also at 850 Broadway, near 14th Street.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key-Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

ELEGANT!

UNION ADAMS & CO.

Have manufactured, expressly

For the Present Season, a Splendid Variety of

House Coats,
Smoking Jackets,
Robes de Chambre,
Railway Rugs,
Traveling Shawls,

&c., &c., &c.,

ADAPTED TO COMFORT.

637 BROADWAY.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

BRIGGS & BRO.

SEEDSMEN & FLORISTS,

ROCHESTER, N.Y.

ILLUSTRATED WORK for January, 1873, now out. Issued as a Quarterly. The four numbers sent to any address by mail for 25 cents. The richest and most instructive illustrated and Descriptive Floral Guide ever issued. You will miss it if you order Seeds before seeing BRIGGS & BRO.'s QUARTERLY. We challenge comparison on quality of Seed and prices and sizes of packets. Our "CALENDAR ADVANCE SHEET AND PRICE LIST FOR 1873" sent free.

Address BRIGGS & BROTHER,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Stick to your text. Eat your Christmas dinner and then do what you might have done ten years ago—subscribe for the GREAT FAMILY PAPER—receive an elegant PRANG CHROMO free gratis, read the paper for 1873, and be happy. The STAR-SPANGLED BANNER is —— you can easily remember the rest, for we have been telling you in every paper for ten years past. It makes a specialty of "showing up" the "Tricks and Traps of America." Do you remember that Gift enterprise, Dollar music-box, "Rights," "Recipes," Curlique and curling comb? Has no swindler ever caught you? The STAR-SPANGLED BANNER names and exposes EVERY humbug, quack, and swindler. Speaks right out plain, and is hated by every rascal as it is praised by all honest men, ONLY $1 secures this large 8-page paper, size of Ledger, a whole year, and also one of the most superb chromos ever made by Prang, the best of all artists. All for $1; no delay; chromo sent AT ONCE. No Maine or Michigan style. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Established 1863. Refer to Wood's Magazine, Toledo Blade, N. Y. Tribune, and 50,000 present subscribers. Agents wanted; outfit FREE; specimens 6 cts. One dollar for chromo and paper. Send to Star-Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

No Lady should be without

Mrs. GILMAN'S PATENT WORK HOLDER,

For sale by A. T. STEWART & CO., New York; and at the works of the manufacturers,

BILLINGS & SPENCER CO., Lawrence St., Hartford, Conn.

Hosted by Google

F. W. LASAK'S SON,

(ESTABLISHED 1823).
RUSSIAN, AMERICAN, and HUDSON'S BAY CO.'S

FURS. FURS.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description, consisting of Seal and Astrakhan Sacques in every variety, Boas, Collars, Muffs, Cuffs, Skating Caps, &c., &c., in Russian and Hudson's Bay Sable, Ermine, Fitch, Mink, Siberian Squirrel, Black Marten, and other Furs, together with a full assortment of Sleigh and Lap Robes, Gloves, Carriage Rugs, &c. Also FUR TRIMMINGS, ALL STYLES.

ALL ARTICLES OF OUR OWN MANUFACTURE, AND WARRANTED OF SUPERIOR QUALITY AND WORKMANSHIP.

682 BROADWAY, New York, Corner Great Jones Street.

1823. JUBILEE! 1873.

Better than Pictures is the

NEW YORK OBSERVER,

The Great American Family Newspaper.
$3 a Year with the JUBILEE YEAR BOOK.
SIDNEY E. MORSE & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.
SEND FOR A SAMPLE COPY.

A GREAT OFFER! HOLIDAYS!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, New York, will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of three first-class makers, including Waters', at extremely low prices for cash, during the Holidays. New 7-octave first-class PIANOS, modern improvements, for* $275 cash. The CONCERTO PARLOR ORGAN are the most beautiful in style, and perfect in tone ever made. Price, for 6 stops, $200, 10 stops, $250. Others for $50 and upwards for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

MOTHERS,

SAVE YOUR INFANTS.

NESTLÉ'S LACTEOUS FARINA,
THE MOTHER'S MILK SUBSTITUTE.
Extensively used and recommended by the most eminent physicians. Sold by Druggists and Grocers.
H. ASTIÉ & CO., Sole Agents,
15 South William Street, New York.

Musical Boxes

In rich inlaid Rosewood and other fine Cases—ALL SIZES, STYLES, and PRICES—playing from one tune to over one hundred tunes. Accompaniments of Bells, Drums, Castanets, and Voix Celeste.

Call and see the largest stock ever exhibited in this country. Send for Circular and Price-List.

MUSICAL BOXES REPAIRED by skillful workmen.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 Broadway, N. Y.

"Best in the Market."

ASHWORTH'S
SIX-CORD
SPOOL COTTON.
SOLD BY
The GROVER & BAKER Sewing-Machine Company.

ALEX. KING & Co., Agents, New York.

HOLIDAYS

are drawing near! and those intending useful GIFTS for ANY of their FRIENDS, whether Men, Women, Boys or Girls, could not bestow one that would be BETTER appreciated than a

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESS

Send for a descriptive, illustrated Pamphlet, containing the various Agents' addresses, to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 349—351 Federal & 152 Kneeland-st's, Boston.

No suspension of Business on account of Fire!

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

A CHARM FOR A HOLIDAY PRESENT to your suffering friend. A pair of Patent Metallic Shields—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Nervous Headaches. Our most eminent physicians use them in their practice. Price $5 per pair, by mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

LADIES!

Dr. Kennedy's Hair Tea will prevent the hair from falling out, and preserve its health and beauty. Sold by Druggists at $1.00 per bottle.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

The best terms offered. AGENTS WANTED for Explorations in

AFRICA

Dr. Livingstone discovered. The HERALD-STANLEY Expedition complete. Large octavo now ready. Outfit $1.00. UNION PUBLISHING CO., Chicago, Phila., or Springfield, Mass.

AGENTS—Ladies particularly—can make money working for us, as there is no competition, and the goods are wanted by every one. Address The McKEE MANUFACTURING CO., 309 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

FREEMAN & BURR,

CLOTHING WAREHOUSES, 138 & 140 Fulton Street, New York.

THE STOCK for Fall and Winter is of immense extent and variety. As usual, it embraces all the most popular Styles and Fabrics for all ages and all classes.

Facilities for Fine Custom Work unequaled. Any garment made to measure at a few hours' notice.

GRADE.	OVERCOATS, $5 to $60.			BUSINESS SUITS, $15 to $50.			DRESS SUITS, $25 to $75.			BOYS' DEPARTMENT. Suits.		Overcoats.
	Frock.	Sack.	Cape Talma.	Coats.	Pants.	Vests.	Coats.	Pants.	Vests.	3 to 6 Years.	9 to 15 Years.	3 to 9 Years.	9 to 15 Years.
1	$8	$5	$10	$8	$4	$3	$12	$8	$5	$4	$5	$3	$5
2	$10	$8	$15	$10	$5	$3	$20	$9	$6	$5	$8	$4	$8
3	$15	$10	$20	$12	$6	$4	$25	$10	$7	$8	$10	$5	$10
4	$20	$12	$30	$15	$7	$4	$30	$12	$8	$9	$12	$6	$12
5	$25	$15	$40	$18	$8	$5	$35	$14	$9	$10	$15	$8	$15
6	$30	$20	$45	$20	$10	$6	$40	$15	$10	$11	$18	$12	$18
7	$35	$25	$50	$25	$12	$7	$45	$16	$11	$12	$20	$15	$20
8	$40	$30	$60	$30	$15	$8	$50	$18	$12	$15	$25	$20	$25

COUNTRY ORDERS. ORDERS BY LETTER promptly filled. FREEMAN & BURR'S new system for SELF-MEASURE, of which thousands avail themselves, enables parties in all parts of the country to order direct from them, with the certainty of receiving the most PERFECT FIT attainable.

RULES for SELF-MEASURE, Samples of Goods, Price-List, and Fashion Sheet SENT FREE on application.

LADIES, DO YOU LOVE FLOWERS?

Send for Specimen Copies (free) of

THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET

and Pictorial Home Companion,

A new and beautiful Paper, devoted specially to the Culture of Flowers for the Flower Garden and Plants for Window Gardening or indoor ornament. Has an abundance of pictorial Home Reading, and will be popular with the Family Circle.

Ladies will also find in it choice reading on Household Work, Fashion, Dress, Home Comforts and Elegances; also, good hints to young people on Manners, Society, Self-Improvement, Amusement, Courtship, Marriage, &c. Club Agents wanted every where.

Price $1 00, including two beautiful Chromos.

☞ Window Gardening, a new book, exquisitely illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Flowers, and Bulbs for indoors; also, Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Book-stores have it.

☞ Prospectus and Premium Lists free for P. O. stamp.

☞ 100 Papers at Club Rates.—Send stamp for List.

☞ Agents wanted to canvass in every village.

Address LADIES' CABINET, Box 2445, N. Y.

NOTHING LIKE IT!

EMBROIDERING AND FLUTING MACHINE.

Thirteen Patterns of Embroidery adapted to Ladies' and Children's wearing apparel, such as Skirts, Collars, Cuffs, Basques, Mantillas, Cloth Dress Goods generally. Pillow-Cases, Napkins, Piano-Covers, &c., can be beautifully embroidered in a few minutes' time. The Embroidering Dies and Fluter are interchangable at will, thus securing with one Machine any desired pattern.

Easily operated, strong and effective, just what every lady wants, and would make a valuable Christmas Present. Price, Machine complete, $2 00 and $2 75. Sent by Express on receipt of amount. House Furnishing Stores and others sell it. Address

THE McKEE M'F'G CO., 309 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

1829. CHARTER PERPETUAL. 1872.

FRANKLIN FIRE INSURANCE CO.,

OF PHILADELPHIA.

Capital, - - - - -	$ 400,000 00
Accrued Surplus and Premiums,	2,916,316 88
Cash Assets, November 30, 1872,	$3,316,316 88
Premiums, October, 1872, -	$252,780 70
Premiums, November, 1872, -	301,876 64
	$554,657 34
Amount insured in the Burned District, Boston, - - -	$458,196 00
Amount insured on Outskirts of same, - - - -	39,500 00

It has been definitely ascertained that $2000 will cover all claims upon the last item, while salvages already determined indicate a net loss of not over $400,000.

ALFRED G. BAKER, Pres't.
GEORGE FALES, Vice-President.
J. W. McALLISTER, Second Vice-Pres't.
THEO. M. REGER, Secretary.
SAML. W. KAY, Assistant Secretary.

BRANCH OFFICE,
No. 243 Broadway, New York City,
GEO. F. REGER, Manager.

The Agents of the FRANKLIN throughout the U. S. number nearly 1000.

MATHUSHEK PIANO M'F'G CO. New Haven, Conn. The most durable pianos. The most powerful tone. The finest touch & action. The purchasers delighted. The pamphlets sent free.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH. A lady, who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh, was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the receipt, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

AGENTS WANTED for Great Fires of History. Chicago, Boston, N. York. London etc. Causes. Systems of Extinguishing Fire. Sates, Fire Proof Buildings, Bank Vaults, Insurance, &c. Thrilling, Humorous, Pathetic. Illustrated. Going like Hot Cakes. Address Worthington, Dustin & Co., Hartford, Ct.

ITCHING SORES, BURNING ERUPTIONS, SALT RHEUM, SCROFULA, &c., relieved at once and permanently cured by NORTON'S OINTMENT. Price 50 cents. Office 10 Ann St., N. Y.

$1 50. THE NURSERY. A MONTHLY MAGAZINE for YOUNGEST READERS. Superbly Illustrated. ☞ Send stamp for a sample number. NOW is the time to subscribe.
JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield St., Boston.

TO THE WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt St., New York.

AGENTS Wanted.—Agents make more money at work for us than at anything else. Particulars free. J. STINSON & Co., Fine Art Publishers, Portland, Maine.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING" "DOMESTIC"

presents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.

Agents wanted everywhere.

Address "DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. Co., Bath, Me.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

PARQUET FLOORS.

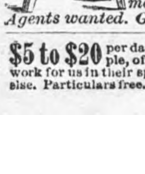
The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING.

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.



Beautiful inventions for marking Clothing and printing Cards, &c. One will do for a whole family. Movable Type. Profitable, amusing and instructive for the young. Jet Printer $1. Silver $1.25, with Ink, Type and neat Case, delivered by mail anywhere. 4 Alphabets extra 60c. Agents wanted. Golding & Co, 14 Kilby St, Boston.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

WE BELIEVE

OUR STOCK OF

PORCELAIN, POTTERY, GLASS,

AND

FANCY GOODS

Is the best ever exhibited in New York, and invite an inspection.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO.,
747 BROADWAY, near 8th St., N. Y.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St, and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

THE YOUNG EUPHEMIST.

AUNT MARY. "What is meant by Declining a Noun, Ethel?"
ETHEL. "Politely Refusing it, Aunt dear."

TOO LATE.

MIDDLE-AGED CUSTOMER. "Mr. Bassbridge, my musical education has been utterly neglected, but I've a strong desire to practice some instrument. What should you advise me to take up?"

CONSCIENTIOUS TRADESMAN. "Well, Sir, I should recommend the triangle; or—yes—I think a musical snuff-box, Sir, would be the best!"

A writer on physiognomy sagely says, "A human face without a nose doesn't amount to much;" whereupon another writer observes that "a human nose without a face doesn't amount to much either."

"You say," said a judge to a witness, "that the plaintiff resorted to an ingenious use of circumstantial evidence: state just exactly what you mean by that."
"Well," said the witness, "my exact meaning is that he lied."

"We have not enough chairs for our company," said a gay wife to her frugal husband.
"Plenty of chairs, dear, but too much company," replied the gay young wife's husband, with a sigh.

STRANGER THAN "BORROWED DAYS"—Lent terms.

THE WEATHER.

A pleasant climate this of ours!
I would not now turn out a dog
To face the soot-encumbered show'rs—
Fog!

To-morrow, true, a change may see—
Our climate changes oft—but vain
Is any change! What will it be?—
Rain!

The next day may be altered too—
Variety again prevail;
But where's the use to me or you?—
Hail!

And after that—well, goodness knows
What cheer our climate next may show;
May nip our noses, pinch our toes—
Snow!

IMPROVING THE OCCASION.

"Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day, dear Tommy," said mamma.
"Then let's finish up the plum-pudding to-night," said the sweet child.

MOTTO FOR THE DAVENPORT BROTHERS—"Wait for the turn of the tied."

A FACT!—People who suffer from toothache often pass a night of mourning.

A MISFIT.

LITTLE TOMKINS (excitedly). "I say, my dear Fellow, how do they fit, eh? will they do?"
THE DEAR FELLOW. "Well, I should say you—ah—don't look well in Men's Clothes."

FACETIÆ.

MORE UNNATURAL HISTORY.—An old subscriber writes that they have fire-flies so large in his neighborhood that they use them to cook by. They hang the kettles on their hind-legs, which are bent for the purpose like pot-hooks.

PEOPLE YOU EXPECT TO MEET.

Mr. Smith, who speaks his native English with a slightly foreign accent whenever he returns from a week upon the Continent.
Mr. Brown, who can't appreciate Beethoven, but dotes upon the bagpipes.
Mr. Jones, who, when he shares a cab with you, somehow never has small change about him.
Mr. Robinson, who carefully abstains from volunteering a political opinion until he has consulted half a dozen newspapers.
Mr. Cruiser, who keeps a schooner yacht, but, except in a dead calm, never ventures out of harbor.
Mr. Sharpe, who, when he drops his money into the collection plate, can make a sixpence sound as though it were a dollar.
Mrs. Snobbington, who calls her little knife-boy a page, and when she hires a fly talks of taking carriage exercise.
Mr. Tyttle Tattle, who, from some official source of information, always brings the latest news of the intentions of the government.
Mr. Hodger, who considers Tupper far superior to Milton, and goes ready primed with arguments to prove it.
Mr. Dodger, who invariably takes an old umbrella to a party, in the hope, by lucky accident, to change it for a new one.
Miss Sniveller, who keeps a sentimental diary, and bullies her small brothers.
Mr. Funniman, who can not cut a tongue without cutting a stale joke about it.

MAKING AN ASS OF HIMSELF.

DR. BIRCH (to hopelessly inattentive pupil). "Did you hear what I said? [Silence.] You're a stupid donkey! Don't you hear me? [Silence and pause.] Come, what did I say?"
PUPIL (inspired). "You're a stupid donkey, Sir!"

An American woman in London recently went to the legation for a "pass" to see the Queen.

USEFUL MEM.—When a church catches fire it generally blazes fiercely. It's the ile in it, perhaps.

The source of the Nile was discovered long ago by the Romans. They maintained that "Ex Nihilo, Nihil n scitur: ecce Nihil"—i. e., "The Nile rises from the Nile: that's its source."

Can a thing which decreases be said to grow?—Certainly; else why the time-honored sentiment, "May your shadow never grow less?"

THAT'S IT.

MISTRESS. "Why, Mary, what's that you've got on?"
MARY. "What is it? A Dolly Varden, of course."
MISTRESS. "You with a Dolly Varden! Why, I shouldn't think of wearing such a thing."
MARY. "P'raps not, Mim. It ain't Every Body they Becomes."

LOVE LORE.

January.—The 1st of January is one of the earliest days in the year you can take a wife on, if you want to. If you really want two, though, you can't, because it is not legal.
February.—Feathered songsters choose their mates. This month they pick them, presently they will peck them. Go thou and do likewise.
March.—Don't believe the woman who says she will give you her heart this month. It is not given—it's Lent.
April.—The 1st is All-fools' Day. This is the day to make promises of marriage, and accept accommodation bills. Go it!
May.—Trusting maidens, don't believe in a chimney-sweep's suit this month! The fellow will most likely wash it all off on May-day.
June.—The longest day occurs this month. Take care it doesn't come in the latter end of your honey-moon.
July.—Every dog has his day this month. Bachelor dog-days are numbered.
August.—The first mail, 1784! Poor fellow!
September.—Michaelmas-day this month. Wise geese keep close.
October.—Old Michaelmas-day used to fall on the 11th of this month. Hoary-headed and unmarried old ganders chuckle at the thought of their escape.
November.—Mothers of large families should get their Guys off their hands, if possible, this month.
December.—If you have not been hooked before midnight on the 31st, you are safe for this year at least.

A member of the New York "Lazy Club" has just been expelled for going at a faster gait than a walk. The recusant offered in mitigation of the sentence the fact that the sheriff was after him, but the society was inexorable.

FOR ANOTHER WOMAN.

"Please tell me what the time is?" asked a little boy of an apothecary, who was much troubled by such inquiries.
"Why, I told you the time but a moment ago," snapped the apothecary.
"Yes, Sir," said the boy, "but this is for another woman."

MORAL TRIUMPH.—A popular essayist says, "Perhaps the great triumph of all moral writings, including sermons, is that at least they have produced some sweet and innocent sleep."

"The best of all ways to lengthen our days" is to make a short trip to Spitzbergen, my dear, where the longest day lasts three months and a half. Who wouldn't be a Spitz-burgher?

A correspondent who reads the reports of all the banquets complains that so much is said about "the memory of Washington," and inquires whether Washington had a better memory than any body else, that it should be so generally remarked upon.

A SWEET BABE.

YOUNG WILLIE (to whom dear Grandpa has just offered half a dollar). "No, thank you, Grandad. You stick to it a bit longer, and lay it out at Interest, and I'll get all the more when you pop off, Old Man."

"MISUNDERSTOOD."

SCENE—An Evening Party. Enter Young Molyneux.

PRIVATE CHORUS OF LADIES. "What a horrid-looking Man! What is he Scowling at?" etc., etc.

[Now we happen to know that Young Molyneux is one of the best-tempered fellows extant, but he is dreadfully short-sighted. He has forgotten his eyeglass, and is helplessly peering about for the Hostess.

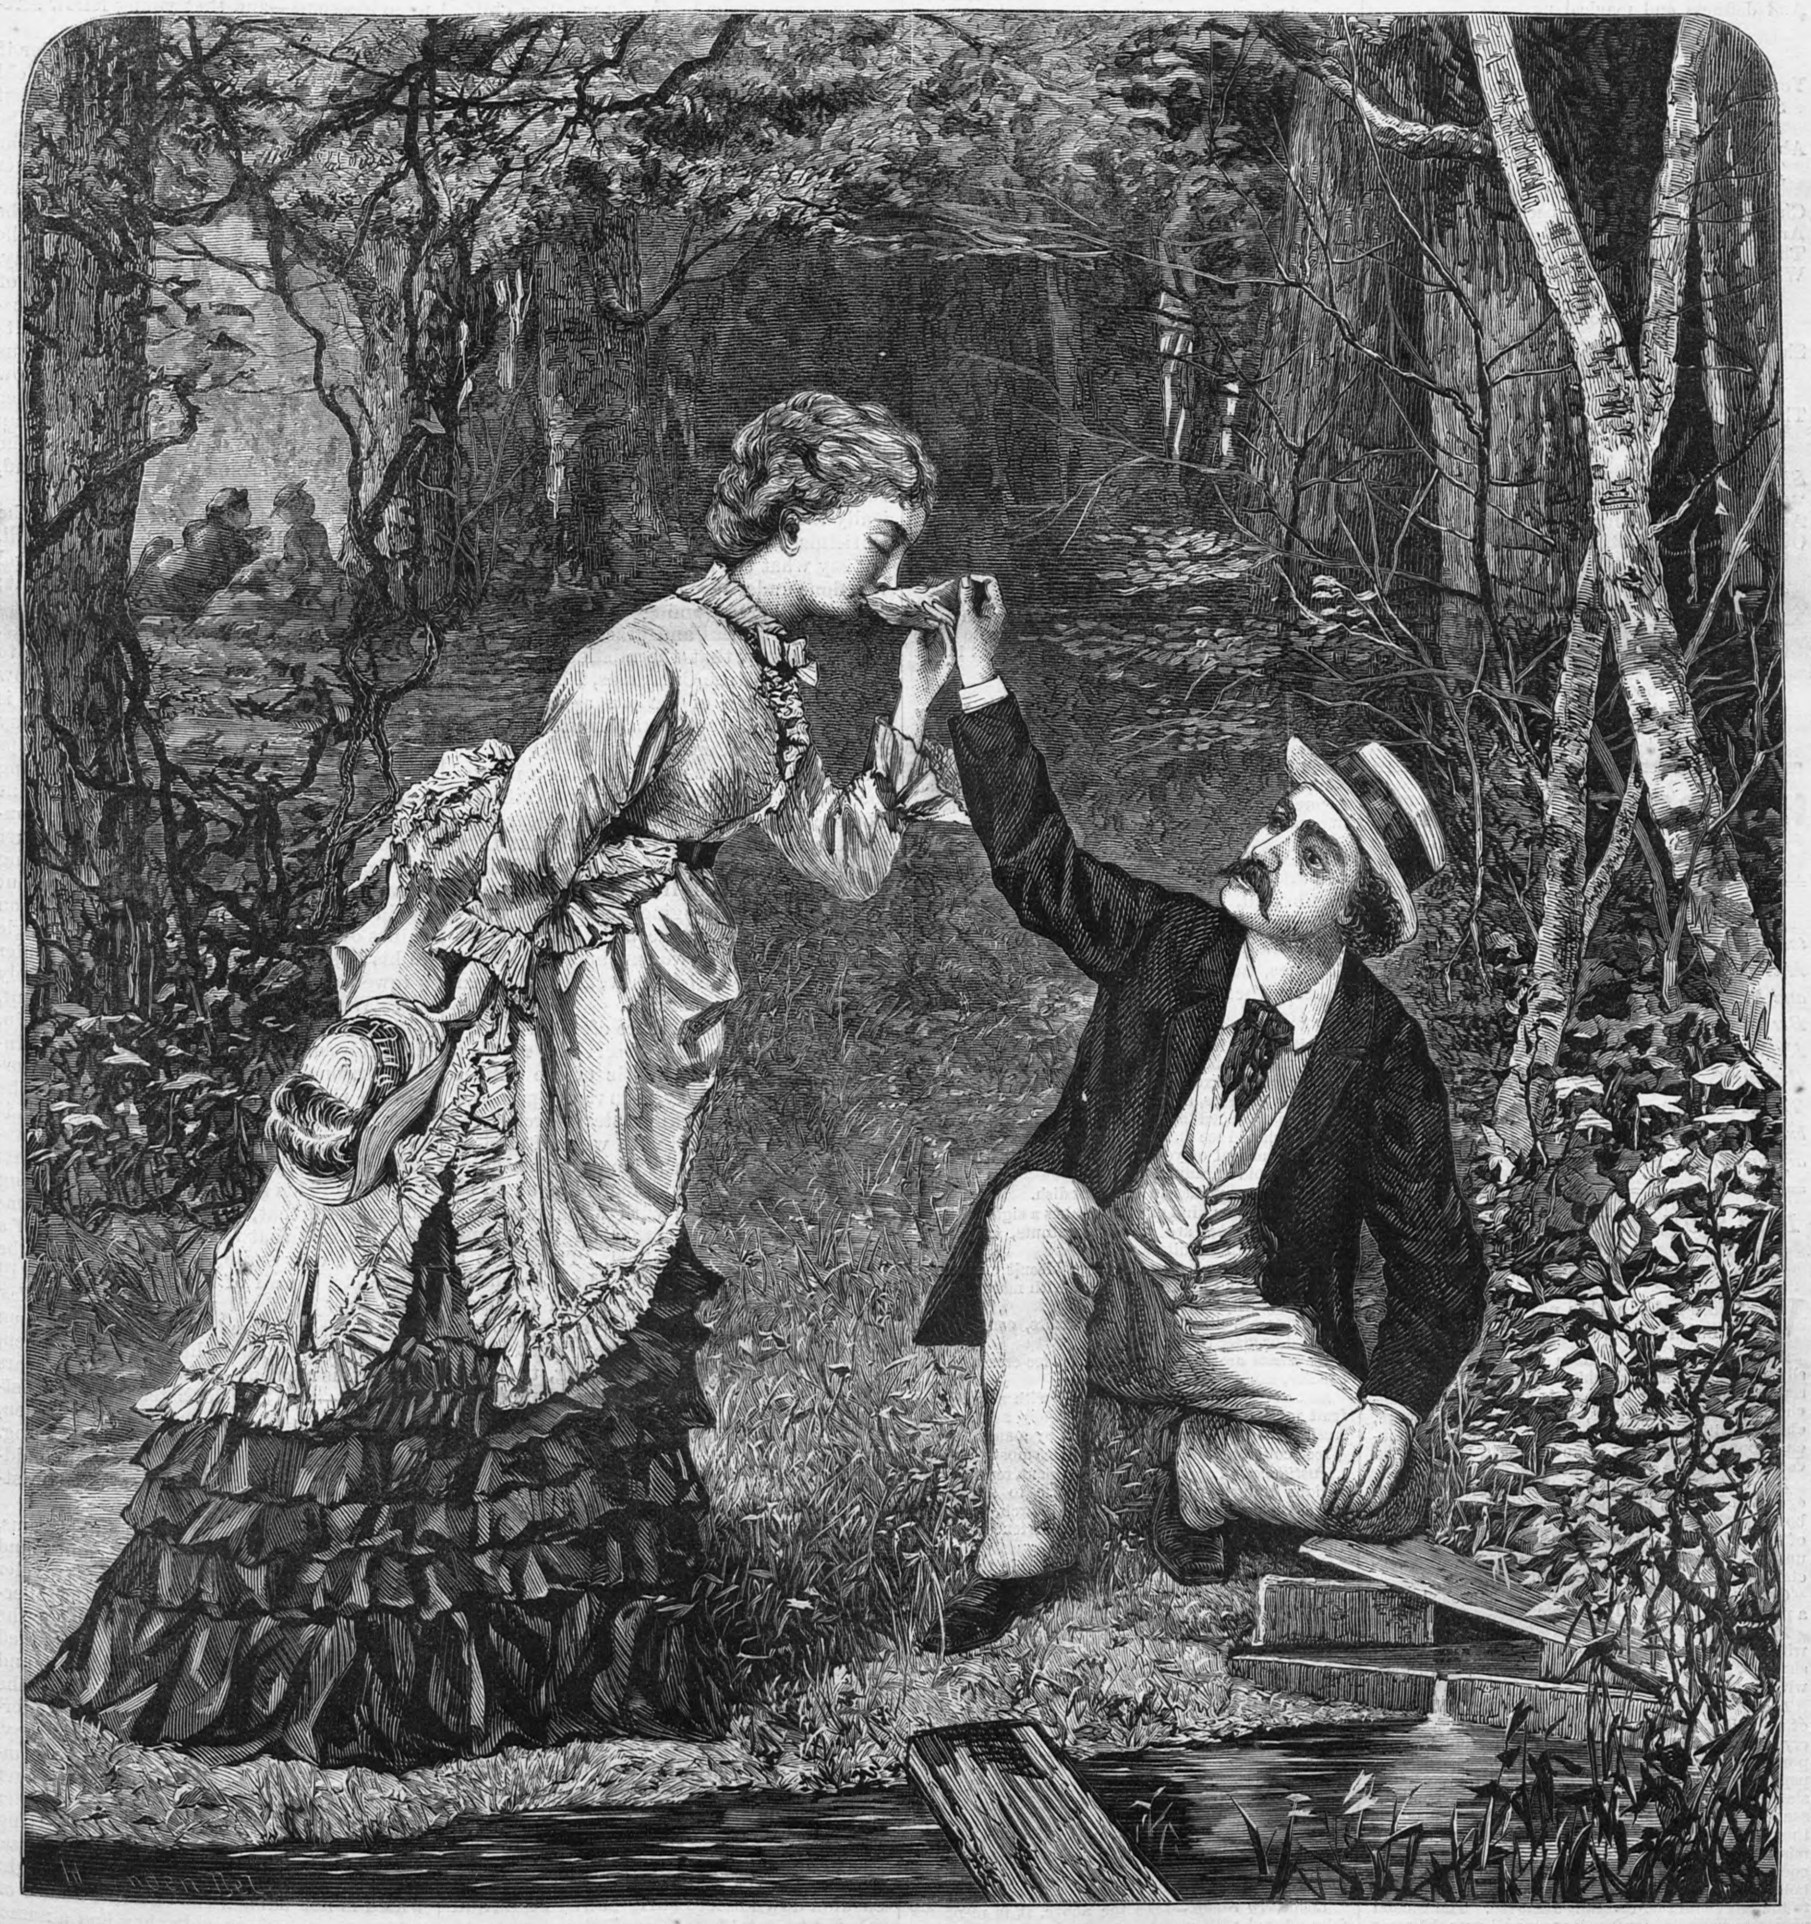
Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 3.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.



"AT THE SPRING."—DRAWN BY T. HOVENDEN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Hosted by Google

AT THE SPRING.

See illustration on first page.

BY way of contrast, this charming picture of the mossy spring in the forest glades, where the maiden bares her head to the gentle summer breeze while she drinks the clear water from the leaf-cup which the youth gallantly proffers her on bended knee, is delicious to contemplate amidst the snows and blasts of winter. The spring is ice-bound now, the trees are clad with icicles instead of leaves, and the youth and maiden sit by the warm fireside and chat of the summer wanderings among scenes where they learned to know and love each other. Perhaps at this very spring, around which some local superstition had woven a charm like that of the famed Fountain of Trevi, they spoke the magic words which bound them for life; and this memory brings a glow to their hearts sufficient to melt all the frosts of winter. Many a forest spring has a spell which in spirit, if not in flesh, will recall those who have drank of it as surely as its counterpart of Rome.

MARY, THE COOK.

IT is strange what a world of romance,
What a 'wildering, witching spell,
Hangs about Mary, the cook.
Why, it's music to sit in her silence,
And (I'm not ashamed to tell)
It's heaven to catch but her look.
She, rubbing the lamps, well might madden
The stoniest slave of Aladdin—
In short, if you want to know sweetness
And deftness and magical neatness,
You've only to look
At Mary, the cook.

You see, as we're off on a picnic,
Some duties must fall to the girls;
So Mary is boiling the tea.
Ah, who wouldn't be an old kettle
To mirror those tumbled curls,
And sing near her heart for glee!
Charley and Kate, by the beeches,
Are opening pickles and peaches;
The others are making a table;
While I, like the fox in the fable,
Sit vainly and look
At Mary, the cook.

She's "steady"—I'd swear it. And "sober?"
Well, no—by that mischievous laugh!
"Willing?" A fellow can't tell,
Though she knows how I long to ask her,
Or guesses it more than half,
Which answers nearly as well.
Shall I ask her? (But, ah, what effront'ry!)
"To go a short way in the country,"
And always be— Jove! Is she flushing
Over that fire—or—blushing?
What if I rose and "took"
Mary, the cook!

Mine! by the grand old beeches!
Mine! by the pickles and peaches!
Mine! by the rippling brook!
Mine! by the sunset splendor!
Mine! by the starlight tender!
Mary, the cook!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1873.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of Skating Suits for Lads and Misses from 4 to 15 Years old; Ladies' Evening and Ball Dresses, Walking Suits, House Dresses, Breakfast and Dress Caps, Lingerie, etc.; Girls' Knitted and Crochet Hoods; Sewing-Weights, Blotting-Cushions, Emery Bags, Card-Baskets, Toilette Cushions, Wall-Pockets, Purses, Embroidery Patterns, etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

BILLS OF FARE FOR SUPPER-PARTIES.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

WE conclude in this paper our glossary of culinary terms.

Fancy toast is a dish made with slices of bread slightly toasted, and on which butter, mixed with essence of anchovy or mustard, is spread. Boned anchovies, sardines, herrings, caviare, hard-boiled eggs, chopped with parsley, capers, ham, or meat of chicken, chopped, are used to make the toast, which, when carefully made, is a most appetizing dish.

Beurre de Montpellier is a mixture of sweet-oil, vinegar, salt, pepper, hard-boiled yolks of eggs, capers, boned anchovies, pickled cucumbers (and a few cloves of garlic, if liked). The whole is pounded in a mortar until reduced to a paste. It can be colored with vegetable carmine or juice of spinach.

Oysters.—Served raw, either on the half shell or on a plate, with pieces of lemon, etc.

Fish-salad.—Made with boned salmon or flounders, or with the flesh of the tails of lobsters, craw-fish, and shrimps, placed on a salad of vegetables, and served with a mayonnaise sauce.

Lobster-salad can be made in two ways. The meat of the tail and claws is chopped and mixed with celery cut in small pieces, then the following sauce is poured over: mix well together oil, vinegar, salt, pepper, mustard, chopped parsley, and the soft substance found in the body shell of the lobster, and the sauce is made. The green substance found inside is thought by many not to be fit for eating, which is a mistake. It is the liver of the lobster, and is just as good as the white part. It turns green while being boiled. The dark bluish vein running from the head to the tail should be carefully removed. The second way is to spread a mayonnaise sauce all over the meat and celery, and decorate with hard-boiled eggs cut in fancy shapes, capers, lettuce, pickles, etc.

Lobster en coquilles are tails of small boiled lobsters split in two lengthwise, tastefully placed on a dish with hard-boiled eggs cut in fancy shapes, chopped parsley, and mayonnaise sauce. The body and claws are used as ornaments.

Salmon à la Parisienne.—Boiled salmon served whole and cold, with jelly, lettuce, water-cress, shrimps, or craw-fish, and a mayonnaise sauce.

Salmon, boiled.—Served cold with either a ravigote or a rémolade sauce.

Sturgeon au beurre de Montpellier is a boiled sturgeon with head and tail off, served with beurre de Montpellier and a mayonnaise sauce. A trout is served the same as a sturgeon.

The birds described below, either tame or wild, after being boned and cooked, are served cold, en Bellevue or with jelly, as explained in the preceding number: capons, chicken, ducks, guinea-fowls, turkeys, partridge, grouse, pheasants, pigeons, prairie-chickens, quails, snipes, bobolinks, and other small birds.

Pâtés (pies) may be made of the above birds, and served cold.

A fillet of beef, a tongue, a saddle of veal or of venison, veal and deer chops, a ham, are also served whole, either en Bellevue or with jelly.

Roast beef, corned beef pressed, ham, saucisson de Lyon, roast chicken and turkey, are served cold, whole or in pieces.

Such birds as capons, chickens, turkeys, grouse, partridge, pigeons, and quails can be served cold, surrounded with water-cress.

Chicken-salad is too well known to require any description.

Foies gras are served in slices or à la Lucullus—that is, cut in the shape of a chop, and served with truffles, tongue, and jelly chopped together. Foies gras, or pâtés de foies gras, are made with geese livers and fresh pork, seasoned with truffles, fines herbes, and spices. They are mostly imported.

Chicken écarlate.—Fillets of chicken served with slices of tongue and jelly.

Chicken en chanfroix.—Fillets of chicken served with jelly and a sauce. Grouse and partridge are also served like chicken en chanfroix.

Hure de Sanglier.—This dish may be decorated in several ways. It can be made with a wild hog's head (there being no sangliers, or wild boars, here), or even with a domestic hog's head; it is an excellent and handsome dish. By opening the head underneath and lengthwise, all the bones, the tongue, and most of the flesh are taken off. The flesh and tongue are chopped or cut in dice, and mixed with truffles, pork loins, beef tongues, and salt pork, cut in the same way and well seasoned. The head is filled with the mixture, preserving its original shape as much as possible. It is sewed and wrapped up in a towel, and then boiled for about six hours. When cold it is surrounded with jelly, and served whole. The ears, eyes, and mouth are filled with chopped jelly and chopped parsley.

Pain de volaille is chicken meat chopped, and cooked in a sauce into which are mixed chicken combs, slices of truffles and of tongue; then it is turned into a mould, and served, surrounded with meat jelly, when perfectly cold.

Pain de gibier is the same dish as the above, made with partridges, grouse, and the like, instead of chicken.

Sheep's Tongues à la Père Hyacinthe.—Boiled sheep's tongues served with slices of beef tongues alternated around a dish, in the middle of which is a salad of vegetables. The tongues are surrounded with meat jelly and croûtons. A mayonnaise or a ravigote sauce is served with them. Veal tongues are served in the same way.

CAKES.

Baba.—This cake is served small or large. It may be dipped in a sirup of Madeira or of rum for half a minute immediately after it is out of the oven, and allowed to cool afterward.

Biscuits are made with flour, eggs, and sugar, and flavored with any kind of extract. Almonds or hazel-nuts cut in small pieces may be mixed with the rest.

All such cakes as the following are served at parties: bouchées, biscottes, Breton, Châteaubriand, Compiègne, Napolitain, Pithiviers, Savarin, éclairs, Charlotte-Russe, kisses or méringues, macaroons, Génoises, Madeleines, nougats, waffles, choux or cream-cakes, either méringues, glacés, or au chocolat, etc.

A Bombe is ice-cream moulded in the shape of a bomb, the fuse being imitated with colored sugar.

Brioche is an excellent cake, made of any size, with flour, butter, eggs, sugar, cream, salt, and yeast. The more it is kneaded the better and lighter it is. Housekeepers should see that their cooks do not use mineral powders instead of yeast. We know that it is often done to avoid kneading.

Blanc-mange makes an excellent dish.

Buisson of any kind of cakes makes a sightly dish.

Croquembouches are glazed chestnuts, carpels of oranges, or other fruits.

Corbeilles are pieces of a large biscuit cut in the shape of a small basket, and filled with marmalade of apricots or jelly.

Baskets are filled with cakes, fruits, candies, and candied or glazed fruit.

Pyramids are made with fruits, ice-cream cakes, candies, candied or glazed fruit, etc.

Sorbets (sherbets or ices) are made with any kind of fruit juice, or with Champagne. They are very refreshing, and preferred to ice-cream by many.

Iced coffee, tea, and chocolate are also most excellent.

Pastillages.—Large pieces for ornament, representing various things, from a Roman vase to a fortified castle. They are made with sugar, starch, gum, etc. These dishes can only be made by experienced confectioners.

Pièces montées are like pastillages, made to imitate an indefinite number of objects and subjects. They are made of paste, of pastillage, and of such cakes as kisses, waffles, nougat, sponge-cake, Génoises, etc.

Macédoine of Fruit.—A mixture of preserved or crystallized fruits, served with fruit jelly.

Compotes, as well as marmalades or jams and preserved fruits, are as good as they are numerous.

Lemonade is water and lemon juice, sweetened. The addition of a little orange juice is liked by many.

Orangeade is made like the above, with orange instead of lemon juice.

Groseille is water and currant juice, sweetened. Currant jelly diluted with water makes an excellent beverage for dancing parties.

Orgeat is pounded almonds diluted with water, sweetened, and then flavored with orange-flower water.

Apple Sirup.—Apple jelly diluted with water, and sweetened to taste.

Raspberry Sirup.—Like the above, it is raspberry jelly diluted with water. It is flavored with vinegar and slightly sweetened. Raspberry jelly being naturally flat, good wine vinegar gives it a cooling and very pleasant taste.

Any other fruit jellies may be used in the same way to make delicious evening beverages, which are refreshing and very agreeable to the taste. It is better not to sweeten them much, as they slake thirst better when somewhat sour.

The dishes served at suppers are the same as those served at anniversaries, weddings, christenings, and other similar parties. If there is any difference, it is only in the beverages. At a wedding or christening party, for instance, more wines are used than at a dancing party.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Mistletoe.

MY DEAR HORACE,—I sit in my room this Christmas-eve and hear the chimes from the neighboring steeple. The air is very cold and very still, and the music is very sweet and tender. But such music is more than that of bells. They, indeed, seem to furnish only the sound of an inward chiming, and it is not melody from the tower in the next street that we hear, but the mingled music of other years, of thoughts and associations vibrating from the distance. What a happy time it is! How truly they are holidays that we celebrate! As it is the anniversary of the birth of a spotless child, so it is sacred to children, and the renewal of our faith and hope and charity by the sympathy of childhood. No day in the year so truly restores our childhood to us; and if we could forget Christmas, and make it a common day, we should be very much poorer for it. You remember Dickens's Christmas stories, and what Thackeray says of them in words that blaze and crackle, as it were, with Christmas warmth. It was not only the good cheer of Christmas that they celebrated—not only the turkey, and beef, and mince-pie, and plum-pudding—but the rich food of charity and sympathy. The day takes the form of a feast in those stories, but that makes it only the more human.

I know a young lady who thinks that there is not enough of the mistletoe in those tales. She is very grave and staid about it, but she says that we must be historically correct, and every body knows that historically there was a great deal of mistletoe at Christmas. She says no more. She does not say what the mistletoe meant, nor what was done under it. But when, with her soft eyes and her blooming cheek, and that nameless freshness and grace of youth, she says, earnestly, that the mistletoe is indispensable to a true Christmas, I have heard many gentlemen of various ages, as they looked at her intently with honest admiration, exclaim, "Certainly it is! O that it were Christmas-eve now, and that a mistletoe bough hung from this very ceiling!" You are such a shrewd fellow, my dear Horace, that I suppose you suspect what they meant. I really believe that if it had been Christmas-eve, and if there had been a mistletoe bough hanging somewhere overhead, there would have been a prodigious rush for that young woman, and that all the historic rites of Christmas would have been enthusiastically celebrated.

But the mistletoe is there oftener than we think, and all the rites observed. As I sit in my chair, and the music of the chimes trembles and dies away, then rises again, and seems to fill the sparkling starry arch, I remember the little girl with whom I used to play at school, with the long ringlets flowing down her back, who looked at us all so archly, and to dance with whom we boys struggled with each other on the happy days of the dancing school. There was a handsome mother who looked on, I remember, and who seemed to me as old as Helen of Troy, but who was really a very young woman. I seem to recall now what I was not then conscious of observing, that the handsome mother was pleased and proud to see her little girl a belle among those little boys; and once, I remember, she stooped and kissed me when I was her daughter's partner. What odd fancies a very young boy may have! I wonder if I really did think as I danced with her that she was to be my wife, or do I only suppose that I must have thought so? Certainly the other boys teased me, and called the little Flora my sweetheart. She smiled gayly; but I did not smile, although I know that it made me happy to hear the words. And when we played games on Christmas-eve, and I was to kneel to the wittiest, bow to the prettiest, and kiss the one I loved best, the boys began to laugh, and said, "Oh, oh!" and "We know who he is going to kiss;" and I did not care, although my cheek was burning, and, like a knight riding into the tournament, and proud to wear the colors of his Queen of Love and Beauty, I plumped the cushion down before curly-haired Flora, and saluted her amidst the explosive delight of that juvenile company. Dear little Flora! How softly sound those chimes! That handsome young mother is long since gone, and the little girl never grew to be a woman. Does any body else recall that smiling, happy face this Christmas-eve?

Or there was Una, the sweet, serene maiden who seemed to have stepped from a Venetian picture. The dancing-school days were passed, and life had become much more serious. Serious! Why, there was a young fellow who was wondering, as he constantly thought of Una, upon what sum a heroic youth might marry. There was a young fellow who read poetry and stories, and to whom every love poem and novel seemed to have been written only to express his feeling for Una. There was a young fellow who sang prettily, and who invited other youth to join him in giving little serenades to several divine and incomparable maidens, and who always sang a passionate solo under Una's window. One day he heard that the world had suddenly come to an end—at least that seemed to be the real scope of the intelligence, for it was that the serene Una was going to marry the Chevalier Bayard. There was, as it were, a murmur of delight, for the event was declared to prove incontestably that matches are made in heaven. There was a young fellow who refused to believe the rumor, and who had his own views of the place in which such matches were made. But one day, alas! there were wedding-cake and orange blossoms—and that young fellow serenaded no more.

If I should look in my glass, I wonder if I could find any resemblance to that old young fellow whom I remember? Last week I took tea with the widow of the chevalier. Her name is Una, and she is the serenest of old ladies. Her hair is silver white, smoothed away under her cap, and she seemed to me quite as lovely as she seemed to that young fellow—but with the difference. It is December now, not May. We talked of the old times, as I think of them when I hear the chimes on Christmas-eve. And as I think of them now I salute the serene Una, who has been always so true and lovely a woman. That young fellow long ago generously forgave her preference of the man whom she loved best, and can see that his own fancy was a mist of the morning. How strangely the chimes sound, like far-away marriage bells!

I said it was December, but August is the month of which I am thinking, and a still, warm morning. That is a lake of the Tyrol yonder, with snow mountains rising from it; and a party descend to the shore and step into a boat and pull out upon the lake. One of them is the same boy who knelt to the little Flora, and the same young fellow who sang solos under Una's window. He is pulling an oar steadily, and there is gay conversation in the boat. Gretchen dips her hand in the water and listens, looking sometimes at the traveler from a distant country, but taking small part in the conversation in which her father and mother and her brother and sisters and that young traveler join. In the evening they go out again upon the water, and the full moon shines over them. The traveler lifts a bugle to his lips as the boat lies motionless under a towering cliff, and he plays a melancholy air. When he ends he waits for a moment, and then the melody is breathed back again, infinitely soft and clear. Some hapless princess prisoned in the cliff murmurs her sorrow to the moon. Gretchen looks at the young traveler, and he half fancies that it is her voice he hears—a tone of tender appeal. Their eyes meet, and again he lifts the bugle to his lips. What song of longing and regret is that, what whisper that dreams are vain, and that the chance travelers of a day must only smile and part? Again the soft reply, a wail of heart-break—and still their eyes are fixed upon each other—leb' wohl, auf wiedersehen! Next morning upon the diligence he kisses his hand to Gretchen, and at this moment—how many, many years between!—that traveler listens to the Christmas chimes, and sees the silent Gretchen, never seen since that old summer morning. Did she marry? Will young men and maidens say to-morrow morning, "Merry Christmas, dear grandmamma?"

Aurora, next, lover of woods and streams, who sat all day rocking in a tree, and found fairies every where. She took that traveler in her boat, and as they drifted in the reflection of the autumn maples he told her the romance of travel. They heard the muffled beat of the mill-wheel beneath the hill, and sang together simple songs. They read the story of Francesca, and seemed to understand. Aurora married Bacchus—the gay, gay god. They parted; and the most charming matron whom you know is that voyager of inland streams whom the young traveler met as he returned from kissing his parting hand to Gretchen. The acute womanly sense, the just and charitable judgment, the insight which is not baffled, the cheerful humor of experience, if collectively they had a name, it would be Aurora. The chimes seem to ring it in that change—Aurora! Aurora! brightness and clearness of daylight and morning!

Hosted by Google

So as I sit here, dear Horace, the air is full of various music. It is Christmas music—songs of jubilee and joy. I think of the happy homes chiming with the sweet voices of children before light, feeling of the stockings and blessing Santa Claus. Those voices enchant parent and grand-parent until they, too, are children. Then the whole feast expands. It is the festival not of a day, but of a life. And, O staid and grave young woman, who sweetly insistest that the rites of the mistletoe shall be scrupulously observed, lo! they have not been forgotten even in this solitary chamber. For here, alone in the Christmas-eve, amidst the soft clangor of the chimes, this old heart tenderly salutes damsel after damsel beneath the mistletoe of memory!

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FUR-TRIMMED DRESSES.

WHITE furs are being used in Paris for trimming evening dresses. For this purpose ermine is preferred. Wide bands of ermine are placed flatly on the dress material, or appear as a facing for velvet or satin sashes, basques, etc. A regal dress made in Paris, and worn by a New York lady when receiving New-Year's calls, furnishes a model for description. The dress is white satin; the garniture is royal purple velvet, point lace, and ermine. The trained skirt has a quilled ruffle of satin on the edge, headed by a broad band of purple velvet, with a stripe of ermine placed along the middle, and a narrow quilling of satin on the upper edge. Down the front breadth a tablier is formed of lengthwise bands of velvet, on which ermine is laid. The over-skirt is open in front, with sharp points on each side, and panier puffs behind, held up by a sash of purple velvet. There are two corsages, one high and the other low in the neck; both are pointed in front, and have postilion backs. Velvet, ermine, and point lace trim the neck and sleeves.

Bands of ostrich feathers, either white or tinted to match pale silks, are also much used for heading the lace flounces of rich evening dresses. The light downy marabout feathers are being introduced as trimming on thin materials, but are so frail that they do not meet with much favor.

NEW-YEAR'S DRESSES.

A lovely dress worn by a young brunette on New-Year's Day was of palest tea-rose silk, trimmed with pleatings of white gauze and garlands of roses shaded from the palest pink to deepest crimson. In contrast to this was a dress of turquoise blue silk, worn by a blonde. This dress represents a favorite fashion this season, of dispensing with an over-skirt, and having merely an apron on the front breadths, while the back is trimmed to represent a court train, and is looped in a large panier puff by a velvet sash. Five narrow lapping ruffles, very fully gathered, are on the lower part of the three front breadths, while above those is the wrinkled apron simply edged with Valenciennes lace. A single wider gathered ruffle extends from the belt down the second side seam and around the train. The sash is of darkish sapphire blue velvet, lined with the pale blue silk of the dress. The low corsage has a belted front and two soft points behind, edged with a double cord of silk. The Grecian folds of the bertha are formed of the dark velvet and light silk, edged with pleated Malines tulle. Tea-rose clusters are on the front of the corsage and the left shoulder. A pale opal-tinted silk has an appliqué border of oak leaves and white blossoms wrought in chenille. A very rich dress of sarde brown silk has five flounces in front, each headed by a velvet band; two wide flounces are in the back. The over-skirt has a wide flounce around the apron, while the back breadths are straight and looped like sashes. The corsage with belt and postilion back has a collar of velvet and Malines tulle.

A superb dress worn by a stately blonde was of black faille, with garniture of black brocade and Valenciennes lace. This had no over-skirt, but merely a vest-basque and a train looped in panier puffs by a brocaded satin sash. The front of the skirt had the new melon puffs lately described, wide brocaded revers on the second side breadths, and a flounce on the back. The vest and square cuffs were of brocade, edged with a frill of pointed Valenciennes lace. The back of the waist was pointed, and a graduated ruffle edged it, like a basque.

LACE POLONAISES.

Lace polonaises are among the dressy articles lately imported. A French fancy is to make these entirely of stripes of white insertion, either of Valenciennes or duchesse lace, alternating with stripes of black velvet ribbon two inches wide. The garment is then edged with white lace laid over black, and is worn with a belt and sash of black velvet lined with white silk. This makes a very pretty over dress for the black and light-colored silks that are worn to dinner-parties and small receptions.

PLAIN WINTER DRESSES.

Woolen dresses for daily wear at home are now made in such a fashion that they may be worn in the street also. They have a plain polonaise, either belted or in the princesse shape. The skirt is usually untrimmed, though a single deep flounce may be added, or else a cluster of lapping folds is used, with a narrow box-pleating on each side. Skirts with back breadths trimmed to the belt with ruffles or kilt pleating are too elaborate and too easily disarranged for house dresses. A preferable fashion is a plain skirt, with merely an apron in front and sashes in the back, like the pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. V. The materials for these dresses are the wool diagonals, serges, satines, and merinoes, and the softer repped fabrics, empress cloths, Biarritz, and velours. These are now sold at from 75 cents to $1 a yard. The basque corsage is used with the skirts just described, and should be made in the simplest jockey shape, with merely a facing of silk or velvet for trimming. A fanciful chatelaine pocket of the dress material, or else of the fabric with which it is trimmed, is convenient and pretty with home dresses. When made of black velvet, this will serve with various dresses. This is merely a five-sided bag or pocket—made flat, with straight sides and a point below—pendent from two bias straps that are fastened on the right side of the belt under a bow of ribbon. Dusky olives, plum-color, blue-gray, and warm red-maroon are the quiet colors that replace the bright blue, green, and crimson formerly chosen for afternoon dresses. To enliven these sombre hues, gay ribbons are worn about the neck and hair, and the complexion is softened by amply pleated frills of clear white muslin or lace, worn around the neck and wrists. The caprice of the moment is to make these frills very full in box-pleats; this is true of lace frills as well as of simple muslin. White Swiss muslin cravat bows, with the edges trimmed with Valenciennes, are also prettily worn with house toilettes. For fresh, clear complexions fine sheer linen is arranged in side pleats, and worn as a standing frill behind, while the corners in front are turned over after the fashion of English collars. A muslin bow, or a jabot of lace or ribbon, is then worn at the throat.

The comfortable box-pleated blouses of last year are in as great favor as when first introduced. A blouse of gay-colored cashmere, or of white, black, or gray opera flannel, is a most convenient garment for house wear. It may be worn with various skirts, thereby saving the trimmed corsages of nice costumes, and it serves also in the place of half-worn waists that sometimes accompany good skirts. Scarlet and blue flannel blouses, with black and white braiding on the pleats, are sold at the furnishing houses for $4; white and black flannel blouses are also shown, either for mourning or for ladies wearing colors. The sailor blouses of blue flannel have been noted lately.

The New-Year's Day apron of sheer white muslin, trimmed with Valenciennes lace laid over colored ribbon, is also found at the furnishing houses. Trimmed with Italian lace, the prices range from $2 to $5. This apron is in favor for young ladies who do not wear full evening dress when receiving New-Year's calls, and also for the ladies who attend tables at the charity fairs and bazars that are so numerous this season.

CALICOES, ETC.

The housewives who, even in winter, wear calico morning dresses when attending to their household duties are advised to buy the yard-wide English calicoes. These are of firm, close fabric and durable colors, that come from the laundry brightened and freshened week after week. They are sold in double purples, of stripes or other simple pattern, for 20 cents a yard; chintz patterns, closely imitating French calicoes, are 25 cents. Eight yards of this makes a loose Gabrielle wrapper, shaped like an elongated polonaise. When snugly belted over a trim figure, this is a tidy, graceful-looking dress, that endures any amount of lifting, raising the arms, or other motions, without ripping or straining the fabric. To make these warm enough they should be worn over under-waists of Canton flannel or other warm material. If lined, the material of the lining should be well shrunken before it is used.

QUILTED SKIRTS, FLANNELS, ETC.

Among English goods are warm quilted skirts, to be used as Balmorals. Some of these are of black satin, quilted in diamonds, and trimmed to the knee with kilt pleatings, or with flounces stamped in designs like embroidery. These are handsome enough to be worn as the lower skirts of costumes. Price $40. Plain quilted satin skirts, gored in trim shape, are $16; others, with the lower half of the skirt made of quilted satin and the upper of alpaca, are $7. Felt skirts with deep quilted satin border are also $7.

The flannel petticoats shown at the furnishing houses are no longer gored, but are of three full straight breadths gathered to an ample belt, into which drawing-strings are run. The simplest designs for these are a hem and two tucks, ornamented with feather stitching of silk or linen floss. Smooth linen floss looks quite as well as silk, washes and wears better, and is much less expensive. Skirts with embroidered edges cost from $6 to $18. The popular embroideries are shallow scallops, heavily overcast, and rows of square blocks, or else clusters of leaves, wrought above. The all-wool flannel, a yard wide, worth from 60 cents to $1 13 a yard, is much used for these skirts. This, however, is apt to shrink, and we commend instead those flannels in which a little cotton is mixed. The best heavy goods for winter use are the Shaker flannels, a yard wide, worth from 50 cents to 85 cents a yard. Skirt patterns of light flannel, with the selvedge embroidered by machinery in leaf-pointed edges and vines, cost from $1 75 to $5 50 a yard. For skirts to be used when traveling thick gray flannels are shown, also the heavy gray twilled Shaker flannels that are used by working-women. A "medicated" flannel of bright scarlet is shown for under-clothing for invalids. The scarlet Shaker flannel is heavily twilled, and has the advantage of having been shrunk: price $1 a yard. The double-warped red flannel sometimes used for gentlemen's under-clothing is $1 10. Blue twilled flannel for girls' and boys' sailor suits is sold in the best shades and quality, twenty-four inches wide, for 60 cents.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

MR. GEORGE P. PUTNAM, whose sudden decease on the 21st ult. has thrown a gloom over literary and artistic circles, was equally known and esteemed as a publisher, scholar, gentleman, and the personal friend and associate of the most eminent public men of the time. He was a close companion of the late WASHINGTON IRVING, and had the intimate friendship of FENIMORE COOPER, JOHN P. KENNEDY, BAYARD TAYLOR, THOMAS HOOD, and many other notabilities in the world of literature and art. In connection with Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS and CHARLES F. BRIGGS he established Putnam's Magazine. He was one of the founders of the Century Club, and for several years chairman of the Art Committee of the Union League Club. He was a modest, amiable, intelligent gentleman, and one of the most useful of our citizens.

—Miss THACKERAY, whose exquisite stories have formed a prominent attraction in the columns of the Bazar and Weekly, is as admirable in society as she is on paper, and in the literary circles of London occupies the highest position.

—A Miss WHEAT, of Virginia, having entered into the holy bonds, and that sort of thing, an editor of the district expresses the hope that her path may be flowery, and that she may never be thrashed by her husband.

—Mrs. J. LLOYD ABBOTT, who recently made her appearance at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, in this city, is a lady in opulent circumstances and good social position. She is the granddaughter of the late Governor SHELBY, of Tennessee, and daughter of General DUSHEA, of Mobile.

—Mr. CHAFFER is a peculiar man. A few moments before the fire broke out in the Fifth Avenue Hotel he was assigned a room. He immediately descended and coolly asked if the clerk "could not give him a room that was not on fire."

—We are sorry to see that Bishop JANES, Dr. Foss, and a few others of the Methodist Episcopal Church are joining hands with the Roman Catholic clergy in making war upon the Public School System. A few evenings since the first anniversary of the Educational Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held in New York, and some of the speakers assailed the public schools. We hope the laity will take the matter in hand. In every country the movement in favor of sectarian schools is purely a Clerical one. The people here, no matter of what creed, if left to themselves, prefer the present system, and know it to be the only one that can be sustained, for it is the only one that is in harmony with American institutions. If the Educational Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church requires the destruction of our Public Schools, the sooner it is broken up the better.

—This truly wonderful "personal" of an American peripatetic warrior comes from a London paper: "Mr. Serjeant BATES, who bears the Stars and Stripes across England, is of distinguished kin. A brother of the late Hon. EDWARD BATES, the Attorney-General under the administration of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and connected with the late JOSHUA BATES, the great banker, he first entered the public service as an advocate of distinguished qualities, appearing as attorney in the now famous case of the United States v. GEORGE ALFRED TOWNSEND. He gradually rose to eminence, until he became one of the ornaments of the American bar. His fondness for British institutions led him to adopt the title of Serjeant (not Sergeant) BATES." Well, well, well!

—Mlle. BERNHARDT, who has achieved fame as an actress in Paris, has among other pleasing peculiarities the whim of carrying around with her the skull of a poor girl who died of consumption—whether to remind her of the shortness of life, or as a petit souvenir of her lost friend, is unknown.

—The mother of RUBINSTEIN, the pianist, is a celebrated music-teacher in Moscow, and said to be very wealthy.

—THOMAS CARLYLE has one little peculiarity which should give us national grief. He can not hear the name of WASHINGTON repeated without violent expressions of contempt. He does not like our federal parent because he failed to fulfill the true condition of grandeur as set forth in Hero-Worshipers. But he likes EMERSON.

—Mrs. General SANDERSON, of Washington, Ohio, owns a box said to have been brought to America by CORTÉZ when he came to conquer Mexico. It is inlaid with ivory, and its age is said to be about four hundred years.

—Mr. DARWIN has written a new book, the subject of which is The Expression of Emotion in Man and Animals. For the purpose of proving the connection between the two species he states that both men and apes "pout" and "turn the cold shoulder" as an indication of displeasure. And he tells how it is done, in order that all juvenile apes or humans who like may practice the pout without mistake. He says that "the pouting here referred to consists of the protrusion of both lips in a tubular form, sometimes to such an extent as to project as far as the end of the nose, if this be short;" and that "pouting is generally accompanied by frowning, and sometimes by a booing or whooing noise."

—Two Japanese priests have arrived at Berlin to obtain information about the Christian religion. The Rev. Dr. LISCO is explaining to them the various Christian creeds. The interpreters are a Japanese acquainted with the French language, and the sworn interpreter, Dr. GIOVANOLI. It was at first attempted to employ one of the young Japanese in Berlin as interpreter, but it was soon discovered that he was unable to translate into Japanese certain fine theological distinctions with the requisite accuracy.

—The Duchess of Newcastle, who was a great writer of romances in the time of CHARLES II., asked Bishop WILKINS, who had just announced his discovery of a world in the moon, how she could get there. "As the journey," said she, "must needs be very long, there will not be any possibility of getting there without stopping on the way." "Your Grace," replied the bishop, "can be at no loss for places to stop at, as you have built so many castles in the air."

—Princeton College has given to the American Episcopate five bishops: CLAGGETT, of Maryland; HOBART, of New York; MEADE, of Virginia; M'ILVAINE, of Ohio; and JOHNS, of Virginia.

—JENNY LIND recently delighted the Americans at Florence by singing in the Episcopal chapel maintained by our countrymen in that city.

—Miss DEPEW, of Le Mars, Wisconsin, has built and organ-ized an Episcopal church, and that, too, as the vitally pious editor of the World says, without Depew-ting any part of the work to others.

—Rich as the Orleans princes are known to be, they have just been made doubly so, the French National Assembly having passed a bill restoring to them their confiscated property, valued at over forty millions of francs. The amount is to be divided among the fifty-two living descendants of LOUIS PHILIPPE.

—The Baroness DE SAMUEL, a somewhat antiquated but extremely wealthy Jewess, of London, is about to marry a young English nobleman, who is very poor.

—M. CATACAZY, after having inserted himself in fresh linen and appropriate traveling garb, left Paris a few days since for parts unknown, leaving madame to delight metropolitan attention by her fascinating manners, her jewels, and her beautiful apparel.

—PINCHBACK is said to be not the real name of the acting Governor of Louisiana. It was given to him when he was boating on the Mississippi River, on account of the profusion with which he adorned himself with what is sometimes called jewelry.

—Of GEORGE MACDONALD it is said that in an age of too much loose literature he is, like SCOTT and DICKENS and THACKERAY, pure-minded. His English is very pure, and while WILKIE COLLINS outdoes him in plot, he outdoes WILKIE COLLINS in delicacy and sweetness of touch.

—VON MOLTKE must be growing younger, according to the warm account of an enthused young Englishman, who says that, though the old general is seventy, he is the youngest, blondest, and slenderest general officer he ever saw. "The quick, elastic step, the slender, almost womanly waist, contrast strangely with what one expects to see in a full general. It is difficult to shake off the impression that he is a boy. He has a light and nearly transparent complexion, a clear blue eye, flaxen hair, white eyebrows, and no mustache."

—According to Mr. FORSTER, his biographer, CHARLES DICKENS lived and worked at high pressure, and died of overwork. He did even his nothings in a strenuous way. One day he got wet through thrice, and dressed four times; another, he walked eighteen miles in four and a half hours in a broiling sun. Living at Genoa one winter, he dashed over to London in the most inclement weather (riding night and day) and back to Genoa again, for no earthly reason but to try the effect of reading The Chimes on a few intimate friends. His dash into the editorship of the London Daily News and out of it again within three weeks was highly characteristic of the man.

—Colonel FORNEY was perhaps the man who enjoyed most of the society and confidence of the late EDWIN FORREST. In a lengthy editorial on his character he speaks of his talent as a talker, and whether he talked politics, religion, or poetry, he was the peer of his associates, of whatever rank or station. More than once in days gone by, when statesmen in Congress of both parties visited the editor of the Washington Chronicle and the Philadelphia Press at his old rooms on Capitol Hill, FORREST would drop in after he had acted Macbeth, or Othello, or Richelieu, or Jack Cade, or Coriolanus, and at a word forget the fatigues of the night, and startle the dignities by appearing as a French critic on SHAKSPEARE, a Yankee in the South, a slave-holder on a steamboat, a negro in the pulpit, or an interpreter of some old ballad of the fireside affections. And all this till cold PITT FESSENDEN, of Maine, or grim THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, or reticent JOSEPH HOLT, of Kentucky, would be convulsed with laughter or drowned in tears.

—The latest royal betrothal has made a break in reference to faith, brought about by the betrothal of the Grand Duke VLADIMIR to a daughter of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Before the recent conference of the emperors at Berlin the custom was that when a princess married into the imperial family of Russia she had to join the Greek Church; but at the conference the Emperor WILLIAM peremptorily declared that henceforth German princesses marrying into the Russian imperial family must be allowed to continue in the Protestant faith.

—That was a pleasant incident in Mrs. CADY STANTON'S career when, a few evenings since, at Green Bay, she was delivering her lecture on the "Coming Girl." She told how her father, when they were going over the highlands of Scotland together, had a pair of boots made for her, and how she walked therein just as many miles as he, and just as well. After the lecture a bronze-faced, furzy individual stepped around to the greenroom, and putting forth a knotted palm, said, "An' wi' ye shek haan's wi' the maan wha made the booties for ye?" and there he was. She did.

—EDMUND YATES, who is now in the wilds of Chicago, St. Louis, and jungles adjacent, has, in company with AUGUSTE DUBOURG, written a new comedy, entitled Without Love, which is soon to be produced at the Olympic Theatre, London.

—Twenty years ago, when HENRY CLAY was in Philadelphia, he was called on at his hotel by MR. FORREST. It was after Mr. C. had introduced the compromise measures, which were violently opposed by PIERRE SOULÉ, of Louisiana. Colonel FORNEY, who accompanied Mr. FORREST, praised Mr. SOULÉ'S abilities, which Mr. CLAY at once denied, ending with the exclamation, "He is nothing but an actor, Sir!" when, suddenly recollecting that the great tragedian was present, he added, quickly, "I mean a French actor, Mr. FORREST." As Colonel F. and FORREST passed down stairs the latter laughed very heartily as he said, "And I think the best actor of the two was the old man himself."

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—VELVET AND LACE OPERA HOOD.—BACK.

Fig. 2.—VELVET AND LACE OPERA HOOD.—FRONT.

Velvet and Lace Opera Hood, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS black velvet hood is lined with lustring and trimmed with white guipure lace, and also with pinked ruches and bows of pale pink gros grain. The front ends of the cape are fastened at the bottom of the waist as shown by the illustration.

Fraises with Bows of Swiss Muslin, Lace, and Ribbon, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—PLEATED SWISS MUSLIN FRAISE WITH BOW. This fraise consists of two rows of gathered lace seven-eighths of an inch wide, which are sewed on one side of a tulle strip seven-eighths of an inch wide, with the straight edges turned toward each other; this tulle strip is edged at the other side with a single row of gathered lace. The seam of the two upper rows of lace is covered by a needle-work strip a quarter of an inch wide. The bow consists of two loops each two inches and a half long and three inches and a quarter wide, and two ends of the same width and four inches long, of narrow-pleated Swiss muslin, edged with lace half an inch wide. Several loops and ends of red gros grain ribbon an inch and a quarter wide and a knot of smooth Swiss muslin complete the bow.

Fig. 2.—DOTTED SWISS MUSLIN FRAISE WITH BOW. This fraise is made of two rows of gathered lace an inch and a quarter wide, and several narrow rolls of plain Swiss muslin. Arrange the bow of figured Swiss muslin edged with lace and narrow light blue gros grain ribbon as shown by the illustration. Of course the color may be varied to suit the dress.

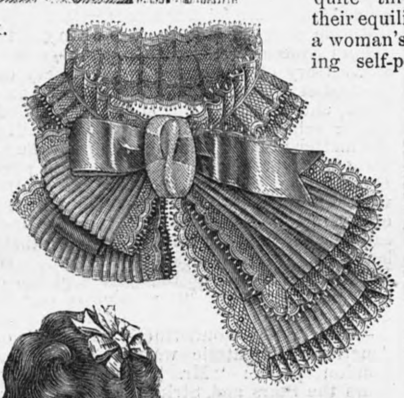

Fig. 1.—FRAISE WITH BOW OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND RIBBON.

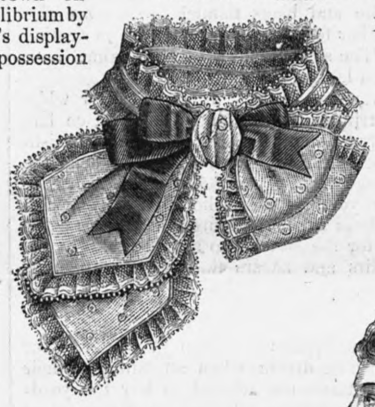

Fig. 2.—FRAISE WITH BOW OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND RIBBON.

POULT DE SOIE DRESS.

Poult de Soie Dress.

THIS dress is made of gray poult de soie. A wide kilt-pleated ruffle of the material is sewed on the skirt. The trimming for the over-skirt and waist consists of a binding of gray poult de soie and white guipure lace. Bows of the material are set on the sides of the over-skirt. Pleated Swiss muslin collar and under-sleeves. Cherry gros grain hair bow.

Gros Grain Dress.

THIS brown gros grain dress consists of a skirt and polonaise, trimmed with bows, folds, and box-pleated ruffles of the material and white guipure lace. Pleated Swiss muslin collar and under-sleeves.

WOMEN AND WORK.

I AM not one of the sticklers for a formal adherence to certain conventional laws which somebody or other has enacted for the governance of men and women. I have known people to be quite thrown off their equilibrium by a woman's displaying self-possession enough to read aloud a poem in a promiscuous circle. And again, I have known some persons to manifest considerable disturbance at seeing a gentleman, and, above all, a clergyman, take a walk with his baby in his arms. If it had been a child of two years, it might possibly have been overlooked; but an infant in long-clothes — how shockingly improper! But have the fathers, then, no duties? Was the Great Founder of the race mistaken in giving children a father as well as a mother?

I have as little admiration as any one for a man who is Old Bettyish, and continually dabbling in domesticities; but I do greatly admire one who has manliness enough to let his dignity take care of itself; who, if his wife is feeble, and his cook has suddenly taken her departure, is not too full of conceits about his own respectability to go into the kitchen, if need be, and tend a cake at the fire — like a king before him, and not burn it either, as the royal Alfred did.

I admire a man who can turn his hand to any thing that sudden exigencies may require, and without being tormented by qualms lest perchance some doctor of divinity, or president of a college, or some old acquaintance on Change, should hear of his deed, and he should thus sink one notch below his lordly heights.

And I admire a woman who can throw herself into the breach in similar exigencies, and bravely do a man's work without so much as once asking herself whether it be perfectly feminine, or what Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones would say if they should see her. This is one of "woman's rights" that I believe in. And I believe in man's rights too—in his right to do any thing that needs to be done, when there is no one else to do it; in his right to rock the cradle and tend the baby if necessary, and even to get up at midnight, if it should be sick, and carry it back and forth with soothing words or a gentle lullaby, while its worn mother gets a little quiet sleep.

Perhaps, in all candor, I ought here to admit, however ashamed I may feel to do so, that there are inefficient, or indolent, or possibly a few mannish women, who have no objection to impose their proper work upon their husbands. Of such inglorious shirking there can be but one opinion. For of all upside-down arrangements, none is more despicable than that in which a woman, having put her husband under the yoke, leaves him to perform domestic drudgery at home while she is gossiping in the street.

GROS GRAIN DRESS.

Hosted by Google

"GOOD-BY, DEAR."

"GOOD-BY, DEAR."

THESE gushing young ladies, who force the street car to wait while they exchange a last fond embrace, oblivious of the stare from window and platform of the passengers, know very little of that delicate tenderness which shuns the public gaze, and deems its demonstrations too sacred for such occasions. But the girl of the period wears her heart on her sleeve, and makes the whole world a sharer in her feelings. She is speculative in every thing, and wholly ignores comparative values; her conversation knows no shading: each of her friends is dearest and darling; all her preferences and aversions are either awfully nice or awfully horrid; she has no idea of any such thing as a golden mean, and, withal, expresses her likes and dislikes with sovereign contempt of the tastes of those about her. Let us hope that time and experience will tone down her manner, and prove to her that gush is only the froth of feeling, that sentimentality is the pinchbeck imitation of sentiment, and that quiet conviction carries more force with it than the noisiest demonstration.

(Continued from No. 1, page 7.)

LONDON'S HEART.

By B. L. FARJEON,

Author of "Blade-o'-Grass," "Grif," and "Joshua Marvel."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

GOOD COUNSEL.

THE cab was turning the corner of the little street in Soho in which Lily lived, and Lily was about to ring the door-bell, when Mr. Sheldrake laid his hand on her wrist, and said,

"Let me have a few minutes' conversation with you to-night, Miss Lily. I beg it as a favor."

Not daring for Alfred's sake to refuse, Lily tremblingly suggested that they should go indoors and talk; but Mr. Sheldrake said, in a tone that was half decided and half imploring,

"I can not speak to you in the house, Miss Lily."

She raised her eyes to his face for an explanation, and he answered the look.

"Your grandfather is not my friend."

"But that is not grandfather's fault," she said, loyally.

"I do not say it is; it is my misfortune, perhaps. He is not so much a friend of Alfred's as he should be."

"How can you say that?" asked Lily, with a beating heart. "You are wrong, very wrong; grandfather loves Alfred."

"I only judge from what Alfred has told me, Miss Lily. So far as regards myself, of course I can see that your grandfather is not overcordial to me. And he has no right to be otherwise: I have been a good friend to his grandson, and I deserve some better return."

"I know, I know, Mr. Sheldrake," said Lily, earnestly. "Alfred has told me of your kindness to him. I am very grateful to you for it, believe me."

"Well, then," rejoined Mr. Sheldrake, briskly, "you can scarcely refuse me the small favor of a few minutes' quiet conversation with you—although I accept it as a great favor, Miss Lily? It is a fine night, and, after the heat of the theatre, the air will do you no harm."

She had no power to refuse, and they turned slowly from the door. Near to the house was an arched avenue which led to one of the larger thoroughfares. Not many persons were stirring in this quiet courtway, and thither Mr. Sheldrake led Lily.

"If we walk up and down slowly, Miss Lily," he said, "our talking together at this time of night will not attract attention. Pray take my arm."

She laid her hand lightly on his sleeve, and waited anxiously for his next words.

"I hope," he said, looking into her face with an expression of tender solicitude, "that the effects of your faintness have quite passed away."

"Yes, thank you. It was very stupid of me to give way so."

"You must not say that. You could not help it. And you are the last person, I am sure, to give pain to your friends."

She raised her eyes to his.

"It pained me exceedingly to see you overcome, and I could not help reproaching myself for being the innocent cause of your suffering."

"You were not to know that I was so weak; you did not know what kind of a play it was we were going to see."

"Thank you, Miss Lily," he said, eagerly, "thank you. You do me greater justice than your friend Lizzie did. She seemed to be unaccountably set against me."

"She was anxious about me, Mr. Sheldrake."

"And naturally so. For that reason I can find an excuse for her; if it were not for that, I should have been inclined to be angry with her. I think she must be ungrateful."

"No, indeed," said Lily, warmly. "She is the very reverse of that. You must not speak ill of Lizzie, Mr. Sheldrake."

"Your wish is law," he replied, gallantly; "but if she is not ungrateful, I am the most unfortunate of men, for I have by some unaccountable means incurred the displeasure of two persons whom you love—your grandfather and Lizzie."

He paused here, anticipating and wishing that Lily would have replied to this, but she was silent.

"And the mystery is that both have good reason to behave differently toward me, to think better of me, for they must know that I have stood a good friend to Alfred. You know that."

"Yes."

"We entered into a compact, if you remember—you and I—to work together for Alfred's good. You do remember it, do you not?"

"Yes."

"That was at Bushey Park. It is one of the pleasantest days in my remembrance. Well, now, I've tried to perform my part in the compact. I've stood Alfred's friend through thick and thin—it might sound boastful if I said that very few men would have stuck to him as I have done. However, I can take no credit to myself for doing so: he has you to thank for it—only you. Why, here am I repeating the very words I said to you on the day we entered into partnership!"

His treacherous hand closed upon hers with a tender pressure which made her shiver. Not so much in the words he had spoken, but in the manner of their utterance, he made her understand that he held Alfred's safety—perhaps his life—in his hand, and she felt that if she repulsed him Alfred would be made to suffer. He released her presently, and, encouraged by her submission, his treacherous arm would have stolen round her waist. But instinctively she evaded the embrace, and stood apart from him. Had her life depended upon it, she could not have acted otherwise. At this moment a man passed through the archway. Mr. Sheldrake's back was toward the man, who, with a keen observance of Lily's attitude, walked slowly onward in the direction of Lily's home. Mr. Sheldrake waited until the man was out of hearing before he spoke again.

"I hope I have not frightened you by telling you that very few men would have stood by Alfred as I have done, Miss Lily?" How strong the armor of modesty is was never better shown than in the fact that the man of the world had not yet found courage to address her simply by her Christian name. "But it is a fact, I assure you. I dare say Alfred has confided in you, and has told you some of his troubles?"

"I don't know the exact nature of them," replied Lily; "I only know that he is very much harassed."

"Perhaps it is better," said Mr. Sheldrake, significantly, "that your knowledge should go no farther. I am afraid that he has been very injudicious—it is a mild phrase, but I would not distress you by using a harsher term. Let us say that he has been injudicious, indiscreet. Well, what then? So long as you and I remain true to our compact, he is safe. There is comfort in that knowledge, is there not?"

"Mr. Sheldrake," said Lily, in an agony of alarm, "is Alfred in danger?"

"Not while we stand by him. Do not needlessly distress yourself. We'll see him through it, you and I. Many a young fellow has been wrecked through want of a friend—but Alfred has two. Shall I tell you what makes me so earnest in his cause?"

"No," she replied, hurriedly, and looking round as if for help; "not to-night. It is late, and grandfather will be anxious about me. Some other time."

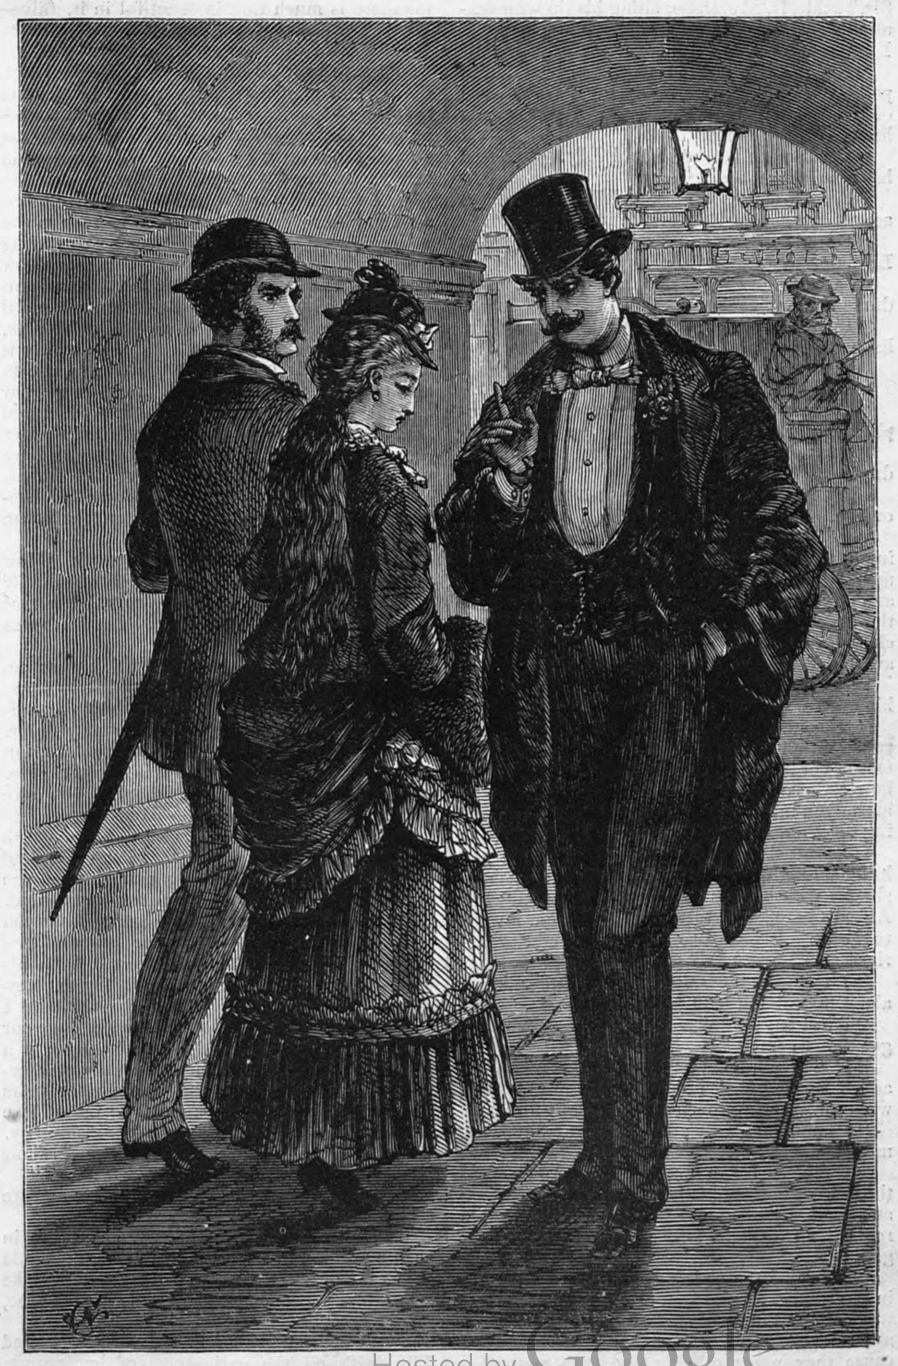
"What if some other time should be too late?" he questioned, pitilessly. "You are scarcely kind to me, Miss Lily. Nor to your brother either. You ask me whether he is in danger, and almost in the same breath you show unkindness to the only friend who has it in his power to pull him through his difficulties. I make no boast of being his friend—it is the simple truth. And what should there be to displease you in the knowledge that I am your brother's friend because of the feeling I entertain for you? A girl should be thankful—I will not speak of gratitude—to be in this way the guardian and protector of her brother."

"I am grateful, Mr. Sheldrake; indeed, indeed, I am!"

"You have a strange way of showing it, Miss Lily. Pardon me if I seem to speak harshly, but I am deeply wounded by your conduct, and by the conduct of others who should show a better regard for Alfred's position. Your grandfather is cold to me—Alfred's sweetheart misjudges me; but I could forgive these if you were kind. It is due to my self-respect—which I can not forfeit, not even to win your good opinion, Miss Lily—to ask you again whether I may tell you what makes me so earnest in your brother's cause?"

Thus miserably constrained, Lily whispered "Yes," in a faint tone, knowing what was coming, and dreading it. Mr. Sheldrake dropped his voice to the requisite pitch of tenderness, and prepared to make his avowal.

"I saw you first by accident, Miss Lily. I was passing the Royal White Rose Music-hall one evening—it was in June of last year, a night I shall never forget—and having a spare half hour, I dropped in. Almost as I entered you came upon the stage, and from that moment it seemed to me that my fate was fixed. Such an impression did your sweet face make upon me that I drove to the hall on the following evening, and being acquainted with Storks, the manager, we spoke together about you. You remember on that night I threw you a bouquet—I bought it especially for the pretty girl who had made such an impression upon me—and after the performance I came to the back of the stage, and had the pleasure of being introduced to you. I saw that you were too good for such a place—that you were in every way different from the usual run of music-hall performers—and you must take the blame on yourself for having attracted me in such a manner. It is not many



"FOR ALFRED'S SAKE."

Hosted by Google

girls who have done so—nay, no other has ever produced a similar impression upon me. From that moment, Miss Lily, I began to love you."

He did not appear to be aware that the very words he employed in declaring his love showed of what base material it was composed. His speech flowed smoothly, and he mentally congratulated himself upon his skill in delivering it. There was no tremor in his voice, for the situation was not new to him. He had delivered himself of artificial love-phrases to a score of girls in his time, and he had become practiced in the art; but he was compelled to acknowledge to himself that never had he found conquest so difficult as this—which gave it without doubt a keener zest, and made him as artificially earnest as it was in his false nature to be.

Lily listened tremblingly. It was the first avowal of love that had ever been made to her, and it met with no response in her heart. But thought of Alfred's peril compelled her attention. Encouraged by her silence, Mr. Sheldrake proceeded:

"I saw you home that night, and after lingering about the street long after you entered the house—see what an impression you made upon me!—it was my good fortune to make the acquaintance of your brother. He has told you of the circumstance probably?"

He paused for her reply, and she gave it.

"Yes." Faintly whispered, as if it were wrung from her.

"He was in some difficulty, and I was enabled to get him out of it. I was attracted to him by his voice and by his resemblance to you. An acquaintanceship sprang up between us, and it has been in my power to assist him on many occasions. I have done so, as you know, for your sake, and because I love you. There is no need for me to say more. There is one reward I have looked forward to for befriending your brother, and whom I shall continue to befriend if I can hope to find some place in your affection—"

He placed his arm around her, and so overpowered was she by her inward conflict of feeling that she had no power to resist. But at this critical moment a quick step was heard coming into the archway. Lily turned with a gasp of relief, and seeing who it was that was approaching them, involuntarily cried, in a joyful tone,

"Felix!"

And made a movement toward him.

Felix raised his hat, and said,

"Your grandfather is anxious about you, Miss Lily."

"Have you seen him to-night?" asked Lily.

"Yes; I have been to see The Bells, and he told me that you had gone to the same theatre. He expected you would have been home before this time."

"Miss Lily was in perfectly safe keeping, Sir," said Mr. Sheldrake, biting his lip with vexation at the interruption, and with jealousy at Lily's more cordial manner toward Felix.

"I make no question of it," replied Felix, politely. "Her grandfather must be satisfied of that; but I think he expected Alfred would bring his sister home."

"I will come at once," said Lily. "Alfred has gone to see Lizzie home."

Felix offered his arm, and Lily was about to accept it, when Mr. Sheldrake interposed:

"I would like you to assure this person, Miss Lily, that there was no cause for alarm."

In a very lofty manner indeed did Mr. Sheldrake make this request.

"Indeed, no assurance is necessary," said Felix, with the intention of sparing Lily.

But Mr. Sheldrake would not be denied.

"I asked the lady, Sir."

"There was no cause for alarm, Felix," replied Lily, thus directly appealed to.

"One word before you go," said Mr. Sheldrake.

Obedient to her look, Felix fell back a pace or two.

"I will take an early opportunity of continuing our conversation; I will not intrude farther upon you to-night, for I see that you are fatigued and anxious. Thank you a thousand times for the hope you have given me." In this way he chose to interpret her manner of receiving his avowal of love. "Who is this person?"

"He is a friend of ours, who has been very kind to us."

"Of course you will keep what has passed between us an entire secret. For Alfred's sake. Out of consideration for you I have not told you how serious his position is; I do not wish to alarm you unnecessarily. But you and I, working together, will be able to set him straight."

He pressed her hand tenderly as he wished her good-night; and as she took Felix's arm he shaped with his lips the warning words, "For Alfred's sake," and turned away without a word to Felix. Before Lily and her protector arrived at the house Lily said,

"I want you not to let grandfather know about my talking with Mr. Sheldrake."

"I will say nothing, Lily. You are not angry that I came?"

"No; I am glad—very, very glad." And added, anxiously, "I have not done any thing wrong in stopping to speak to Mr. Sheldrake."

"I know that, Lily; but don't say any thing more about it."

"I must. I can not bear that you should think ill of me; and it has so strange an appearance that any one less generous than you would require an explanation, and that I can not give."

"If I say I am satisfied, and that I hold you in too perfect esteem to think ill of you in any way—that I know you have troubles which you are compelled to keep to your own breast, because they affect others more than yourself—will that content you?"

She answered yes, and he gave her the assurance in other words.

"I have a confession to make before we go in, Lily."

"You, Felix!"

"Yes; I have told an untruth, but one which, I think, may be pardoned. I have not been to your house since eight o'clock. I saw your grandfather then, and he told me you had gone to see The Bells, and appeared anxious about you. I was anxious also, for I did not care that you should see such a piece."

Lily shuddered. "It was dreadful, Felix! Did you know that I fainted?"

"No; I noticed that you were very pale."

"You were watching me, Felix?"

"Yes, Lily; I was at the back of the pit, and could just see your box."

Lily experienced an exquisite delight at this confession. He had come to the theatre expressly to watch over her. Involuntarily she held out her hand to him, and allowed it to remain in his grasp.

"I knew when you came out of the theatre, Lily," he continued, "and when I came toward you just now, and you asked me if I had been at home with your grandfather, I saw no other way of avoiding an unpleasant explanation with Mr. Sheldrake than to say what was not exactly true. Now, if you can say sincerely that you forgive me for the subterfuge, you will relieve my mind and make me feel less culpable."

"No forgiveness can be necessary, Felix, when the only feeling I have is one of gratitude that you came when you did."

"Thank you; I am more than sufficiently rewarded. Now I am going to say something to you which may need forgiveness; but I depend upon your generous nature not to misjudge me. My words are prompted by sincerity and pure esteem, Lily. Shall I go on?"

"Yes," she answered, clearly, looking him steadily and earnestly in the face. There was so much truthfulness in her look that he could have taken her in his arms there and then, believing that she would have found comfort in that shelter, knowing that it would be to him the greatest happiness earth could afford. But he mastered the impulse with manly resolve, and with a tender and chivalrous regard for her weakness. There was no fear, no doubt, in her face; she knew she could trust him; all the bright dreams of her youth were embodied in him, and would ever be, though the dear realization of them might never, never come. He was her knight, in the truest sense of the word.

"You are but a child, Lily," he said, "inexperienced in the world's hard ways, and bringing only to your aid, in any difficulty you may be laboring under, a simple heart, unused to the artifice and cunning which surround us. I have learned something of the world in my struggle; and although I have not learned to condemn it—for there is much that is beautiful in it, Lily—I have learned that it is often necessary to arm yourself with weapons that you despise, if you would save yourself from hurt. In battling with the world a man must not wear his heart upon his sleeve—there are too many vultures about—he must not oppose a bare breast to foes whose breasts are mailed. I am expressing myself in this way so as to make you understand that I—who, I would have you believe, despise meanness and unworthiness as heartily as it is in the power of man to do—feel the necessity of using weapons in life's battle which I would fain throw aside. There is nothing more noble than simplicity of heart—I worship it wherever I see it—but it is a weak weapon, as the world goes, and in most cases where it is relied on solely it becomes wofully bruised. Say that you are in any trouble, that any cloud hangs over your life, that you are threatened by storms which you see approaching to you nearer and nearer—how can you meet them, Lily? What weapons have you at your command to save yourself from the peril? Simplicity, innocence, self-sacrifice! Relying only on these and on yourself, the storm breaks, and then—"

He paused, and Lily did not speak. How precious were his words to her! How skillfully and delicately had he contrived to tell her that her happiness was dear to him! His voice was like music to her heart.

"Then, Lily," he resumed, "think what occurs. It may be that I am wrong in my fears. How happy it would make me to know that it is so! But if I am right, think what may occur. You may bring misery not only to yourself, but to others. You are moved by this thought, I see. Has it never occurred to you before? You have at home two whom you love—your brother and your grandfather. There is no need for me to say how dearly your grandfather loves you, and what anguish you may bring upon him if you allow suffering to come on yourself unprepared. In both your brother and your grandfather you should confide, and from your grandfather's larger experience of the world, and from his whole-hearted love for his dear child, good counsel would surely come, if counsel be needed. I should say, if I were asked, that were I in your place and needed counsel, I should deem it a matter of duty, as it is equally a matter of affection, to seek for it in one whose riper years qualify him for giving it, and whose life of love for his child is a sufficient warrant for his sincerity. I should say more than this, Lily, if you will allow me, and if you are not displeased with me—"

"Go on, Felix. I honor you for what you are saying."

"I should say, were I in your place, and in such a position as I have hinted at, that I should fail in my duty and my love if I neglected to take him into my confidence, and that, in that case, doubts might well arise in his mind—"

"Of my love for him, Felix!" interrupted Lily, with all the earnestness of her nature. "No, no; do not say that!"

"I might have been harsh enough to use these very words, if I did not know that good old man's heart. Cling to him and to his love, dear Lily; do not throw him aside in your trouble. It is the dearest privilege of affection to share the troubles of those we love. If I were married"—his voice trembled slightly here—"the first consoling thought that would arise to my mind should misfortune overtake me would be, 'Thank God, I have one at home who will sympathize with me and, by her sympathy, console me!'"

Had Felix been the most cunning of men, and had he carefully studied every word he wished to say, he could not have made a more successful appeal. Such strength is there in sincerity and in honesty of purpose! If any thing had been wanting to make him inexpressibly dear to the girl he loved so loyally, to make her cherish him (as she did) in her heart of hearts, he had supplied it. But he had no thought of that; he had spoken out of perfect singleness of motive.

"So now," he said, in a lighter tone, "my lecture being over, and knowing, as I know, that you are not hurt or offended with me for speaking as I have done, we will go in to your grandfather. I look upon myself as a very conspirator—pretending to be anxious that you should be at home, and keeping you in the night air for my own selfish purpose!"

He raised his hand to the bell, and Lily caught it and kissed it. She felt no shame in the action, any more than a little child might have done; but the soft touch of her lips thrilled through Felix, and so powerful a happiness filled his heart, as he thought of what might be in the future for him and for her, that a mist floated before his eyes. The next moment he raised her hand to his lips, and returned the homage with the respect and devotion of a true and faithful knight.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

AND YET.

I SEE him look at Linda's wavy hair;
I see him watch Cecilia's winning smile;
I see him notice Maud's complexion fair;
My heart with dread is beating all the while;
And yet
I'm almost sure he loves me best of all.

I see him glance at Milly's fairy feet,
And follow all their movements with a smile;
I see him charmed by many maidens sweet,
My heart with dread fast beating all the while;
And yet
I'm almost sure he loves me best of all.

For when he takes my hand in both of his,
And looks at me with his confiding smile,
My every doubt and fear are set at ease,
Although my heart is beating all the while;
And—yes!
I'm sure, quite sure, he loves me best of all.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Parisian drawing-rooms are reopening for the season, and the capital is becoming gayer day by day. The diplomatic corps announce frequent and regular receptions, and every thing betokens a brilliant winter. The influx of foreigners into Paris since autumn has been greater than at any time since the Exposition; and even the shop-keepers—those habitual grumblers at the hard times—are forced to confess that business is good. The political agitation causes some uneasiness, it is true, but it is generally believed that this will soon be quieted, and that we shall enjoy the peace to which we all aspire.

A few dancing parties have already been given, but the ball season will not begin before January. Until then our dress-makers will be busy in meditating on the effects of trimmings, and awaiting inspiration which shall enable them to compose not one, but a thousand fashions; for in these days no lady is content unless each one of her dresses has been invented expressly for her, and is wholly unlike any thing that has ever been seen before. The combination not only of colors, but also of fabrics, is the great resource of modistes in this emergency, and nowhere but in Paris can the most opposite colors and the most inharmonious stuffs be allied with artistic grace. Whenever this is attempted elsewhere, the result is sure to be crude and heavy.

Ball dresses are divided into three classes: silk alone; tarlatan or tulle, without the admixture of any other fabric; and lastly, tarlatan and silk, tulle and silk or velvet, etc. This last class is infinite; it is the domain of unlimited fancy.

The so-called simple toilettes are made therefore of tarlatan, and nothing but tarlatan, in several layers, one above another; coarse tarlatan for petticoats, and fine tarlatan for skirts, overskirts, flounces, ruches, and pleated and gathered trimmings of all sorts. It is almost the same with tulle; this, however, is usually worn over a petticoat of silk, satin, or faye, and is therefore less simple.

There remains the costly and dressy toilette. This has for its basis a petticoat of silk, a skirt of tarlatan or tulle, with all possible trimmings, and lastly, a tunic or polonaise, made often of silk tissue, brocaded in the Pompadour style, or else of plain silk, plain satin, or velvet of a light or even dark shade, according to fancy. Of course this tunic or polonaise is very short, and is generally open in front, and cut in points so as to conceal as little as possible the trimmings of the tulle or tarlatan skirt. To tell the truth, these ball tunics, when they are made of velvet, satin, or silk, and worn over tulle or tarlatan dresses, are basques rather than tunics, and more of an ornament than a garment, but are always attached to a waist of the same material as themselves. To make my meaning better understood, I will describe a dress of this kind.

Petticoat of white silk, trimmed on the bottom with a pleated flounce of white tarlatan, headed by a lace flounce. Skirt of white tarlatan, trimmed with a pleated flounce (but with the pleats very far apart) of peach velvet. Large tunic, almost trained, of white tarlatan, trimmed with a lace flounce, and slightly draped on each side under an agrafe of peach velvet. On the back of this tunic is a very deep flounce, forming a long basque. Low waist, with very short sleeves, of peach velvet, with four large basques lined with white satin. Between each basque the velvet is arranged in a large pleat. All the velvet portions—the flounce, waist, and basques—are trimmed on the edge with a very narrow galloon of white silk. This peach shade, which is a very beautiful pinkish-violet, is quite new, and copies the bloom seen on the finest ripe peaches, gilded and colored by the sun, in the suburbs of Paris.

The coiffures are all very high. To be in the fashion it is necessary to mass all the hair on the crown of the head, leaving the back entirely flat and bare, save for a stray curl or two, or a few ends of ribbon or sprays of flowers that escape from the top. The hair is brushed up from the nape of the neck to the top of the head, where it is confined by a short but very broad comb, which, however, remains invisible; the front hair is then arranged to suit the taste, being generally combed backward so as to expose the forehead, temples, and even the ears, and, together with the back hair, is formed into loops of all sizes, and seemingly without any symmetry or regularity. When it is insufficient in quantity there is added, here and there, a puff or two, a few floating curls, a bow of ribbon, one or two pins of precious stones, metal, or simply shell, or, when the dress permits the ornament, two or three flexible stems with a few flowers. The whole is designed to look as if arranged carelessly, without study, and as if laid on without being fastened in place. Feathers and aigrettes are also often worn in the hair with ball toilettes.

Scarfs of wide ribbon, which have taken the place of belts, and are worn on the right or left side, arranged in numerous loops of different sizes, form part of all dresses for the street, balls, dinners, etc. They are trimmed on the ends with silk or cord embroidery, or else with velvet application edged with soutache—all, embroidery or application, being of the same color as the ribbon. The latter may be either of the color of the dress or the trimmings; when the latter is of two shades, the scarf always matches the darker tint.

The most fashionable fur is the silver-fox, which is used in bands for trimming dresses and wrappings, with muffs to match. This fur is black, with grayish, almost white, tips, which look like little snow-flakes on the fur. Very long paletots of light cloth, trimmed and lined with fur, are made for carriage wraps. For the street Dolmans are universally in vogue; they accompany all suits, and are worn over polonaises.

For the house sleeveless jackets of velveteen or Amiens velvet, with cotton back, are much worn over polonaises, with plain waist and half-flowing sleeves, open in front, and without trimming, or else edged with fringe.

Woolen guipure, fringed and in all colors to match the dress, is still much worn, and is even used for dresses of faille, reps, or silk armure.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

NETTIRES.

CHAPTER FIRST.

TO commence à la Wilkie Collins: The time was morning; the scene, Miss Nettire's bedchamber; the personages, Miss Nettire and an angel, on whom she had just opened her eyes.

Miss Nettire was a person who regulated herself by certain infallible rules. She never deviated from them by the breadth of a hair. You at once perceive she could have had no faults. Her neighbors did deviate from these rules; worse yet, sometimes wholly denied their efficacy. Being faultless herself, Miss Nettire had all the more time to devote to her neighbors, and, as a right-minded woman, was in constant concern about them.

Therefore, when, as I have just said, she beheld an angel, who demanded of her the names of the most grievous sinners who had offended her, she might have been startled, but she was not amazed beyond measure. She had a feeling that it was very much what might have been expected of Heaven, and that the angel's selection of a guide was not amiss. She answered the question with a fair degree of composure, and then a vast complacency expanded within her. Now it would be seen, with the sanction of Heaven upon her, who was right—she, or the people who sneeringly declared that if she were a saint, they preferred to remain among the sinners. How would they do now? Would they shriek, or swoon, or fall on their knees and call on her for protection?

CHAPTER SECOND.

To proceed à la Wilkie Collins: Place, Will Hartleigh's bachelor lodgings; time, breakfast-time; persons—invisible, Miss Nettire and the angel; visible, Will Hartleigh and his chum, Ned Hill.

Miss Nettire looked about her with virtuous horror. She hardly felt safe there, even in the company of an angel. He was a flirt. He attended theatres, and talked geology, and made wicked jests on the T. P. (Truly Pious) when he met Miss Nettire. Briefly, he was absolutely without a redeeming trait, and the least that the angel could do, in her opinion, was to brand him and shut him up in a cage.

"Can't do it, Ned!" said Will's jolly voice. "To tell the truth, I had set my heart on running over to Europe this year, but I was obliged to pay out a thousand dollars in another direction; so I must stay at home this season."

That was all—not a word more; but under the solemn, benignant look of the angel, there flashed into Miss Nettire's brain a sudden scorching consciousness of their meaning. The recent Juneroseville fire had left Miles Stanley penniless. He was an old man, with a helpless family, and he was also Will Hartleigh's persistent enemy. Some one sent Miles Stanley, anonymously, a gift of one thousand dollars. No one had praised the unknown giver more loudly than Miss Nettire. She had also taken Will to task for his evident satisfaction over his enemy's misfortune. The generous unknown was Will Hartleigh, and he had sacrificed his year's pleasure for his enemy, and told nobody.

CHAPTER THIRD.

PLACE, the parsonage; persons, the much-enduring pastor and his more-enduring wife; Miss Nettire and the angel, invisible.

Miss Nettire looked hard at the angel. This was a degenerate parson. He was on horseback when he should have been visiting sick old women, and he paid three visits to Mrs. Hauton, who occupied the most stately house in Juneroseville, where he paid one elsewhere. If ever the thunder fell, what head better merited it than that of this selfish, frivolous, worldly, time-serving, latitudinarian priest? And again Miss Nettire looked hard at the angel.

The parson laid down his book, and looked anxiously at his wife.

"I am troubled for Mrs. Hauton," he said, with a sigh. "Her trials are so many! First, the death of Lucy, and now this terrible anxiety. Mr. Hauton is undoubtedly insane, and yet his insanity is mixed with so much cunning that it would be no easy matter to prove it; and she is obliged to look on quietly while he recklessly throws to the winds her children's property; and to crown all comes this trouble between John and his father. The young man will not credit his father's mental condition—insists on remonstrating with him as if he were a reasonable being. The poor woman feels as if she were losing her faith under these repeated afflictions."

Mrs. Parson looked sympathizing.

"You will ride there to-day, James?"

"I shall go there, but I shall not ride. I hear that some of my congregation are displeased with my new diversion. Their version of the matter is that their pastor rides about for pleasure and at his ease while the afflicted suffer and die without him."

"And so you will walk two miles and a half through this deep mud—you who are already so weak?" replied his wife, a red spot beginning to glow on either cheek. "What did the doctor tell you, James? That you could not hope to remain another year in your pulpit without active exercise, and exercise taken for pleasure, too. He said you might as well file a piece of steel every day in the year on exactly the same spot and not expect to wear a hole there. Follow my example, Sir, and don't walk with the fear of Nettire before your eyes, when your duty to God and yourself calls you another way. I had no outside wrap this winter" (Miss Nettire started). "To buy one out of your salary was not to be thought of. I had given my shawl to Kate: I couldn't see her come shivering home from school every day. I had some pieces of silk ten years old, and two extra breadths of cashmere left from my dress pattern. Between the two I contrived myself a paletot. It is cut after the latest style; I could cut it no other way. I lined and wadded it, and embroidered it to hide the piecing and help out the silk. It is very comfortable, and you say becoming. Well, Miss Nettire stands aghast, I am told. She says, 'It is no wonder that so many young women are going straight to destruction, and that people sneer at Christianity, when a woman who, from her position alone, should be pre-eminently adorned with good works, attires herself instead in gold and pearls and broidered array;' that means my piecing, you know. What should I do? Remain a prisoner in the house, and then be censured for non-attendance at the church, non-visiting, etc.? I say we can not serve two masters, and I prefer God to Miss Nettire. Be a wise man. Go and do likewise."

Miss Nettire's thin face was crimson. What sermons she had preached with that paletot for a text! What a scape-goat for the sins of the community was that luckless horse in her estimation! and how much she had added to Mrs. Hauton's heavy burdens! How natural, simple, and inevitable looked the very things that in her eyes had been inexcusable!

CHAPTER FOURTH.

TIME, lunch-time; place, Mrs. Goreout's breakfast-room; persons, the angel and Miss Nettire, Mrs. Goreout and her cousin Sue.

Mrs. Goreout was a pretty woman, and made the most of it. Her chestnut hair was rolled back becomingly from her arch face. A light-minded bit of lace perched jauntily over her forehead, evidently setting up for a breakfast-cap, though it could have no reasonable expectations of being taken for any thing more than a rosette. In Miss Nettire's opinion this bit of lace was the key-note to Mrs. Goreout's character. It was of no possible use. It could not keep her warm. She did not need it, for she was not bald. It was just there to look pretty—Mrs. Goreout's highest aim and constant endeavor, although she hypocritically pretended to care about better things.

"Now," thought Miss Nettire, "if she knew an angel was looking at her, I wonder if she wouldn't wish herself in a plain gray dress instead of that ruffled wrapper, and whether she would try to tuck her hair behind her ears or not!"

But Mrs. Goreout evidently had no suspicion of the angel. She sat complacent in her iniquitous gown, smiling as she dropped lumps of sugar into her cousin Sue's coffee, and talking in a pleasant voice.

"Grievous things said against me? What are they, Sue?"

Sue smiled, and coined a word on the spot:

"Nettires."

"Oh!" Mrs. Goreout's white forehead had contracted a little.

"You are a member of the church, and yet, Miss Nettire says, you are absent half the time from the prayer-meetings, and from the 'Mothers' Flannel Society' assemblies; and more than that, she don't see, for her part, how you can come flouncing to the communion and to prayers in silk and velvet. She should think you would be afraid."

Mrs. Goreout sighed, and looked down for a moment, and then flashed a bright smile at Susan.

"Foolish to care, is it not? I won't care. It is true, I was not at the prayer-meeting last Wednesday. But there was a reason for it. Old Lisba's complaint is just now so bad that she keeps her bed. I could send her what she needs; but you know there are plenty to attend the prayer-meeting, and there are not plenty who will bathe Lisba's poor limbs, and brush her hair, and talk her into a happier humor. She told me once that for years her heart was as hard as a stone, because she thought that God had made one world for the rich and another for the poor, and that the rich threw alms to her, and such as her, as they would to a dog, to keep them from being too troublesome. But when ladies who were rich and happy and fortunate left their grand houses to sit down with her in her smoky room, and talk to her about her troubles, and waited on her with their own hands for Jesus' sake, then indeed she did believe there was a Jesus, and that Christians did love one another. Now, Sue, I would never dare to stay away when she needed me, after that. Think of the harm I might do any one already so sore at heart."

Miss Nettire winced. She felt the gaze of the angel fixed on her with a look of solemn inquiry.

"And about the 'Flannel Society,'" continued Mrs. Goreout: "I was absent from that too. It was the only day in the week on which I could take old Mrs. Bathersby and Miss Simcox to drive, and they have grown to count so on that weekly ride! They have so little pleasure; and though they pinch and save every cent just to live, they are so proud, it is the only thing I dare offer them. They like the change, and they like, too, to have the carriage draw up in front of their door. Their poor poverty-hunted souls shake off their bondage, and you can feel that a pleasant sense of ease and importance is warming them through every fibre, as they chat with me and lean back on the cushions in an elegant manner. It is pure selfishness, I suppose, on my part. These are good women, and if the cup of cold water is not to be forgotten, I suppose even such a trifle as this will bring its blessing."

"And the silk and velvet?" queried Susan. "If meat makes my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world stands, you know. And your dress does offend Miss Nettire."

"Yes, I know; but how if eating no meat would offend a weaker brother yet more?" said Mrs. Goreout, gravely. "I like to look nice, and yet I do suppose I should have no right to trip Miss Nettire with my fashions if it were not for Frank. He declares that my good spirits and tasteful dress are the best arguments he has ever heard in favor of religion; and that he can have confidence in a piety that does not consist chiefly in asceticism, but does every thing as to God, even rejoicing and looking lovely. Miss Nettire does not need me as much as Frank. Her conversion is not at stake, while my influence over Frank depends very much on such trivial matters. But I know what I can do. I can try to be better friends with Miss Nettire. I fancy we have none of us enough of what Rosa calls 'love-charity' for her. We think too much of the prickles, and not enough of the real goodness in her character."

Miss Nettire gasped. From the solemn, benignant presence near her something like a halo seemed to shine about Mrs. Goreout. A great sob came choking into the spinster's throat.

"Go back," she said, huskily, "to Sally Nettire's house. She is the sinner whom you came to seek, and who ought to arouse all my righteous wrath. I believe now, if we could but know all, there are few for whom there is not some palliation, and no case in which we can be certain of judging a righteous judgment, and that is why God forbade us in our blindness to judge at all. I could get over the rest, but to think that such a butterfly as Maria Goreout should be doing things for Jesus' sake. I am going home to pray not to be judged as I have judged others."

CHAPTER FIFTH.

MISS NETTIRE at her window.

"I wonder why Julia Pritchard is forever in the street? I should think she had better be at home with her bedridden mother." Pulling herself up: "No, I don't! I won't think like that. Maybe she has the best of reasons."

Miss Nettire had concluded that the angel's visit was a dream, but it had left its traces. Hence a constant succession of single combats between herself and her second nature in private; in public such a reformed edition of Miss Nettire as set all Juneroseville wondering. If angels' visits were not so few, how certain other communities might be similarly benefited!

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE nine great bells which ring out the "chimes" of Trinity Church hang two hundred and eighteen feet above the sidewalk below. To citizens of New York and vicinity—for in clear weather the chimes can be heard several miles distant—these musical bells are like old friends who bring pleasant words every day, but come with specially gladsome greeting on such occasions as Christmas and New-Year's. The spire of Trinity Church, from the street level to the top of the surmounting cross, is 284 feet high. The visitors' platform, reached by over three hundred steps, is 250 feet above the ground; and pretty hard climbing is it, the last hundred feet or so being up a narrow winding stairway through a darkened tower. When, however, the visitor has recovered his spent breath, and gazes out from the high elevation, he is richly repaid by the magnificent view of the city and the suburbs, and the more distant prospect of ocean, rivers, mountains, and towns.

Five of the bells which make up the chime were brought from England in 1846; but these were not enough, and in due time four bells of American manufacture were added, and proved to be fully as satisfactory as those made on the other side of the Atlantic. Each of these bells weighs several hundred pounds. The five original ones are connected with the church clock, and perform regular duty by striking the "hours" and the "quarters." When music is to be played, these are all disconnected from the clock-work. Of course no air whose notes do not come within the range of the nine bells can be properly performed; and this range being but an octave and a quarter, only the simpler melodies can be played. Nor is the working of these huge bells any easy task, as no modern inventions have been applied to this performance at Trinity. Every note is struck by hand-power on a lever connected by a cord with the tongue of each bell. But melodiously do these old bells ring out joy-peals for Christmas, for New-Year, for Easter, and for all occasions of festivity and general rejoicing.

The Brooklyn Tabernacle, which was recently destroyed by fire, was probably the largest church in the country. It was capable of seating 3000 persons, with room in the aisles for 500 more. The building was a novelty in church architecture, the interior being semicircular, presenting the appearance of an amphitheatre, and being without a gallery. The organ, which was burned with the building, was a magnificent instrument, built for and used at the first Boston Jubilee. The fire originated, as most fires in churches do, in the furnace flues. It occurred on Sunday morning, about an hour and a half before the time for morning service. The Tabernacle was built in 1870, and enlarged in 1871.

The word critic of the Galaxy regards the common use of adverbs with the verb to look as erroneous. He says the error is the consequence of a confusion of look in the sense of to direct the eye, and look in the sense to seem, to appear. The same persons who say that a man looked wretchedly or a woman looked beautifully would not say that he seemed wretchedly or she seemed beautifully. In the phrases, he looked well, she seemed ill, well and ill are not really adverbs.

The old Roman Coliseum has witnessed many strange scenes, but none stranger than an assemblage of people, within the capacious walls of that historical building of the ancient city, seeking universal suffrage. Reports from Rome inform us that the republicans of the city were to meet in the Coliseum last month to ask the right to vote.

A French writer informs us that since 1789 there have been twelve different governments in France, each having been usurped.

It is said of Mr. Greeley that his facility for sleep at unusual times was a great blessing, and doubtless the loss of that facility in his greatest need contributed to his death. He was almost certain to catch a wink of sleep in any assemblage at any time, without regard to the occasion or the need of keeping awake. It was generally believed by his friends that he heard and saw just as well while in a nodding mood as at any other time.

"I can't vote for Greeley unless you keep him awake in church," said a gentleman to one of Mr. Greeley's friends, as Dr. Chapin's congregation was dismissed, several Sundays before the election.

"If you can tell me as much about the sermon as Mr. Greeley can," retorted the friend, "I'll vote as you wish."

He used to take a nap even at Chappaqua while eulogies of him from fiery orators of the new-born South were making the evergreens ring.

In an old book entitled The Athenian Oracle it is stated that formerly it was the custom of the monks to offer prayers for the safety of all ships that went on long voyages. Under the direction of the priest a little box was affixed to each vessel, into which the sailors put money and other valuables to secure the prayers of the church. At Christmas these boxes were opened, and hence were called "Christmas-boxes."

A Turkish princess is about to be married, and great has been the preparation for the grand event. Thirty gorgeous robes are being made by fashionable modistes—only a small part of her wardrobe, however. The wedding veil of Brussels lace cost $4000. On the day of her marriage the princess will wear not only the magnificent jewels presented by the bridegroom, but also a tiara and necklace of diamonds presented by her father, valued at $100,000. All these things are her own. She can not be deprived of them by her husband or any other person, as the Turkish law is careful to secure a wife's property. Two of her private apartments have been furnished by a Parisian upholsterer at a cost of $14,000, including the ornaments.

The Old South Church, of Boston, is to be rented to the United States government as a post-office for two years. After the expiration of that lease it is to be sold to the Massachusetts Historical Society, to be kept as a historic building in substantially its present condition, to be used as a place of occasional divine worship, and for other purposes, in accordance with the views of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

A lazy dyspeptic was bewailing his own misfortune, and congratulating his friend on his hearty appearance. "What do you do to make yourself so strong and healthy?" inquired the dyspeptic.

"Live on fruit alone," answered the friend.

"What kind of fruit?"

"The fruit of industry, and I am never troubled with indigestion."

The Journal of Health asserts that no thoughtful mother should rest until she has taught her daughters to do well the following things: to make a cup of coffee; to draw a dish of tea; to bake a loaf of bread; to cook a potato; to broil a steak or chicken; to cut, fit, and make a dress; to set a tidy table. For every woman to so understand these seven things as to be able to do them herself, or to teach others how to do them well, would bring material comfort into thousands of families.

A bone felon is a bad thing, and there are numerous so-called remedies for it. Doubtless an application which is successful in one case may, from some unknown cause, fail in another. An exchange says that a sure cure is dry rock-salt, pounded and mixed with spirits of turpentine. Put the mixture in a cloth, and wrap around the part affected, and change when it gets dry. This is said to kill the felon in twenty-four hours.

Evidently we are a pie-eating people; otherwise it could never be true, as it now is, that one great establishment in New York city manufactures daily 50,000 pies, and in an emergency can supply 15,000 additional ones. Every thing has to be on a huge scale to make up such a quantity of pies: ten immense ovens, one of which—if it can be called an oven—will bake 900 pies an hour; a range big enough to cook ten barrels of fruit at once; and 150,000 pie-plates in constant use.

The following conversation, supposed to be reported verbatim et literatim, will give an idea how perplexing our use of prepositions with verbs is to foreigners:

"I begin to understand your language better," said a Frenchman to his friend; "but your verbs trouble me still, you mix things up so with your prepositions. I saw your friend, Mrs. James, just now," continued he; "she says she intends to break down housekeeping. Am I right there?"

"Break up housekeeping, she must have said."

"Yes, I remember—break up housekeeping."

"Why does she do that?" inquired the listener.

"Because her health is so broken into."

"Broken down, you should say."

"Broken down—oh yes. And, indeed, since the small-pox has broken up in your city—"

"Broken out, you mean."

"She thinks she will leave it for a few weeks."

"Indeed! And will she close her house?"

"No; she is afraid it will be broken—broken—how do I say that?"

"Broken into."

"Certainly; it is what I meant to say."

"Is her son to be married soon?"

"No; that engagement is broken—broken—"

"Broken off."

"Ah! I had not heard that. She is very sorry about it. Her son only broke the news down to her last week. Am I right?—I am so anxious to speak the English well."

"He merely broke the news; no preposition this time."

"It is hard to understand. That young man, her son, is a fine fellow—a breaker, I think."

"A broker, and a very fine fellow. Good-day."

So much for the verb to break.

Mr. Ruskin declines to contribute for the purchase of a public park near London. He thinks the first business to be attended to for promoting the comfort of working people is to make their homes healthy and delightful. He remarks: "It will, perhaps, one of these days occur to those who are attempting to 'elevate the masses' that what the masses really require for their elevation is not 'a day in the country' occasionally, or a public park, or a museum open on Sundays, but dwellings in which they and their families may find a shelter without sinking to the level of pigs." There is no doubt of the truth of this. Still we believe the laboring classes derive great comfort and enjoyment from well-appointed public parks.

Forty-six years ago there was a known boundary line between British America and the United States along the Lake of the Woods, but all marks of it are now gone. Last August an American and an English surveying party attempted to settle this boundary. The American party started from St. Paul, Minnesota. Some weeks were spent in the survey, as well as the money appropriated to the object, but no definite result was reached.

One of the greatest griefs of Mr. Greeley's life was the death of his young son Arthur. Though this event occurred more than twenty years ago, to the end of his life Mr. Greeley made frequent allusions to it. The boy was about five when he died.

The University of Wisconsin has had a valuable addition to its library of four hundred volumes from Norway, the result of a concert given for the purpose by Ole Bull. As this library already contained about two hundred Norwegian books, the collection is a very remarkable one for this country.

Digitized by Google

CRAVAT BOW OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON.

Cravat Bow of Swiss Muslin, Lace, and Gros Grain Ribbon.

FOR this cravat cut of white Swiss muslin one piece three inches and a quarter square. On each corner of the square set a rosette of gathered lace an inch and a quarter and three-quarters of an inch wide, and trimmed in the centre with a needle-work figure. The loops and ends of pink silk ribbon are arranged as shown by the illustration, being set on the under side of the rosettes.

Cravat Bow of Crape, Lace, and Gros Grain Ribbon.

THE ends of this cravat consist of a piece of lace insertion six inches and seven-eighths long and an inch and a quarter wide, which is rounded off on the under end. This insertion is underlaid with cherry gros grain ribbon and edged all around, excepting the upper edge, with gathered lace an inch and a half wide. The seam made by setting these ends on the foundation is covered by loops of white crape two inches and a half wide, and loops and ends of cherry gros grain ribbon an inch and a quarter wide.

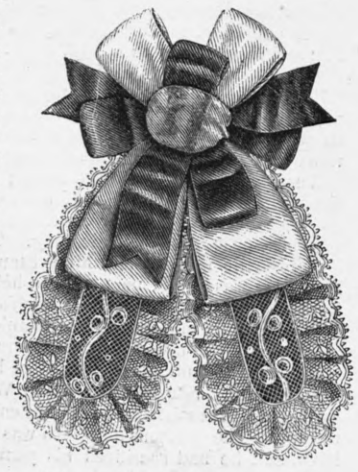
Gros Grain Evening Dress.

THIS dress, with heart-shaped basque-waist, is made of violet gros grain, and is trimmed with the material, lavender gros grain, and white lace. The waist is completed by a chemisette of lavender gros grain.

Needle-work Borders, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are especially designed for trimming bosoms of gentlemen's shirts, but may also be used for handkerchiefs, etc. They are worked on linen, Swiss muslin, or batiste with fine embroidery cotton. The border shown in Fig. 1 is worked in straight half-polka and back stitch. The border, Fig. 2, is worked in satin and diagonal half-polka stitch and in back stitch and point Russe, in the manner shown by the illustration.

GROS GRAIN EVENING DRESS.



CRAVAT BOW OF CRAPE, LACE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON.

did remuneration for very scanty services. We know of a medical man whose duty it is to take lunch every day at a great castle belonging to a noble lord. The household is immense; and there is just the chance that there may be some case of indisposition demanding attention. He gets some of the best company and best lunches in England, and duly charges a guinea for each attendance. There is a very wealthy man near a great city who can not bear to be left for the night. There is a physician of great ability who drives out of town nightly to sleep at his residence; he is consequently debarred evening society, and if he goes out to dinner he has to leave his friends before wine. He has to charge his patient a thousand a year; and, I think, he works hard for his money. Sometimes the services are such that money can not repay them. A friend of mine, a young medicus, had a standing engagement of four hundred a year to look after the health of an old lady. She required to be inspected three times a day, and make an exhibition of tongue and pulse. What made matters so aggravating was, that she was as strong as a horse, while the doctor was a delicate man. She was so selfish and perverse that he was obliged to tell her that he would have nothing to do with her case. Similarly, I know the son of a rich man who proposed to pay a clergyman several hundred pounds a year for leave to spend his evenings with him. The parson, however, was obliged to tell his rich friend that he talked such intolerable twaddle that he could not accept his company on any terms that could be named. But the oddest of these arrangements is the following. A medical man has been attending a patient several years, and yet he has never seen his patient. The gentleman firmly believes that he has an esophagus of peculiar construction, and that he is accordingly liable at any moment to be choked. That help may be at hand whenever any sudden emergency may occur, he has a physician in the house night and day. The physician being human, must needs take his walks abroad, and it becomes necessary to provide a substitute for him two hours a day. Accordingly a doctor attends

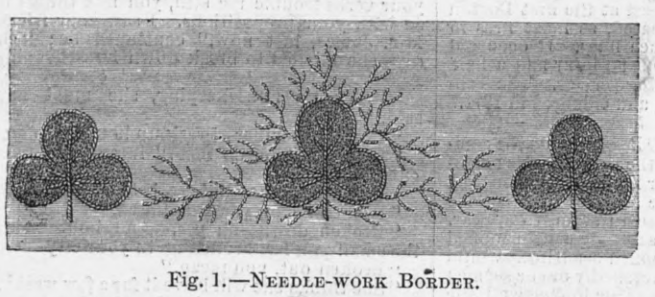


Fig. 1.—NEEDLE-WORK BORDER.

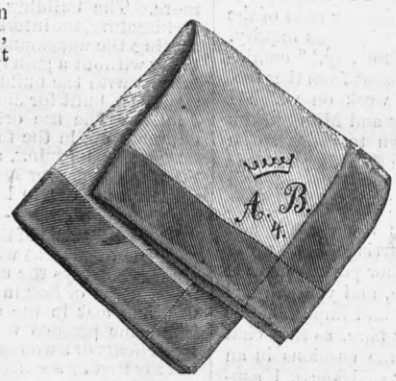

GENTLEMAN'S BATISTE AND FOULARD HANDKERCHIEF.

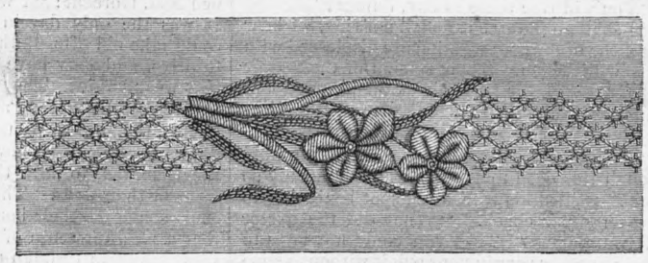

Fig. 2.—NEEDLE-WORK BORDER.

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.—FRONT.

Gentleman's Batiste and Foulard Handkerchief.

THIS white batiste handkerchief is trimmed on the edge with a strip of scarlet foulard three inches and a quarter wide, which is stitched on at the corners. The monogram is worked with scarlet silk.

Gros Grain Dress with Basque-Waist, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS dress with double skirt and basque-waist is made of olive gros grain. The trimming consists of box-pleated ruffles of the material and of bows, bands, and folds of a darker shade of velvet. Sash of similar velvet.

ENGLISH DOCTORS.

THE curiosities of medical life and practice are endless. If we hear very often of medical men doing arduous work for very scanty remuneration, sometimes there is an agreeable obverse of receiving very splen-

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.—BACK.

Hosted by Google

daily from twelve to two, fills up his time by disposing of an admirable lunch, and finds the gold and silver coin, in their usual happy combination, neatly put by the side of his plate, in tissue-paper. Up to the present date he has never had the pleasure of exchanging words with his interesting patient, who finds comfort in the certainty of having a doctor always in readiness for the expected crisis.

and saved from utter obscurity numberless true geniuses who, but for their aid, would have died unrenowned, perhaps even unconscious of the talent dormant within them, but have instilled into the national mind that proverbial taste and elegance which the French so conspicuously display in all branches of art workmanship. Public art instruction in Paris is wholly gratuitous, from the initiatory schools where the student, hardly thanks to the free schools, rich and poor compete with equal chances. In addition to this there are private schools innumerable, held something after the fashion of philosophers of old, by artists of renown, who for a small sum (usually about $5 per month) from each of their pupils give them the daily use of a studio, a model, and their advice and instruction. In these cases many of the poor students pay nothing, M. Cogniet having seen a boyish sketch of his in a primary school, and recognizing his innate talent. Again, other masters lend their services to classes conducted by the pupils themselves on the strictest communistic principles. A studio is hired, a model secured, by a treasurer, called a massier, elected by themselves, and at the end of each week the cost of the whole is divided among the members, the treasurer him-

ART STUDENTS COPYING PICTURES AT THE LOUVRE, PARIS.

ART STUDENTS COPYING PICTURES AT THE LOUVRE.

AMONG the many artistic benefits which Louis XIV. conferred on his country, none were of more importance than the foundation of the first of those schools of art which, rendering the best instruction available to the poorest student, have not only brought to light in his teens, and in many cases younger still, learns the "rudiments," to the Academy at Rome, where, after a course of competitive examinations, he enjoys a four years' scholarship in the home of Raphael and Michael Angelo. In the primary schools a five-franc entrance fee is all that is required to obtain admission, but to enter the École des Beaux Arts a competitive examination is necessary, at which, however, ing whatever, the master feeling that he—himself elevated to his position by the kindly aid of others—is only discharging a moral debt of gratitude by thus in his turn assisting the needy. One well-known French painter, the master of Meissonnier, M. Léon Cogniet, has had as many as forty free out of a class of sixty pupils, and one French artist, now of some celebrity, was ten years with him without paying a single pen-self paying nothing in consideration of his trouble. The master drops in about three times a week, looks at each pupil's work, praises or blames as occasion requires, and should the student have some important work on hand at home, promises to pay him a visit and give him his advice and criticism. Another advantage the Parisian student possesses is the facility afforded him for studying and copying the chefs-d'œuvre of sculpture and painting in the collections of the Luxembourg and the Louvre; and here is the subject of our illustration. Not, however, that all those copyists who, perched on high stools or singular and frail-looking scaffoldings, are so familiar to the Parisian visitor, are to be classed among students. By no means. That venerable dame in the foreground is a copyist in every sense of the word, and after a life of toil now only earns a seamstress's wages, at most three or four francs a day. The old gentleman belongs to quite another category, which forms no inconsiderable part of the Louvre copyists—namely, the retired bourgeois who has made a fortune in soap and sugar, or maybe on the Bourse, and now devotes his days to les arts, and hangs his villa at Meudon or Fontainebleau with his productions. Of yet another class is the young damsel on the screened platform. She is a child of talent—at least so her friends tell her, and so she fancies—and thinking she has only to will to rival Rubens (it is in the Rubens Room that our sketch was taken), whose picture she is copying, spends three-quarters of her time in flirting with her masculine acquaintances. The girl to the left is a true student, and, working diligently, never looks to the right nor the left of her task till the stroke of four puts an end to her labors for the day. Students are allowed to copy at the Louvre every day, barring Sunday and Monday, on which latter day the rooms undergo a course of sweeping and cirèing, though a favored few are even then allowed to remain.

As we have said, the acme of every student's ambition is the Prix de Rome. Roman scholarships are awarded every year to the best students in painting, architecture, sculpture, and music; biennially for engraving on copper; and quintennially for engraving on precious stones. At the end of their term students are bound to send home for exhibition some original work, which is invariably purchased by the government. Besides being furnished with every requisite by the state, the prizeman is allowanced, so that in many cases he saves money. The well-known painter Ingrès, indeed, saved sufficient to enable him to stay in Rome double the usual time.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Hepworth Dixon and the Pall Mall.—The Trial at Bar.—Recent Millionaires.

THE great libel case of Dixon v. Smith has at last come off in our Court of Common Pleas, and produced all the excitement which I foretold for it months ago in your columns. The declaration charged that the defendant had falsely and maliciously printed and published about the plaintiff, in the Pall Mall Gazette of the 18th of May, 1870, an article commencing: "We have received from Mr. Hepworth Dixon another of those insolent, ingenious letters with which he contrives to puff his books—obscene, inaccurate, or both—as soon as they appear. Nobody knows better than Mr. Dixon that to 'make a racket' (as they call it who employ the expedient) is the best of all ways of promoting its sale, and obviously the more worthless a book is, and the greater its dependence for commercial success on being pushed into all the libraries before its real merits are made known, the more desirable is this 'racket.' Mr. Dixon's letters to the papers show him to be a master of the art; indeed, we are almost inclined to think that he is wrong aforethought and indecent on purpose, so that opportunities for 'Letters to the Editor' may arise, and the name of Mr. Dixon's books and Mr. Dixon's own name may be kept in the papers for a while."

A further libel was alleged as having appeared in the Pall Mall of August, 1871, stating that "Mr. Hepworth Dixon made his first appearance on Saturday in St. George's Hall in the character of the Shakers' friend.....He spoke of the 'beautiful Eden' produced by Shakerism, which seemed to be, according to Elder Evans, 'the holding of wives in common,' and was 'nothing more than Quakerism divested of its ordinations relative to the giving and taking in marriage.' Of course Mr. Dixon and the Shakers can fraternize in public if they choose; but it is surely a strange and almost incredible irony to find a writer who is best known as a successful compiler of obscene literature and vamped-up travels announced as the presiding genius at the London festival in honor of Scott."

Mr. Sergeant Parry, who, with the exception of Mr. Sergeant Ballantyne, is supposed to be the best criminal advocate in England, appeared for the plaintiff, and Sir John Karslake, the late Tory Solicitor-General, for the defendant. The court, which was crowded nearly to suffocation throughout the proceedings, presented a most unwonted appearance; for instead of the huge tomes of law-books that are generally to be seen on the desks of the counsel and of the judge, there were piles of butterfly-looking volumes in green and gold, the more select works—such as Her Majesty's Tower—of the plaintiff, put in in evidence that he was not best known as "a successful compiler of obscene literature and vamped-up travels." Of course the chief reliance of the defendant was placed upon the book called Spiritual Wives, which, on the other hand, was by no means the pièce de résistance of the plaintiff, whose advocate, instead of defending it, frankly admitted that it was a pity that Mr. Dixon had ever published it; and certainly Sir John Karslake contrived to raise the hair of the wigless portion of his audience by his quotations from that volume. But by far the most amusing portion of Mr. Dixon's cross-examination was that which referred to his Free Russia. As to his finding beavers in the Ural Mountains, he confessed that he had not found any there himself, but only heard of their being found; he had not seen Tonks, in Siberia, though he had described it as "a charming spot." He had certainly described Perm as "a suburb" of Kazan, whereas they were 1100 miles apart; but then all things were comparative, and some people called Brighton a suburb of London. His book had stated that "in this empire of villages there is a force of 610,000 parish priests; "but that," he said, "was an obvious misprint for 61,000." "Nay," said Sir John, "but it is not put in figures; it is printed at length." "Nevertheless," answered Mr. Dixon, "it is a clerical error."

Curiously enough, neither the advocate nor the audience seemed to perceive the aptness of the term "clerical" to an error that multiplied the priesthood of Russia by ten; but there was plenty of amusement in the trial adapted to every capacity, the effects of which were apparent in the reiterated cries of "Silence!" from the ushers.

After four days' trial, chiefly occupied with unsavory quotations, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages one farthing. Mr. Hepworth Dixon will therefore have to pay his own costs, unless (which is not likely) the public should subscribe the money. The writer of the articles in the Pall Mall did not put in an appearance, but he is supposed to be Mr. Sutherland Edwards, who, having, as it were, a vested right in exhibiting Russia to the British public, was doubtless indignant with "Perm, a suburb of Kazan," and the beauty imputed to the locality of Tonks. Of course every body is greatly pleased at the discomfiture of the plaintiff, who is by no means the idol of society, and the press in particular is jubilant over the victory, or what is equivalent to it, of the Pall Mall. But although I quite admit that Mr. Dixon deserves not a whit more than the damages which have been awarded to him, it is nevertheless clear to me that there was a personal animus in the articles complained of over and above the passionate zeal for morality claimed (by Sir John) for the writer. Almost all our literary newspapers, indeed, are "cliquey," and have their favorites and aversions. Of every popular author it would not be difficult to predicate in which quarter he would receive praise and in which censure, quite independent of the merits of his production. A curious instance of this occurred a few years ago with respect to the very paper over which Mr. Dixon once presided—the Athenæum. A well-known novelist of my acquaintance, whose works had been habitually attacked in that journal, laid a wager that he would obtain a favorable review from it for his next story, without taking any steps to secure the same by means of remonstrance or social bribery of any kind. The bet was accepted, and the novel, which was in other quarters by no means so much applauded as his usual productions, received a panegyric from the Athenæum. This result was obtained by the simple method of publishing it anonymously.

The Tichborne case, on account of the length of time it threatens to occupy, is prorogued to Easter, when it will be tried at bar. A "trial at bar" is a very unusual proceeding, and, as I believe, has not happened in this country since O'Connell was so tried in Ireland. It is tried before three judges instead of one. Poor Lady Doughty (against whose daughter the claimant made so infamous an assertion) lately died. Both sides sent their counsel in order to take her dying depositions. Imagine the distress that must have been caused to the poor lady at such a time in having her mind disturbed by entering into what this impudent impostor calls "the merits" of his case. Yet only the other night I met one of his late counsel, who assured us that he was not more certain of any thing in this world than that the claimant was the real Sir Roger. "I hope, at all events," remarked one who was present, "that your faith in that which is to come has better grounds."

A philosophic journal has just favored us with a list of the great capitalists that have died within the last ten years in this country. Ten persons have left behind them more than the conventional million—some of them many millions; fifty-three have died worth £500,000; and one hundred and sixty-one worth £200,000; and all this is mere "personalty," exclusive of much larger fortunes invested in land. Such "personalties" are only too agreeable to all of us; yet it would be worth while to lay to heart the cynical but pregnant observation of the poet Rogers when told of a man who had died worth half a million, "And a very pretty sum to begin the next world with, too."

In my last gossip I told you that the London police had "struck." Emboldened, I suppose, by this sign of sympathy, the thieves have broken into the Lord Mayor's country-house, and stolen heaps of jewels and his lordship's order of the Medjidie, conferred on him by the Sultan. What will they do with it? Persons in danger of having foreign honors thrust upon them please take notice.

You have not read The Unwritten Book, perhaps; nor have I. Whether it has merit or not as Desultory Colloquies on the Poets (which is its second title), I know not, therefore; but it has certainly a claim to originality in its having been "set up" by the author himself in type without the intervention of pen and ink. This is sad, and may produce even worse authors than we have, as setting an example of "composing" without even learning one's "pot-hooks and hangers."

Mrs. Somerville, the great lady mathematician, has died at Naples, at an age that takes some knowledge of arithmetic to compute. She wrote some interesting scientific papers respecting the last eruption of Mount Vesuvius at the age of ninety-one!

You will be glad, but I hope not surprised, to hear that Sergeant Bates concluded his expedition with the star-bespangled banner in triumph by his arrival at Guildhall. So far from "insulting" him, the populace took out his horses (for he drove through town, though the rest of his journey was performed on foot) in Bond Street, and dragged the carriage along Piccadilly. So the Britishers are not so "riled" by your arbitration successes after all.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

THE THREE GRACES.

A MADRIGAL.

TELL me, little trembling rose,
Thou whose sweet, coy crimson glows
Where her lilies, chaste and pale,
Mutely tell their pensive tale—
What your name, and whence you came?
Whence your glory or your shame!

Tell me, faint Æolian moan,
Thou whose plaintive monotone,
Like the widowed dove's at night,
Chides a cheerful chirp's delight—
What your name, and whence your pain?
Why that trouble in your strain?

Tell me, brilliant, pure and clear,
Loath to leave thy purer sphere—
Some dumb sorrow's darkened plight
Broke in poetry and light—
What thy name, thy pleading charm?
Who could do thee any harm?

Blush am I; but by-and-by,
If I live, they'll call me Sigh.
I'm a sigh; but if I grow,
Tear they'll name me, for my woe.
Call me Tear, dear, if I move
Thee to pity—if I prove
Wanton vanity above.
I was Blush once; I was Sigh;
I'll be Memory by-and-by.
—But our sorrow's name is Love!

TO THE BITTER END.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "THE LOVELS OF ARDEN," "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XLV.—(Continued.)

"BY THE SAME MADNESS STILL MADE BLIND."

JOHN WORT looked at him for some minutes in silent wonder, biting his nails doubtfully. No one but a raging madman would have talked like this, surely; and yet this man was perfectly calm and collected, and spoke with an air of conviction that was more strange than the fact of his guilt.

"Good God! Rick Redmayne," he exclaimed at last, with a groan, "what have you done?"

"Killed the man who killed my daughter. You call it murder: I call it justice."

"Why, you don't even know that it was this man poor Gracey went away with."

"Don't I? What, not when he sent her his likeness? when he was the only man that ever had the opportunity of so much as ten minutes' talk with her? Why, this man lived in my house above a month; he was the only gentleman my Gracey knew—d—n him! Come, John Wort, you were a good friend to me in years gone by; speak the truth like a man. Have you any doubt that it was this fellow who tempted my girl away?"

"No," replied the steward, emphatically, "I have not!"

And then after a pause he went on:

"He's dead, and it can't matter now. You've done your worst. Nothing would have wrung the admission out of me if he were still alive. I did suspect him of taking Grace away, and taxed him with it, as I told you long ago. He denied it—I told you the truth when I said that—but I never believed his denial. There was no one else. She was not a girl to have two lovers, and I had seen those two together one day at Clevedon. But he was such a steady-going fellow, and I thought he might be trusted. I'd known him from a boy, and had never known any harm of him; and there were circumstances in his life, family matters, that made me pity him. Upon my soul, Rick, I don't think I could have been more sorry for what happened if Gracey had been my own daughter. But oh, old friend, for God's sake say there was no meaning in your wild talk just now. It was not you who fired that gun last night—Joseph Flood's gun. How should you have come by it?"

"The fellow was loafing about the park with it late last night. I thought that he was up to mischief, somehow, and I followed him a bit, and saw him hide his gun in that old summer-house. It was within reach of my arm when I saw him coming along the avenue, with the moonlight full upon his face. The devil put it in my way handy."

"You must have been mad when you did it."

"Not any madder than I am now. It may have been a wild kind of justice, but I meant it for justice."

Mr. Wort groaned once more, and sat down upon the raggedest of the office-stools in blank, dismal despair.

"What do you mean by coming here to tell me this, Richard Redmayne?" he inquired, helplessly. "A pretty pickle you put me in! There's that poor innocent young man in the lock-up hard by: as an honest man, it would be my duty to inform against you."

"Do your duty," answered the farmer, coolly. "I came here on purpose to give myself in charge."

"You did? And do you know what that means?—Maidstone jail for the next six weeks, to be tried for your life at the next assizes, and to be hung. Oh, Rick, Rick, to think that any man of your name should come to such an end as that!"

Richard Redmayne shrugged his shoulders with a gesture that was nonchalant enough, but accompanied by a faint sigh.

"It's hard lines," he said. "Heaven knows I've tried to keep that name honest. When I was in debt hereabouts I felt as if I was scorched through and through with a red-hot branding-iron, because no Redmayne of Brierwood had ever owed money he couldn't pay before my time. I worked hard, and wiped off that stain. But I suppose, when I'm dead and gone, the world will think worse of this business. And yet, John Wort, I'm not sorry that I killed him. I was sorry enough, ready to blow my brains out, when I thought I'd shot the wrong man. But, by the heaven above me, I do not repent of having killed my daughter's destroyer!"

"Good God, Richard, what a hardened conscience you must have!"

"I don't know any thing about my conscience, but I know I've been hardening my heart against that man for the last three years, and it wasn't likely I should deal overgently with him when his time came. I hunted for him as well as I could; but I'm not good at that kind of hunting, and when I failed in that I thought I'd wait. There's a fate in these things. Providence would throw him in my path sooner or later: the world is hardly wide enough to hide a man long from the just wrath of his enemy. So I bided my time quietly enough, but never parted with the hope that I should find him before I died. And when chance did throw him across my path, what would you have had me do?" asked Richard Redmayne, with a sardonic laugh. "Civilly tell him who I was, I suppose, and ask him to apologize for having broken my heart? No. I have dreamed of our meeting often enough, and all my dreams were colored with blood. Why, I have felt my grip upon his lying throat many a time, and have seen his false face change and darken as my grasp tightened."

"You have nursed your hatred until it has grown into a monomania, Richard. You could hardly have been answerable for what you did last night."

"I was answerable: and I am ready to answer to God and man."

"'Vengeance is mine,'" murmured the steward. "Don't seek to justify your sin in the eyes of God, Richard, but try to obtain His pardon. I don't want to preach a sermon to you; it's hard enough to be placed in such a situation as yours, and I don't believe there ever was a man more to be pitied. I only say this—don't take pride in a stubborn heart, Richard. It's wiser to own yourself a sinner."

"I'll think of squaring that account by-and-by," answered the other, in his reckless way; "that can stand over. I want to set matters right about that young man they've sent to prison. I want to take my burden on my own shoulders."

Mr. Wort leaned his elbow on his desk, buried his face in his hands, and cogitated profoundly, while Richard Redmayne coolly refilled his pipe, and lighted it at the office lamp.

What was he to do? Give this man into the custody of the patrol from Tunbridge who nightly perambulated the peaceful shades of Kingsbury—pass him on to the jail where Joseph Flood now lay in durance? Do this with the certainty—or something very close to certainty—that he was handing his old friend over to a shameful doom? John Wort felt as if he could not do this thing.

Was there no way of escape?—no way by which Richard Redmayne could get clear off, and yet release young Flood from his present peril? Might he not draw up a full confession of his guilt, get his signature attested by some one who would not know the real nature of the document, and then start for Australia, leaving his confession behind him? That would surely exculpate Joseph Flood, and yet leave the guilty man a chance of life and liberty. Mr. Wort was a man who respected the law and all its mysteries, but it did not appear to him that the world in general would be any better for the hanging of Richard Redmayne. He had also a just appreciation of the penalties to which an accessory after the fact would be liable; but he fancied he might suggest his friend's escape without incurring these. There was no money involved in the transaction, nor need the world ever know that he was cognizant of Richard Redmayne's crime.

"Look here, Rick," he said at last. "There's no one can think worse of what you've done than I do; but I know more of what's gone before than the rest of the world, and I won't be the man to hand you over to the hangman."

And then Mr. Wort went on to suggest, very clearly and concisely, that line of conduct which it seemed to him Richard might safely adopt.

"If they hunt you down at last," he said, in conclusion—"and they'll hardly do that, for you can get a good start of them—why, you'll have had a run for your life anyhow."

"No," said the farmer, quietly; "I've done the deed, and I'll stand by it. It doesn't seem half so bad to me to stand in the dock now that I know I killed the right man. I'll face the world, John Wort, and let the world know how a man can punish the destroyer of his child. By heavens, if there were more such rough-and-ready justice in the world, there would be less villainy. The law's a big machine that only moves in a certain groove. Let a man steer clear of that, and he may be as big a scoundrel as he pleases."

"What do you mean to do, then?"

"Give myself over to the police as soon as I leave this office. I thought you would have been in a hurry to do it for me; but as you're not, I suppose I must do it myself."

There was farther parley after this, but Mr. Wort's arguments were of no avail. Richard Redmayne went out into the summer night, and walked along the Tunbridge road till he met the patrol, to whom he told his story.

Digitized by Google

The man was at first incredulous. He knew Mr. Redmayne by sight, and had heard people talk of the strange, secluded life he led at Brierwood. The poor fellow was a little off his head, no doubt, thought the policeman; but finding the poor fellow very resolute, he suggested that they should proceed forthwith to Clevedon—Sir Francis was a justice of the peace—and that Mr. Redmayne should there repeat his extraordinary statement.

It was late when they arrived at Clevedon; but Sir Francis was still in his study, with a London detective for his companion. This man had only arrived an hour before, his services not having been available at the moment the telegram arrived; and to this man Sir Francis had been relating all that Georgie had told him about Richard Redmayne.

"A curious story," remarked Mr. Winch, the detective, coolly; "and it certainly does seem at the first glimpse to have a bearing on the case. Yet it hardly comes to much when taken against the evidence of the gun, which Flood owns to; and of that girl he's been keeping company with, who, from what I can hear of the inquest, seems to have done him no end of harm with her hysterics, and her talk about his jealousy, and being afraid of him, and so on. It does not appear, from any thing you tell me, that this Redmayne threatened violence toward you while under that delusion about the miniature; and unless he had threatened, the rest comes to nothing."

"A man may mean a good deal without threatening," said Sir Francis; "and you see in this case there has been a wrong done, and there was a strong motive. Lady Clevedon said the man had a desperate air, like a man who was capable of any rash act."

"But how did he come by your groom's gun? How do you get over the gun, Sir?"

"I leave that problem for you to solve. All I can say is that I know this Flood to be a good fellow; he's been with me only a twelvemonth, certainly, but I know something of his disposition, and he came to me with an excellent character from a gentleman near here. No, I can not believe Joseph Flood to be an assassin."

The Baronet and Mr. Winch were still discussing the details of the case when a servant announced that a policeman, accompanied by another person, wished to see Sir Francis.

"Bring them in immediately," said Sir Francis. "Some new evidence, I suppose," he added, to the detective.

"Yes, Sir," replied Mr. Winch, with a sarcastic air; "no doubt you'll have plenty of mare's-nests brought you by the local police."

The job was a good one, and the accomplished Winch did not wish the local police to cut the ground from under his feet by any abnormal sharpness and activity.

Richard Redmayne walked first into the room, alone, unshackled, with his head more erect than he had carried it for a long time; a noble specimen of the English yeoman class, with something of the free grace of some wild forest creature in his bearing, which was even more noble than the sturdy British ruggedness. He was a handsome man still, in spite of the change and ruin that had come upon him; and as he stood calmly facing Sir Francis in the lamp-light, with only the table between them, the Baronet thought that he had never beheld a more striking figure.

He guessed at once that this man must be Richard Redmayne.

The policeman told his story briefly, but with a good many "he says," and "I says," to carry him through it.

"And as you was the nearest magistrate, Sir Francis, and concerned in this business, as one may say, begging your pardon, Sir Francis, I thought as how I'd better bring him along here; and if you see any grounds for believing this 'ere rum start, why, you could make out a warrant and commit him. I could get a cart and drive him over to Tunbridge for to-night, and he can go on to Maidstone to-morrow; leastways, if you think there's any truth in his story."

"I have reason to know that his story is perfectly true," said Sir Francis, filling in the warrant as he spoke. "Abominable as his crime is, I am glad that he has at least had enough good feeling left to prompt him to give himself up, rather than let an innocent man suffer for his wickedness."

"Yes, Sir Francis," replied the policeman, looking at Richard Redmayne with a lenient countenance; "and I hope as how that, and the fack of him and his having farmed their own land for the last three hundred year, will stand in his favior with the judge and jury."

The guilty man himself spoke not a word, but stood quietly waiting to be handed on upon the next stage of that brief journey which was to convey him to the gallows.

"I should be glad if you would repeat the statement which you made just now to the officer, Mr. Redmayne, here in the presence of witnesses."

The man obeyed unhesitatingly, telling his story in the plainest words, with no attempt to extenuate his conduct.

"A bad business from beginning to end," said Sir Francis, with a sigh. "You can remove your prisoner, officer. My people will accommodate you with a conveyance, and you can take a groom to Tunbridge with you, if you want one."

"Better let me go, Sir Francis," interposed Mr. Winch. "I'm better up to this kind of business than a groom, I rose from the ranks myself, sergeant."

Not a word more was said. The information was made out, and the warrant granted. Richard Redmayne waited with Mr. Winch in a lobby adjoining the housekeeper's room while a dog-cart was being got ready for his speedy transport to Tunbridge. They drove at a smart pace through the moon-lit country, every inch whereof was so familiar to the prisoner. He sat beside the driver with folded arms, silently watching the landscape as it sped past him; as if, looking on hill and valley, coppice and hedge-row, for the last time, he would fain have printed every feature of the scene upon his memory, as a picture which he might keep in his mind to brighten the gloom of his narrow cell.

Fear he had none, nor remorse, as yet; but he had a vague feeling that it was sad to turn his back upon so fair a world; to lose the glory of summer sunshine and the freshness of summer winds forever.

CHAPTER XLVI.

"HOME THEY BROUGHT HER WARRIOR DEAD."

THEY carried all that remained of Hubert Harcross back to Mastodon Crescent—secretly, under cover of night, as befitted so solemn a transit. They set up the ponderous treble coffin on trestles in that darksome den behind the dining-room, which was filled for the most part with law-books and Parliamentary reports—the dismal chamber where the dead man had been wont to spend solitary hours in the stillest watch of the night.

They brought him home stealthily, when Mastodon Crescent was wrapped in sleep—that sleep of care-takers and lonely house-maids which falls upon western London out of the season. They brought him home and laid him in this darkened study, there to wait the final journey to the Vallory vault at Kensal Green, a grim square stone edifice nearly as large as a modern villa, with an iron door of an Egyptian design that was eminently suggestive of mummies.

Mrs. Harcross came home the day after this midnight journey. Georgie and Sir Francis had done their uttermost to persuade her to remain at Clevedon, but in vain.

"You are very kind to wish it, but I would rather be with him," she said, piteously; as if there were indeed as much companionship between herself and that clay-cold corpse as there had been when those two were living man and wife.

Georgie would have gone to London to stay with her, but this offer too Mrs. Harcross declined.

"Indeed, I would rather be alone; nothing can make my loss any less, or make me think of it any less."

Her father had arrived at Clevedon by this time, having sped thither as swiftly as his gout would suffer him to speed; and under her father's escort Mrs. Harcross left Clevedon Hall to return to that splendid mansion which had been the cheerless home of her brief wedded life.

It was a dreary journey and a dreary business altogether for Mr. Vallory, and although he was sincerely attached to his daughter, he would gladly have deputed the task to Weston, who was languishing to be useful, and deeply wounded by his cousin's refusal to see him: a lengthy journey, although they traveled express, and shot the stations swift as a falling-star. Augusta sat silent, with slow tears rolling down her pale cheeks every now and then. Once or twice Mr. Vallory made some feeble attempt to comfort; but the dead man's untimely end not coming in any way under the category of happy releases, he was sorely put to it to shape even the tritest consolatory sentence.

Across the dull agony of Augusta's grief there shot the sting of a sharper anguish—the biting pain of remorse. True that she had loved the dead man as deeply after her own nature as wife ever loved husband, but she had not the less cheated him of his due, locked her love in her own breast, starved him with cold words and disdainful looks, kept him at arms-length as it were, lest in coming too near he should discover that she was a very woman at best.

She had cheated him; that was the cruel truth which came home to her now. She had been proud of him, but had never acknowledged her pride; had paid him none of that tender tribute of praise and even sweet-savored flattery which loving women give to their husbands, the humble flowers of speech which strew the path matrimonial, as village children scatter their blossoms before the feet of bridegroom and bride. Every man is more or less godlike in his own estimation, and the world must seem cold to that unappreciated hero for whom no altar fire burns at home. Hubert Harcross had been made to do without such domestic homage. If he came home to Mastodon Crescent glowing with a professional victory, and in a moment of expansion communicated the particulars of his success, no rapture beamed in the eyes of his wife, no sympathetic word encouraged him to dilate upon his triumph; he was only told that that odious court had made him late for dinner, or that he had only half an hour to dress if he meant to keep his engagement in Portman Square.

She remembered these trifles and many other details of her married life to-day as she traveled swiftly toward that worse than empty house where her dead husband was lying. She remembered that interview in the picture-gallery at Clevedon Hall, when he had told her the secret of his life; remembered with a bitter pang how she had refrained from any expression of pity for him, and thought only of herself, and compassionated only herself, as if the great wrong done to him had been only a wrong against her. It was a bitter thing to reckon these small injustices, these petty slights, now, when the victim of them had passed beyond the reach of apology or atonement. Down to the grave must she carry this burden of a great debt; farther than the grave she could not look. She was a religious woman, in a church-going, strictly conforming sense, but she was not spiritual enough to be able to say, "We shall meet in a fair far-off land, where he will read my heart and forgive me."

Very stately was the funeral which for one brief hour enlivened the emptiness of Mastodon Crescent. All that can be done by sable plumes and costly trappings, by solemn-visaged mutes and inky-hued Flemish horses, by mourning coaches and close-shuttered broughams, was done to do honor to the dead. Augusta Harcross could not be dissuaded from accompanying her husband in that last journey. She went with her father in the first of the mourning-coaches, silent, ashy pale, but tearless. She stood beside the vault of the Vallorys, and saw the massive oaken coffin deposited in its stony niche, and looked at the empty place beside it, where she might lie when her time should come.

And so ended the story of her married life. She went home desolate to that abode of horrors, a spacious and splendid mansion where "love, domestic love, no longer nestles;" went home to find the blinds drawn up, open windows admitting the summer air, the rooms and balconies bright with flowers; a smirking pretense that there had been no such thing as a death in the family palpable every where.

A strange fancy seized her when she had sent her father home to Acropolis Square to nurse his gout, and had thus got rid of his clumsy attempts at consolation—a fancy for looking at the dead man's rooms on the third floor, the very thought whereof in this day of remorse had been one of her small tortures. Those third-floor rooms were one of the many trivial slights she had put upon him, one of the little ways by which she had suffered him and the household to know that he was only a secondary personage in that establishment.

She went up the servants' staircase, a roomy staircase enough—for every thing in this stately district was built on wide lines—but of a somewhat chilling aspect, the stairs covered with floor-cloth, the walls painted a dingy drab. She went up to the spacious chamber which she had so rarely entered during her husband's lifetime. It was not a cheerful room: the windows on this story had been designed with a view to external effect; the sills were breast-high, the lower panes of plate-glass obscured by the stone cornice outside them. There was plenty of light, but the windows revealed nothing of the outer world, only three patches of summer sky, no glimpse of verdant park or cheerful squares. The room was large and bare. Mr. Harcross had repudiated all finery. A huge metal bath occupied one end, with all its works and pipes exposed like a skeleton clock. There was a barren desert of floor-cloth, a low, wide mahogany wardrobe, full of long, narrow drawers (for the presiding genius of the tailoring art has discovered that to hang a coat is destruction); one cushionless oak arm-chair stood before the dressing-table, a chair of the severest school of upholstery—such a chair as Canute the Dane may have sat in when he put his flatterers to the blush on the edge of Southampton Water; two grim rows of boots on a stand masked the fire-place, half a dozen railway time-tables and a legal almanac adorned the space above the mantel-piece; picture, or bronze, or bust, or object of luxury there was none.

Augusta seated herself in the arm-chair, and looked round the room drearily. For how many conventional dinner-parties, for how many joyless receptions, Hubert Harcross had dressed himself in this room! How often and how often had he mounted that cheerless stair and put on the regulation costume when it would have suited his humor so much better to dine at home and to dawdle away a lazy evening after his own pleasure, sleeping a little, reading a little, enjoying the rare privilege of rest! How often had he gone up to that room to dress feeling like a slave at a wheel, grinding on forever!

It was not possible that Augusta could fully comprehend how joyless this life of fashionable pleasure had been to him; but she did know that she had often insisted on his going out when he would rather have remained at home, that she had squared his days and hours by the rule and compass of her particular world, that she had never let him live his own life.

Very bitter is the memory of such small injuries when the victim of them lies dead.

Her eyes wandered slowly about the room that was so strange to her. The sparsely furnished chamber had no strong individuality of its own; it was not a room which even hinted at the history of its last occupant; there were no scattered evidences of his favorite pursuits, no traces of his presence. It was a room entirely without litter, and it is litter which most bespeaks the character of the tenant. You may read the history of a household on a dust-heap sometimes better than in the bric-à-brac of a carefully arranged drawing-room.

"The room is like himself," Augusta thought: "it tells nothing of his life."

On one side of the fire-place there were three or four trunks and portmanteaus, one iron-clamped box, much larger than the rest—a shabby, much-battered receptacle, decorated with the dignified labels of various railway companies—the very box in which Hubert Walgrave had carried his books to Brierwood. On this massive chest Augusta's eyes lingered thoughtfully.

"I dare say he kept his papers in that," she said to herself—"old letters, secrets perhaps: a man who told so little must have had secrets."

She took a bunch of keys from her pocket, and looked at them with a faint and bitter smile; the dead man's keys, on a ring with his name and address engraved upon it, each key distinguished by a neat ivory label.

"If he had any secrets, they are all in my power now," she thought. "Or was that one secret of his birth the only thing he ever kept from me? Whatever papers he has left, I had better examine and burn them. I don't want all the world to know my husband's history."

She moved a couple of empty portmanteaus which surmounted the iron-clamped box, and then knelt down before it and opened it.

There were no papers in that capacious chest. Only a tangle of unmade silk dresses and cashmere shawls, French slippers, ivory-backed hair-brushes, daintily carved by the cunning hand of some Chinese artisan, fans, scenting bottles, packets of primrose and lavender gloves—the things Mr. Walgrave had bought years ago for Grace Redmayne.

Mrs. Harcross dragged these objects out of the chest one by one, at arms-length, as if the very touch of them might have defiled her, and flung them in a heap on the floor. What did they mean? None of them had been used. They were tumbled and injured from rough packing, but all unworn. No scrap of paper, no vestige of letter or memorandum, helped to solve the mystery. There was nothing but this confusion of woman's clothing, a multitude of delicate and costly objects crammed pell-mell into a big box.

Having cast them forth in this way, Mrs. Harcross was presently obliged to put them back again. It would never do for the prying eyes of Tullion or of any domestic in that house to rest upon those inscrutable silks and slippers and cashmeres and hair-brushes. She thrust them back into the chest, leaving them if possible in a worse condition than the state in which she had found them, put down the lid hastily, and locked and double locked the receptacle. Then with a little wailing cry she clasped her hands across her brow, and sat, fixed as Niobe, upon the ground beside that box.

"They must have belonged to some one he loved," she said to herself. "What other reason could he have had for keeping them?"

Her quick eye had told her that the things were of modern fashion, made within the last few years; things that could not by any possibility have belonged to his mother, who had died more than thirty years ago. She could not comfort herself with that idea, as she might have done otherwise.

"That pale apple green was in fashion the summer before my marriage," she said to herself, thinking of one of the delicate fabrics which she had stuffed relentlessly into the box. "Bouffante made me a dress of that very shade for a garden-party."

This was the bitterest pang of all. She could have forgiven the dead man for loving her with a measured affection, but not for bestowing unmeasured love elsewhere.

"He must have loved the owner of those things very dearly," she thought, "or he would hardly have run such a risk as to keep them."

Those cashmeres and packets of gloves and plumed and painted fans, such a heap of unworn finery discarded, had a look of luxury and recklessness. She thought of all the stories she had heard from worldly wise matrons of bijou villas in the shades of Fulham or St. John's Wood, and it seemed to her that these things must have been part of the belongings of such a villa. The thought led her into a labyrinth of painful speculations. The last idea that could have entered her imagination was that only for a village maiden, tender and pure and true, had these fineries been chosen.

CHAPTER XLVII.

"WHY BANISH TRUTH? IT INJURES NOT THE DEAD."

RICHARD REDMAYNE was a prisoner in Maidstone jail. Very wearisome were the examinations and cross-examinations which were necessary before the indictment against the actual sinner was fairly made out, and the innocence of Joseph Flood so demonstrated as to admit of his release from custody. Then, with the season of hop-gathering, and the long October nights lit here and there by camp-fires, came the assizes. Rick Redmayne, of Brierwood Farm, the kindly master, the cheerful, open-hearted yeoman and trusty friend of years gone by, stood in the dock to plead guilty to a midnight assassination.

Never was there a profounder silence than that which held the court spell-bound when, after a verdict of guilty and a recommendation to mercy, the prisoner was asked if he had any thing to say.

"Yes," answered Richard Redmayne, quietly. "There is something I should be thankful to say, with your lordship's leave. I should like the world to know why I shot that man."

And then, in very plain and simple words, with a singular clearness and conciseness, he told Grace's story and his own; his return from Australia, his search, his discovery—only of a grave—his rooted conviction that the revealment of her lover's villainy had slain his daughter. He told the judge, in a few rugged, powerful sentences, what he felt as he sat in the moonlight watching his enemy's approach, and why he fired straight at that enemy's breast.

"I don't want any body to say that I was off my head that night," he said in conclusion. "I meant to do it. I'd rather speak the truth and hang for it, than be saved by a lie."

All the plausible rhetoric of a Thurtell or a Fauntleroy, airing a university education in the dock, would have seemed poor beside that unvarnished statement of facts. Already the jury had recommended the guilty man to mercy; the judge strengthened their recommendation by all the might of his own influence. Thank God, we do not live in hanging days! Of ten men doomed to the gallows six escape their doom, and Richard Redmayne was one of the six. Three days before the date appointed for his execution the jail chaplain informed him that the Secretary of State had been pleased to commute his sentence to penal servitude for life.

Richard Redmayne gave a deep sigh of relief when he heard these tidings, but was not wildly

Hosted by Google

"MRS. HARCROSS DRAGGED THESE OBJECTS OUT OF THE CHEST ONE BY ONE."

elated, like a man for whom the prospect of death had been full of terror.

"I thank you kindly, Sir," he said, very quietly. "I feel much beholden to you and the other gentlemen for having taken all this trouble to beg me off; and I'm very glad for the sake of the good old name that I'm not going to be jerked out of this world by the common hangman. But as far as my own feelings go, I think I'd as lief have ended my troubles even that way. Hard labor and a prison for the rest of one's life isn't a lively prospect for a man to look forward to."

"But it is a mercy for which you have good reason to be grateful, Redmayne," the chaplain answered, gravely, "since it will afford you time for penitence. A crime such as yours is not to be wiped out hastily, though we can not reckon the mercy of God to sinners, or what special dispensation He may reserve for those who lie under the final sentence of the law. You have a great work to do for your soul in years to come, Richard; for I fear your mind is not yet awakened to the enormity of your offense. Think how great a sin it was to lurk waiting for your enemy in the darkness of the night."

"It was broad moonlight," said Richard, bluntly; "he might have seen me as well as I saw him."

"The act was not the less treacherous," rejoined the chaplain. "Consider how great a sin it is to send a soul unprepared to stand before its Maker. And, by your own showing, this man had been a sinner; even his sin against your daughter may have been still unrepented of."

Richard Redmayne stood for a few moments looking at the ground in thoughtful silence before he replied to this suggestion.

"I don't know," he said at last, "but I think somehow that he was sorry." And then he told the story of his last visit to the church-yard at Hetheridge, and of the garland of snow-white hot-house flowers. "I hardly think he'd have remembered her birthday, and gone yonder to lay that wreath upon her grave, if he hadn't been sorry. It would have been easier for him to forget her. If I'd remembered those flowers upon her grave that night at Clevedon, I don't think I should have shot him."

It was the first expression of any feeling like sorrow or regret which had dropped from Rick Redmayne's lips. The chaplain, although recognizing something noble in the man, had begun to fear he was a hardened sinner; but at this first indication that the stubborn heart could melt, the good man took courage, and grew more hopeful about his spiritual patient. He worked this vein with all his might before the prisoner was transferred to Portland: talked much of the dead girl, and of God's providence, which had snatched her from a world that was full of snares for helpless innocent wanderers who had once strayed from the home nest. He talked of that mysterious spirit world in which the secrets of all hearts are to be made manifest; a world where there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage, neither tears nor death, neither sin nor sorrow; where Richard Redmayne and his daughter and his daughter's lover might meet, forgiven and forgiving.

His labors were not in vain. It was with a softened spirit that the farmer left Maidstone jail and the country of his birth, with no last look at the stubble fields and busy hop gardens of Brierwood, close guarded with other felons in a railway van, roughly shipped as if they had been a small herd of cattle sent up to the London market.

But before the removal of this little band of delinquents to new quarters, Rick Redmayne had an interview with an old friend. John Wort, the steward, paid him a visit in his cell at Maidstone on the last day of his residence there, and bade him a kindly farewell, not without some show of emotion, as sternly held in check as any rough-and-ready, gruff-spoken man of business ever held his more tender emotions.

"Thank God, they remitted the sentence, Rick," said the steward. "I dare say it seems hard enough to you to go to Portland. But, bless my soul! I hear the air is uncommonly healthy, and the diet good; and who knows how soon you may get a ticket of leave—if—if you behave well, as of course you will, and attend chapel regular—though I suppose that'll be compulsory—and read your Bible, and what not, and make friends with the chaplain?"

"I'm a lifer," said Richard, grimly. "I don't suppose tickets of leave are dealt out very free to lifers."

"Oh, but there's no knowing. There are exceptional cases, you know. And favoritism goes a good way. You'll start with a good character; and be sure you make friends with the chaplain."

"I'll curry favor with no man," said Rick, proudly.

"Curry favor! of course not; but you like your Bible, don't you? and you may just as well read it."

"I should like to see Queensland and the new farm again before I die, and to see what Jim has made of it," said Rick, thoughtfully; "else I don't think it much matters whether I'm in jail or out of it. I suppose my work at Portland Island will be out-of-doors, and that I shall have the open sky above my head, and feel the sea-wind blowing over me. I don't care how hard the work may be, so long as it isn't inside four walls."

"But if ever you do get free, Rick, a few years ahead of us—"

"If ever I do, I'll sail straight away for Brisbane. I sha'n't come back to Kent to be pointed at as the first that ever brought disgrace on the name of Redmayne."

"Oh, Rick, I don't believe there's a man among us who doesn't pity you," said the steward, earnestly. "Sir Francis was one of those that tried hardest to get the sentence commuted. Lady Clevedon—well, there!—the tears were in her eyes when she talked to me about you."

"Tender-hearted soul," murmured Richard, gently; "I was sorry for her when I thought I'd killed her husband; but I can't for the life of me get to feel friendly toward him, though I know he's never done me any harm, and has even stood my friend since my trial. He's too much like that other. God, God! I couldn't have believed such a likeness was possible between men who were nothing to each other!"

"The likeness was strong, certainly, but hardly so close as you think. You only saw Harcross in the moonlight; if you'd seen both men by broad day, you'd have seen plenty of difference between them. The strangest thing was the accidental likeness in that miniature—an accident that might have cost Sir Francis his life. But they were like each other, there's no denying that; only there semblance may not be quite so strange as you think."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Come, Rick, I believe you're to be trusted—not a man to blab every thing you know, or to talk where talking would be a breach of honor—so I'll tell you a secret. Those two were something more than casual acquaintances, though Sir Francis doesn't know it, and is never likely to know it. They were half-brothers!"

"What?"

"Half-brothers. Ten years before Sir Lucas Clevedon married Miss Agnes Wilder he ran away with an actress, a pretty woman, and a woman who was, for a few seasons, the rage up in London. She went by the name of Mrs. Mostyn, but whether she had a husband, living or dead, is more than I know; and whether Sir Lucas ever married her is more than I know. But my belief is that he did; for just before she died he sold an estate that his mother had left him, and settled every sixpence of the purchase-money in trust for the benefit of the son that had been born somewhere in Italy. Lord Dartmoor was one of the trustees, and I was the other; and it was Lord Dartmoor made him do it, as I heard drop from him in the course of the business. It was a good lump of money that he parted with this way, and I knew Sir Lucas well enough to know that he wouldn't have sacrificed as much as a twentieth part of the sum for any generous or manly consideration—in plain words, not unless he was obliged. So I have always suspected there was some kind of marriage—if not strictly legal, still strong enough to frighten Sir Lucas—and that the poor lady was persuaded to sell her son's birthright for this settlement. Sir Lucas had just come home from the Continent, and was paying his court to another lady at the time, the only daughter and heiress of a great banker, a young lady who afterward married a nobleman. That courtship never came to any thing. Sir Lucas was going down hill by this time, and his character had got to be pretty well known; so the young lady's father shut the door in his face, and he came down to Clevedon, and shut himself up and sulked like a wounded wild beast. As to his son, I don't believe he ever took the trouble to see him after he left him somewhere in foreign parts with the poor mother. If any thing was wanted to be done, I did it; and when Lord Dartmoor died I had the whole management of the boy's business till he came of age, when my trusteeship expired. We gave him a first-rate education—there was just enough income to do that liberally, and leave a small margin for accumulation. He was a clever, steady-going lad, and seemed to do well wherever he went. As a young man he was free from all his father's vices. I had as much trust and confidence in him as I might have had in my own son, or I should never have brought him across your threshold. You'll believe that of me, won't you, Richard Redmayne? I should never have brought him to Brierwood if I hadn't thought him an honest man."

"Ay, ay," said Rick, gloomily, "you trusted him, I dare say; but the wrong was done for all that. A stranger was brought into my house while I was away—a stranger who broke my daughter's heart."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

THIS low-browed, half-Egyptian face, whose rich olive complexion, scarlet lips, and raven hair we fancy we see through the black and white of the engraving, would readily of itself conjure up a dream of luscious summer, even without the late August flowers and foliage with which the artist has wreathed it to complete the picture. And when is such a dream more welcome than in these bleak days, when snow-drifts cumber the frozen earth, and the winter wind moans drearily through the leafless trees fringed with icicles? If it is true that none may

"Wallow naked in December snow
By thinking on fantastic summer's heat," still the vision of the not far distant days when the earth will again be clad with verdure, and the winds of heaven will be courted as friends and not shunned as foes, may well assist us in patiently enduring the winter's cold. In this view, our picture is especially seasonable at this moment. And if this vision is grateful to those who sit at luxurious firesides, what must it be to the houseless and homeless ones, who shiver hungrily at every corner? To them winter means death, and summer life. To them winter brings no geniality, holiday-making, and social pleasure. It is simply cold and starvation. They are the ones who look for summer longingly, and dream of it as an angel of light, whose balmy wings assuage half the pangs of poverty and hunger. Would that the fortunate ones of earth would take the place of this angel, and equalize the seasons in a measure, by bearing for them the added burdens of winter, especially in this holiday season, which, to be a true jubilee, should not witness a sad face in all the land!

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

Hosted by Google

MACARONI-MAKING.

YOU would never guess how macaroni is made if you had not seen it. You imagine, no doubt, that they make it like pipes, roll it on wires, or spin it out like glass. If you are in Naples, and you are quite sure you don't care very, very much for macaroni, you had better go and clear up the mystery. The moment you have passed the Ponte della Maddalena you see on either side of you trestles in front of the shops, supporting canes which are covered with a double fringe, long and yellowish. This is macaroni hanging in the sun to dry. The flies know it very well, and dot it in thousands, and the little boys know it very well, and crawl under the fringe, and just clip the ends and pick up stray morsels that may drop. I saw it hanging just so while the ashes from Vesuvius were still blowing about Portici. Nothing seems to harm it, neither boys, nor dust, nor flies; they add to the flavor. Now how do you think it is made? Just peep beyond the trestles there into the shop. "Why, by Jove, they are all naked." No, not quite. "What are those three fellows doing, jumping up and down as if they were on a see-saw?" Kneading the macaroni paste. A friend of mine says he has seen them kneading it as they are doing now, but without the beam. "And that horrible old Spagnoletto in the bin?" He is performing the first operation to the paste—treading it. "And this troop of maniacs in front, rushing madly backward and forward at the end of this pole, threatening to capsize us every minute?" Why, don't you see they are turning the screw of the press, and below there out comes the macaroni; while the boy in the hole fans it directly it is presented to the world. Then he nips it off when it has dropped a certain length, and hands it to a lad, who spreads it on the canes, and then—the sun, the dust, the flies, and the boys. If you wish to know any more, take away this importunate foreman who keeps jogging my elbow while I draw, and insisting on taking me to look at every detail, while I only want to sketch the whole scene at a distance. He will show you the yellow corn. He will tell you it comes from the country near Brindisi. He will make the wrinkled Spagnoletto put water—hot water, mind—on the floor, and tread it under your nose. He will bring you the brass moulds at the foot of the press, through which the paste is forced, and fit bits of macaroni into the holes. He will not, perhaps, know that these moulds are made in England. By-the-bye, do you observe how the master, playing cards yonder in a corner, keeps looking at us a little suspiciously? He half thinks we are learning the secret of macaroni-making, to take it to America, and set up a rival manufactory. Never fear; in America we have not got the Neapolitan water, and that's no great loss. Above Castellamare they say the best macaroni is made, but I don't know on what the excellence depends.

"Macaroni is only flour and water." That's all. It can't be the substance, then, that delights the Neapolitans; it must be the form. There must be something in the long, snaky strings which tickles the Neapolitan throat and palate. Some gourmand wished for a throat as long as a crane's, that he might eke out the pleasure of eating. Yards and yards of macaroni, and yards and yards of neck, would be the very acme of delight to a Neapolitan. You may catch him in the act, if you like, in a little street that runs away to the right from the Castle Nuovo. Here there are dozens of queer shops, with frying apparatus outside, and our Neapolitan sees his macaroni cooked, swallows whole bunches of it, or rather lets it glide down his throat, and never thinks—not he—how it's made, nor of the dust and the flies and the boys.

MACARONI-MAKERS AT NAPLES.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—The "Ugly Girl" articles are a series of papers now being published in the Bazar, containing hints for improving the complexion, taking care of the hair, etc. You can order the Bazars containing them at this office. They are twelve in number, and cost ten cents each.

A CONSTANT READER.—Make your brown merino with a Worth over-skirt and jockey basque. Trim with bias scalloped ruffles and bias bands of silk. Do not alter your black cashmere. Make your sacque shorter and half-fitting. Dress your boy in Gabrielles and yoke slips of white muslin, with plenty of thick under-clothing and warm wraps.

KATE B.—Get a garnet or an olive brown cashmere, and make by the Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. Wear with sky blue and rose-colored neck-ties.

M. E. C.—Lay full-length kilt pleats on a cambric facing for the back widths of a dress, press them flatly, and catch them at intervals on the wrong side by tapes.

LAPIDARY.—Pearls are quite as appropriate as diamonds for a bride.

C. C.—You can get a Bazar Book of Decorum by sending $1 and your address to this office.

MRS. G. B.—Get a black silk suit, a blue-gray cashmere, and a garnet silk like your samples to wear with your garnet bonnet. The back flounces are on the three back breadths only, and bows with long ends conceal the place where they meet the front trimming. Passementerie with an upright box-pleated frill is a pretty heading for your flounces.

JEANIE DEANS.—Your darker sample is olive brown; the lighter is sardonyx. Both are cashmere, which differs from merino in being twilled on one side and plain on the other, while both sides of merino are twilled. Blue piping would make your sardonyx suit look common, while a dark nut brown silk piping would give it character and style. A polonaise faced with silk and a flounced skirt is the best design for fine woolen suits.

MRS. A. M. S.—Trim the gray suit with maroon velvet, making a wrap of the gray merino, with velvet bands for trimming. See Bazar No. 47, Vol. V., for illustrations of children's wraps.

D. C. L.—White muslin worn over pink or blue silk is an appropriate concert dress for a young singer.

S.—Water-proof cloaks look far better without trimming of any kind. The pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., is the best model.

EDITH DOMBEY.—The blue empress cloth you suggest will be stylish. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 50, Vol. V., for hints about coiffures. The bonnets and round hats this season differ only in having strings. Make your pink silk by the full dress pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. V., omitting the lace, and using bias gathered narrow ruffles instead.—Fresh benzine will cleanse your kid gloves.

MERIT IS ITS OWN SUCCESS.—Superior merits and capabilities, cheapness in price, and ease of operation, have placed the New Wilson Under-Feed Sewing-Machine far in advance of all other machines in the market. The public shows its approval of all that it is and does by purchasing the machines as fast as the company can possibly manufacture them. There is no test of a sewing-machine ever yet inaugurated but what has been used on the Improved Wilson, and in every case it has come off ahead of every other machine in use. No pains or expense is spared in the material used in it, or the workmanship of its construction, to make the Wilson every way the best, most pleasant, and most durable sewing-machine in existence. It costs but $50, and is sold on easy payments. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the U.S. The company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.—Mrs. M. G. PHILLIPS, Fort Ann, N. Y., has had a Wheeler & Wilson Lock-Stitch Machine since 1854, doing shirt-work and family sewing, without repairs, and it is now in good working order. See the new Improvements and Woods' Lock-Stitch Ripper.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

WORK;

Or, CHRISTIE'S EXPERIMENT.

By LOUISA M. ALCOTT.

Author of "Little Women," "Old-Fashioned Girl," "Little Men," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

CHRISTIE.

"AUNT BETSEY, there's going to be a new Declaration of Independence."

"Bless and save us, what do you mean, child?" And the startled old lady precipitated a pie into the oven with destructive haste.

"I mean that, being of age, I am going to take care of myself, and not be a burden any longer. Uncle wishes me out of the way; thinks I ought to go, and sooner or later will tell me so. I don't intend to wait for that, but, like the people in fairy tales, travel away into the world and seek my fortune. I know I can find it."

Christie emphasized her speech by energetic demonstrations in the bread-trough, kneading the dough as if it was her destiny, and she was shaping it to suit herself; while Aunt Betsey stood listening, with uplifted pie-fork, and as much astonishment as her placid face was capable of expressing. As the girl paused, with a decided thump, the old lady exclaimed:

"What crazy idee you got into your head now?"

"A very sane and sensible one, that's got to be worked out; so please listen to it, ma'am, I've had it a good while. I've thought it over thoroughly, and I'm sure it's the right thing for me to do. I'm old enough to take care of myself; and if I'd been a boy, I should have been told to do it long ago. I hate to be dependent, and now there's no need of it; I can't bear it any longer. If you were poor, I would not leave you, for I never forget how kind you have been to me. I am a burden to him, and I must go where I can take care of myself. I can't be happy till I do, for there's nothing here for me. I'm sick of this dull town, where the one idea is to eat, drink, and get rich. I don't find any friends to help me as I want to be helped, or any work that I can do well; so let me go, Aunty, and find my place, wherever it is."

"But I do need you, deary; and you mustn't think Uncle don't like you. He does, only he don't show it, and when your odd ways fret him, he ain't pleasant, I know. I don't see why you can't be contented; I've lived here all my days, and never found the place lonesome, or the folks unneighborly," and Aunt Betsey looked perplexed by the new idea.

"You and I are very different, ma'am. There was more yeast put into my composition, I guess; and, after standing quiet in a warm corner so long, I begin to ferment, and ought to be kneaded up in time, so that I may turn out a wholesome loaf. You can't do this; so let me go where it can be done, else I shall turn sour and good for nothing. Does that make the matter any clearer?" And Christie's serious face relaxed into a smile as her aunt's eye went from her to the nicely-molded loaf offered as an illustration.

"I see what you mean, Kitty, but I never thought on't before. You be better riz than me, though, let me tell you: too much emptins makes bread poor stuff, like baker's trash; and too much working up makes it hard and dry. Now fly around, for the big oven is most het, and this cake takes a sight of time in the mixin'."

"You havn't said I might go, Aunty," began the girl, after a long pause devoted by the old lady to the preparation of some compound which seemed to require great nicety of measurement in its ingredients; for when she replied, Aunt Betsey curiously interlarded her speech with audible directions to herself from the receipt-book before her.

"I ain't no right to keep you, dear, ef you choose to (take a pinch of salt). I'm sorry you ain't happy, and think you might ef you'd only (beat eggs, six yolks and whites together). But ef you can't, and feel that you need (two cups of sugar), only speak to Uncle, and ef he says (a squeeze of fresh lemon), go, my dear, and take my blessin' with you (not forgettin' to cover with a piece of paper)."

Christie's laugh echoed through the kitchen; and the old lady smiled benignly, quite unconscious of the cause of the girl's merriment.

"I shall ask Uncle to-night, and I know he won't object. Then I shall write to see if Mrs. Flint has a room for me, where I can stay till I get something to do. There is plenty of work in the world, and I'm not afraid of it; so you'll soon hear good news of me. Don't look sad, for you know I never could forget you, even if I should become the greatest lady in the land." And Christie left the prints of two floury but affectionate hands on the old lady's shoulders, as she kissed the wrinkled face that had never worn a frown to her.

Full of hopeful fancies, Christie salted the pans and buttered the dough in pleasant forgetfulness of all mundane affairs, and the ludicrous dismay of Aunt Betsey, who followed her about, rectifying her mistakes, and watching over her as if this sudden absence of mind had roused suspicions of her'sanity.

"Uncle, I want to go away, and get my own living, if you please," was Christie's abrupt beginning, as they sat around the evening fire.

"Hey! what's that?" said Uncle Enos, rousing from the doze he was enjoying, with a candle in perilous proximity to his newspaper and his nose.

Christie repeated her request, and was much relieved when, after a meditative stare, the old man briefly answered:

"Wal, go ahead."

"I was afraid you might think it rash or silly, sir."

"I think it's the best thing you could do; and I like your good sense in pupposin' on't."

"Then I may really go."

"Soon's ever you like. Don't pester me about it till you're ready; then I'll give you a little suthing to start off with." And Uncle Enos returned to "The Farmer's Friend," as if cattle were more interesting than kindred.

Christie was accustomed to this curt speech and careless manner—had expected nothing more cordial; and, turning to her aunt, said, rather bitterly:

"Didn't I tell you he'd be glad to have me go? No matter! When I've done something to be proud of, he will be as glad to see me back again." Then her voice changed, her eyes kindled, and the firm lips softened with a smile.

"Yes, Ill try my experiment; then I'll get rich; found a home for girls like myself; or, better still, be a Mrs. Fry, a Florence Nightingale, or—"

"How are you on for stockins, dear?"

Christie's castles in the air vanished at the prosaic question; but, after a blank look, she answered pleasantly:

"Thank you for bringing me down to my feet again, when I was soaring away too far and too fast. I'm poorly off, ma'am; but if you are knitting these for me, I shall certainly start on a firm foundation." And, leaning on Aunt Betsey's knee, she patiently discussed the wardrobe question from hose to head-gear.

"Don't you think you could be contented any way, Christie, ef I make the work lighter, and leave you more time for your books and things?" asked the old lady, loth to lose the one youthful element in her quiet life.

"No, ma'am, for I can't find what I want here," was the decided answer.

"What do you want, child?"

"Look in the fire, and I'll try to show you."

The old lady obediently turned her spectacles that way, and Christie said in a tone half serious, half playful:

"Do you see those two logs? Well, that one smouldering dismally away in the corner is what my life is now; the other blazing and singing is what I want my life to be."

"Bless me, what an idee! They are both a-burnin' where they are put, and both will be ashes to-morrow; so what difference does it make?"

Christie smiled at the literal old lady; but, following the fancy that pleased her, she added earnestly:

"I know the end is the same; but it does make a difference how they turn to ashes, and how I spend my life. That log, with its one dull spot of fire, gives neither life nor warmth, but lies sizzling despondently among the cinders. But the other glows from end to end with cheerful little flames that go singing up the chimney with a pleasant sound. Its light fills the room and shines out into the dark; its warmth draws us nearer, making the hearth the cosiest place in the house, and we shall all miss the friendly blaze when it dies. Yes," she added, as if to herself, "I hope my life may be like that, so that whether it be long or short, it will be useful and cheerful while it lasts, will be missed when it ends, and leave something behind besides ashes."

Though she only half understood them, the girl's words touched the old lady, and made her look anxiously at the eager young face gazing so wistfully into the fire.

"A good smart blowing up with the bellusses would make the green stick burn most as well as the dry one after a spell. I guess contentedness is the bellus for young folks, ef they would only think so."

"I dare say you are right, Aunty, but I want to try for myself, and if I fail, I'll come back and follow your advice. Young folks always have discontented fits, you know. Didn't you when you were a girl?"

"Shouldn't wonder ef I did; but Enos came along, and I forgot 'em."

"My Enos has not come along yet, and never may; so I'm not going to sit and wait for any man to give me independence, if I can earn it for myself." And a quick glance at the gruff, gray old man in the corner plainly betrayed that, in Christie's opinion, Aunt Betsey made a bad bargain when she exchanged her girlish aspirations for a man whose soul was in his pocket.

"Jest like her mother, full of hifalutin notions, discontented and sot in her own idees; a poor capital to start a fortin' on."

Christie's eye met that of her uncle peering over the top of his paper with an expression that always tried her patience. Now it was like a dash of cold water on her enthusiasm, and her face fell as she answered quickly:

* * * * * *

"There, there, dear, hev a good cry, and forgit about it," purred Aunt Betsey, as the heavy footsteps creaked away, for the good soul had a most old-fashioned and dutiful awe of her lord and master.

"I shan't cry but act; for it is high time I was off. I've stayed for your sake; now I'm more trouble than comfort, and away I go. Good-night, my dear old aunty, and don't look troubled, for I'll be a lamb while I stay."

Having kissed the old lady, Christie swept her work away, and sat down to write the letter which was the first step toward freedom. When it was done, she drew near to her friendly confidante, the fire, and till late into the night sat thinking tenderly of the past, bravely of the present, hopeful of the future. Twenty-one to-morrow, and her inheritance a head, a heart, a pair of hands; also the dower of most New England girls, intelligence, courage, and common-sense, many practical gifts, all hidden under the shy pride that soon melts in a genial atmosphere, much romance and enthusiasm, and the spirit which can rise to heroism when the great moment comes.

* * * * * *

Christie looked back over the long, lonely years she had spent in the old farm-house, plodding to school and church, and doing her tasks with kind Aunt Betsey while a child; and slowly growing into girlhood, with a world of romance locked up in a heart hungry for love, and a larger, nobler life.

She had tried to appease this hunger in many ways, but found little help. Her father's old books were all she could command, and these she wore out with much reading. Inheriting his refined tastes, she found nothing to attract her in the society of the common-place and often coarse people about her. She tried to like the buxom girls whose one ambition was to "get married," and whose subjects of conversation were "smart bonnets" and "nice dresses." She tried to believe that the admiration and regard of the bluff young farmers were worth striving for; but when one well-to-do neighbor laid his acres at her feet, she found it impossible to accept for her life's companion a man whose soul was wrapped up in prize cattle and big turnips.

Uncle Enos never could forgive her for this piece of folly, and Christie plainly saw that one of three things would surely happen if she lived on there with no vent for her full heart and busy mind. She would either marry Joe Butterfield in sheer desperation, and become a farmer's household drudge; settle down into a sour spinster, content to make butter, gossip, and lay up money all her days; or do what poor Matty Stone had done, try to curb and crush her needs and aspirations till the struggle grew too hard, and then, in a fit of despair, end her life, and leave a tragic story to haunt their quiet river.

To escape these fates but one way appeared: to break loose from this narrow life, and go out into the world and see what she could do for herself. This idea was full of enchantment for the eager girl, and, after much earnest thought, she had resolved to try it.

"If I fail, I can come back," she said to herself, even while she scorned the thought of failure, for with all her shy pride she was both brave and ardent, and her dreams were of the rosiest sort.

"I won't marry Joe; I won't wear myself out in a district-school for the mean sum they give a woman; I won't delve away here where I'm not wanted; and I won't end my life like a coward because it is dull and hard. I'll try my fate as mother did, and perhaps I may succeed as well." And Christie's thoughts went wandering away into the dim, sweet past when she, a happy child, lived with loving parents in a different world from that.

Lost in these tender memories, she sat till the old moon-faced clock behind the door struck twelve, then the visions vanished, leaving their benison behind them.

As she glanced backward at the smouldering fire, a slender spire of flame shot up from the log that had blazed so cheerily, and shone upon her as she went. A good omen, gratefully accepted then, and remembered often in the years to come.

Thus ends the first chapter of Miss Alcott's sprightly and attractive but thoughtful new story, which commences in the holiday number of Henry Ward Beecher's Great Literary and Family Weekly—The Christian Union—and will be continued only in that paper. Miss Alcott has found the key to the popular heart; it is in depicting the true home life of America, which she makes full of zest, enjoyment, and wholesome earnestness. This story will be followed in The Christian Union by other serials from other eminent American pens. Edward Eggleston, Robertson Gray, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, etc.

The Christian Union contains contributions from eminent writers of all denominations, and has matters of interest for every member of the household, young and old. Having the largest circulation in the world of its class, it can afford to buy for its columns the very best talent.

The terms of subscription to this fine popular family weekly are but $3 per year, including the Illustrated Holiday number, and all the numbers (or a supplement) up to Jan. 1st, containing all the opening chapters of Miss Alcott's Story—presented free. To every subscriber is given away a beautiful $12 new Oleograph, a brilliant and charming work of art; or the $10 Pair of French Oil Chromos, "Wide Awake" and "Fast Asleep"—subjects life size. Subscriptions should be sent to J. B. Ford & Co., Publishers, 27 Park Place, New York. See their prospectus in this and the adjoining column.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NICOL, DAVIDSON, & CO.,
686 BROADWAY,
Near Great Jones Street, New York,
Offer a Quarter of a Million Dollars' worth of
REAL BRONZE CLOCKS;
MANTLE SETS, GROUPS, FIGURES;
BISQUE, PARIAN;
ENAMELED-BRONZE JEWEL-BOXES;
CHINA, GLASS;
GAS-FIXTURES AND CHANDELIERS,
in Crystal, Gilt, or Bronze,
At a small advance on cost of importation.

FOR MOTH PATCHES,
Freckles, and Tan, use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

FOR PIMPLES ON THE FACE,
Blackheads, and Fleshworms, use Perry's Improved Comedone and Pimple Remedy—the Great Skin Medicine. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York.

LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WORLD!
A FAMILY PAPER
Which can be trusted, and which is always full of interest, is a necessity of the times.
Such a one is the
CHRISTIAN UNION.
The Unsectarian, Evangelical, Literary, and Family Newspaper.
Henry Ward Beecher,
EDITOR.
It has something for every member of the household, in matters of religion, morals, politics, literature, art, science, agriculture, poetry, news, wholesome fiction for young and old, and truth for every body.
Mr. Beecher's vigorous and characteristic pen in his Editorials and Star Papers, and the verbatim reports of his Lecture-Room Talks in Plymouth Church, are great attractions. There is also a large and able editorial staff.
Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe writes exclusively for the CHRISTIAN UNION, her stories, sketches, and general articles appearing in that paper only.
THE CONVENIENT FORM is a recommendation; TWENTY-FOUR LARGE QUARTO PAGES, folded, pasted at the back, and trimmed at the edges—a decided advantage for reading.
THE REMARKABLE SUCCESS of this journal, it having attained the largest circulation of its class in the world, has enabled its publishers to add to its excellences, strengthen its Editorial Department by the addition of experienced writers and editors, and give these Special Attractions
For 1873!
SERIAL STORIES
BY DISTINGUISHED WRITERS.
The Publishers have arranged for several serial tales by the most famous American writers, to commence at different periods during the year, written expressly for the CHRISTIAN UNION. Among the authors thus engaged are LOUISA M. ALCOTT,
Author of "Little Women," "Little Men," "The Old-Fashioned Girl," &c., &c.
HARRIET BEECHER STOWE,
Author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "My Wife and I," "Sam Lawson's Stories," &c., &c.,
EDWARD EGGLESTON,
Author of "The Hoosier School-Master," "The End of the World," &c., &c.
ROBERTSON GRAY.
This is the nom de plume of another favorite story writer, heretofore known chiefly by the brilliancy, wit, pathos, humor, and readableness of the shorter tales published over his own name.
☞ The above Serials in Book form would cost double our subscription price.
A SPLENDID LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS,
Including not only those who have heretofore written for the CHRISTIAN UNION, but also many others whom our increasing resources enable us more and more widely to seek out and secure, among the most eminent and attractive writers of England and America.
FREE!
The Illustrated Holiday Number.
We present to every subscriber for 1873 a copy of our Illustrated Holiday Number of December 18th, with Christmas Pictures, Christmas Stories, and interesting matter by Mrs. Stowe, the poet Whittier, and many others. In this commences Miss Alcott's new story, the succeeding number of which up to January 1st will be sent to every subscriber. Also,

Hosted by Google

GIVEN AWAY!

A NEW AND EXQUISITE FRENCH

OLEOGRAPH,

(A name given only to the highest and choicest class of French and Italian Art-printing in oils—the perfection of oil chromos!) The Picture is a FAC-SIMILE of the latest and most brilliant work of the great French painter, LOBRICHON—a charming subject charmingly portrayed—a beautiful creation of art, entitled

"LITTLE RUNAWAY and her PETS."

The color, the finish, the delicacy of conception, the sweet attractiveness, and the thoroughly artistic beauty of the thing, make it a rare picture. It was painted expressly for the CHRISTIAN UNION, and will be PRESENTED TO ITS SUBSCRIBERS. The original painting cost thousands of francs; the NINETEEN lithographic color-stones are made by Jehenne, the acknowledged master of that art in the whole world. It is printed in Paris, and is the ever offered by any periodical. The size (14½x21½ inches) gives a wall picture a great elegance, which, in the picture stores, easily sells for $12 00.

LARGEST AND HANDSOMEST

FRENCH OIL CHROMO

This picture, while beautifully complete in itself, is a most charming CENTRE-PIECE for those two pretty French Oil Chromos, now famous the continent over, and of which we have already given away nearly 130,000 pairs to our subscribers. They are still in unabated demand, and no wonder, for they win the heart as well as the eye, and, as the Advance says, "Unlike nine pictures out of ten that cost a good deal more, one can look at them day after day and not tire of them." We therefore shall continue to present the pair to every annular subscriber who prefers them. The regular market price of these beautiful pictures is ($10) Ten Dollars, size 10½x12½ inches each. They are no common prints, but careful copies of paintings by Mrs. Anderson, the eminent English artist; printed in oil colors from sixteen stones, and equal to any chromo heretofore issued. The subjects are LIFE-SIZE, and can not fail to please all who love art or children.

"Wide Awake" and "Fast Asleep."

Or, we will present both the Oleograph and the Pair on the terms given below.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION

ARE AS FOLLOWS:

One Year, Only $3.

1. Every subscriber, for three dollars, shall receive the CHRISTIAN UNION for one year, the Illustrated Holiday Number, the opening chapters of Miss Alcott's new story to January 1st, and the choice between the two picture premiums, viz.: the charming PAIR and the exquisite OLEOGRAPH.

$22 Worth of Pictures Free.

HOW? LOOK!

2. Any one sending $5 75 shall receive the CHRISTIAN UNION for two years, the Illustrated Holiday Number, the opening chapters of Miss Alcott's new story to January 1st, and BOTH of the Picture Premiums.

3. Any one sending $3 for himself and $3 for new subscriber (i. e., six dollars in all), shall receive one copy of the CHRISTIAN UNION for a year, and both Picture Premiums; and the new subscriber shall receive one copy of the paper for a year, and either of the two Picture Premiums he may choose; and both subscribers shall receive the Illustrated Holiday Number free, and all the opening chapters of Miss Alcott's new story up to January 1st.

The Picture Premiums thus presented are deliverable at the publication office. If the subscriber adds ten cents, for expenses of wrapping, mailing, &c., of either premium ($3 10 altogether), the copies will be mailed, postpaid; and if the subscriber sends 25 cents more ($3 35 altogether), the copies so mailed will be strongly mounted, sized, and varnished, all ready for framing—the pair of Chromos on card-board, and the Oleograph on limp canvas. Or, the Oleograph mounted on canvas and wooden stretcher, exactly like an oil painting, varnished, &c., $3 40 (must be sent by express, at expense of subscriber).

The mounted form is much the best for the subscriber, as all pictures must be mounted before framing, and, in the vast quantities we prepare, it can be done more uniformly and at a quarter of the usual expense. Therefore, all subscribers should send for their pictures mounted.

Send money by Postal Orders, Drafts, or Registered Letter. Currency at the risk of the sender.

☞ FIRST COME, FIRST SERVED. ☜

SPECIMEN COPIES mailed free on receipt of 6 cents.

J. B. FORD & CO., Publishers,
27 Park Place, New York.

☞ State plainly which Premium Picture is desired, or, better yet, send $6 for both, and the price for Mounting and Mailing. ☜ and the very best business opportunity ever offered is to be found in an Agency for taking subscriptions.

AGENTS WANTED.

(SEE BELOW.)

A GREAT COMBINATION,

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

GREAT LITERARY FAMILY NEWSPAPER, with which is given away the largest and best Premium ever offered, the new and exquisite $12 00

FRENCH OLEOGRAPH

called "Little Runaway and her Pets." (Oleographs are the choicest class of French Art-printing in oils—the perfection of chromo.) We also give the superb $10 pair of Genuine French oil Chromos, "Wide Awake" and "Fast Asleep," subjects LIFE-SIZE—charming fac-similies of Original Oil Paintings. This paper has the largest circulation of its class in the world. It will next year be made better than ever. Serial tales by world-famous authors, L. M. ALCOTT, EDWARD EGGLESTON, HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, &c. New and brilliant contributors. Illustrated Holiday Number and back Nos. of Miss Alcott's story FREE. The most taking "Combination!" the largest commissions paid! One Agent made $900 in three months; another $537 in 35 days; another $94 40 in one week; one $37 60 in one day, and many others from $5 and $10 to $40 per day. This year our offers are even more profitable. No waiting for the premiums. THE SUBSCRIBER GETS THEM WHEN HE PAYS AGENT.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED!

Intelligent men and women wanted every where. To get good territory, exclusively assigned, send early for circulars and terms to J. B. FORD & CO., Pubs., New York; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; or San Francisco, Cal.

FURS. FURS. FURS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,

Are now offering, to close the season, previous to taking their semi-annual inventory,

GENUINE SABLE, SILVER FOX,
ERMINE, BLACK MARTIN,
CHINCHILLA, MINK AND SEAL SETS,
FUR TRIMMINGS, FUR ROBES, &c.,

At 25 per Cent. Less than the Cost of Importation.

Also,

PARIS AND CITY MADE
EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES,
CLOAKS, &c.,

BELOW THE COST OF MANUFACTURE.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

IN REAL INDIA

CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,

REAL POINT AND CHANTILLY
LACE DRESSES, FLOUNCES, SHAWLS, COLLARS,
CUFFS, SETS, &c.

Ladies' and Misses' Paris-made
SILK, POPLIN, AND VELVET DRESSES
Very elegant, at about one-half the cost of importation.

Seal-Skin Jackets and Sacques, only $50 and upward. Handsomely trimmed ditto, only $75.

PARIS-MADE HATS, BONNETS, &c.

Mourning as well as other orders for

FASHIONABLE DRESSMAKING

Executed under superior management at short notice; no disappointment.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,
IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.
" " Chamois, $4 00, $5 00, $6 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;
SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,
All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

WE WANT EVERY LADY who reads Harper's Bazar to try one of

LORING'S DOLLAR BOXES
Of ELEGANT FRENCH NOTE-PAPER.

Thousands all over the country use them. They contain just what a lady requires for daily use, and have no equal in quality and beauty. We stamp her INITIAL or PET name on each sheet and mail to her on receipt of One Dollar.

A. K. LORING,
Box 5011, Boston.

MAGIC FOR THE PARLOR.

Send a stamp for the new price-list.
HARTZ CONJURING REPOSITORY, 743 Broadway, New York; also at 850 Broadway, near 14th Street.

REAL LACES

CLOAK VELVETS, FINE FURS, &c. Cheapest in the country. Send for full Winter Price-List to

EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

"HOW IS YOUR HEALTH?"

If you would be well and strong, read THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. The best and only ILLUSTRATED HEALTH JOURNAL, not being the organ of any person, business, or institution, but an independent earnest Teacher of the LAWS OF LIFE AND HEALTH; showing how to regain and preserve HEALTH. Only $2 00 a year; single numbers 20 cents. Clubbed with either of Harper's for $5 00. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

1829. CHARTER PERPETUAL. 1872.

FRANKLIN FIRE INSURANCE CO.,

OF

PHILADELPHIA.

Capital, - - - - - -	$400,000 00
Accrued Surplus and Premiums,	2,916,316 88
Cash Assets, November 30, 1872,	$3,316,316 88
Premiums, October, 1872, -	$252,780 70
Premiums, November, 1872, -	301,876 64
	$554,657 34
Amount insured in the Burned District, Boston, - - -	$458,196 00
Amount insured on Outskirts of same, - - - - -	39,500 00

It has been definitely ascertained that $2000 will cover all claims upon the last item, while salvages already determined indicate a net loss of not over $400,000.

ALFRED G. BAKER, Pres't.
GEORGE FALES, Vice-President.
J. W. McALLISTER, Second Vice-Pres't.
THEO. M. REGER, Secretary.
SAML. W. KAY, Assistant Secretary.

BRANCH OFFICE,
No. 243 Broadway, New York City,
GEO. F. REGER, Manager.

The Agents of the FRANKLIN throughout the U. S. number nearly 1000.

HOLIDAYS

are drawing near! and those intending useful GIFTS for ANY of their FRIENDS, whether Men, Women, Boys or Girls, could not bestow one that would be BETTER appreciated than a

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESS

Send for a descriptive, illustrated Pamphlet, containing the various Agents' addresses, to

BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,
349—351 Federal & 152 Kneeland-st's, Boston.

No suspension of Business on account of Fire!

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?

WHY BE ANNOYED WITH

CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?

WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL

REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,

AT SO SMALL A COST,

BY USING WRIGHT'S

"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."

Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

"IT STILL WAVES!" The old, original, and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER." THE FAMILY PAPER of America. It is a paper for THE MILLION. Old and young, rich and poor, saint or sinner, will find it JUST the paper for them. It is a large, illustrated, 40 column paper; 8 pages, Ledger size, and filled to overflowing with charming Stories, Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor and Fun. It makes a specialty of "showing up" and exposing Rogues, Rascals, Swindlers, Quacks and Humbugs. IT EXPOSES RASCALITY, and saves money to its readers. Every subscriber, for only $1.00, will receive the BANNER a whole year; and also, FREE GRATIS, and prepaid, a superb PRANG CHROMO, a "BOUQUET OF AUTUMN LEAVES." Satisfaction guaranteed, or money refunded. $1.00 a year; 3 months, 15 Cents. Sample SENT FREE. NOW IS THE TIME. AGENTS WANTED. Now! NOW! NOW! don't put it off. Address, STAR SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

A CHARM FOR A HOLIDAY PRESENT to your suffering friend. A pair of Patent Metallic Shields—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Nervous Headaches. Our most eminent physicians use them in their practice. Price $5 per pair, by mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

"Best in the Market."

ASHWORTH'S
SIX-CORD
SPOOL COTTON.
SOLD BY
The GROVER & BAKER Sewing-Machine Company.

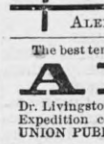
ALEX. KING & Co., Agents, New York.

The best terms offered. AGENTS WANTED for Explorations in

AFRICA

Dr. Livingstone discovered. The HERALD-STANLEY Expedition complete. Large octavo now ready. Outfit $1.00. UNION PUBLISHING CO., Chicago, Phila., or Springfield, Mass.

AGENTS—Ladies particularly—can make money working for us, as there is no competition, and the goods are wanted by every one. Address The MCKEE MANUFACTURING CO., 309 BROADWAW, NEW YORK.



Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 529 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

MATHUSHEK PIANO M'F'G CO. New Haven, Conn.

The most durable pianos.
The most powerful tone.
The finest touch & action.
The purchasers delighted.
The pamphlets sent free.

AGENTS WANTED for Great Fires of History. Chicago, Boston, N. York. London etc. Causes. Systems of Extinguishing Fire. Sates, Fire Proof Buildings, Bank Vaults, Insurance, &c. Thrilling, Humorous, Pathetic. Illustrated. Going like Hot Cakes. Address Worthington, Dustin & Co., Hartford, Ct.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING.

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

$1 50. THE NURSERY. A MONTHLY MAGAZINE for YOUNGEST READERS. Superbly Illustrated. ☞ Send stamp for a sample number. NOW is the time to subscribe.

JOHN L. SHOREY,
36 Bromfield St., Boston.

Beautiful inventions for marking Clothing and printing Cards, &c. One will do for a whole family. Movable Type. Profitable, amusing and instructive for the young. Jet Printer $1. Silver $1.25, with Ink, Type and neat Case, delivered by mail anywhere. 4 Alphabets extra 60c. Agents wanted. Golding & Co, 14 Kilby St, Boston.

TO THE WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp,

M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt St., New York.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

No Lady should be without

Mrs. GILMAN'S PATENT WORK HOLDER,

For sale by A. T. STEWART & CO., New York; and at the works of the manufacturers,

BILLINGS & SPENCER CO., Lawrence St., Hartford, Conn.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL,

A Weekly Magazine of Popular High-class Literature.

ENLARGED FOR 1873.

Price 10 cents per number; or $4 00 per annum in advance. Subscriptions received for Twelve or Six Months. New Subscribers for 1873, remitting by or before January 1st, will receive the numbers for December, 1872, gratuitously, including an extra Christmas number.

Any person procuring FIVE Yearly Subscriptions for weekly numbers, and remitting $20, will be entitled to a copy for one year gratis.

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,
549 & 551 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 6 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A LOVER once wrote to a lady who had rejected him, saying that he intended to go "to some secluded spot and breathe away his life in sighs!" to which the lady replied by inquiring whether they were to be medium or large size. The man has not since been heard from.

Why is dancing like new milk?—Because it strengthens the calves.

The prospectus of a girls' school at Pesth announces: "With regard to mythology, we shall teach the young ladies all that is necessary to understand the modern opera bouffe."

Why is nature like a baby?—Because there is generally a squall when its face is washed.

A new dish is grape leaves fried in egg batter; it is called a French dish. A contemporary remarks, "We can't think of any thing that would be more delicious than fried grape leaves, unless it is a theatrical poster on toast."

Why is a ballet-dancer a most inhuman creature?—Because her greatest delight is to execute her grand pas (grandpa).

It is now claimed that the architect of the great wall of China was a woman, but a woman wouldn't do any thing to keep men out in that way.

A NEW WORD.—A gentleman on walking up a hill in England found a bit of iron dropped from some machine, and deposited it at the nearest cottage, observing that the owner of the iron might give the housewife something for restoring it. "Oh," said she, "I don't know that; hereabouts they are not very givish."

MORE SELFISHNESS.

PLAYFUL BABE. "I say, Clara, pull off your Boots and Stockings, there's a good fellow, and come and help me to launch my Boat; Uncle won't."

[Would you believe it, she wouldn't.

A female novelist commenced her last work thus: "The sun had sunk into his western bed, but drawing the golden clouds up too high to hide his face, allowed his shining toes to protrude at the other end, thus casting a faint pinkish and crimsonish glow over nature's face."

If a spoonful of yeast will raise fifty cents' worth of flour, how much will it take to raise funds enough to buy another barrel with?

That was a good though rather a severe pun which was made by a student in one of our theological seminaries (and he was not one of the brightest of the class, either), when he asked, "Why is Professor —— the greatest revivalist of the age?" and on all "giving it up," said, "Because at the close of every sermon there is a 'Great Awakening.'"

A Shakspearean was reading A Midsummer Night's Dream to the sailors of a ship on which he was crossing the Atlantic, and they listened with pleasure till he came to the passage which describes "a mermaid sitting on a dolphin's back," when an old salt burst out, "That's nonsense! A dolphin's back is as sharp as a razor, and no mermaid could ride one till she'd saddled him."

HOW TO PREVENT FITS—Buy ready-made boots.

The sharpest so far this month is the girl who makes her unsuspecting father the daily bearer of sweet missives to a clerk in his office who has been forbidden to visit his employer's house. She pins the letter in the old man's cloak, and when he reaches the office and throws off the garment the clerk gets it and responds by the same carrier.

A compositor in a Southern printing-office was escorted home the other night by a squad of dogs. The only remarkable thing about the occurrence was the rapid time made.

A well-known Connecticut clergyman had a deacon who insisted upon leading the singing at the prayer-meetings. He was a great blunderer, and he sang all the sad and melancholy tunes he could think of. The hymn was given out,

"I love to steal a while away."

The deacon began, "I love to steal"—to Mear, where he broke down. He started with Dundee—"I love to steal." The third time he commenced and broke down, when the pastor arose and gravely said, "I am sorry for our brother's propensity. Will some brother pray?"

The following scene, it is said, took place in a Parisian magasin. An elegantly dressed lady asked to see some materials for paletots. The shop-man mounted the steps, and took down several pieces of striped velvet. "The rain would spoil it," said the lady; "show me some swan-skin." Several pieces being laid upon the counter, "Too thick," said the lady, after an examination of ten minutes; "show me some ladies' cloth." Several great rolls were laid before her. They were too thin. Then came velvet, silk, satin, moiré, until the counter disappeared under the piles of stuffs, behind which stood the nearly invisible shop-man, still patient and polite. At last, "I have decided," said the customer, "in favor of flannel, blue flannel." Ten or twelve pieces were placed upon the heap. "That will do," she said, after a long and minute scrutiny. "How much will it take to make a dog's paletot?" and she held up a microscopic toy terrier.

"A paletot?" asked the shop-man, not at all disconcerted, and appearing to make a mental calculation. "Will it have pockets, madame?"

MEMS. FOR MANIACS.

JANUARY, the first month of the year, took its name from Janus. We don't know what Janus did without his name afterward.

Gardening Operations. The bulbs appear this month. Book your seats early. Protect your tulip beds; sit up with them all night, and keep your blunderbuss loaded. Examine the roots of your dahlias; never mind if you offend them; it's for their good. If you keep a boarding-house, attend to your borders.

FEBRUARY.—February used to come before January. This, however, has since then been set straight, to avoid confusion.

Gardening Operations. Begin to get your annuals ready for next year. Give out your snow-storm stories to be written at midsummer. Pot off well-rooted cuttings of calceolarius. This is good rifle practice. Sow cabbages, but take care that your thread is strong enough.

MARCH.—March used to be called the spring month. In leap-year, however, the name is more properly applied to February.

Gardening Operations. Keep your beds as tidy as you can. Rake and water them carefully. If this won't do, consult an experienced bed-maker. You may nail wall-fruit this month, if no one is looking.

APRIL.—There is a fool moon this month. Let us say on the 12th day, 9 h. 51 m. P.M., but you may fix any other time, if you like it better.

Gardening Operations. Weed your walks, and throw weeds over next-door neighbor's wall. Sow climbers, and sit down and watch them; this requires patience. Plant a biennial, and give him the slip; this is an awful lark, and well repays the trouble.

MAY.—Lads and lasses in the olden time used to repair to the woodlands at the dawn of May morning to gather May on other people's property. Many of them having got into trouble, this fine old practice has subsided.

Gardening Operations.—You should remove bulbs this month; remove those belonging to the people next door, if you can. This is a good time for hoeing, where you can get any tick. Plant tomatoes, and see they turn their toes out.

JUNE.—June is the sixth month of the year, according to the common reckoning. If you don't want to be common, reckon it the fifth.

JULY.—July was named in honor of Julius Cæsar. It usually follows June.

Gardening Operations. Plant out your most forward chrysanthemums. Never mind how forward they are, if of the gentler sex; they'll go off all the quicker. Don't let them be impudent to you, though. Gather seed-pods, and pop them; you won't get much on them, perhaps, but never mind. Stake your scarlet runners, and see they are properly booked.

AUGUST.—Our Saxon ancestors called August "Arn monat;" whether it came when called there is now no telling.

Gardening Operations. Look over your hollyhocks, and make faces at your wife; take care her back is turned. This is a good month to throw bottle-ends and brickbats over the wall into the next-door people's garden.

SEPTEMBER.—September used to be the seventh month; after a while, though, it got tired of being so.

Gardening Operations. Dig up the things in the next-door garden after they are gone to bed. Plant out your cabbages and laugh at them; they will feel dreadfully ashamed of themselves.

OCTOBER.—There is no joke about October, particularly if you haven't paid up your last quarter's rent, and your landlord has put the broker in.

Gardening Operations.—Finish potting the layers of piccotees; also pot your old roosters. Replant your shrubberies—two or three times a day. Get in your bulbs and draw the blinds down. Earth up leeks, more especially if they are in the water-butt.

NOVEMBER.—There is a holiday on the 25th of this month, because the British evacuated New York city about a hundred years ago. From present appearances we should think that a good many of them came back again.

Gardening Operations. Tie your blustering boreases tight. Take up your dahlias sharply if they are pert. Play the cornet to your cabbages; it encourages them. Dig a hole and fill it up again. Get over the wall and break the next-door people's spade.

DECEMBER.—The Feast of Thor, which was celebrated at the winter solstice, was called Guil, from iol, or ol, which signified ale, now corrupted into yule.

Gardening Operations. This is the month for larks. Dig up every thing. Get up a row among the cabbages. Get over the wall and pull the next-door people's noses. Mulch your rhubarb. If the weather is open, shut it up. Serenade the garden roller. Have the garden paved.

People who believe the current stories about intelligent dogs will read with pleasure that a lost dog in Norfolk, having seen his master's advertisement in a local print, promptly went home.

"We're in a pickle now," said a man in a crowd. "A regular jam," said another. "Heaven preserve us!" moaned an old lady.

A soldier can not be even half a soldier if he is in quarters.

"When I put my foot down, I'll have you to understand," says Mrs. Nojoker, "that there's something there." On investigation, it was found to be a No. 11 shoe.

A GAME OF PITCH AND TOSS—A life on the ocean wave.

Every thing that enters Paris has to pay octroi duty. For many weeks an elegantly attired gentleman drove a well-appointed dog-cart from the outskirts to the city, being attended every evening by a neat-looking groom. One night the dog-cart was upset in the presence of the gens-d'armes, who, on going to the rescue, noticed that the groom had not moved from his seat. "Come," said one of the men. The groom preserved a dignified silence. "Come down," cried they, angrily; "don't you see your master is hurt? Are you drunk or stupid?" The groom preserved his English sang-froid, and the employés, giving him a shake, discovered, to their unutterable astonishment, that he was made of zinc, and contained one hundred and fifty litres of Cognac!

Why are teeth like verbs?—Because they are regular, irregular, and defective.

Cornish people have always been, until brought into closer contact in later years with the rest of the world by the railway, very unsophisticated. During the Crimean war a lady went into a shop in Penzance to purchase groceries. While she was there an old woman from the country came in and asked for some candles, for which she had to pay a higher price than usual.

"Why should you ask more for the candles than I have always paid?" inquired she.

"It's owing to the war," says the shop-keeper, "that the price is raised, for candles are become dearer."

"Lor!" ejaculates the poor old woman, holding up her hands. "Well, I never knowed afore that they fight by candle-light! Well, to be sure!"

An enthusiastic Berliner residing on the coast of Guinea obtained a bust of his well-beloved emperor to present to a friendly chief in the slave line of business. It was a plaster of Paris affair (the bust), and in order to give the effect of a bronze work of art of high value the Berliner bestowed a few artistic coats of black upon it. The chief received the bust with pleasure, and remained in contemplation of it for some time. The Berliner was astonished at the marked effect, and asked for an explanation of the long and mute wonder, believing it to be due to his artistic efforts.

The reply was this question, "And is this really the great emperor who conquered his no less mighty neighbor?"

"Indeed it is, Königlich roheit," replied the Berliner.

"Then," responded the negro ruler, "I am indeed delighted, for I see that the great conqueror, the mighty Emperor William, is as I am—a negro."

The effect of his artistic performance astonished the good Berliner.

What is the difference between a farmer and a seamstress?—The farmer gathers what he sows, and the seamstress sews what she gathers.

A young couple were sitting together in a romantic spot, with birds and flowers about them, when the following dialogue ensued:

"My dear, if the sacrifice of my life would please thee, most gladly would I lay it at thy feet."

"Oh, Sir, you are too kind! But it just reminds me that I wish you'd leave off using tobacco."

"Can't think of it. It's a habit to which I am wedded."

"Very well, Sir; since this is the way you lay down your life for me, and as you are already wedded to tobacco, I'll take good care you are never wedded to me, as it would be bigamy."

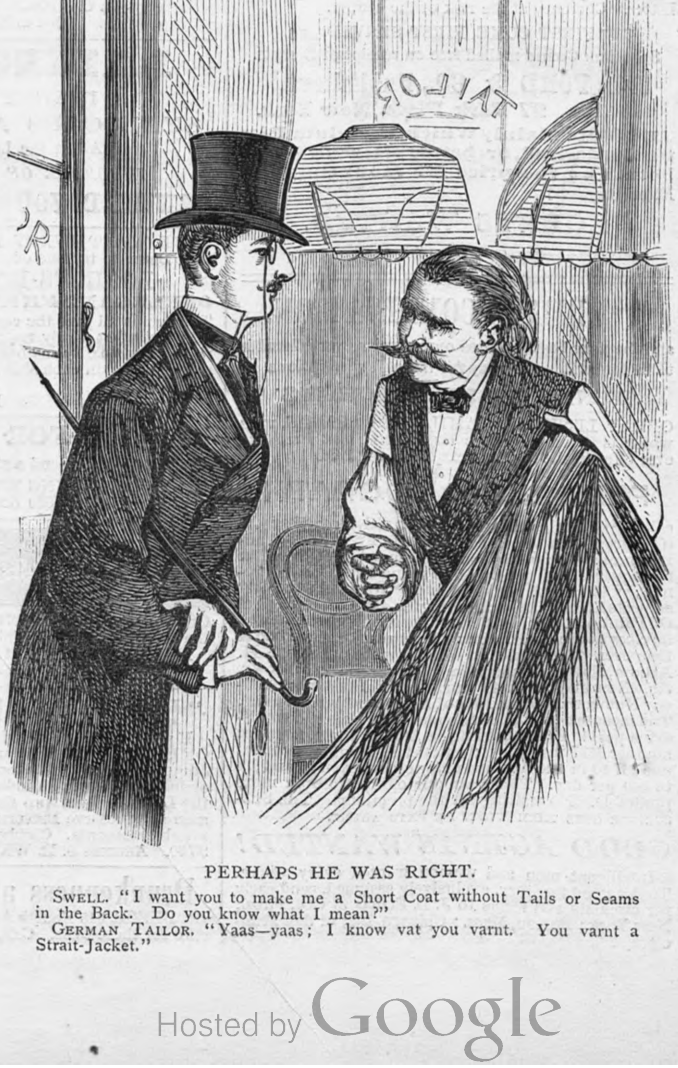
When is a man like a cannon-ball?—When he looks round.

What weed does a gardener seldom object to see?—A cigar in his own mouth.

TOO LATE.

DDLE-AGED CUSTOMER. "Mr. Bassbridge, my Musical Education has been utterly Neglected, but I've a strong Desire to Practice some Instrument. What should you Advise me to take up?"

CONSCIENTIOUS TRADESMAN. "Well, Sir, I should recommend the Triangle—or—yes—I think a Musical Snuff-box, Sir, would be the Best!"



PERHAPS HE WAS RIGHT.

SWELL. "I want you to make me a Short Coat without Tails or Seams in the Back. Do you know what I mean?"

GERMAN TAILOR. "Yaas—yaas; I know vat you varnt. You varnt a Strait-Jacket."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 4.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

IMPROMPTU FURNITURE.

A VERY simple method of preparing a very tasteful little table or work-stand we find described in an old English paper, which will no doubt interest numerous readers of the Bazar.

The plan is to take a square or round board, intended for the top, and cover it with buff chintz, very tightly drawn, and fastened down with tacks on the under side. Then take dark paper of some color that will contrast well—maroon velvet or deep blue—and cut out leaves of various sizes, flowers, or any geometrical design, and paste them on very smoothly as a border, finishing off the edge with a fringe of the same color as the figures. This will commend itself to many on account of its cheapness; and whoever has in the house the bottom of a butter firkin will have a table-top already provided, and may thus complete a really useful little stand for an upper chamber. For a parlor the plan may be still further improved, and at the same time will afford something more appropriate, and corresponding better with the other furniture.

Take a circular or square board of light-colored wood—oak, poplar, maple, or, if nothing better can be had, of white pine, well seasoned. If convenient, let it be grooved or moulded neatly around the edge, and varnish it with a coat of any kind of white filling varnish, rubbing it smooth, when dry, with fine sand-paper. Now cut out of black-walnut veneers, such as are made very thin for covering walls, leaves or figures to form a wreath, or centre pieces and corners, according to taste. One of the prettiest and simplest wreaths may be composed of ivy leaves of

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN AND SILK GAUZE DRESS. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—TULLE AND FAILLE DRESS. For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 42ª, 42ᵇ-44ª, 44ᵇ.

Fig. 3.—POULT DE SOIE AND TARLATAN DRESS. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—GROS GRAIN AND SILK GAUZE DRESS. For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 45-52.

Fig. 5.—SILK GAUZE DRESS. For description see Supplement.

FIGS. 1-5.—LADIES' BALL AND EVENING DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

different shapes and sizes, with berries put on in clusters. Cut all the leaves with stems, but make some to curve to the right and others to the left, so as to facilitate the arrangement of them into wreaths or sprays. Then fasten them on with thin white glue, pressing them entirely flat and close, and when dry varnish the whole surface with one or two coats of dammar. This is perhaps the simplest and cheapest plan for obtaining an excellent imitation of inlaid work, and may be applied to a great variety of other articles.

SNOW-BOUND.

How did it happen? Well, you see,
Charley called for Mary or me;
Sleighing good, and neither loath,
Only wished he could take us both,
So he said. And grandmother smiled,
Nodding at me, "Dress warmly, child."
He looked at Moll
As if to say:
Too bad; but we
Shall ride some day.
While I, half prompted not to go,
Yet feeling, somehow, forced, you know,
Ran to get ready, blithely humming,
Never dreaming of what was coming.

A dear little sleigh and robes—so nice!
And though the air was cold as ice,
I didn't care one bit, not I.
And that horse of Charley's seemed to fly;
While the sleigh-bells' ching-a-ling, clear and sweet,
Kept tune to my heart's bewildered beat,
With a ching-a-ling-ching,
And Charley singing,
"What would you do, love?"
Through their ringing.
Every thing was so perfect and bright
And sweet and warm—for a winter night—
That—that—in fact, though only sleighing,
I hardly knew what Charley was saying.

Snow-bound? Ah, that is only his joke;
There wasn't a storm, and nothing broke,
And we weren't half dead with cold and fear,
Nor buried in drift, as he'd have it appear.
It's only his way of letting you know
Of what befell o'er the crispy snow,
While ching-a-ling-ching
We slid along,
And Charley forgot
To end his song,
And I—well, I was quiet too,
For where was the use, when Charley knew?
All in a breath the past grew clear,
And life shone forth, so dear, so dear!

"Drifts," indeed! and "Pity we went!"
You might have guessed what his "snow-bound" meant.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1873.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of full-sized patterns, descriptions, and illustrations of Ladies' Ball, Evening, and Reception Toilettes; Walking Suits; Dresses for Children under Four Years old; Fichus, Bretelles, Fans, Hair Ornaments, Cigar-Holders, Key-Bags, Easy-Chairs, Tidies, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

THE LIBRARY.

IT is a cheering proof of the general recognition of the importance of books that no modern house of the least pretensions is without an apartment appropriated expressly for keeping and professedly using them. The library, so called, is not always, it is true, as may be pretended, a place for reading and study.

The suddenly made rich and uncultivated man in building his new house resolves that it shall have the completeness of a grand mansion, and gives his orders to the architect not to satisfy such tastes as he may possess, but to absorb the large sum of money he is willing to spend for the display of his newly gotten wealth. He will have, he declares, all that dollars can pay for, and, of course, his new house "must not be without a butler's pantry and a library," which, though in reality they have no more connection than the Paradise Lost of MILTON and a sirloin of beef, he associates together as the essential appurtenances of a dignified residence. The library, however, though its richly carved book-cases may be as indiscriminately filled as the dusty shelves of a street bookstand, is not without its good effect. Books seem to exercise a refining influence by their mere presence, though they may never be read. We may grant that the master of the house seeks his library only as the quietest place wherein to doze over his newspaper or sleep off the effects of his heavy dinner, and that his splendidly bound volumes are in reality no nearer to him than the gilded cornices of his ceiling, yet the apartment and its contents are a desirable possession. The children are brought up with the consciousness at least that there are such things as books, and a place nominally provided for the study of them, and it is presumed that, with a better opportunity of education, they will have a livelier sense of the proper use of both than their unappreciative and somnolent sire.

All houses of sufficient extent to admit of it should have a room set apart for a library. This ought not to be that stately apartment, perpetually smelling of morocco, varnish, and new carpet, of many fashionable mansions, which, with its richly carved rosewood, plate-glass, and book backs of gilt, is kept to exhibit to company as one of the series of show-rooms in which the proprietor of the house delights to display his money's worth.

According to our notion, the library should be essentially a room for use. This, indeed, should be of an especial kind. As study and reading are the purposes of the library, it should be reserved for these, and none of the other occupations and diversions of the family ought to be allowed to interfere with them. Nothing is more favorable to the acquisition of the habit of using books than having them of easy access, and collected together in a place convenient for their perusal. In ordinary families the library, as we call it, or study, as it may be termed, might be used, under proper regulations, as a place for the youthful members of the family to prepare the lessons set for them at school and college, and should have all the conveniences they may require.

The literary, scientific, or professional man will, of course, have his library to suit his particular purpose. His books and the apartment which contains them are like the tools and workshop of a mechanic, and are to be adapted more or less to his special vocation. Our general remarks are therefore, of course, less applicable to his requirements than to those of others. The library we have in view is essentially a family one. The room appropriated to the purpose should be spacious, properly ventilated, and particularly well lighted. As it is chiefly intended for books, it would be well to select an apartment with broad, unbroken walls, that there may be sufficient space for the cases to contain them. If practicable, the library should have a window, or windows, at both ends, and but one door. Open shelves are better than closed cases. In all real libraries the books are exposed without glass or other cover, so that they may be conveniently got at without any preliminary fumbling with a key at a lock, than which there is nothing more trying to a man in the heat and impatience of research. There can be little risk in thus exposing books, or the bookseller and the librarian would not habitually do so with their valuable stocks and collections. The freest circulation of air is essential, in fact, to the preservation of books from the effects of moisture and damage from worms. The cases, accordingly, had better be open, and always kept a short distance away from the wall. All the protection ordinary books require may be secured by means of strips of cloth tacked to the edge of each shelf. This will prevent the accumulation of dust. Judicious use is, after all, the best preservative, but if the contents of the library are only kept for show, it will be necessary to treat them with all the nursing care required by any other fine furniture.

Books themselves are always the most interesting and becoming objects for the eye to rest upon, especially in a library. All concealment, therefore, of them, by means of drapery or any other contrivance of the upholsterer, is inappropriate and contrary to every dictate of good taste. When we behold any thing of the kind we have immediate suspicion of a sham. We recall to mind how once we eagerly opened the plate-glass doors of a book-case draped with beautiful pink satin, radiating in glistening pleats from a central sun of gilt, in expectation of finding some choice literature worthy of being thus magnificently embalmed. The doors yielded quickly to our impatient haste, when, lo and behold, we don't know how many white pots of jam, all in a row, stared us in the face! These were undoubtedly creditable illustrations of the housewifery of the dame of the mansion, and delectable specimens of their kind, but they were not the sweets which we were in search of.

The book-cases, which are the chief furniture of a library, are much more convenient for use when they are made only so high that the uppermost shelf may be within easy reach of the outstretched arm. When thus constructed low, they moreover offer good foundations for statuettes and busts, and have a more tasteful effect.

A table with a solid hold upon the floor, a broad cloth-covered surface, and numerous easy-sliding drawers, a few well-cushioned chairs, and a thick carpet or rugs, are the chief requirements of the library, in addition to the books and the cases which contain them. Most students, however well-warmed may be the apartment in which they work, are liable to suffer from coldness of feet. Instead of attempting to remedy this by raising to an excessive degree the general temperature of the room, it is better to make special provision for the warmth of the feet by having a fur skin of some kind or other for them to rest upon. In case of protracted study or writing, it is well to vary frequently the posture of the body, and therefore we would recommend, in addition to the library table, a standing desk, or pult, as it is called by those most persistent of students, the Germans, who universally use it.

It is a common mistake, we think, to employ concentrated instead of diffused light for night-work. Where necessity compels the economy of a single lamp, it is no doubt better to have a shade to confine its limited brightness to the point where it is especially required by the eye. Where, however, no such motive prevents a free supply of artificial light, the more complete and diffused it is, the better it will be, both for clearness of vision and the health of its organ.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Rectangularity.

MY DEAR THADDEUS,—Among the earlier social sketches of Leech—and they will all become more interesting and valuable as time passes—there is one which shows "Where you should not dine on Christmas-day." It reveals a chill British interior. There is a drawing-room in which the chandelier is still in the bag and the chairs are covered. The family is assembled in full dinner dress. The British father in white waistcoat and cravat stands with his back to the fire, his hands in his pockets, and his big, mean, mutton-chop-whiskered face lifted superciliously toward a youth who has unfortunately called, upon the chance of an invitation to dinner. Three wretched British young ladies with curls and low-necked dresses sit in a row upon a family sofa. Behind them the British brother lifts his chin and draws on his white gloves, and separated from the sisters by a table sits a meek young woman in black, evidently a cousin from the country—a poor relation. The chilly British matron sits upon the other side of the room with the aunt and uncle; and the whole family freezes the hapless youth as he enters, feeling, too late, that this is the very place where you should not dine on Christmas-day. Of course he escapes as soon as he can, and is off to some happy, hilarious home where there is less white cravat, and where he is not impaled at every turn upon the sharpest angles.

We call it the British home, but the angularity is not confined to Britannia. With a very small effort of the imagination I enter similar drawing-rooms, where the chairs and tables and sofas and book-cases are on their chilliest good behavior, where the rugs lie with mathematical precision, and the place of every trifle upon the mantel or upon the table has evidently been determined by exact calculation. There are houses of such angular perfection that you would be afraid to stand if you were not more afraid to sit. What would happen in either case is inconceivable. Every thing is very splendid and costly, but somehow it is all carved in ice. A blazing wood fire in the gorgeous parlors seems an impropriety, and the crackling and sputtering of coal should bring a blush to the well-regulated cheek. The very books upon the shelves turn upon the humble spectator disdainful backs bristling with gilt. Somehow one of these superb interiors, over which morbid Propriety, the god of right-angled triangles, presides, is like a magnificent mausoleum of lapis lazuli, a vast refrigerator, a glittering grotto hewn out of a glacier.

And what, tell me—what are children to do in such a house? Poor things! they can not resist the baleful influence. They become rectangular too. They are always upon dress parade. The cool admonitions shower them like snow-flakes. "Adolphus, my dear, I am surprised!" "Melissa, my love, you forget yourself!" Warmth, eagerness, spontaneity, impulse, are the mortal sins. They are put under the ban. Now it is the business of children to romp, to roar, to racket, and turn the home into a Pandemonium. Have you grizzly bears in the dining-room? Is that a squadron of cavalry coming down stairs? These are the becoming questions in a house full of children. But in the house of angles silence reigns and enthusiasm is regulated. You wouldn't dine there on Christmas-day. No. And when would you dine there, if you could help yourself?

I am far from always holding the mistress of the household responsible for the rectangularity. It is often a horrid enchantment which seizes her and sways her helplessly. I am very sure, for instance, that little Mrs. Prism wishes that her house were not so "faultily faultless." But what can she do? She is unhappy if a single hair of her head is not in its proper place. If she saw "a speck of dust" upon one of the mantels or upon a drawing-room table, I tremble for the consequences. If any piece of furniture were "worn," or there were confusion any where—if any body's shawl or coat or India rubbers were in the wrong place, or there were a book left upon the sideboard, or a stray piece of work upon a chair or a sofa—little Mrs. Prism's self-reproaches and wrath would be so bitter that life itself would be a mere burden. Now what is she to do? Is she to descend to breakfast with her head disheveled? Or shall she deliberately derange the good order of her drawing-room? Is she to encourage the deposition of dust upon the table? You might as well expect her to wear her shoe down at the heel, or to carry a ragged pocket-handkerchief. She can not help herself. Do you not see people who never appear to be well dressed, although they may wear the finest of clothes, made by the most skillful of tailors and dress-makers? We can be what we please, can we? Then, Master Riquet, please to stand straight as Apollo. Oh, you didn't mean that? Then, Madame Gruffenuff, will you kindly fit this glass slipper to your foot? You can not do it. No: and neither can little Mrs. Prism be other than so prim and proper and angular that you might hang game for a month by her domestic hearth and it would not thaw.

Is this rectangularity any more agreeable when it is the rule of daily life? I meet Todger in the street, and I say, pulling out my watch, "Todger, 'tis half past twelve; let us go and have an oyster." The poor man looks at me and says, "Very sorry, but I never lunch until half past one." We have not met for a year. We were friends once. To this sympathetic breast he confided that hopeless passion for Desdemona, who married as you know—and now he is very sorry, but the laws of the Medes and Persians forbid his lunching an hour earlier. Friendship, good-fellowship, the nameless pleasures of a cheerful—oyster (no, my dear Thaddeus, you thought that I was going to say glass, and so expose myself to teetotal excommunication)—all these are nothing in comparison with his "regular system." The fellow to whom I put out a cordial hand has pierced my heart with the icy point of an angle. I call upon Mrs. Muff. She is constantly gauging the temperature, and in the midst of conversation she exclaims that it must be very warm, and sweeps across the room to consult the mercury. "Bless my soul!" says Mrs. Muff, "seventy degrees! I never allow the mercury to rise above sixty-seven, or, at the very most, sixty-seven and a half." I, however, am not uncomfortable. In fact, I can stand a heat of seventy-two degrees, and in a room without an open fire I am never comfortably warm, although I may suffocate. Mrs. Muff opens the door or the window, "for nothing," she says, "is so bad as a hot room, and we Americans always sit in such ovens." "Yes, madame; last year the mercury in the house in which I was staying marked ninety-eight degrees." "Heavens! Mr. Bachelor, and you live to tell the tale?" "'Twas in August, ma'am!" "La! Mr. Bachelor, you will have your jest." Yes—but why not ask me whether I was suffering with the heat? Nothing so selfish as the rectangular rule of life.

Even in traveling in the cars we can not escape it. I am sitting comfortably by a window. The air is not agreeable, but it is not very bad; and I see with apprehension a severe-looking lady entering at the door. There is a certain high resolution upon her firm features, and I perceive at once that she has stepped upon the platform with a fixed theory of the situation. The car is full; it is hot; the air is poisonous—these are her data. As she enters she looks rapidly at the windows, which are closed, yet the ventilators are open. To my dismay, she makes for the seat before me, saying, as she pushes along, "Horrible! What air! The black hole of Calcutta was nothing to it! Whew! whew!" I have already a cold, and I know what is coming. Up goes the window, and an icy blast dashes at me. Instantly every body in the car is uncomfortable. "Frightful air! frightful, frightful!" says my severe neighbor, in a tone which defies the whole company. "We shall all be asphyxiated." Very well, madame, suppose we are. We must all die some time, and why not of asphyxia as well as pneumonia? Her confounded right-angled rule stabs us all right and left. Because fresh air is good, shall we be forced to take draughts of ice? My dear lady, why not have your rules of courtesy as rigid as those of ventilation?

The famous Mrs. Comus was truly a rectangular person. There are twelve months in the year, said that lady, and three in each season. Our clothing should be adjusted to each. Therefore Mrs. Comus closed her winter wardrobe on the 1st of May, and opened that for summer. On the 2d of May the mercury might be any where toward the bulb, but it was after the day appointed for putting on thinner garments, and if the weather did not choose to correspond to the rule it was certainly not the fault of Mrs. Comus. She was only responsible for her rules, and for their rigorous enforcement. And even my cousin Blandina, when she was younger, hedged herself about with the thorniest angles, and tried to lay out her whole life with a kind of stiff Versailles formality. In those ancient days of our youth I used to run into her house and whip out an apple or a sugar-plum for the young people. "My dear cousin," she said to me, as she confiscated the contraband, "my children never eat between meals, and under no circumstances could I permit their stomachs to receive candy. Thank you very much, but 'tis impossible." Or I went in, smiling, with a ticket to the Midsummer Night's Dream, or the Merry Wives of Windsor, and proposed to take a pair of younglings to the play. "No, thank you! they never go to the play; and, besides, it would take Selina from her practicing, and keep them both up long after bedtime. They always go to bed at eight." In vain I pleaded Christmas, holidays, a little spree, a wise departure from the code. The rectangularity was invincible. The only thing considered was going to bed at eight o'clock.

Hosted by Google

Selina has her own children now, and when the fatal hour strikes in the very midst of a game, although the rule is eight o'clock, there is another rule that overbears it; and that other rule is that rules should now and then be broken. Bacon says that moderation should be the law, but an occasional excess is good. I suppose he means sherry as the roadster, so to speak, and now and then a foaming beaker of Champagne as the racer! I hope that you understand me, Thaddeus, for if I were to put this letter into a sermon, I should select for my text, "It is the letter that killeth," and exhort my congregation to eschew rectangularity.

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SHORT SKIRTS.

LEADERS of fashion are again taking a decided stand in favor of short skirts for street suits. Whether the fresh protest against the slovenliness of long skirts is merely a return of good sense, or is caused by the fact that the newest Parisian costumes are short enough to escape the ground, we can not tell; but the effect is good, and we are glad to chronicle it. A leading modiste says her most fashionable customers are ordering their costumes made shorter; or else, if the skirts are made long enough to train slightly, when used in the house or carriage, they are invariably provided with numerous loops and buttons to shorten them when worn in the street. Ladies have found it difficult to shorten their skirts gracefully, to prevent them from looking bunchy, or from "dipping" between the loops; but it is quite possible to do this, provided enough loops and buttons are supplied. The best plan is to put the loops on the outside of the skirt a short distance below the belt. Instead of braid or cord loops, use tiny squares of silk (doubled or lined with muslin), in each of which a buttonhole is made. Find the extra length of the skirt beyond walking length, and place the button-hole squares exactly that length below the belt at intervals of six inches, beginning in the middle of the first side gore, and continuing all around the back and sides of the skirt. The buttons to which these are to be fastened are small moulds covered with silk, and should be placed just below the belt. If these directions are followed, and the skirt is looped before being put on, it will be found to be a graceful, trim short skirt.

SKATING SUITS.

The skating season has returned, and with it appear some jaunty new skating costumes. Utility and warmth, rather than elegance of material, are desirable in these pretty outfits, hence the popularity of the thick twilled flannel dresses and the sailor "toggery" that young girls and children have adopted for the rink. A dark navy blue flannel dress with ample sailor blouse, a straight clinging skirt trimmed with bands of lighter blue cashmere, and a scarf of the cashmere knotted loosely around the hips, is an effective dress for a young skater, and serviceable also, as it will not be injured by contact with the ice. If worn over thick under-clothing, an extra wrap will not be needed during the heating exercise. Similar dresses are made of black woolen stuffs, brightened by scarlet merino bands, and of gray twilled flannel with blue borders, pockets, collar, cuffs, and sash. Young girls wear these dresses quite short, giving occasional glimpses of the blue or scarlet stocking worn to match the dress. The Scotch plaid costumes once so popular with skaters are now confined to very young children. Young ladies appear at the rink in the short woolen suits worn in the street. The roughly twilled camel's-hair polonaises, with fur border and velvet skirt, make handsome wintry costumes suitable for this purpose. Fine English blue water-proof, and the dark blue ladies' cloth suits, with trimmings of wide braid and huge buttons, are worn with belts of Russia leather, fastened by wide buckles of filigree that look like breast-plates, and from which dangle fanciful bags and chatelaine trinkets. The cap is a seal-skin turban, or else a saucy Tyrolienne of felt, with a gay wing stuck in the band, and the top of the high crown dented, or else caught down on the side by a tassel. The hair is combed straight up from the forehead and nape of the neck and arranged in a tiny knot on top of the head, and this knot is concealed by the turban; a fringe of the hair droops over the forehead, and the sides are "fluffy" rather than smooth. School-girls wear two long plaits of hair braided only half their length, tied with gay ribbon, and the ends left flowing. The rich velvet and showy velveteen suits worn when skating first came into fashion are now seldom seen.

FUR ROBES.

The sleighing carnival of midwinter has brought into use the loveliest fur robes. There are fashions in carriage robes as in other things, and the caprice this season is for dark robes made of the skins of the brown beaver, the wolverine, and the black or brown bear, instead of the white-fox robes that ladies once preferred for their carriages and sleighs. Most fashionable of all for a lady's use are the brown-beaver robes, smooth, reddish-brown, and glossy, resembling dark seal-skin. These are lined with bright blue or scarlet cloth that is pinked on the edges and extends beyond the fur to form a border: they cost from $100 to $150. Next in choice is the shaded yellowish-brown "wolverine" robe, which costs from $75 to $120. The favorite black-bear robes cost from $100 to $175. The long fleece of the brown bear is the color of mink fur, but less soft, and is used for gentlemen's cabs and sleigh robes: price $75. Lynx robes of soft light grayish fur are less expensive, costing about $45. The black genet robes cost from $40 to $50. Among the white robes that are still used, especially for sleighs, the handsomest is the long soft fleece of the white fox, resting like a snow-drift on its gay-colored lining: $75 to $100 is the range of prices. The white-bear robes cost from $100 to $175. A very dainty and inexpensive robe for a lady's coupé is of white Astrakhan, the skin of the Iceland lamb: price from $30 to $50. A novelty for ladies is a robe of the fleece of the white merino sheep, "tipped," as the furriers term it: this costs $75. Children's carriage robes are of the white chamois-skin, imported from Switzerland: price $15 with blue cloth lining.

For sleighs, the skins of the red fox and the gray are made into warm robes. The first is yellowish-red with white lines, and the second is a yellow fleece with gray stripes: price $65. The skins of the beautiful spotted leopard are also made into sleigh robes: price $45. One mammoth affair has the head of the animal mounted in the most natural manner, and attached to the skin, to hang over the back of the sleigh.

For the coachman, who most of all is exposed to the cold, are wolf and tiger skins, also the wild-cat, 'coon, and buffalo skins, warmly wadded and lined, for lap robes. Those of the Japanese wolf are inexpensive, costing from $25 to $35. Coachmen's capes of black genet fur, reaching below the elbow, are worn with the long livery overcoat by drivers of stylish equipages.

FOOT-MUFFS, RUGS, ETC.

Among other seasonable things found at the furriers' are comfortable foot-muffs for carriage use. These are made of tiger or leopard skins, warmly lined with softer fleeces, and cost from $6 to $10.

Small rugs, soft and warm, for invalids, or to be placed by the bedside and receive bare feet on wintry mornings, have the entire skin of the white fox, its head and cunning eyes, its legs and shaggy tail, spread at length on cloth of brilliant hue, prettily wrought and pinked around the edges: price $20. Other rugs and small lap robes are fancifully made of circular strips of seal and otter skins of different shades.

SEAL-SKIN HOODS, HATS, ETC.

Fur hoods are comfortable for sleighing and traveling bonnets, but hitherto they have been so clumsy and unbecoming that they have not found favor. The last importations, however, are so pretty that ladies are using them with evening cloaks as sorties du bal. These are fanchons of seal-skin, with a Marie Stuart point on the forehead, lappets over the ears, and ribbon strings to tie under the chin. The lining is of soft silk, that will not disarrange the hair, and is warmly wadded. Plain seal-skin hoods are $12; with beaver borders they are $14 or $16.

The newest seal-skin hats are of French importation, and are made in the shape of the fashionable sailor bonnet, with turned up brim and broad crown. By way of ornament two long tabs or fur tails are pendent behind, and the head, breast, and tail plumage of a bird is stuck on the left side: price $20.

Seal-skin mittens for ladies to draw on over kid gloves cost from $2 50 to $5. Boys' gloves of seal-skin are now finished with kid on the inside of the hand, like those worn by gentlemen, and are warmly lined with lamb-skin: price from $3 to $5.

EIDER-DOWN QUILTS, ETC.

The furnishing houses also make a display of the warmth-giving articles so desirable at this season. Among these are eider "comfortables," or quilts filled with down, so warm and soft, yet of scarcely perceptible weight, making them an especial boon to invalids. Covered with French calico, in gayest Turkey red shades, and quilted in lines at wide intervals, instead of in the small figures that make a quilt hard and unpliable, they cost $28; with gay silk covering, also very slightly quilted, they cost from $50 to $55, according to their size.

California blankets, with thick, fine fleece, snowy white and as soft as down, are considered by housewives as the perfection of warmth and comfort for bed-covering. They come in various qualities, costing from $10 50 to $35 a pair; those popularly sold are of medium price, costing about $14. All-wool blankets of ordinary thickness cost from $6 to $20 a pair. The twilled cotton-wool blankets, with just enough cotton to prevent shrinkage, are commended by thrifty housewives for the nursery and for other beds that are in constant use: price from $3 to $10 a pair.

For information received thanks are due, for dresses and dress goods, to Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co; and A. T. STEWART & Co.; and for furs to C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS.

PERSONAL.

OUR Washington belles are capturing the cleverest of the foreign diplomats. The latest victory is that of Miss CAMPBELL, who is to be led to the hymeneal, etc., by Mr. WILLIAM OSWALD CHARLTON, of the British Legation. Mr. C. is of an old Northumbrian family who have always been Catholics, and the understanding when he came hither to take upon himself a portion of the responsibilities of the British lion was that he should marry neither an American nor a Catholic. The lady is both, is quite young, and is regarded as one of the most beautiful girls in Washington; and, what is better, CHARLTON père has been in Washington, seen the future daughter-in-law, and is delighted with the programme. How nice!

—Again the rumor is revived that the ex-imperial family of France will come over to us early next season, and travel through the length and breadth of the land.

—Mr. JOHN M. FRANCIS, editor of the Troy Times, and at present minister to Greece, where he has become the especial guide, philosopher, and friend of the king, has utterly extinguished the story about the Maid of Athens, and that the said maid is now an old woman and in want. When the bit of poetry which created her was written, BYRON was boarding with a Mrs. MACRI, and left these now famous lines behind with other scraps when he left the house. They were entirely imaginary so far as the heroine is concerned, and were only preserved by the family as a memento of their afterward distinguished boarder. Subsequently the daughter of Mrs. MACRI—at the time the verses were written a girl of ten years—became associated with the verses as "Zoe," but without reason therefor other than the imagination of those curious in Byronic legend.

—Medical men of all nationalities are to be called on to contribute funds for the erection of a monument at Berlin to the great oculist of Europe, VON GRAEFFE.

—GAMBETTA acknowledged recently to a merchant of Lyons that he was a Jew, but had not been in a synagogue since he was eight years old. It is high time for him to look up his little Pentateuch and go among rabbis.

—ROBERT BROWNING is at work on a new poem, and has forsworn dinner-parties in order that he may give genius a chance. It is rather tough for him, for good ROBERT BROWNING doth much love the feast of reason and the flow of soul—the modest oyster, the cheerful duck, the animating Champagne, and things cognate.

—One of those girls who greeted the Parent of the Country on the occasion of his entry into Newburyport, Massachusetts, has just died in that town. She was ninety-seven.

—In the recently published memoirs of Baron STOCKMAR we find the following story of the Princess Imperial of Germany, then Princess Royal of England, and a child: "PRATORIUS, one of the German secretaries of Prince ALBERT, was not a good-looking man. The queen was once reading the Bible with her little daughter, the princess. They came to the passage, 'God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him.' Upon which the child, gifted with an early sense of beauty, exclaimed, 'But, mamma, surely not Dr. PRATORIUS!'"

—The event of the season is the great Charity Ball in aid of the Nursery and Child's Hospital, which will be given at the Academy of Music, in this city, on the evening of Wednesday, February 5. Its list of managers embraces the names of nearly all of our wealthiest and best citizens; and although the previous entertainments in behalf of this noble institution have been elegant and enjoyable, this year's ball will eclipse all former efforts. We understand that the arrangements are of the most elaborate character, and the ladies and gentlemen who have them in charge are deserving of the most liberal encouragement. The institution is eminently worthy, and this event one of interest to all.

—M. CAMONDO, a Hebrew, said to be worth an indefinite number of millions, is the most opulent private banker of the East, and the ROTHSCHILD of Constantinople. Some years since he purchased of the Italian government the title of count, which gives him a certain personal position and character as a banker.

—Mr. KODAMA, the Japanese gentleman who was baptized in Washington last year by the Rev. Dr. NEWMAN, and commenced to study law, has abandoned the legal notion, and is now preparing for the Methodist ministry. It is his intention to establish and preach in a Methodist church in Japan.

—Mrs. MARY CLEMMER AMES, one of the "brightest and best" of the Washington correspondents, has resumed epistolary work for the Independent and the Brooklyn Union. Her biography of ALICE and PHŒBE CARY is having a large sale. She was an intimate friend of the sisters, and was for some time an inmate of their family.

—The Rev. FREDERICK HOWLETT, an English astronomer, announces his discovery of sundry more little spots on the sun, which have easily escaped the notice of other observers, as they only cover a thousand million square miles.

—The Rev. HUBBELL LOOMIS, father of Professor LOOMIS, of Yale, died on the 16th ult., in Upper Alton, Illinois, at the age of ninety-seven. He was one of the oldest men and oldest settlers of Illinois.

—Governor HARTRANFT, of Pennsylvania, proposes to introduce a polite civil service reform, by introducing female clerical labor in the various departments of the State government.

—Mr. FORREST'S biography, which has been in preparation for three years past, will be quite unique and exceptionally good in the way of illustration. During this period the biographer, Mr. WILLIAM L. ALGER, aided by Mr. JAMES OAKES, has been at work collecting facts and material for the work. In consequence of Mr. FORREST'S death the publication will be delayed for the purpose of introducing many facts and incidents touching his private and inner life that could not have been published with propriety during his life. There will doubtless be published a number of biographies of FORREST, but none so authentic or complete as the one authorized by the tragedian himself previous to his death. As soon as it is possible to complete it this work will be published, under the personal supervision of the historian, and with the sanction of JAMES OAKES, of Boston, JAMES LAWSON, of New York, and DANIEL DOUGHERTY, of Philadelphia, the executors of Mr. FORREST'S will, and trustees of his estate.

—Miss CLARA REMINGTON, of St. Louis, has this consolation: she is to have the fee-simple of an estate in Cuba worth $500,000, which was recently left to her by a Spanish officer, Colonel MUNCOS, to whom for some time she had been engaged.

—WIENIAWSKI is a wag. The RUBINSTEIN troupe having had thin audiences at the Hub, he remarked, "Our only trouble is lest, if we stay in Boston much longer, we may become unaccustomed to appearing in public."

—HENRY MEIGS, the railroad king of Peru, recently presented President BALTA'S wife with $150,000 on her birthday, and at the same time sent her daughter $50,000—mere little trifles with the noble MEIGS—something that he does every day or two.

—Madame ARABELLA GODDARD, who is a personal and professional favorite of Queen VICTORIA, starts next year on a tour, commencing in Australia, thence to California, then to New York, and so home to old England.

—Concerning foreign princes, the last rumor is that a son of BISMARCK is engaged to be married to an American girl.

—Mr. BONTON, a dealer in curious books, has at his place in Broadway what is doubtless the most valuable copy of the Bible ever compiled. It represents the toil for thirty years of an English collector of Biblical prints, engravings, drawings in oil and water colors, and is roughly valued at $10,000. Such subjects as "Susanna and the Elders" or "Daniel in the Lions' Den" are enriched with scores of illustrations drawn from every field of art—the convent missals of the medieval ages, the strange, fanciful, strikingly false drawing of the Italian masters, the grotesque works of Dutch and German painters, and the later and more truthful efforts of modern artists. In all, this wonderful monument of loving devotion to a worthy hobby includes no less than 30,000 illustrations of various kinds, some of them worth from $50 to $100 each, and extracts from some thirty editions of the sacred text.

—Dr. CHARLES SPIER, of Visalia, California, is said to be the oldest living and most successful numismatist in the world. He has been engaged in coin-collecting for over fifty-seven years, and has now over 14,000 pieces, representing every species of coin ever produced in any year, or under the dominion of any sovereign or government, from the days of SEMIRAMIS and the PHARAOHS to the present time. His collection is worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. He has over 10,000 of his pieces in the vaults of the Bank of California, and 4000 or over here. At the Bank of California his collection is pronounced the best and most valuable in existence, not excepting those of Queen VICTORIA and the Sultan of Turkey, which are particularly extensive and valuable. The 4000 pieces stored here embrace coins of the ancient Jewish kingdom; of the various kings, consuls, and emperors of Rome; of Tyre, Sidon, Nineveh, Babylon, China, Palestine, etc.; with specimens of every year's coinage in all Christian lands from the time of CONSTANTINE till now. He has gold and silver coins from the size of a very large tea-cup down to that of a pea. The doctor is in easy circumstances, very old, and remains in Visalia on account of the excellence of the climate.

—The income of young Mr. BENNETT, of the Herald, is said to be about $700,000 per annum; apropos of which a cynical swell remarks, "This will do, of course; but we had supposed that the old gentleman was really wealthy."

—One of the most remarkable women among the royal families of Europe is the Princess Imperial of Prussia, the eldest child of Queen VICTORIA. Of course she appears on all necessary state occasions, but most of her life is spent in comparative seclusion. She and her husband from the first laid down strict rules as to the sphere of their activity, and have scrupulously and consistently refrained from any thing like interference with political affairs. The prince never hesitates to give his opinion on any matter frankly and fully when it is asked for; but this is not very often, and he has always taken care to guard against setting up a little independent court of his own. As for the princess, she is absolutely and entirely cut off from politics in every shape. Her nature and training have combined to inspire her with a profound respect for the habits of constitutional government. Nothing could be more remote or foreign to the whole tenor of her life and character than political meddling. Social questions occupy her attention. She has given a great impulse to all kinds of philanthropic asylums, provident societies, etc. She takes a deep interest in the woman's rights movement in its more rational aspects—in the efforts made to improve female education, and to expand the sphere of female labor. She carries on a constant and voluminous correspondence with the leaders of this and kindred movements in this country, and they are indebted to her for much excellent practical advice and encouraging sympathy, as well as more substantial help. The GUELPHS have usually been distinguished by a fair share of shrewdness and common-sense, but the Princess Imperial has more than this. She is undoubtedly the ablest member of her family; she has a quick, robust intelligence, deep sensibility, and a strong sense of duty. She is an excellent musician, a clever artist both in painting and sculpture, and a capital talker; but she has much more than the accomplishments of the salon. She is an earnest and conscientious thinker, and quite abreast of the intellectual movements of the day. In her family circle she is a devoted wife and mother. An old friend who saw her immediately after the news had arrived of the victory of Königgratz found her in tears for a child she had lost, and she could talk of nothing else. Baron STOCKMAR, who knew her well, used to say she possessed remarkable gifts, even amounting to inspiration. In short, she is a remarkable woman, of whom we shall, in all probability, hear more in coming years.

Hosted by Google

Embroidered Cigar-Box, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS cigar-box, in the shape of an Alpine cottage, is of carved brown stained wood, three inches and a quarter high, eight inches long, and five inches and three-quarters wide. The inside of the lid is furnished with embroidery in satin and half-polka stitch on brown silk reps with saddler's silk in a lighter shade. The embroidery may also be worked with silk of various colors in the design of the medallions shown on page 20, Harper's Bazar, No. 2, Vol. VI., or else in petit point.

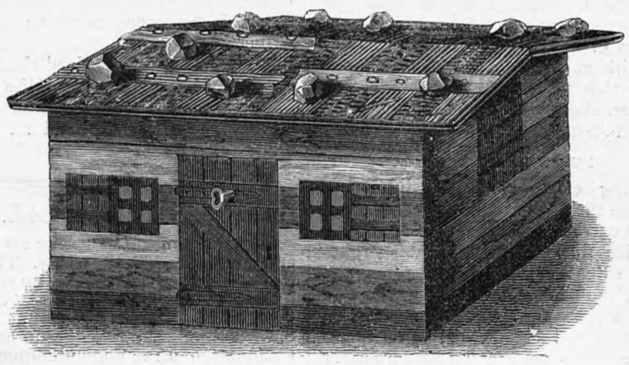

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED CIGAR-BOX.—CLOSED.

EMBROIDERED SEWING-WEIGHT.
For design see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 40.

Embroidered Sewing-Weight.

THIS sewing-weight consists of a square polished black wooden box three inches and a quarter in diameter and an inch and three-quarters high, which is ornamented with plates of bronze and pearl beads, fastened on a plate of lead covered with red velvet and filled in with lead. The cushion on the upper surface of the sewing-weight is covered with fine red cashmere and embroidered with sewing silk in various colors in half-polka stitch and point Russe; Fig. 40, of the present Supplement, gives the design for the embroidery. In the middle of the cushion is a handle of polished black wood with bronze ring.

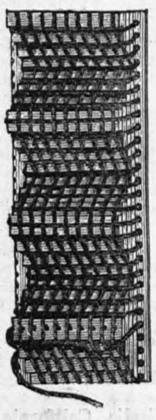

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF BORDER OF SEWING NÉCESSAIRE.

Paper-Weight with Point Russe Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS pretty paper-weight, which at the same time serves for holding envelopes, notices, pen-holders, etc., is made of red Russia leather and bronzed metal. The rim is furnished with a border worked in half-polka stitch and point Russe on gray silk with saddler's silk in various colors; Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the border.

Sewing Nécessaire with Pincushion, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS nécessaire consists of an oval card-board box six inches long and two inches and a half high, with a flat lid, which is joined to the box by means of a hinge. The lid, which is furnished with a cushion, and the rim of the box are covered with red velvet, and the rim is trimmed, besides, with a border worked on perforated board with saddler's silk of various colors, as shown by Fig. 1. Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the border. As seen in the illustration, the border consists of raised sections; for each of which take four double pieces of perforated board, the lowest piece counting seven holes in width and the uppermost one hole in width, paste them, first, together, and then on a corresponding strip of perforated board, and stretch colored silk on these pieces. The inside of the box is covered with red silk, and the lid with gray silk; the latter is ornamented with a medallion of silk of various colors in satin and half-polka stitch, for which either of the designs shown on page 20 of Harper's Bazar, No. 2, Vol. VI., may be used. On the bottom of the box fasten bands of red silk.

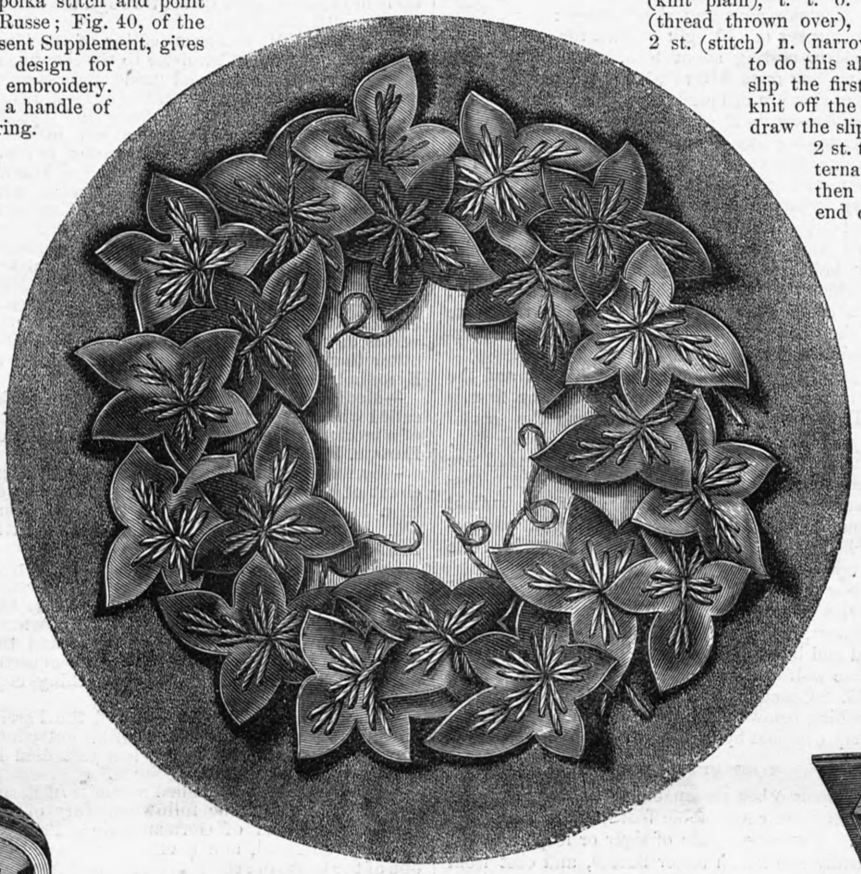

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY FOR WALL-POCKET. FULL SIZE.—[See Page 53.]

Fig. 1.—SEWING NÉCESSAIRE WITH PINCUSHION.

Tatted Square for Cravats, etc.

THIS square is suitable for trimming cravats and lingerie, as well as for tidies. When designed for cravats and lingerie, use fine twisted cotton, while for tidies the cotton should be coarser. Begin the square from the middle, working with one thread (shuttle) one four-leaved figure as follows: One leaflet of 6 ds. (double stitch), 7 p. (picot) separated each by 3 ds., 6 ds. Close to this work three similar leaflets, and then tie the ends of the working thread together. Work four more figures like the one just finished, and fasten them to the middle figure as shown by the illustration, fastening the working thread to the first and last p. of two leaflets of the middle figure, instead of forming the middle p. of one of the four leaflets in working each figure. Now work with two threads one round for the outer edge of the square in the following manner: ∗ With one thread work one leaflet of 6 ds., 3 p. separated each by 3 ds., 3 ds., fasten to the middle p. of a leaflet in one of the four figures worked last, 3 ds., 3 p. separated each by 3 ds., 6 ds., close to this one leaflet like the preceding, but fasten to a leaflet of the next figure, turn the work, and with both threads work one scallop of 3 ds., 7 p. separated each by 3 ds., 3 ds., turn the work, three times alternately one leaflet and one scallop like the preceding, fasten the leaflets as shown by the illustration; repeat from ∗, and, finally, fasten the threads.

Fig. 1.—PAPER-WEIGHT WITH POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY.

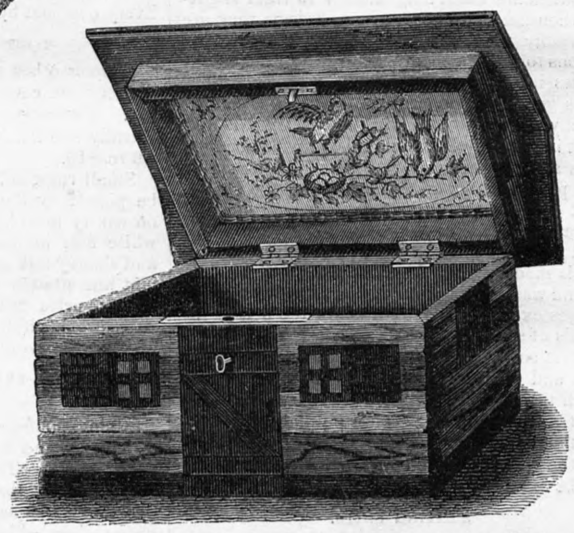

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED CIGAR-BOX.—OPEN.

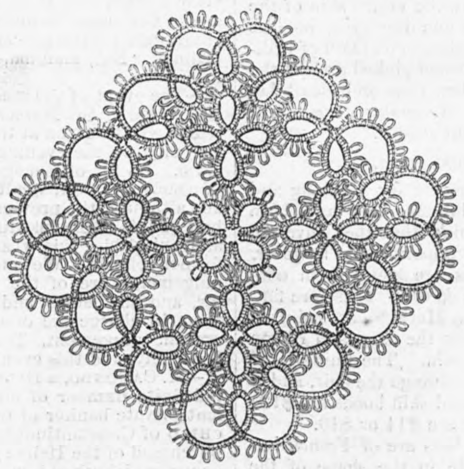
Knitted Designs for Stocking Tops, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—The number of stitches for this design should be divisible by 17; knit in rounds, always going forward, as follows: 1st, 2d, and 3d rounds.—All purled. 4th round.—∗ 2 k. (knit plain), t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 2 st. (stitch) n. (narrowed; to do this always slip the first st., knit off the following 2 st. together, and draw the slipped st. over these), t. t. o., k. 2 st. together crossed; five times alternately 1 p. (purled), 1 st. crossed, then t. t. o. Repeat from ∗ to the end of the round. The repetition from ∗ takes place in every following round, and will, therefore, not be referred to again. 5th round.—K. 2 st. together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o., k. 2 st. together crossed, k. 1 crossed, four times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., k. 1 crossed. 6th round.—∗ 2 k., t. t. o., 2 st. n., t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, four times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 7th round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, k. 1 crossed; three times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., k. 1 crossed, 1 p., k. 1 crossed, then t. t. o. 8th round.—∗ 2 k., t. t. o., 2 st. n., t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed; three times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., twice alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 9th round.—∗ K. 2 st. together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, k. 1 crossed, twice alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., k. 1 crossed, twice alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 10th round.—∗ 2 k., t. t. o., 2 st. n., t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, twice alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed, then t. t. o., three times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 11th round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, k. 1 crossed, 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., k. 1 crossed, three times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 12th round.—∗ 2 k., t. t. o., 2 st. n., t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, 1 p., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., four times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 13th round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., k. 1 crossed, four times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 14th round.—∗ 2 k., t. t. o., 2 st. n., t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, t. t. o., five times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. 15th round.—∗ K. 2 together, t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, t. t. o., k. 2 together crossed, t. t. o., five times alternately 1 p., k. 1 crossed. Repeat continually from the fourth round.

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF BORDER OF PAPER-WEIGHT.



TATTED SQUARE FOR CRAVATS, ETC.

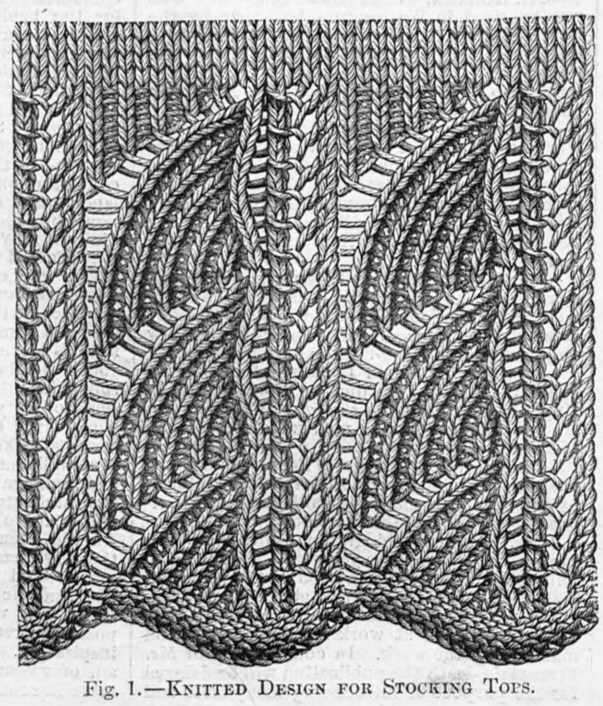


Fig. 1.—KNITTED DESIGN FOR STOCKING TOPS.

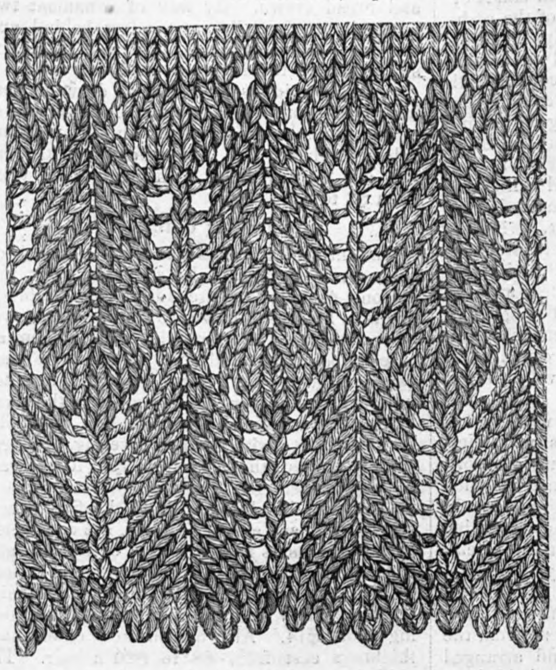

Fig. 2.—KNITTED DESIGN FOR STOCKING TOPS.

Fig. 2.—The number of stitches for this design is divisible by 9. The lower end of the garter is finished by small points. On a foundation of the requisite length knit four rounds plain and one round of alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together; then again four rounds plain. Then take up the lower veins of the foundation st. on separate needles, fold down the lower part of the knitting on the wrong side, and now knit off together always 1 st. of the last round with one of the st. taken upon separate needles. Now begin the design. All rounds designated by even numbers are knit all plain. 1st round. —* 1 st. n. (to do this slip the first st., knit off the following st., and draw the slipped st. over), k. 2 together, 2 k., t. t. o., k. 1 crossed, t. t. o., 2 k. 3d, 5th, 7th, 9th, and 11th rounds.—Like the first round. 13th round.—* 1 st. n., k. 2 together, 1 k., t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., 1 k. 15th round.—* 1 st. n., k. 2 together, t. t. o., 5 k., t. t. o. 17th round. —* K. 2 together crossed, t. t. o., 2 k., 1 st. n., 3 k., t. t. o. 19th round.—K. 1 crossed, t. t. o., 2 k., 1 st. n., k. 2 together, 2 k., t. t. o. This last round is a repetition of the first round of the design; the design is transposed in this manner, and is continued as described in the preceding rounds.

Hosted by Google

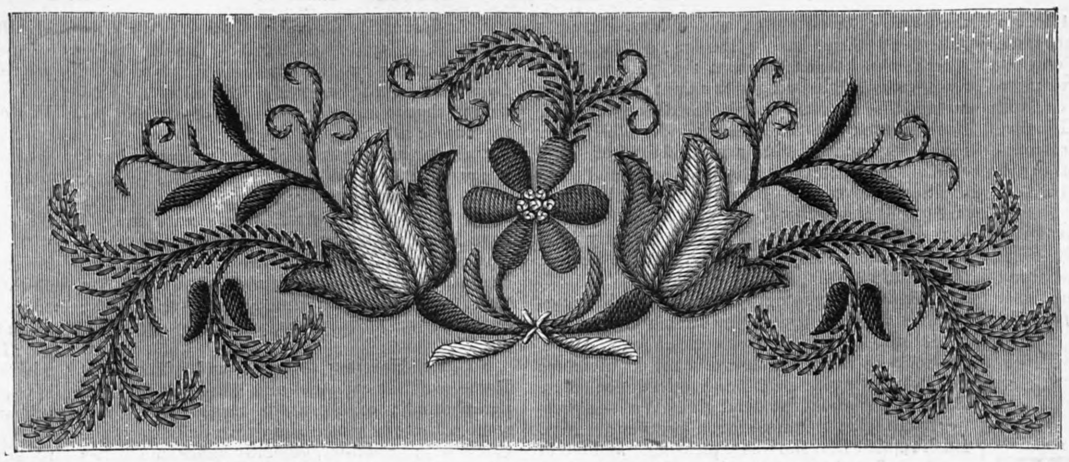

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF EMBROIDERY FOR CARD-BASKET.—FULL SIZE.

Embroidered Toilette Cushion.

THIS round cushion is five inches and three-quarters in diameter and two inches and a half high, and is trimmed on the outside, as shown by the illustration, with pinked ruffles and with puffs of fawn-colored silk, and also with a piece of embroidered light brown cloth, cut in points and pinked on the outer edge. Work the embroidery, for which Fig. 63 of the Supplement gives the design, partly with narrow brown silk braid and gold cord, and partly with light and dark brown saddler's silk in half-polka and knotted stitch and in point Russe. Cover the under surface of the cushion with brown carriage leather.

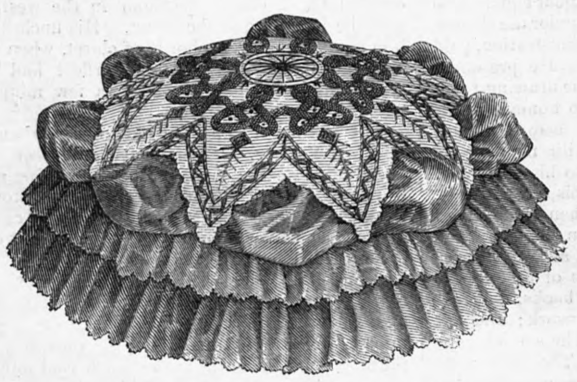
Fig. 2.—SLIDE FOR PURSE.—FULL SIZE.

EMBROIDERED BLOTTING CUSHION.
For design see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 38.

Fig. 3.—GRELOT FOR PURSE. FULL SIZE.

Basket for Visiting-Cards, Fancy-Work, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THE foundation for this basket is of card-board. The outer cover is of fine red cashmere, ornamented in satin and half-polka stitch embroidery, and in point Russe with fine saddler's silk in bright colors. Fig. 61, Supplement, gives a third section of the pattern for the rim, Fig. 62 gives the design for the embroidery on the bottom of the basket, and the illustration Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the rim with embroidery. The inside of the bottom is edged with black chenille, and the outer edge of the basket is trimmed with a ruche of red silk ribbon. The rim at the bottom and the bars of the frame, curved as shown by Fig. 1, are of wood covered with black velvet.



EMBROIDERED TOILETTE CUSHION.
For design see Supplement, No. XIX., Fig. 63.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET PURSE.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

Fig. 1.—BASKET FOR VISITING-CARDS, FANCY-WORK, ETC.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 61 and 62.

Crochet Purse, Figs. 1–3.

THIS purse is worked with green saddler's silk — the middle part in open-work bar rounds, and the ends all in single crochet. It is ornamented with acorn-shaped dots of light and dark brown silk, which are crocheted into the foundation. Begin the purse on one end with a foundation of 44 ch. (chain stitch), close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and crochet, always going forward, 52 rounds of sc. (single crochet), widening 2 st. (stitch) each at the beginning and in the middle of the 1st–11th rounds. To do this crochet in the first round before the first and after the twenty-second st. 2 ch., without passing over a foundation st.; then work in the 2d–10th rounds always 2 sc. separated by 2 ch. on the 2 ch. of the preceding round, and in the 11th round only 2 sc. on the corresponding ch. This 11th round should count 84 sc. Besides this work the first dots in the 5th and 6th rounds. To do this work in the 5th round first 8 sc. with green silk, in doing which crochet in the light brown silk, then work with the latter color 4 sc. on the next st. below in a vertical direction in the 1st round, thus surrounding the st. of three rounds below each other; with these 4 sc. pass over 1 st. of the 4th round. Again work 13 sc. with green silk, then 4 sc. with brown silk as before, and 7 sc. with green silk. This completes the first half of this round, and the second half is worked in precisely the same manner. In this as well as in the following dot round the brown silk thread is crocheted in. In the 6th round work with dark brown silk always 2 sc. on the first and last of the 4 sc. crocheted with light brown silk in the preceding round, and on the middle 2 of these sc. always 2 dc. (double crochet); after the last of these 8 st. crochet 1 ch., and draw it through the first of the 8 st. so that the dot becomes raised on the right side of the work. For the remainder crochet with green silk 1 sc. on every green st. of the preceding round. Before changing the green and brown silk threads always work off the last st. of one color with the thread of the other color. In the following (the 7th) round, which is again worked entirely with green silk in sc., pass over each dot with 1 ch. Repeat the dots in every sixth following round, and transpose them, as shown by Fig. 1; between the dots always work 13 sc. for the foundation. After finishing the 52d round work 21 sc. to the middle of the close part thus formed, and then for the middle part work 34 open-work bar rounds, going back and forth, which forms the slit. For the first of these 34 rounds work 3 ch., which count as first dc., 1 dc. on the following st., then always alternately 2 ch., 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the fourth following st. In the following rounds always work the dc. on the ch. between 2 dc. in the preceding round.

Fig. 2.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Work the second close part of the purse on a separate foundation similar to the part before described, and then overseam it closely to the middle part of the purse from the wrong side. Previous to this, however, furnish the middle part with the slides covered with sc. and acorn-shaped dots, as shown by Fig. 2, which gives one slide in full size. Edge the ends of the purse, as shown by Fig. 1, with one picot round, working 1 sc. on every second following st., then

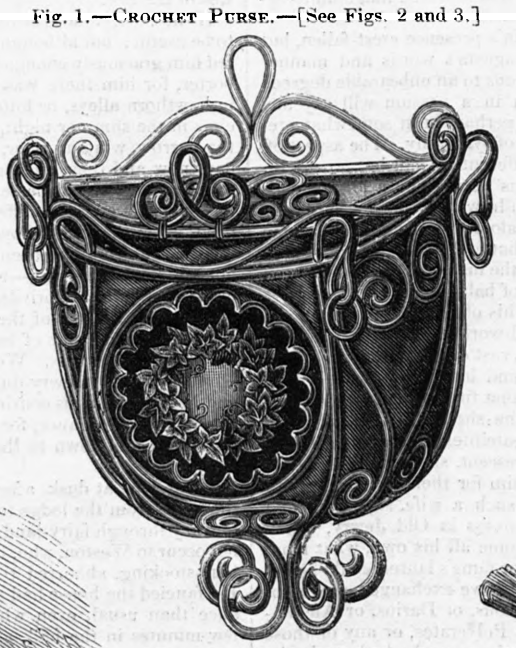


Fig. 1.—WALL-POCKET WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.—[See Page 52.]

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE HOOD.—BACK.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE HOOD.—FRONT.
For description see Supplement.

Hosted by Google

always 1 picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these; in doing this at the same time crochet the foundation st. of each end together. To this round are joined two more rounds of small and large scallops of ch. and picots, as shown by the illustration. Finally, trim the purse on the ends each with four acorn-shaped grelots. For each of these grelots cover an oblong wooden mould, furnished with a hole in the middle, closely with light brown silk. Then work the small cup with dark brown silk all in sc., beginning from the middle, and sew it on the covered wooden mould, turning the wrong side out. Fig. 3 shows a grelot in full size. Cover the thread to which the grelot is fastened with several button-hole stitches.

Embroidered Blotting Cushion.

See illustration on page 53.

THIS blotting cushion consists of a piece of wood six inches long, two inches and a half wide, and covered with light brown leather. The upper surface is ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown saddler's silk in the design given by Fig. 38, Supplement, and with brown silk cord and gold cord. On this piece of wood fasten, by means of a screw on a polished black wooden handle, a piece of white felt covered on the sides with inlaid light brown leather, and on the under raised surface with several layers of blotting-paper, as shown by the illustration.

Crochet Edging for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 53.

Fig. 1.—This edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 60, and consists of three rounds. 1st round.—14 ch. (chain stitch), close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), then 2 sc. (single crochet), 1 p. (picot, that is, 4 ch.), 2 sc., 1 p., 5 sc., 1 p., 2 sc. on the ch. ring; * 12 ch., drop the st. (stitch) from the needle, insert the needle in the middle of the 5 sc., and draw through the dropped st., which again forms a ch. ring; then 2 sc., 1 p., 2 sc., 1 p., 5 sc., 1 p., 2 sc. on this ring, and repeat from * until the edging has gained the requisite length. 2d round.—On the free ch. of each ring work 2 sc., 2 p. separated by 2 sc., 2 sc. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the first free p. of the next ring, 5 ch.

Fig. 2.—To make this edging use twisted cotton, No. 100, and work four rounds, as follows: 1st round.—37 ch., pass over the last 5 of these, take up 1 st. from the sixth ch., then take up 1 st. each from the seventh following, the ninth following, the seventh following, and the sixth following of the 36 ch., so that 5 p. turned downward are formed, and 6 st. are on the needle; each of these 6 st. is cast off as in the Tunisian (Victoria) stitch, drawing the thread through once, the last st. remains on the needle, and from the next 5 vertical st. take up 1 st. each, and cast off together the 6 st. on the needle, drawing the thread through once. Let the st. remain on the needle, draw the working thread through the first of the 37 ch., 5 ch., and cast off the last of these together with the st. on the needle. * 10 ch., drop the st. from the needle, insert the needle in the middle st. of the next p. of 5 ch., and draw through the dropped st.; 31 ch., take up 1 st. from the seventh following, 1 st. from the ninth following, 1 st. from the seventh following of the 31 ch., and 1 st. from the eighth of the 10 ch. (counting from the beginning), and cast off each of the 6 st. on the needle, drawing the thread through once; take up 1 st. each from the next 5 vertical st., cast off the 6 st. on the needle together, drawing the thread through once, let the last st. remain on the needle, draw the working thread through the sixth of the 10 ch. (counting from the beginning also), 5 ch., and cast off the last of these together with the st. on the needle. Repeat from * until the edging has gained the requisite length. 2d round.—Always alternately 7 sc. on the 5 ch. above a picot figure, 3 ch., with these pass over the following 5 ch. of the preceding round. 3d round.—1 sc. on the middle of every 7 sc. in the preceding round, then always 8 ch. 4th round.—1 double crochet on every second following st. and after every double crochet, 1 ch.

Wall-Pocket with Application Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 53.

THIS wall-pocket is made of bronzed cane, lined with brown silk, and ornamented with a medallion in application embroidery. The foundation of the medallion, which is shown in full size by Fig. 2, page 52, is of black velvet. In the middle of the medallion a piece two inches and seven-eighths in diameter is cut out, and a piece is inserted of fawn-colored silk of the requisite size, edged with a wreath of ivy leaves, which are cut of green cloth of different shades, and are ornamented, as shown by Fig. 2, with veins of lighter filling silk, and sewed on the foundation. To complete the wreath work on the brown silk a number of stems and vines with green silk in half-polka stitch.

TO THE BITTER END.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "THE LOVELS OF ARDEN," "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

"AND WHEN HE FALLS, HE FALLS LIKE LUCIFER."

MRS. HARCROSS read Richard Redmayne's story in the Times—read it with dry eyes, but a bitter and passionate heart. So she had been the dupe, after all! and all that remorse for her own short-comings, all that sad yearning for the days of her married life to come back again, that she might be a better wife to the husband of her love—all these pangs of conscience were wasted agony. He had never loved her; his false heart had been given to this country girl; his moody hours of thought and silence had been a tribute to that dead love. He had given to her, his legitimate wife, only the unreal image and semblance of affection, while tender memories and remorseful thoughts were lavished on that lost idol.

In the light of this discovery she remembered a hundred petty details of the life that was ended: the merest trifles in themselves, but indicating so much now that she possessed the key to their meaning. She remembered how much more prone he had been to fits of absence and gloom after that summer holiday in Kent than he had ever been before—a change which she had ascribed to altered health, and about which, in the proud security that a well-developed organ of self-esteem gives its possessor, she had troubled herself very little. She drained her cup of bitterness to the dregs, and even went down to Brierwood to see the place where her lover had learned to be false to her. Mrs. Bush was still in charge of the homestead, and quite ready to tell the strange lady all she knew, even without the bribe of a sovereign which Mrs. Harcross gave her. Augusta saw the low, old-fashioned rooms; the garden, where a few pale monthly roses were still blooming with a faint perfume that seemed like a memory of vanished sweets. Mrs. Bush pointed out the cedar "under which Mr. Redmayne and his family was so fond of sittin'—Miss Grace, and her aunt and uncle, and all—of a Sunday evenin'." How common it all sounded! And it was for a girl with such surroundings as these that he had been shamefully false to her! For this poor cottage heroine he had forfeited his life!

There was a photograph of Grace still hanging over the chimney-piece in Richard's room—a poor, faint shadow of the sweet, changeful face. What! was it for this insignificant countenance he had betrayed her? She questioned Mrs. Bush closely about the dead girl. Was she prettier than that picture—much prettier? Mrs. Bush replied that she was "pleasing," and could not be induced to venture beyond that cautious epithet. Augusta asked permission to walk round the garden once more by herself; and having obtained it, went slowly along the path where Hubert and Grace had lingered quoting Romeo and Juliet in the summer night; looked drearily into the orchard where they had sat on sultry afternoons, she with some never-to-be-finished needle-work in her lap, he reading and expounding Shelley's Epipsychidion, and thinking how sweet it would be to spend the rest of his days in a garden or an orchard at Grace Redmayne's feet. Augusta gazed upon this humble scene with tired, aching eyes, marveling strangely, in the midst of her despair, how he to whom all the glories of the Acropolis Square district were open could have endured existence in such a scene as this, even for a week. And then she went back to the fly that had brought her from the station, and made her dismal journey home, there to seclude herself from all companionship, and brood upon this new trouble.

It was a cruel blow, a most humiliating revelation; for she had loved the traitor, still loved him, holding his memory dearer than any earthly affection. Still more bitter even than the first shock of the discovery was Weston Vallory's visit of condolence, with the Times newspaper in his pocket, and a smug smile of satisfaction lurking at the corners of his cunning mouth.

"It is the fate of noble natures to be deceived, my dear Augusta," he said, with a sympathetic air. "Suffering such as you are called upon to endure is a heritage of sorrow which but too often accompanies nobility of heart."

Mrs. Harcross was the last of women to brook any sentimental impertinence of this kind. All the cousinship in the world could not, in her eyes, justify such violation of her sacred grief.

"Who taught you to gauge my sorrow?" she cried, with passionate disdain, "or to measure his sins with your petty plumb-line? At his worst he was better and nobler than you ever were or can be. Stick to your office desk, and your copying machine, and your gutta-percha speaking-tubes, Weston, if you please, and do not presume to talk of my troubles."

This was rather a knock-down blow for Weston Vallory, who had fancied the course very smooth and straight before him now that Providence in its wisdom had removed that stumbling-block, Hubert Harcross.

He left his cousin's presence crest-fallen, but not despairing. Augusta's words and manner had been contemptuous to an unbearable degree; but then a woman in a passion will say any thing; and he had perhaps been somewhat premature in his offers of sympathy. The aspect of things would be different by-and-by, no doubt. He would resent this outrage by a lofty silence and a dignified withdrawal of his presence; he would hold himself aloof from Augusta for some time to come, until that foolish, infatuated woman should discover that the man who had always been useful had perforce of habit become necessary.

He went back to his office desk, as his cousin had bidden him, and worked on steadily, adding brick to brick in that vast edifice, the firm of Harcross and Vallory, and looking forward with a hopeful patience to that future day in which Augusta and her fortune should be his, and when the butler and his satellites, and all the household in Mastodon Crescent, should bow down before him, and own him for their master. With such a house and such a wife, supported and sustained by the business in Old Jewry, which must eventually become all his own, what more of earth's splendors or fame's laurels could he desire? He would not have exchanged such a lot for the might of Crœsus, or Darius, or Alexander, or Hannibal, or Polycrates, or any of those classical "parties" whose works had made the burden of his school-days, who abode in hourly dread of unpleasant oracles, and altogether appeared to be more subject to the fluctuation of fortune and the malice of the gods than any modern adventurer.

So Mr. Vallory junior held his soul in patience, and his faith was strong in time; whereby it was something of a shock to him to learn one fine morning from his uncle that Augusta was going to sell off the splendid goods and chattels in Mastodon Crescent, and to travel on the Continent for a year or so with her father.

"You can get on very well without me here, Weston," Mr. Vallory observed, graciously; "and I really feel it my duty to look after Augusta. This business has been an awful blow. I think she felt that horrid story of Harcross's past life which came out during that scoundrel Redmayne's trial almost more than her husband's death, although she has never admitted as much to me. I am very glad to take her abroad: change of scene and all that kind of thing may do wonders, you know. And I'm very glad she has decided upon selling the lease and furniture in Mastodon Crescent; she'll get rid of all melancholy associations, you see."

"And sacrifice no end of money," said Weston, with a lugubrious look. "She'll realize about as many hundreds as she spent thousands. I have no doubt there's a good deal of consolation in that to any thing as inconsistent and unreasonable as a woman."

"In her present state of mind money is hardly a consideration, Weston," replied Mr. Vallory, in his pompous way. "When my daughter returns to England she will reside with me. I have felt my house no home without her. Even my cook has fallen off; I rarely get my favorite curries, or the only soup I really care for. Not that Augusta ever interfered about such trifles; but there was an influence, you know—an influence."

So Mrs. Harcross departed, and wintered at Rome, whither carriages and horses, and all the paraphernalia of Acropolis Square existence, went with her; where she drove daily upon the Corso with her father, gloomily handsome in her widow's weeds, leaning back listlessly in her open carriage, with eyes that seemed to see neither landscape nor people. She staid here till the end of March, and spent the summer in pottering about from one German bath to another, in quest of the magical elixir which was to cure her father's gout. They spent the following winter in Paris, where Mr. Vallory hired a luxurious first floor in the Rue César-Auguste, and the Acropolis Square mansion still languished in brown holland and darkness. The irrepressible Weston employed a great deal of his leisure during this winter—which was unusually severe—in crossing and recrossing the Channel. The mail-boat that carried this modern Cæsar and his fortunes ran foul of a French steamer one blusterous midnight, whereby Weston narrowly escaped drowning; but still he held on, dauntless and unflagging as a queen's messenger, that hapless slave of the state, whose perils about equal those of a famous warrior, and who is, under the cheese-paring system of our present administration, paid very little better than a butler. He presented himself every now and then in the drawing-room in the Rue César-Auguste to do homage to his cousin Augusta, half an hour before dinner, white-cravatted and spotless, with no odor of steamboat or railway clinging to his garments. He had his pet chamber, No. 333 bis, at Meurice's, and rarely found it occupied when he required it. By this unflinching attention—by solicitude that knew no weariness—he did at last contrive to slip back into his old position of usefulness; fetched and carried music and books, and patterns and threads for point lace work; and felt that he was gaining ground. The star of hope began to shine for him again. The days went on—Mr. Vallory and his daughter came back to England. The Ryde villa and the yacht had been sold, at Augusta's request: were they not bitter to her soul, being so closely associated with the days of her courtship and married life? So Mr. Vallory bought an estate in Warwickshire, seven hundred acres or so, with a huge stucco-fronted mansion, called Copplestoke Manor, a few miles from Leamington, and began a new phase of existence as a country gentleman; taking the chair at vestry-meetings, and sitting on the bench at petty sessions, and vexing the souls of rural legislators with the abstrusest technicalities of the law.

Hither, too, came Weston Vallory, always eager to be useful; but although Mrs. Harcross tolerated him graciously enough in his capacity of light porter, for him there was no riding by her side in hawthorn alleys, or loitering under star-proof elms in the summer night, or drifting gently on the narrow, winding river, with a lazy dip of the oars now and then, and an occasional entanglement among green masses of mazy weed. He felt himself a guest on sufferance, and there were times when the star of hope grew dim.

Mrs. Harcross had been three years a widow, but still wore mourning—resolutely refusing Madame Bouffante the privilege of making her any dress which was not of the black silk and bugly order—when the star of hope sank altogether in the blackest darkness. Weston had been unusually busy in Old Jewry during the winter term, and had not seen his cousin, either in London or at Copplestoke Manor, for nearly three months, when he came down to the country-house for a brief visit.

He arrived at dusk, after a snow-storm, when the drive from the lodge to the house was like a journey through fairy-land, although the idea did not occur to Weston, who, like the famous French blue-stocking, abhorred the beauties of nature. He fancied the house had a more festive appearance than usual, even while he lingered for a few minutes in the hall, giving directions about some packages he had brought for Augusta. There were more hot-house flowers, brighter fires, more lights; the servants had a busier, gayer air: for the mansion had been a somewhat sepulchral abode, despite its grandeur, hitherto.

"Has my uncle many visitors?" he asked the butler, carelessly.

"No, Sir; not many, Sir. Lord Stanmore and Edgware is staying with us, Sir, and Captain Purfleet; nobody else."

"Stanmore and Edgware! A new acquaintance," thought Weston, whose only knowledge of that nobleman was obtained from the Peerage and the Morning Post. He had an idea that Stanmore and Edgware was elderly, and had never done any thing to add lustre to his title except condescend to exist. "Humph!" he said, not displeased to find that he was to hob-and-nob with a peer, not a horse-racing or insolvent nobleman, but a respectable land-owner. "Lord Stanmore has a place near here, I suppose?"

"No, Sir; his lordship's estates are in the North, Sir. His lordship was stoppin' at Lord Leigh's for the 'untin' before Christmas, and his lordship has been here hever sence." The butler gave a faint cough, not without some kind of significance, which puzzled Weston a little. But of course it was only the man's elation at having administered so long to the peerage.

Weston went up stairs to dress, and arrayed himself with a little more care than usual: put on his favorite boots, and a shirt with Valenciennes medallions which he deemed invincible; his studs were black enamel skulls with diamond eyes; the parting of his hair was perfection. Never had he felt better satisfied with himself, with his arched instep, his mustache, with all his small graces, than as he went down the wide oak staircase, where unwonted parterres of scented geranium and stephanotis regaled his nostrils as he went.

"Tommy loves a lord," he said to himself, with a cynical grin. "I suppose my poor uncle is not exempt from that pardonable weakness of humanity."

There were only three persons in the drawing-room when he entered—his uncle, Augusta, and a tall bald-headed man with gray mustache, who stood with his back to the fire-place. Mrs. Harcross was seated in a low chair opposite the fire, holding a spangled fan between her face and the blaze of the logs piled on the wide old-fashioned hearth. She wore crimson camellias in her hair and in the bosom of her gauzy black dress, the first gleam of color that Weston had ever seen her wear since her husband's death; and the gentleman with the gray mustache was bending down to speak to her with such an air of chivalrous devotion as may have distinguished King Arthur in the days when Guinevere was true, and the serpent had not yet entered the sacred circle of the king's chosen knights.

The attitude, the look, the tone, revealed all to Weston Vallory's rapid comprehension. The star of hope shot downward to abysses unfathomable, never to rise again. Before he went to his comfortable bachelor bedroom in the western wing he had learned the worst. His uncle told him every thing over a bottle of claret, when the earl and his satellite, Captain Purfleet, had left the dining-room, only lingering a few minutes after Augusta's departure.

"It was not a thing I cared to write about," said Mr. Vallory. "They have only been engaged three weeks; but from the day we first met Lord Stanmore at a hunting breakfast at Stoneleigh the business was settled. It was a 'case,' as you fast young men say. Augusta was very much disinclined to hear of such a thing; but I felt that in an affair of this kind her opposition must be borne down: an estate like Stanmore and Edgware, improving in value every year, miles of building frontages on the outskirts of the most populous towns in the North, coal mines, slate quarries, and a man of blameless character—thirty years or so her senior, I grant; but we know by the experience of mankind that these marriages, founded on a mutual esteem, and—aw, hum—the desire to consolidate a vast estate, are often the happiest."

"Yes," cried Weston, breaking in with a bitter laugh, "but if she had fallen in love with some poor devil of the same age, I wonder what you'd have called it! A vicious infatuation, which argues—the sort of thing which Iago says of Desdemona, you know; but of course, as he's an earl and the estate is all right, it's quite another matter."

"I don't think that's a very genial way of receiving my communication, Weston. I thought you'd be naturally delighted. The match is really a brilliant one, the sort of marriage I always dreamed of for my daughter before her unfortunate alliance with poor Harcross. And even you will profit by it; your status will be not a little improved when you can claim cousinship with a countess. That sort of thing ought to be worth a thousand a year to a man in your position, to say nothing of the probability that you may get the Stanmore land agency before long, and no end of leases and deeds of agreement."

"I ought to be amazingly grateful, I dare say," replied Weston; "but the news is rather startling. I thought my cousin was a model widow, wedded to the dead."

"Weston," exclaimed Mr. Vallory, with severity, "I believe you're a radical!"

So Augusta Harcross, in due time and with no unseemly haste, was translated into a loftier sphere, in which she knew not Weston, or only remembered him faintly at half-yearly intervals, when she permitted his name to be inscribed by some menial hand on one of her invitation-cards.

Her husband's private secretary attended to these minor details. He had a book given him, upon whose right-hand pages were inscribed the sheep, or exalted personages who must be invited to all large assemblies, and upon whose left-hand appeared the obscure herd of goats, who were to be bidden once or so in a season, if convenient.

Augusta had prime ministers and royal dukes to dine with her in these latter days, and Weston attended receptions so crowded that he was fain to depart without having so much as caught a "little look across the crowd" from his hostess and kinswoman. But he did in some wise console himself with the idea that he gained in social distinction by his cousin's advancement, and he received numerous applications from acquaintances of his own who wanted to obtain Lady Stanmore's influence for this or for that. It was a meagre consolation, but it was something. He had his dainty little villa at Norwood, his well-groomed horses, roses that were never permitted to suffer from the green fly, and he had all the keen delights of an ever-increasing business in Old Jewry.

For some favored creatures life seems all sunshine. No shadow has darkened Clevedon Hall since the horror of Hubert Harcross's murder, and some new joys have come to brighten that pleasant home. Little voices sound gayly and little feet patter swiftly in the corridors of Clevedon to-day, and in these latter years there are larger butterflies than "Greeks" or "Trojans," "Camberwell beauties," "peacocks' eyes," or "painted ladies," to be seen hovering about the flower beds in the old-fashioned gardens. Sibyl Clevedon has become Sibyl Hardwood, and brings her babies from Tunbridge Wells every other day to compare Tottie's new tooth with her cousin Lottie's, or to inquire if Migsy's symptoms in the opening stage of measles are as satisfactory as those exhibited by Popsy in the same disease. Happy English households, about which there is so little to tell! The Colonel exists in a seventh heaven of grand-paternal rapture, which verges on senility. The Bungalow brims over with babies—for are not Sibyl's children a kind of left-handed grandchildren of his?—and the quadruped favorites during these irruptions of the juvenile population feel themselves more or less at a disadvantage. Pedro snaps or spits his displeasure; the dogs retire under low chairs to growl at the invader; the mungoose disappears from human ken, to be found, perhaps, at night-fall, by some frightened house-maid, snugly coiled under the Colonel's duvet. The Colonel stuffs the little ones with currie-bât and Bombay ducks, which provoke unwonted thirst in these small epicures, and dried fruits from Afghanistan, and West Indian preserved ginger, and ministers to their little appetites with all the art he knows; for which reason lengthened visits to the Bungalow are apt to result in bilious attacks and the exhibition of doctors' stuff.

Hosted by Google

Brierwood, forfeited forever by Richard Redmayne's crime, has passed into the hands of the stranger. The deed of gift by which he bestowed Bulrush Meads upon his brother James has preserved the Gippsland farm from the grasp of the law; but the gray old Kentish homestead, with the red-tiled roof that shone out warmly from the green background of an English landscape, has gone from the house of Redmayne forever.* The day will come perhaps, distant yet, but dimly possible in the future, when Rick Redmayne's bonds may be loosened; when as a reward for unflinching toil and unvarying good conduct, the quiet submission of a repentant sinner, who feels that his burden can never be too heavy for the measure of his offense, he may go forth from the drear monotony of that prison island, an old man, with grizzled hair and rugged deep-lined countenance, a man whose shoulders are bent with long labor—go forth, free at the last, to that fairer, wider world for which his soul longs. Not to Brierwood, the lost home of sad memories, the house haunted by his dead daughter's ghost, the place whose gloomy influence well-nigh drove him mad; but to the fertile plains and inland seas of Gippsland, to the mountains and water-sheds where tall gum-trees shoot upward under the cloudless blue sky, where the ringing note of the bell-bird sounds keen and clear in the tranquil distance.

THE END.

* The law is now more merciful: the property of a felon is no longer escheated to the crown.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A Morbid Ambition.—No more Seasickness.—The Anxious and the Comfortable.—Some very Fashionable Intelligence.

OUR ministry have long been thought to be tottering and clutching at straws to keep themselves in office, but it now seems indeed that they are on their last legs. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been telegraphing to the Caledonian Society that "he wishes he were a Scotchman." It is true that but for the steady liberal vote of the Scotch members the present government would months ago have been left in a minority; but this desperate bid for the suffrages of the North British is thought to be a little too much. The story as told at the clubs is that the English-born ministers (for Gladstone is half a Scotchman, and there are others who are whole ones) drew lots as to who should express himself in these enthusiastic terms, and that Lowe exclaimed, when it fell on him, "This is just like my luck." I have always thought that the well-known apology for our northern neighbors, "We must remember that they, too, are God's creatures," was impertinent and unnecessary; but there is a wide margin between charity and a fictitious enthusiasm. "It will do us no good," says Ayrton, in his candid way, "for no Scotchman will ever believe it." It is said that Gladstone has made arrangements with his tailor for the discontinuance of pantaloons and the adoption of the kilt during the next session, which, considering that he possesses what one of your humorists terms "a very small chance of legs," will testify to the genuineness of his admiration. In the mean time one hour of the period daily devoted to public business in Downing Street is whispered to be set apart by the whole cabinet to the practice of the bagpipes, which one or two of them, who have been accustomed to play exclusively their own trumpet, find exceedingly hard.

I don't know, Mr. Editor, whether the universal knowledge attributed to your calling comprehends in your case the theory of the Universal Joint; but here nothing else is talked about. It is not a leg of mutton (as one would imagine), but a scientific, mechanical arrangement, which transmits motion in every direction, and whose properties have been adopted by Mr. Bessemer for the prevention of seasickness. If you had been in that gentleman's grounds on Saturday last, which was a very wet day, you would have seen half a dozen eminent men of all classes taking shelter, as you would have supposed, in a very peculiar arbor out of the rain; this was, in fact, a section of the central portion of a vessel, and contained what may be termed the saloon of the future. By means of cranks and appropriate machinery the pitch-and-toss motion of the Channel and the roll of the Atlantic were communicated to the mimic ship, while the saloon remained quite motionless. This apparatus can be fitted to all ordinary screw-steamers, and is quite independent of the especial description of ship which Mr. Bessemer is now designing for the Channel passage; and if it does but work (of which there seems little doubt), it will effect a charming revolution in ocean travel. The great marine maxim of "keep your mind employed and your stomach not" will lose its significance, and you will have the most distinguished persons in this country, who have hitherto been deterred by the terrors of seasickness, coming over to visit your great republic. The bridegroom will take his bride to the Continent without misgivings anent the appearance he may present to her on the passage, and walk the floor of the universal-jointed saloon with the firmness of a Roderick Dhu, who has his foot upon his native heath. The possessor of "sea legs" will no longer have the tremendous advantage over his fellows which he now enjoys, and there will be a great fall in the crockery market. It is already suggested, indeed, that a monument be erected to Bessemer, standing motionless upon the universal joint, with one of those dreadful little white basins lying shattered at his feet, and the legend, "He made ship-stewards unnecessary," encircling his intelligent brow.

I sent you last week a list of our late millionaires; since then a still more curious document has been published, calculating the numbers of "the comfortable." It is terrible to read that in this country of lords of the soil and merchant princes only one and a half per cent. of the population can be said to be "out of the class of the anxious," can propose to give their children the benefit of a good education, have more than enough to eat and drink, and can contemplate a holiday without a sickening feeling of despair. This assessment, which has been made by a social philosopher well qualified for the task, implies in London the occupation of a house costing in rent and taxes £175, and an income of £800 a year; and in the country a house at £150, and an income of £600. Calculating upon these premises the number of the comfortable is less than 60,000 inhabitants out of the 4,600,000 in Great Britain. The respectables, or fairly well-to-do, and who do not live by direct manual labor, amount to 710,000 families.

Incidental to these interesting facts we learn that the taxation of this country, wealthy as it seems, falls upon a population seven in eight of whom live in houses rented at less than £20 a year, are always struggling to make both ends meet, and are affected in the most direct way by a tax, or stoppage in trade, or by a rise in prices; also that the Bank of England is assessed at £36,400 a year, and if sold by auction would probably produce the largest sum ever paid for "a house" since houses were invented. It is by no means only a banking-house, but contains courts and private apartments, in one of which I have had the honor to dine with the officer of the foot-guards, who every night keeps watch over it with a detachment of military. The governors of the bank supply him with an excellent dinner, to which he is permitted to invite a couple of guests.

An American actor, one Mr. J. K. Emmett, has just made a great "hit" here at the Adelphi Theatre, in the character of a German emigrant landed at Castle Garden. On his first appearance Sergeant Bates occupied a conspicuous private box in the theatre, and was as enthusiastically cheered as his fellow-countryman on the stage. Mr. Emmett was fortunate in not making his début a few nights later, as his merits would not in that case have been recognizable, in consequence of the absence of any light by which to see them. A strike has taken place among our gasmen, which might have been even more serious than that of the police a while ago, since its object was no less than, by concerted and simultaneous action, to leave us good folk utterly in the dark—a worse action surely even than its contrary, the holding a candle to the devil! The theatres presented a wretched (though far from a ghastly) appearance, and the streets in general were very dark and dim, though, thanks to the help of the lime lights in the Strand, and the powerful electric light at the Polytechnic Institution in Regent Street, those two great thoroughfares were well illuminated. We are now improving, however, every night; men are being taken on by hundreds to supply the place of the offenders (who are naturally much blamed for their selfishness in not having tried arbitration in the first place), and "the odds," as rude people say when your correspondent is playing at billiards, are "ten to one against the strikers."

It was a saying of Sydney Smith's that "in England the law was open alike to rich and poor, just like the London Tavern," and I am afraid the remark has not yet lost its significance. Yesterday, at Bow Street police-office, the Marquis of Queensberry, aged twenty-eight, was charged with assaulting a police constable. "The noble defendant was permitted to stand in the box allotted to persons summoned to the court instead of in the dock;" and on his being convicted his worship the magistrate is reputed to have "imposed a penalty consistent with the position of the defendant and with the facts of the case in fining him a sovereign." It is said by the radicals that our aristocracy fail to distinguish themselves, but that is certainly not the case just at present, since, in addition to the above, Lord Edward Thynne, aged sixty-three, has this same week "electrified the fashionable world" by running away with the young wife of the Marquis Townsend, a nobleman well known in the metropolis for his philanthropic exertions among the poor. Nor can the reproach that new blood is wanting to our titled classes be altogether justified, since it is announced that Mr. Gladstone is about to confer a baronetage upon Mr. Levi, otherwise Lawson, the proprietor of that popular penny print, the Daily Telegraph.

Literature, you will therefore perceive, Mr. Editor, is looking up in this country, nor is it altogether impossible that you may one day receive a communication from your present correspondent signed

R. KEMBLE, of London, Bart.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN these perilous times, when a conflagration is an event of daily and nightly occurrence, it would be well if every one should consider the possibility of being himself involved in such a catastrophe, and preparing the mind, in some measure, for the exigencies of the occasion. True, we are told that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and we should not be unduly anxious about the future; but an evil understood and guarded against is shorn of half its terrors and dangers. Panics in fires are partially the result of impulsive excitement and vague alarm, and partially caused by entire uncertainty as to what to do. To scream, to run, to jump from a window, or perhaps to throw some useless or breakable article out of a window, may be the first impulse. It is only those who by natural temperament are fitted to meet emergencies, or those who by forethought have prepared the mind for them, who really do the wisest and best things. A short time ago a school-house in Jersey City took fire while one hundred and twenty children were in session in it. Undoubtedly there would have been serious accident and loss of life had not the lady principal, with great presence of mind, prevented a rush down the stairs by peremptorily ordering the scholars to sit still, placing herself in the doorway, and compelling them to file out singly and in regular order. To think what one would do first in case of a sudden alarm of fire, whether in a private house, in a church, in a theatre, or in a hotel, would tend to prevent those panics which are always so fatal, as well as those rash and foolish acts which show an utter lack of forethought and presence of mind.

During the "cold snap" of the latter part of December the weather in some parts of New England was more severe than has been known there since 1857. In many places in Maine the thermometer fell to 20° and 30° below zero, and in some even to 40° below. This extreme cold, accompanied by a very heavy fall of snow, has been a tough experience for the most eastern States, and, indeed, for the whole country, since it extended from East to West.

Christmas-eve fell with sudden gloom and horror upon many a home in Western New York and Pennsylvania. A train on the Buffalo, Corry, and Pittsburg Railroad was slowly descending a steep grade leading to a trestle bridge built over a deep chasm. Suddenly there was a broken wheel, an overturned car, a flashing of fiery flames, and entangled in the wreck, down in that deep abyss, lay the killed and maimed. From out of the blackened ruins more than twenty disfigured corpses were recovered. The wounded were tenderly cared for. But, alas! in how many houses will this sad disaster cause the Christmas of 1872 to be forever held in mournful memory!

It is said that even the bitterest enemies of Disraeli have never attacked his private character; and innumerable stories attest the constancy and warmth of affection which subsisted between himself and his wife. About four years ago, on the occasion of the great Edinburgh banquet, Mr. Disraeli paid his wife a graceful compliment, when he acknowledged that half his success and more than half his happiness in life were due to his wife.

A Washington paper, in view of the approaching "season" at the capital, gives a résumé of certain points of etiquette, which it asserts will be found to accord with old-time usages at Washington:

"All officials and non-officials call on the President. He is not required to return calls or to accept invitations, but may waive this exemption at discretion. All are admitted to his public or formal receptions without cards or invitation, as well as to Mrs. President's receptions on stated days, of which notice is usually given in the city papers. State dinners are attended by those only who are formally invited—which invitation can not be declined on account of any prior engagement.

"Senators who observe the old usages make no 'first calls,' on account of recognized superior rank, except on the President of the United States. Through courtesy to their own presiding officer they may make the 'first call' on the Vice-President, but not by virtue of any supposed higher official position.

"But Senators are expected to return calls like other mortals, and among themselves to observe the usual rules regulating the intercourse of private gentlemen. Those first at the capital make the advance, welcoming after-arrivals.

"Heads of departments and foreign ministers make 'first calls' on the President, Vice-President, and Senators.

"Members of the House make 'first calls' on the foregoing officials, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"None of the classes above mentioned are expected to make 'first calls' on citizens, sojourners, and visitors, but are expected to return such calls in person, or 'by card' when personal calls are impracticable."

These usages have not been established without much friction, discussion, and even rebellion on the part of certain ambitious ones. Of course officials may voluntarily waive their privilege; and men of brains, culture, and acknowledged power are never tenacious about their observance, and act at Washington very much as they do at home among their old neighbors, calling socially wherever they find agreeable society.

Again and again the fire fiend works deadly ruin. Following close upon the Fifth Avenue Hotel disaster, by which eleven servants lost their lives, came another catastrophe of similar nature. Just about dark on a cold December night a large book-binding establishment in Centre Street took fire. In the upper stories hundreds of men, boys, and girls were employed. The fire-escapes with which the building was provided proved defective, and in spite of all exertions of firemen and others it is believed that at least six of the operatives perished in the flames.

In 1870 an act of incorporation was procured, and a contract made to purchase land in the vicinity of One Hundredth Street, between Third and Fourth avenues, whereon to build a grand Crystal Palace; and the design was to open an exhibition in it for the Centennial Independence Celebration, July 4, 1876. The matter is still being agitated.

A new imperial naval flag has been adopted by the Chinese government. It is of a triangular shape, made of bunting, of a deep yellow color, with a blue dragon courant in the centre. It is to be borne by all Chinese war vessels, and the object of the change is to make the flags carried by men-of-war uniform. Hitherto war vessels have carried the flag of the province to which they belong, and consequently the Chinese navy had about a dozen different ensigns. This is henceforth to be done away with, and the navy is to be centralized not only in appearance but in reality.

Somebody, with more truth than poetry, discourses thus:

"Beautiful snow! with a cough on your lungs,
And a chill that each nostril carefully bungs;
Beautiful snow! well, that's rather a jest,
With a big mustard poultice stinging your breast.

"Beautiful snow! when a delicate thaw
Makes the air chilly and damp and raw!
Beautiful snow! they may sing whom it suits.
I object to the stuff, 'cause it soaks through my boots."

The recent destruction by fire of a valuable collection of wild beasts is really a serious loss to the community, though we will not say irreparable. Many of the animals were rare, and had been brought here at great expense. A good menagerie gives both amusement and valuable instruction, particularly to the young. An exchange, in commenting upon this disaster, humorously remarks: "It is well enough understood by this time that Mr. Barnum is, morally considered, perfectly incombustible, and that nothing but the destruction of the whole world can prevent him from being the possessor of lions, tigers, and elephants, of monkeys, anacondas, and whales."

How to keep the feet warm in cold weather is a problem not easily solved. There are some fortunate persons whose circulation is vigorous, who never suffer with cold feet; but many live during the cold season in perpetual discomfort from this cause. Often the feet are not sufficiently protected. We do not consider how exposed they are to wet and snow out-of-doors, nor that in-doors the air near the floor is several degrees colder than that about our heads. Consequently the feet should be warmly clothed; and often, when sitting for a long while writing or studying, a warm soap-stone, or something of the kind, is both comfortable and useful. Tight shoes, tight elastic bands at the top of the stockings, or any stricture which interferes with the free circulation of the blood, will increase the tendency to cold feet. In general, those whose employment is of a sedentary nature suffer most from this habit of cold feet; hence it is evident that plenty of exercise tends to prevent the difficulty.

While on the subject of remedies for the ills of life, it may please our readers to know of a "new cure for ague," which originated "out West." It is simply to crawl down stairs head-foremost. "Laugh at the idea if you please," remarks the inventor of this novel remedy, "but do your crawling first; you can then afford to laugh. Just as the chill is coming on start at the top of a long flight of stairs, and crawl down on your hands and feet, head-foremost. You never did harder work in your life; and when you arrive at the bottom, instead of shaking, you will find yourself puffing, red in the face, and perspiring freely from the strong exertions made in the effort to support yourself. Try it. It won't cost you near as much as quinine or patent medicines, and if it fails it will only do what they do every day."

A most singular story is mentioned in an exchange concerning an old-fashioned clock in Portland, Maine. About fourteen years ago an old lady fell dead of heart-disease while winding up the clock. The time was ten minutes before ten in the morning, and ever since the clock has stopped at ten on the anniversary of her death. Such is the story.

Dr. Hall thinks that not one family in fifty knows how to cook a potato properly. He tells us that immediately beneath the very thin outer skin on the potato is the best part of the vegetable, the part that makes flesh and gives strength, and all the remainder of the potato is destitute of nourishment, containing only starch. He therefore regards it as very wasteful to bake potatoes. They should either be boiled or steamed with their skins on, and then the outer skin is easily removed without any of the nutritious portion adhering to it. Potatoes should always come on the table dry and mealy.

A little incident shows that Mr. Edwin Forrest was much beloved by those whom he had benefited. After his death, while the remains of Mr. Forrest lay in the parlor of his house, a throng of citizens and strangers gathered to take a last look of the dead. A middle-aged woman approached the coffin, and stood, with tearful eyes, gazing on the features of the deceased. At length she went to one of the gentlemen in charge of the room, and said, earnestly,

"Can I not have—oh! will you not give me a little of his hair?"

"Why, madam, that we can not do. We are very sorry, but have not that power."

"Let me plead with you."

"We are very sorry, but must refuse."

"Ah!" bursting into tears and sobbing convulsively, "he was very kind to me and my child!"

Then walking again to the body, taking a last, long look, and bending to kiss the cold brow, she passed from the place. She was unknown to all present.

Fig. 1.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 9 TO 11 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-6.

Fig. 5.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 13 TO 15 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7-14.

Fig. 6.—SKATING SUIT FOR BOY FROM 9 TO 11 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

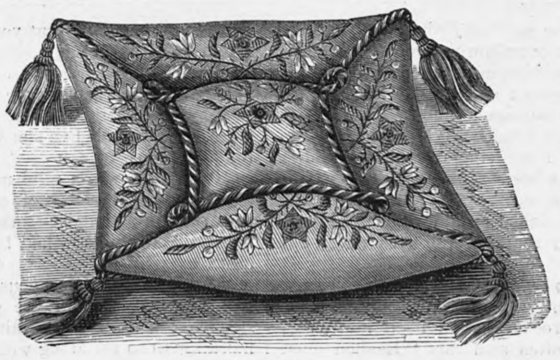
Fig. 7.—SKATING SUIT FOR BOY FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 15-19.

FIGS. 1-7.—SKATING SUITS FOR MISSES AND YOUTHS FROM 4 TO 15 YEARS OLD.

Hosted by Google

Pin or Emery Cushion with Point Russe Embroidery.

THIS pretty pincushion consists of a foundation of four three-cornered raised parts sewed together on the sides, which serve to support a small four-cornered cushion that is set in the centre. First make the cushion for each part by cutting of linen or muslin one piece from Fig. 39, Supplement, leaving extra material for the seams; fold this piece three-cornered, and overseam the sides of both halves together, leaving a slit an inch and a quarter long; then stuff this part closely with emery or sawdust, and sew up the slit. For the outer covering cut of red cashmere one piece from Fig. 39, Supplement, leaving extra material for the seams, work the embroidery on this piece, with the help of the illustration, as indicated on the pattern, in satin, half-polka stitch, and point Russe with sewing silk in various bright colors, and fasten the cover on the cushion. Overseam the four parts arranged in this manner together, and cover the seams with fine variegated silk cord. In a similar manner make a small four-cornered cushion two inches in diameter and seven-eighths of an inch thick, ornament the cover also with embroidery, edge it with silk cord, which is laid in a loop at each corner, and fasten the cushion on the foundation as shown by the illustration. Finish with silk tassels on the corners.



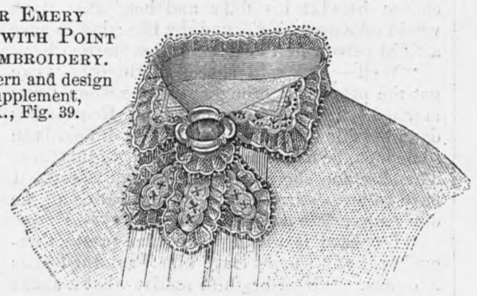
PIN OR EMERY CUSHION WITH POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 39.

NIGHT-VIOLET—A NEW COLOR.

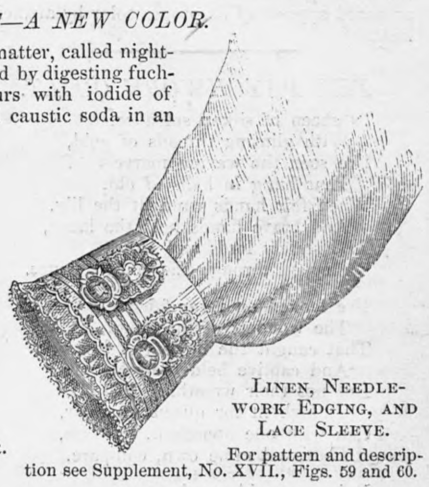
A NEW coloring matter, called night-violet, is prepared by digesting fuchsine for twelve hours with iodide of methyl, alcohol, and caustic soda in an

LINEN, LACE INSERTION, AND LAWN SLEEVE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Fig. 37.

LINEN, LACE INSERTION, AND LACE COLLAR.
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. VIII., Fig. 36.



LINEN, NEEDLE-WORK EDGING, AND LACE COLLAR.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 55-58.



LINEN, NEEDLE-WORK EDGING, AND LACE SLEEVE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 59 and 60.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—VIGOGNE SUIT.—FRONT. [See Fig. 3.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—VIGOGNE SUIT. BACK.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—POPLIN SUIT.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 20-28.

Fig. 5.—POPLIN SUIT.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 20-28.

FIGS. 1-5.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOUSE AND WALKING SUITS.

Hosted by Google

apparatus furnished with an inverted condenser. The mass, taken from the apparatus, is boiled for a long time with strong soda lye, which removes all the iodine, leaving the violet as a cake, which is to be dissolved in a mixture of sulphuric acid and water, and then precipitated by addition of a small quantity of soda. The cake so obtained is washed with a little cold water, dissolved in boiling water, filtered, and the color precipitated with salt. The violet so prepared appears of its proper color by artificial light.

THE PATCHWORK QUILT.

In sheen of silken splendor,
With glinting threads of gold,
I've seen the waving marvels
That hung in halls of old,
When fair hands wrought the lily,
And brave hands held the lance,
And stately lords and ladies
Stepped through the courtly dance.

I've looked on rarer fabrics,
The wonders of the loom,
That caught the flowers of summer,
And captive held their bloom;
But not their wreathing beauty,
Though fit for queens to wear,
Can with one household treasure,
That's all mine own, compare.

It has no golden value,
The simple patchwork spread;
Its squares in homely fashion
Set in with green and red;
But in those faded pieces
For me are shining bright,
Ah! many a summer morning,
And many a winter night.

The dewy breath of clover,
The leaping light of flame,
Like spells my heart come over,
As one by one I name
These bits of old-time dresses—
Chintz, cambric, calico—
That looked so fresh and dainty
On my darlings long ago.

This violet was mother's:
I seem to see her face,
That ever like a sunrise
Lit up the shadiest place.
This buff belonged to Susan;
That scarlet spot was mine;
And Fannie wore this pearly white,
Where purple pansies shine.

I turn my patchwork over—
A book with pictured leaves—
And I feel the lilac fragrance,
And the snow-fall on the eaves.
Of all my heart's possessions
I think it least could spare
The quilt we children pieced at home
When mother dear was there.

HIS FOLKS.

"I CAN'T stand it, and, what's more, I won't," said little Mrs. Hinkle, clutching the bars of her uncomfortable old cage of a rocking-chair.

Mr. Hinkle placidly hung up his almanac, and went out to sow the early pease. He could stand almost any thing, and yet remain as serene as a cabbage head—which, indeed, his wife often said he resembled. Laviny's tantrums troubled him about as much as a mosquito's buzzing would trouble an elephant; but he thought they were kind of wearing to her, and that she "came to quicker" alone. So he left her swinging herself seasick in the rocker, and shuffled off to the garden with a hoe and a pint dipper of pease. At the gate he met Miss Niddlins.

"And how's your poor wife?" said she, sniffing. She suffered with a chronic cold in the head, which gave her an extremely sympathetic manner.

"Able to be stirring," replied Mr. Hinkle, shuffling on in his brown leather moccasins. Even a cabbage head may be, as it usually is, ruffled inside; and deep in his slow-beating heart Mr. Hinkle was annoyed at the sight of Miss Niddlins and the embroidered bed-ticking bag which betokened a week's visit.

"Laviny's putchiky enough without being set on," said he, leaning on his hoe in the favorite attitude adopted by scarecrows. "Yes, I really think she is," he went on, weighing the proposition deliberately. "Not that I mind her being spry-tempered and spitting out at me. It's only a way she has, and comes of her enjoying such poor health. She'll cool down; but that old maid hain't any call to rile her;" and here Mr. Hinkle gave the hoe handle a resentful poke, as if it personated the spinster aforesaid. Like many men not gifted in public speaking, he was much given to talking aloud when alone. Indoors his wife claimed exclusive right of speech.

"And here I've stuck, like a dab of putty, from the day I married with Reuben," she was saying to Miss Niddlins. "I've had to walk on eggs, or his folks would be in my hair. They've had their remarks to make about all my doings, and, you may depend upon it, it grinds."

Mrs. Hinkle must have been ground very sharp indeed, judging by her cutting tongue.

"Poor thing!" groaned Miss Niddlins, using her handkerchief just then because it would produce the effect of pity.

"See how I was put upon this morning by his sister Phebe," said Mrs. Hinkle, moving the end of her nose rapidly back and forth with her forefinger, as if she were playing on a Jew's-harp. "That woman had the impudence to twit me of neglecting Reuben, because I leave him to get his own supper sewing-circle nights!"

"Don't tell me so!" sniffed Miss Niddlins. "Did Mr. Hinkle complain to her?"

"Catch him complaining!" cried Mrs. Hinkle; "he hasn't got spunk enough. Why, he's no more grit than a hay-stack, and he's as sot. I couldn't make him break with his folks if I was to suffer. Wish I was single: then I wouldn't be nosed round by 'em. Now here you are, free to go when you please!"

Miss Niddlins sighed an affirmative. It was her peculiar trial that her relatives never opposed her going.

"If you was to separate, I suppose you've got enough to live on," suggested she, cautiously.

Mrs. Hinkle's rocker jerked itself into a full stop. She had often said that "Reuben must choose betwixt his folks and her," that "she would take herself off," and the like; but to have a third person hint at a separation startled her.

"Well—yes," said she, hesitatingly. "I've got the property I brought with me when I was married. I won't deny but what Reuben has done the fair thing there; but then, if he'd been some men, he might have doubled it by this time. The long and short of it is, he's half asleep. I have to keep stirring him up, and, after all, he don't appreciate me!"

"I believe it would wake him pretty thoroughly if you should leave him," returned Miss Niddlins. "He'd begin to realize what a smart wife he'd lost."

"He'd clutter the kitchen with his greasy harnesses, and camp down on the lunge in his boots—that's what he'd do—the minute I was off!" snapped Mrs. Hinkle.

"He couldn't manage without you, to save his life," declared Miss Niddlins, confidently. "He'd go down on his knees to you to get you back."

Mrs. Hinkle seemed flattered by the idea.

"A pretty figure he'd cut," laughed she, "fat as he is, and looking, you might say, as if he'd been blowed up in his clothes!"

"I'm sure I don't see how you can smile, situated as you are," said Miss Niddlins, showing symptoms of fresh cold.

"His folks have tried my soul out of me," cried Mrs. Hinkle, hastily resuming her wrath; "and what's madded me the most has been to see Reuben take it so cool. That man hasn't any more nerves than a tub of lard! I wouldn't value jumping off the meeting-house steeple if I thought it would give him a start."

"Poor woman!" said Miss Niddlins, displaying the red silk handkerchief that might properly be called her badge of mourning. "It's your duty to yourself to go where you can take some peace of your life!"

"I don't feel clear," said Mrs. Hinkle, as she settled the coffee for dinner, and thus ended their first conference.

But as Miss Niddlins spent the week, justifying Mr. Hinkle's apprehensions, she and Mrs. Hinkle had ample opportunities for renewing the discussion of the latter's grievances, till, from not feeling "clear," Mrs. Hinkle, by the time her guest departed, came to feel, as she expressed it, "all in a muddle." Even her ox-eyed husband noticed something amiss with her.

"I wonder whether or no sage tea wouldn't be kind of quieting to Laviny," he reflected one morning as he jogged along to the village after turnip seed. "I hain't seen her so fractious since she had the neurology in her face. If she wasn't a poor sick creetur I don't know but I should get put out with her—I really don't;" and Mr. Hinkle lowered his voice to an awe-struck whisper as he gave utterance to this treasonous thought.

"His folks" lived in a sick-headache-colored house at the Four Corners, and his sister Phebe was hanging out clothes in the back-yard as he drove up.

"Got any sage to spare?" cried Mr. Hinkle, whoaing Dobbin.

"Mercy on us! is Laviny going to make cheese in mud-time?" was Miss Phebe's answer.

"'Tisn't none of her doings," said Mr. Hinkle, slowly, punishing the wheel with his whiplash; "but she's in a terrible nervous way, and I think maybe she needs something soothing. What's good for her nerves?"

"I don't know, without it's a sound scolding," replied Miss Phebe, with her mouth full of clothes-pins.

"Now, sister, you're hard on Laviny," said Mr. Hinkle, in an injured tone. "She ain't tough, like what you be."

"Her temper is tough enough; but I'm suited if you are, poor soul!" and Miss Phebe hunted for both sage and valerian, though inwardly persuaded that all the poppies in the world couldn't soothe Laviny when she once got "set out."

Meanwhile Mrs. Hinkle had been doing a furious forenoon's work, and, ready to drop from exhaustion, was just hanging up the mop after scrubbing the kitchen floor, when dear, blundering old Reuben scuffed across the threshold with his torn paper bags, scattering dried leaves like an autumn wind, and leaving muddy moccasin tracks at every step. Before those clumsy footprints Mrs. Hinkle's feeble forbearance fled. The herbs her husband had trusted might prove a narcotic acted upon her as a powerful irritant.

"Reuben Hinkle!" said she, bracing her aching back against the pump, "how much longer do you think I'm going to wash floors for you to litter?"

"There, there! now don't fret," pleaded Reuben; "I'll sweep it up. You do putter round more'n you're able, that's a fact. You know I'm ready and willing to hire a girl any day."

"A girl smouching my paint!" cried Mrs. Hinkle, in wrath. "Put down the broom, Reuben; you've made tracks enough. Your folks shall never have that handle, that I spend your money on hired help."

"You're rather hard on 'em, Laviny," said Mr. Hinkle; "they mean well by you. Here's Phebe now been and sent you something stilling. I told her what a fizz your nerves had been in lately."

"So you've been running me down to your folks!" cried Mrs. Hinkle, glaring at her husband. "After all I've stood from you, Reuben, it's too much."

Mr. Hinkle was a mild man—mild as milk; but even the sweetest of milk will sometimes turn sour in a thunder-storm, and oft-recurring matrimonial tempests had had their effect upon him.

"I've always made excuses for you, Laviny, and tried my best to live peaceable," said he, slowly; "but I believe 'tain't in the power of mortal man to get along with you."

Then, in a state of great amazement at himself, he went out to untackle Dobbin and sow the turnip seed. Listening in vain for the dinner horn, he returned to the house half an hour past noon to find the fire out, his unlucky mud-prints dried upon the floor, and his wife absent.

"Gone off in a huff to her sister Tripp's, I guess," said he, patiently setting out the Sunday remnant of beans. "I'd have hitched up if I'd have knowed she wanted to go. She wouldn't speak to me, I s'pose, 'cause I'd riled her. I hadn't oughter done it—that's a fact."

Having relieved his mind by this last confession, Mr. Hinkle ate his dinner with an excellent appetite, and in due time his supper also, his wife not having appeared.

"I expect she calculates for me to go for her, and I'd better be off," said he, as he strained the milk with extreme care and deliberation, and by this means let a slow stream trickle down the outside of the pail upon the spotless pantry floor. "Why, if there ain't Ezra Tripp now!" and as he spoke, in at the west door came his wife's brother-in-law, with unwilling feet, as though goaded on by the spears of the setting sun behind him.

"Laviny ain't sick, I hope?" said Mr. Hinkle, anxiously.

"No, 'tisn't that," replied Mr. Tripp, twisting his forefinger under his collar, as if his cravat choked him—"'tisn't that—but—"

"She's getting most out of patience waiting for me, I suppose," suggested the unsuspecting Reuben. "Well, I'd oughter gone afore, only the off ox broke through the fence, and—"

"Laviny says she won't come back," interrupted Mr. Tripp, desperately; "for she's lived with you as long as she can stand it!"

Mr. Hinkle flopped down like a starchless dicky.

"I might have knowed she couldn't bear what I do," groaned he. "This morning, when she was blowing of me, I spoke ha'sh to her: I don't see how I come to. But, Ezra, you don't think, now, she won't never come round?"

Mr. Tripp muttered something about his sister-in-law being "pretty resolute," and turned away.

"I wish you'd carry over Laviny's cough medicine," said Mr. Hinkle, rousing himself. "Lord! to think of her hacking in the night, and me not hearing her! And, Ezra, I'd take it kindly of you if you'd step in in the morning and tell me how she rested."

Mr. Tripp consigned the bottle to his coat pocket, while Reuben, returning to the deserted kitchen, which already wore a masculine air, tilted his chair against the wall, and listened to the dirges of the frogs, or gave expression to his feelings by singing,

"As on some lonely building's top
The sparrow tells her moan,
Far from the tents of joy and hope
I sit and grieve alone."

"A dreadful poor hand I should be to sit alone," commented he, as he shuffled about to fasten the windows.

"Laviny is a master-woman for making things lively. Somehow I can't bear to lock her out;" and it is a fact worthy of note that the faithful Reuben, for the first time in his married life, went to bed leaving the porch door unbolted.

If he had cherished a vague hope that his wife might steal home in the early morning, he certainly saw no traces of her ruling presence on rising. Instead, the abomination of desolation reigned.

"Seems 's if I was just a frame-work, with nothing inside," said the poor man, moving about the chaotic kitchen in a hushed manner, like a person at a funeral; "the pith is all knocked out of me."

But notwithstanding this alarming internal condition, by dint of burning three fingers he succeeded in making a lumpy hasty-pudding for breakfast, and also a cup of coffee, which, by reason of the large amount of fish-skin that settled it, bore an unpleasant resemblance to chowder. As he was sitting at this frugal repast his sister Phebe flounced in.

"Has Laviny left you, Reuben? It can't be."

Mr. Hinkle nodded his head solemnly, his mouth being not available just then as an organ of speech.

"The worst is her own," stormed Miss Phebe, raining a shower of hair-pins from her falling chignon. "I guess we sha'n't die on her account!"

This reflection seemed to convey no consolation to Mr. Hinkle.

"You never felt right toward Laviny," said he, sorrowfully. "I don't lay this up agin her, her clearing out; I blame it on to Miss Niddlins. She always had a dreadful faculty for onsettling Laviny."

Miss Phebe had a contemptuous nose, turned upward at the end like a sled runner. It curled higher yet at this remark.

"I wish you had some of my spirit, Reuben Hinkle," said she, coiling her back hair with a rapid circular motion, as if she were winding herself up; "if you had, you wouldn't go nigh Laviny for one while. She's contrary, and depend upon it she'll be a great deal more apt to come back if you don't tease her. I'll keep house for you, so don't you be a mite concerned."

Mr. Hinkle groaned in answer. As dough is without yeast, so was he without Laviny. "He needed her to keep him up," he said, pathetically; and though tortures would not have wrung from her the confession, it was equally true that Laviny needed him to keep her down. Some leaven is safest hidden in its three measures of meal. Certainly, in her husband's presence, Mrs. Hinkle had been a patient Griselda compared to what she now was, freed from home restraints. She fretted and fumed in an explosive manner, raising an unwonted fermentation in the Tripp household. She hated his folks; she hated Reuben for not hating them; she hated herself for having borne their interference so long; and declared she had not had "the temper of a fly"—which, indeed, was quite true. But as the week wore on without bringing the coveted vision of her husband at her feet, the effervescence of her mood was fast subsiding, when the rumor that Miss Phebe was wielding her domestic sceptre agitated it anew. Pretty work it was, to be crowded out of her own home by his folks! She knew now why Reuben had not come. They had been setting him against her. What if he should never come? For the first time this thought intruded itself, and in her anguish she sought relief in the camphor bottle. What right had Phebe in her kitchen, solacing Reuben with delectable cookery, when he should have been hungering in solitude after his wife? She declared such conduct would provoke a saint, though she did not give her authority for this conviction. One thing was sure, Phebe should not have the washing of her tea-spoons; and without delay Mrs. Hinkle sent a juvenile Tripp to remove these and other personal valuables, choosing the dinner hour for the errand, that the scenic effect might be greater. When Mr. Hinkle was forced to stir his tea with a fork, perhaps he would be in more haste to conciliate his wife! The plan was well laid; but it failed in the execution through the tardiness of little Joe, who, having a woodchuck to attend to on the way, did not reach his uncle's till the remains of the dinner lay cold on the pantry shelf, and Mr. Hinkle was half a mile away at his afternoon plowing.

Miss Phebe sent the spoons obediently, inwardly resolved that Reuben should not know of this proof of "Laviny's ugliness," for she was well aware that only her own repeated assurances that Laviny would soften toward him if left to herself had kept him passive thus far.

"Seems 's if I wasn't doing the handsome thing not to go nigh her," he often said. "I wonder whether or no she ain't counting on my fetching her?"

"If she comes of her free-will she'll be likely to stay put," Miss Phebe would answer; "but try to drive her, and you know what Laviny is."

Mr. Hinkle did know, unfortunately, and, knowing, schooled himself to patient waiting.

Thus the days wore on, and he plodded through the spring work, cheered a little in spite of himself by Miss Phebe's earnest efforts at making him comfortable, while Laviny, mortified and then alarmed by his non-appearance, worried herself into a course of exasperating sick headaches, and in every sense shut out the sunlight from the house of the Tripps. In the midst of paint-scrubbing Mrs. Tripp found no leisure to devote to her complaining sister, but left one of her children to wait upon her. Mrs. Hinkle felt abused. When had Reuben been too busy to bathe her aching temples? Little Joe made her nervous as a witch, and one day she told him so, and a moment after had the satisfaction of hearing him say to his mother in the kitchen that he "couldn't get along with Aunt Laviny nohow."

Why, that was just what Reuben had said—Reuben, who had never spoken hastily to her in his life! Was she an uncomfortable person to live with?

"'Tain't in the power of mortal man to get along with you, Laviny." The words came back to her with the startling force of a proof-text, and haunted her afterward continually.

It must have been in rhubarb time, for dandelion greens had gone by, when one morning little Joe rushed in with the terrible tidings that "Uncle Reuben had fallen ker-chunk from a beam in the barn."

Mrs. Hinkle tore the bandages from her head and started up.

"Where's my bonnet, Susan? I'm going home!"

"Maybe he isn't badly injured. Wait till we hear further," urged Mrs. Tripp.

"I tell you I'm going home, Susan Tripp! Where's my bonnet?" and snatching it by the string, Mrs. Hinkle sprang into the wagon just vacated by her nephew, and drove away at a doctor's pace.

Little Joe turned a series of somersaults, and then lay writhing on the grass in a fit of uncontrollable giggling.

"Didn't Aunt Laviny streak it?" shouted he. "And Uncle Reuben wasn't hurt a mite, but she wouldn't let me tell her! Tee-hee-hee!"

Yet, though no bones were broken by the fall, it is a fact that Mr. Hinkle found his two hundred pounds avoirdupois considerably shaken, and he was actually, according to his wife's prediction, "camping down on the lunge in his boots," when, opening his eyes, they rested on her frightened face in the doorway.

"Why, bless your heart! come right in, Laviny," said he. And she went in, and shut the door.

Five minutes afterward, as Miss Phebe lifted the latch, she heard her sister-in-law say,

"I know I've hectored you awfully, Reuben, but I do mean to live peaceable now, and put up with your folks."

And Reuben answered, heartily: "I haven't blamed you a bit, Laviny. I knowed 'twas Miss Niddlins's work. But after we'd lived together so long, she might have let us be till God divorced us."

Hosted by Google

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

VISITS are every where a great social institution. Perhaps in most places they are considered something of a social nuisance. At any rate, there is no custom of civilized life that comes in for a greater share of grumbling and gratuitous ill-will. People pay visits as they pay their bills, because it is a necessity established as rigorously by precedent and practice as the payment of one's debts is by law. How cordially nine-tenths of the visiting community hate the business, how they growl over it, and how devoutly they wish the people may be out, and that they may get off with leaving a card, instead of sitting out a tiresome twenty minutes in evolving commonplaces out of their bored wits, and listening to those of the person they are inflicting their politeness on! As to gentlemen, does there exist any country in the civilized world where they can be induced to pay a visit with their wives or mothers without putting those relatives to an amount of preliminary labor in the way of entreaties, cajoleries, coaxing, pouting, and, if the occasion be of a sufficiently urgent kind to justify such extreme measures, threatening and storming, as might be excused if the sacrifice demanded were the pulling out of a tooth? Well, we have a great deal before us in the way of reforms to be effected in the habits and training of these refractory creatures, whose vanity we gratify and disarm by leaving them still the harmless and empty title of lords of the creation. But all this is only leading up to a scolding that I am under the painful necessity of giving my dear American friends. If I loved them less, I should scold them less; but it is just because I have their perfection so much at heart that I am continually laying about them with my cat-o'-nine tails. I want them to seem to all the world on this side of the Atlantic as charming and as genuine as I know them to be. I can not bear, for instance, to hear English and French ladies—the latter especially—say, as I am constantly condemned to do, "How rude those Americans are! Really, they don't know the first rules of civilized society." How can you understand what my feelings are on hearing such comments as these? If you can, then help me to escape them in the future by avoiding the small, the very small, misdemeanors that call them forth. So few Americans are to be found nowadays who have not been to Paris that it seems almost superfluous to mention that in that city people live on flats. Those of my readers, however, who have still the delights of a first visit to Europe before them may be glad to hear some details of the subject. The flats run on first, second, third, fourth, and fifth floors, the value of the apartment decreasing as it rises in height. Formerly a third floor was the last stage at which a family with a tolerable income halted; but of late years the enormous increase of rent has driven even rich people to the topmost rung of the ladder, and you continually find the fourth floors occupied by families who keep a handsome establishment and a carriage. The fifth is so fatiguing and so inconvenient in many ways—being, for instance, right under the domestic republic, composed of your own and your fellow-tenants' servants, stowed away in pigeon-holes, and prone to relieve the monotony of their life in the daytime by convivial meetings at night, often prolonged till the small hours in the morning, and accompanied with sounds not conducive of a good night's rest to the members of the cinquième—that it is never taken, except under pressure of necessity, by a very numerous family, who must have space at any cost; but generally it is let to tailors or such-like. The general run of apartments for comfortable French families is the second and third floors. The first are rented by rich foreigners, as a rule. Americans who are not biased by the conceit of being on a fashionable floor—at least those who come for a season or so—usually encamp on the second or third, where they have the compensations of better light and air, and are at a pleasant distance from cigars and the noise of the street. We will take, therefore, these floors as our basis of consideration in the present grievance. When a French or an English lady does not choose to receive visitors, she sends down word to the concierge to that effect; if she is expecting some particular visit for which she wishes to make an exception, she tells the concierge that she will be at home for Monsieur or Madame So-and-so, and for no one else. All other callers are consequently met with the consigne, "Madame is not at home." Some are so rash or so confident in the fact of their friend being in the house and open to visits that they pass the lodge without inquiring. When, therefore, they are turned back after climbing two or three pairs of stairs, they have no right to complain. But this is a venture that no sane Frenchwoman would embark in without consulting the Cerberus at the gate first. If that functionary is of an oblivious turn of mind, or, what is more likely, if you, for some reason best known to him, have the ill luck to lie under his displeasure, then your friends will be sent up when you have forbidden it, and sent away when you have said you were willing to see them. Some unhappy victims of their concierge have been driven to adopt the crooked-attorney system in the matter of receiving visitors, and of saying they were out when they wished particularly to be in, and vice versa. But then the remedy was in their own hands, or, more properly speaking, in their pockets. Now this simple precaution of saving their friends' legs by warning their concierge, Americans, as a rule, never take. The consequence is that they are constantly getting into hot water, and giving mortal offense to their French and English acquaintances, who are allowed to toil up to their door, and then coolly told that madame is tired and lying down, or that she has a headache, or letters to write that must go that day, etc. The visitor, justly incensed, turns away resolved never to return unless some apology is offered for such rudeness, and avenges herself by complaining to every body she meets that day of the uncivilized ways of those Americans. Another common complaint against Americans is that, when they do receive you, they are apt to keep you waiting while they change their dress, or make some other preparation meant to do you honor. This is considered extremely rude in Paris. A Frenchwoman would come out in her night-cap, once you have been admitted, rather than keep you waiting till she got herself up in drawing-room attire. Louis XVIII. said that punctuality was the politeness of kings: a Frenchwoman considers haste—or empressement, she would call it—the best politeness of a hostess; and in this she rarely fails. Now let me hear of an improvement in this matter, and spare me the pain of listening to invectives against the rudeness of those dreadful Americans for the future.

COMET.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XII.

IF ever a woman deserved a seat in the French Academy for the value of her literary labors to mankind, she was Madame Celnart. The works of this lively, engaging author on manners, dress, cosmetics, needle-work, and kindred topics no less interesting to her sex, and through them to the other, are to be found in eight small octavos in their native French. The lady was an industrious and brilliant writer on themes of the toilette, the household, and deportment, on which Mrs. Farrar, author of The Young Lady's Friend, of our mothers' time, and Mrs. Beeton, the editor of The Englishwoman's Magazine, in our day, have succeeded her with much adornment but no greater scope. Madame Celnart talks—one can hardly imagine her holding a pen—like a Parisian, with empressement, with drollery, precision, and inimitable sprightliness, like a gentle-bred old beauty, secure in the charm of her finished manner against the loss of her earlier fascinations, telling a younger generation the toilette secrets of her age, with half a smile at their readiness to seize these arts, and seriously pointing out the most graceful way of doing things, or the most modest, with the concern of one who is painfully conscious that grace and prudence do not come to all her sex by nature, however the love of these things do. Can not one imagine the arch gentleness with which she opens her work on the toilette in such easy, sparkling guise as this:

"Je viens de feuilleter les arts de plaire, les livres de beauté, et autres évangiles de courtisane," which may be freely translated, "I come to speak of the arts of pleasing, the literature of beauty, and other evangels of coquetry." She has a well-bred curl of disdain for "une allure bourgeoise mesquine," but with the reverence of a true Frenchwoman, whose creed is her mirror, she pronounced her work "consacré à la toilette, et la conservation de la beauté." These duties she divides with serious precision into the "soins de la toilette," which include cosmetic arts, and "l'art de se coiffer, lacer, et chausser." It was indeed an art, in the time of hundred-boned corsets without clasps, to lace one's self, and in the days of classic sandals, perhaps, to put on one's shoes. She is exact in all her details as a schoolmistress might be, though one fancies a covert smile on her wise face as she rallies the young demoiselles who dreaded the bath—because it was so cold? Oh no; but because their modesty could not endure the baring of their person even to themselves. Such, she gravely advises, may save their "pudeur" by bathing in a peignoir. One inevitably recalls Lola Montez's dedication of her famous Book of Beauty, "To all men and women who are not afraid of themselves," in hearing of these French demoiselles with their conventual susceptibility. The graceful preceptress goes on with directions for sitting, for holding one's needle, for dancing, and how to hold one's petticoats out of the mud; and that such hints are by no means superfluous any body will allow who notices the varied awkwardnesses which women fall into who are habitually thoughtless on these points. Some of these nice customs may have been carried to our shores, possibly with Rochambeau's French ladies at Newport or Salem. I remember hearing one of the fine Newburyport ladies, who answer to the description of gentlewomen still, maintain that it was most graceful to "sew with a long point"—that is, to push the needle nearly its whole length through at each stitch, instead of pulling it out, so to speak, by the nose. And she was right, as you can verify by the next sewing you take up.

In the time of Madame Celnart, fine ladies were used to powdering their hair with the dust of Florentine iris, which gave their love-breathing tresses the violet odor of the spring. A pleasant idea; but their iris, our orris root, must have been a trifle fresher than comes to this country. It makes us sure that the beauties of Titian's and Guido's times were real women, when we know that they steeped their tresses in bleaching liquids and dyes, and spread their locks in the sun for hours to gain the coveted golden tinge; and the hair of the Bella Donna herself might have caught part of its enchantment from the sprinkling of violet powder that lent its waves a soul. Those immortal beauties would have canonized Lubin if he had been alive with his pomades and perfumes. Celnart was a courageous advocate of cosmetics, or else she was wise enough to put the worst first, for one of her earliest recipes is this depilatory, which we do not quote by way of recommendation at all. It is the Oriental Rusma, a depilatory used in harems.

Two ounces of quicklime, half an ounce of orpiment and red arsenic; boil in one pint of alkaline lye, and try with a feather to see when it is strong enough. Touch the parts to be rid of hair and wash with cold water. When we say that orpiment and realgar are deadly poisons, and add Madame Celnart's remark that the mixture is of "une grande causticité," attacking often the tissue of the skin, our readers will quite agree with her that it is only to be used with "la plus grande circonspection," or, better, not at all. The Crème Parisienne dépilatoire is harmless, and probably of very little use, but I give it for what it is worth: One-eighth of an ounce of rye starch, and the same of sulphate of baryta (or heavy-spar), the juice of purslane, acacia, and milk-thistle, mixed with oil.

The high-sounding Paste of Venus, devised by a Parisian cosmetic artist, who shared the mythologic fancy which prevailed years ago, was spread over the skin to soften and perfume it. Faith, Esther herself might have used it, for its conjugation of spices would delight an Oriental. It was made of fat, butter, honey, and aromatics, the more the better; but as none of our belles wish to try the anointing bodily, I spare them the list, and give instead the Esprit de pyrêtre. The pyrethrum, or Spanish pellitory, is an herb which is highly valued by cosmetic artists, and appears in several recipes of the French.

Powdered cinnamon, one dram; coriander, nineteen scruples; vanilla, the same; clove, eighteen grains; cochineal, mace, and saffron, the same; simple spirit of pyrethrum, one litre (about seven-eighths of a quart). Let these ingredients digest for fifteen days, and add orange-flower water, half an ounce; oil of anise, eighteen drops; citron, ditto; oils of lavender and thyme, each nine drops; ambergris, three grains. Mix the ambergris with the pyrêtre and put the two liquids together. Filter after two days. Use as a toilette water.

No wonder the French cosmetics are so highly valued, when their composition embraces such a variety of pleasing ingredients. Thyme, anise, and saffron seem homely herbs for the use of our dainty women, but they assisted at every toilette among the Greek women of old, and Rhodora wound the crocus (meadow-saffron) with the rose, and wove fennel among her jasmines, without a thought such as these things give us of sick teas and home-made dyes. Why should herbs of such excellent renown lose the poetry that belongs to them? Mingled in variety with ambergris and orange flowers, they give body to a perfume rich enough to have satisfied Cleopatra. But if this is complicated, what will be said to the next recipe, which is compounded by South American women, but was fashionable in Paris not so very long after the time of Josephine, who may have patronized, or, indeed, introduced the souvenir of creole coquetry. Says Madame Celnart, speaking of it, "Only the Tartuffes of coquetry could blame the Mexican pomade," whose proportions indicate that the formula came straight from the perfumer's hands, and is therefore correct. Any one who wishes to try it can reduce the measure to suit themselves.

Extract of cocoa, sixty-four ounces; oil of noisette, thirty-two ounces; oil of ben, thirty-two ounces; oil of vanilla, two ounces; white balsam of Peru, one dram; benzoin flowers, half a dram; civet, ditto; neroli, one dram; essence of rose, one dram; oil of clove flowers, one ounce; citron and bergamot waters, each half a pint. Steep the vanilla in the cocoa butter eight days in a hot place; dissolve the balsam in half a glass of alcohol, with the benzoin and civet, and add the spirit of clove. Mix the essence of rose and neroli in the oils of ben and noisette, and beat the whole forcibly together in a large marble or china bowl.

The creole women spread this paste on their smooth skins, which the oil of the cocoa softens and moistens, while the delightful changing odor is absorbed, till their forms are like living, dusky, but perfumed marbles. These recipes are given not so much for imitation, or to contribute to the lore of perfumers this side the water, as curiosities of national arts and feminine vanity. Where in our country would we find the ingredients of the celebrated Eau de Stahl, known to the Parisian chemists forty years ago? Its compound was as follows:

Alcohol, nine litres; rose-water, three litres; the root of Spanish pellitory, five ounces; gallingole root, three ounces; tormentil, three ounces; balsam of Peru, three ounces; cinnamon, five drams; rue, one ounce; ratania, eight ounces. Powder the whole, and put in alcohol; shake well, and leave to macerate six days. Pour off, and let it stand twenty-four hours to clear, after which add essential oil of mint, one and a half drams; powdered cochineal, four drams. Leave to infuse anew three days; filter through filtering-paper, and decant. Use for a tooth wash, and for washing the face, or for baths.

The Peruvian powder was another standard preparation of the same date for a dentifrice. It was made of white sugar, half a dram; cream of tartar, one dram; magnesia, ditto; cinnamon, six grains; mace, two grains; sulphate of quinine, three grains; carmine, five grains. Powder and mix carefully, adding four drops of the oils of rose and of mint.

The following cosmetic, called the Serkis du Sérail, is said to be a favorite lotion used by the Sultanas, for whom it is imported from Achaia—though this sounds like one of those pleasant fictions which perfumers delight to invent concerning their oils and pomades more than like any thing we are obliged to believe. There is this to be said in favor of the assertion, that it is just such a mixture of starch and oils as no one but an odalisque could endure to use. It is made of sweet-almond paste, ten livres; rye and potato starch, each six livres; oil of jasmine, eight ounces; the same of oil of orange flowers and of roses; black balsam of Peru, six ounces; essence of rose and of cinnamon, each sixty grains. Mix the powders and essences separately in earthen vessels, then add the powder to the liquid little by little, bruise well together, and strain through muslin.

An elegant preparation for whitening the face and neck is made of terebinth of Mecca, three grains; oil of sweet almonds, four ounces; spermaceti, two drams; flower of zinc, one dram; white wax, two drams; rose-water, six drams. Mix in a water-bath, and melt together. The harmless mineral white is fixed in the pomade, or what we would call cold cream, and is applied with the greatest ease and fine effect. It must be to some preparation of this subtle sort that the lustrous whiteness of certain much-admired fashionable complexions is due. It is a cheap enamel, without the supposed necessity of baking, which, by the way, is such a point-blank blunder that we wonder so many people of sense persist in speaking of it as if it could be a fact.

EVENING TOILETTES.

See illustrations on page 60.

Fig. 1.—This graceful toilette for a full-dress reception is of salmon-colored faille. The demi-trained skirt, without flounces or over-skirt, has an elaborate trimming of white chenille balls, imitating pearls. The low square corsage is edged with point lace, and has lace frills across the back and front; also swinging chains of the balls fall from the shoulders. The necklace and coiffure are also of chenille. Coral jewelry, set in massive Etruscan gold. Pink and yellow roses in the hair. Bouquet of violets and tea-roses.

Fig. 2.—Evening dress of rose-colored faille, with untrimmed demi-train, and chatelaine bodice extending below the waist in the antique fashion. The over-skirt is of Valenciennes lace in quaint medieval design. The sash is of faille ribbon the color of the dress. The Grecian bertha is formed of this ribbon and lace. A lace frill surrounds the chatelaine bodice. Necklace and ear-rings of diamonds and red gold. Provence roses in the corsage and coiffure. Long white kid gloves without buttons.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

WE do not hear that Memnon's statue gave forth its melody at all under the rushing of the mightiest wind, or in response to any other influence, divine or human, than certain short-lived sunbeams of morning; and we must learn to accommodate ourselves to the discovery that some of those cunningly fashioned instruments called human souls have only a very limited range of music, and will not vibrate in the least under a touch that fills others with tremulous rapture or quivering agony.

See the difference between the impression a man makes on you when you walk by his side in familiar talk, or look at him in his home, and the figure he makes when seen from a lofty historical level, or even in the eyes of a critical neighbor, who thinks of him as an embodied system or opinion rather than as a man.

That is the great advantage of dialogue on horseback; it can be merged any minute into a trot or a canter, and one might have escaped from Socrates himself in the saddle.

The beginning of hardship is like the first taste of bitter food—it seems for a moment unbearable; yet, if there is nothing else to satisfy our hunger, we take another bite, and find it possible to go on.

The finest language, I believe, is chiefly made up of unimposing words, such as "light," "sound," "stars," "music"—words really not worth looking at, or hearing, in themselves, any more than "chips" or "sawdust:" it is only that they happen to be the signs of something unspeakably great and beautiful.

When death, the great Reconciler, has come, it is never our tenderness that we repent of, but our severity.

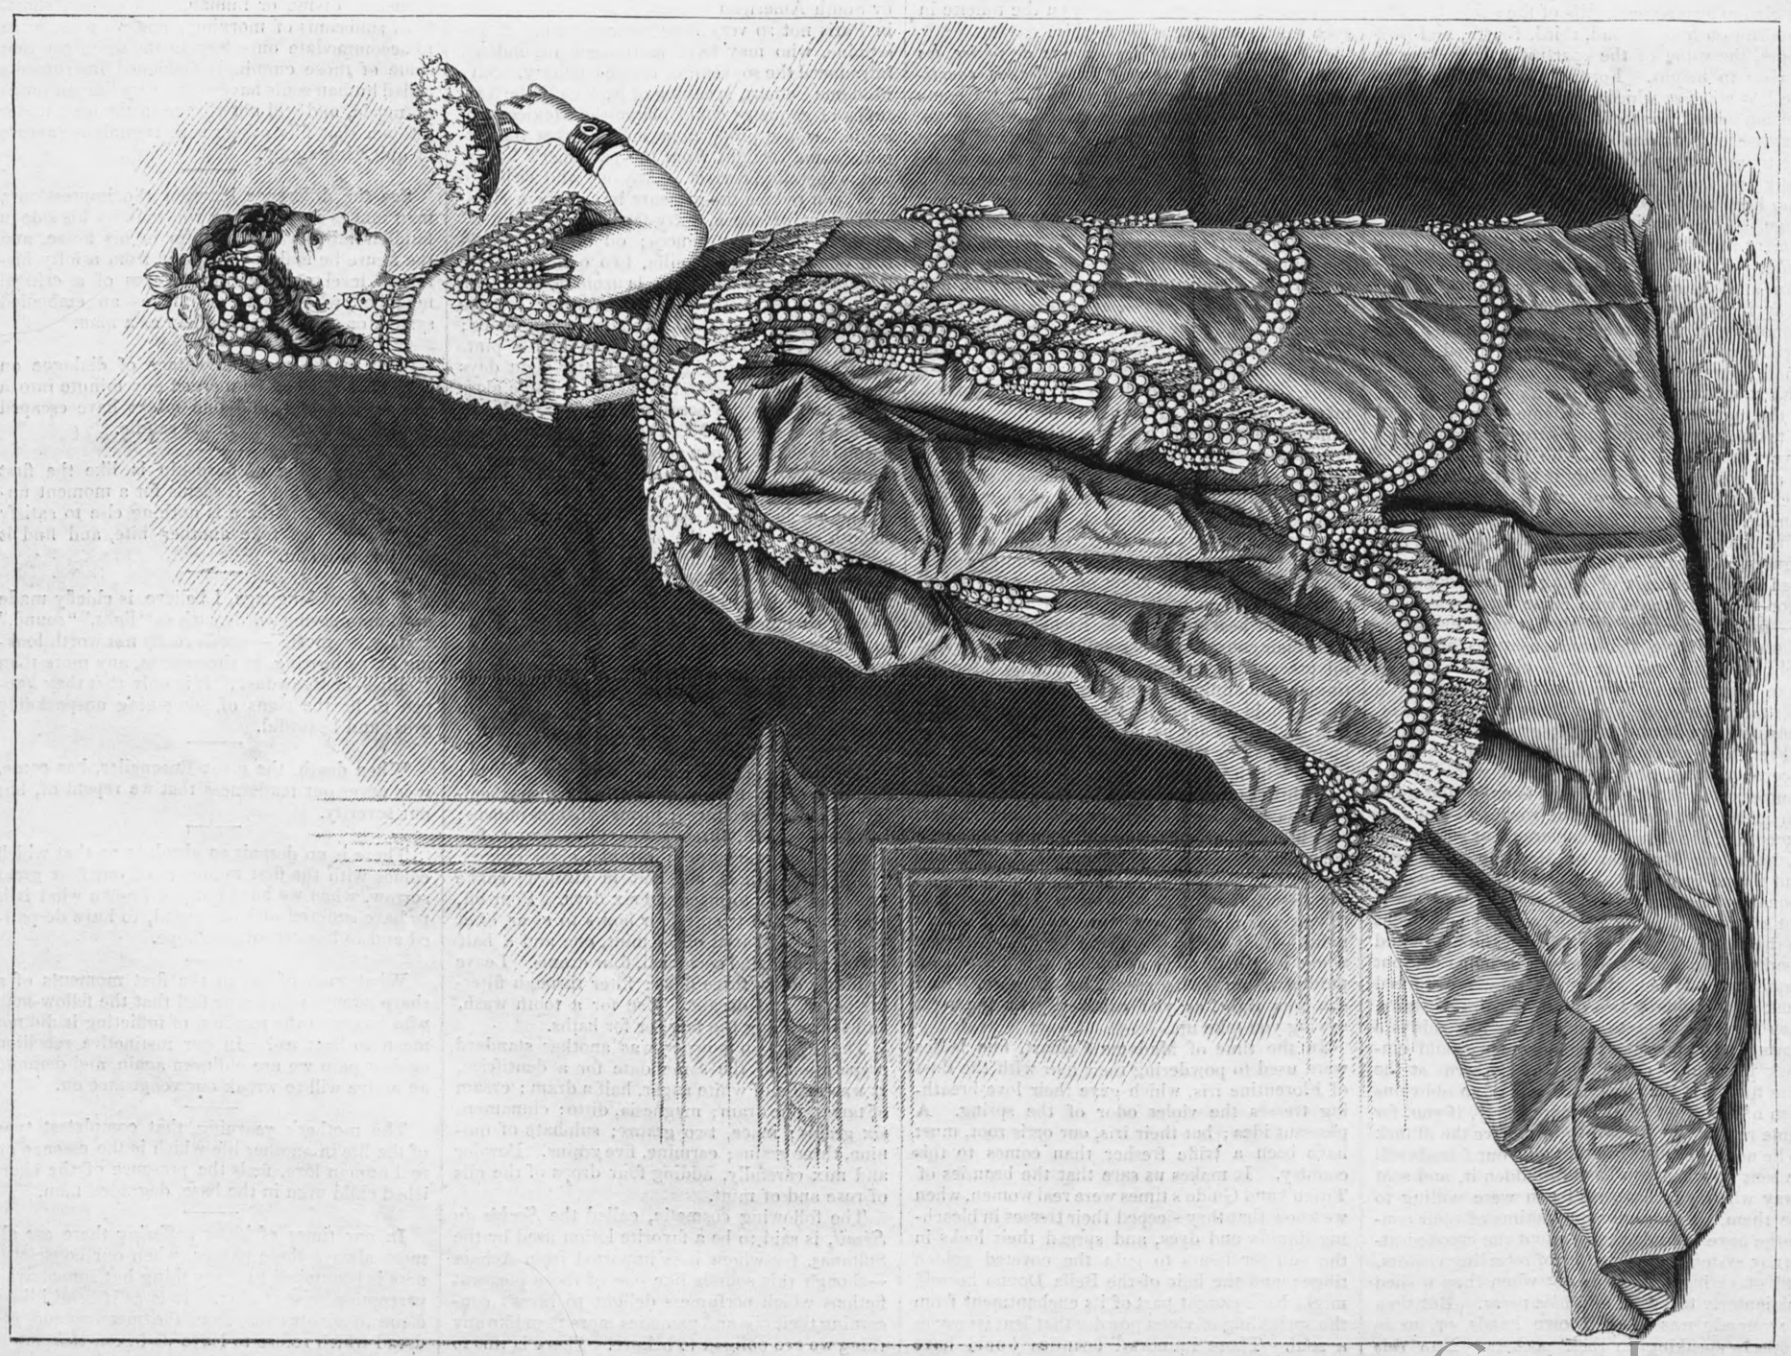
There is no despair so absolute as that which comes with the first moments of our first great sorrow, when we have not yet known what it is to have suffered and be healed, to have despaired and to have recovered hope.

What man of us, in the first moments of a sharp agony, could ever feel that the fellow-man who has been the medium of inflicting it did not mean to hurt us? In our instinctive rebellion against pain we are children again, and demand an active will to wreak our vengeance on.

The mother's yearning, that completest type of the life in another life which is the essence of real human love, feels the presence of the cherished child even in the base, degraded man.

In our times of bitter suffering there are almost always these pauses, when our consciousness is benumbed to every thing but some trivial perception or sensation. It is as if semi-idiocy came to give us rest from the memory and the dread which refuse to leave us in our sleep.

Hosted by Google



EVENING TOILETTES.—[SEE PAGE 53.]

Hosted by Google

Hoods for Girls from 10 to 12 Years old, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET HOOD WITH FICHU-COLLAR. The original is worked with sixfold white zephyr worsted and medium-sized wooden needles. For the crown of the hood first work a straight piece six inches and a half wide and fourteen inches and a half long, beginning on one end with a foundation of 24 st. (stitch), and knitting in rounds, going back and forth, so that on both sides of the work, always alternately, five rounds appear all knit plain and five rounds all purled, each forming one strip. The original counts ten strips knit plain and nine strips purled on the right side. After finishing this part take up the edge stitches at one side on the needle, and now knit lengthwise, going back and forth, one purled strip of five rounds and one plain strip of three rounds; then gather the st. of the last round on a Tunisian crochet needle, cast them off as in the Tunisian or Victoria stitch, and crochet three more pattern rows (consisting each of one round going forward and one round going backward) in the same stitch. In the first round of the 2d and 3d pattern rows, however, double the number of stitches, taking up 1 st. each from the vertical and also from the horizontal st. of the preceding pattern row; cast off the third pattern row with blue worsted. This forms the trimming on the front of the hood. For the ruffle turned toward the back which rests on the crown make a foundation of 40 st. with white worsted and coarse wooden needles, and on this knit in rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 p. (purled). 2d round.—Always alternately p. together the t. t. o. and st. of the preceding round, t. t. o. Then five rounds more like the second round. On the st. of the last round crochet one round of ch. (chain stitch) scallops, always fastening together the st. and t. t. o. with 1 sc. (single crochet), then always 5 ch. Sew this ruffle on the crown of the hood as shown by the illustration. Gather the crown closely on the back edge. Knit the collar in the design of the crown from Fig. 54, Supplement, which gives one-half of the pattern for the collar, beginning on one under end with a foundation of 23 st.; widen and narrow on the outer edges according to the pattern. Border the finished part of the collar on the outer edge, excepting the neck, first with one round of sc., then with one round of bar scallops, working on every second following st. of the preceding round always alternately 1 sc., 5 dc. (double crochet). Besides this sew a ruffle similar to that on the crown to the outer edge of the collar, excepting the front edges and the neck. Gather the collar on the neck to suit the width of the crown, join the collar and crown, and bind the seam with blue silk ribbon an inch wide, the ends of which project nine inches and three-quarters long and form the strings. Bows of blue silk ribbon complete the hood.

Fig. 2.—KNITTED AND CROCHET HOOD WITH SQUARE COLLAR. This hood is also worked with sixfold white zephyr worsted and medium-sized wooden needles in rounds, going back and forth, all knit plain. For the crown work lengthwise one straight strip seven inches and a quarter wide and nineteen inches and a quarter long, which is begun on the front edge. In the original this consists of 48 rounds on a foundation of 70 st. Fold the finished crown double crosswise, and overseam both halves together on the back edge, gathering them slightly. Begin the collar on the back edge, and work it according to Fig. 53, Supplement (one-half of the pattern). Overseam the crown and collar together on the neck, and bind the seam with blue silk ribbon, the projecting ends of which serve for strings. Border the crown and collar of the hood all along the outer edge with one round of sc. and one round of close dc., and for the trimming on the hood work a pointed strip. Knit this strip with white worsted and coarse steel knitting-needles crosswise, in rounds going back and forth, on a foundation of 6 st., all plain. Each point consists of 22 rounds; at the end of the 2d and 5th–11th rounds widen 1 st. each, and at the end of the 14th–20th and the 22d rounds narrow 1 st. each. This widening and narrowing, however, should always be done before the last st. of the round. Slip the first st. of each round as if going to purl. When the pointed strip has gained the requisite length, darn the edge stitches at both sides with blue worsted, tie a tassel of three threads, an inch and three-quarters long, of similar worsted into the middle of each point, and sew the trimming strip through the middle on the bar round on the outer edge of the hood. Form a box-pleat in the middle of the back of the collar, fasten the points marked * on both halves of Fig. 53, Supplement, together, and trim the hood with bows of blue ribbon and with white worsted tassels as shown by the illustration.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND BLUE RIBBON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 33–35.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN AND LILAC RIBBON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 29 and 30.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN AND PINK CRÊPE DE CHINE.
For description see Supplement.

BREAKFAST CAP OF FIGURED SWISS MUSLIN AND CLARET RIBBON.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN, BLACK TULLE, AND GREEN RIBBON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 31 and 32.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 54.

Fig. 2.—KNITTED AND CROCHET HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 53.

LADY'S WALKING SUIT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 41a and 41b.

FISH AND SAUCE.

A DISH known in Scotland as "fish and sauce" is said to be very palatable when properly prepared. Fresh haddock are to be cleaned, and the heads, tails, and fins to be cut off. All of these latter are to be thoroughly boiled, to make stock. This, when done, is to be strained, and the liquid part, with the addition of a little flour mixed with cold water, butter, salt, and some chopped parsley, to be poured over the fish, which has been previously cut in pieces, and the whole boiled till sufficiently cooked. The result is said to be much more savory than if the fish were simply boiled in water.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MARIE.—The married pair leave the church immediately after the ceremony, and receive congratulations at home.—Wear gloves to match your traveling suit. A hat is quite as appropriate as a bonnet.

L. L. B.—A basque and over-skirt are more suitable for black silk than polonaises are. Elderly, and indeed old, ladies wear over-skirts.

E. H.—Your ideas of trimming are excellent. Use cashmere or silk for binding. The vest must be of the material used for trimming.

FRANÇOISE.—The pattern of a full dress toilette illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. V., will be a good guide for you. Substitute ruffles for the lace.

MISS V. F.—We have not the pattern you want.

M. H.—Trim your tan-colored silk with ruffles of a darker shade and velvet bands.

MRS. L. W.—We do not make purchases for our readers.

MRS. W. H.—It will require some ingenuity to cut a shirt, etc., from a pattern that is four or five inches too large. Spiral studs are worn with shirts fastened in front as well as with those fastened behind. You can easily change the pattern to open behind. Fifty cents will be returned you, as the entire set of patterns costs but 25 cents.

JULIA.—You failed to give your post-office address and to inclose sample.—Hoop-skirts, if worn at all, are very small. Flounced skirts made of hair-cloth are preferred.

MRS. J. L. C.—The Water-proof Cloak pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., is the best model for you.

GERTRUDE.—Your sample is blue épingeline. Make by the Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and trim with bias bands of silk and fringe.

HORACE B.—We do not reply by mail.—Ermine boas and muffs will be worn this winter, but are not considered the first choice for dressy furs since the introduction of silver-fox fur.

MRS. S.—Blue cloth suits will be more worn than velveteen.

GYPSY.—Polonaises prevail for woolen goods; the over-skirt and basque for silks. Trimmed back breadths and apron fronts are very popular, but require to be carefully made to look well.

PALMETTO.—We should be glad to oblige you, but it is impossible to give addresses in this column.

C. A. J.—The practice of changing abruptly from the past to the present tense, and vice versa, is a common error, which should be carefully guarded against by young writers, and especially by translators. Your quotations are faulty in this particular. We wish also to say here to you, and to many others, that it is useless to ask us to answer questions in the next Bazar. We endeavor to do justice to all our correspondents, but our letters are so numerous that they must often await their turn for weeks. Moreover, many of these are repetitions of questions which have been already answered; to such questions we pay no attention, as this column is designed for the benefit of our constant readers.

MARIA ROHORA.—A young lady with your accomplishments ought to find little difficulty in obtaining a situation as governess in this country, where music, French, and German are almost indispensable adjuncts to education, though we fear that Polish will find few students. We regret that we can not aid you, however, except by advising you to advertise in our journals, and prosecute inquiries through friends and acquaintances, or through reliable school agencies.

EMILIE.—We can not tell you how much you would be likely to earn as a copyist. We are under the impression that it is a poorly paid business, though a few experts may earn good wages thereat.

THE HISTORY OF A GREAT ENTERPRISE.—In eighteen hundred and fifty-four, the original incorporators of the WILSON SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY embarked in the manufacture of Sewing-Machines, and from that time to the present their time, talent, energy, and capital have been employed in making First-Class Sewing-Machines with varied success attending their efforts. It being their constant aim to produce a Shuttle or Lock-Stitch Machine that should be simple to handle, durable as steel and iron could make it, with unlimited capacity, unexcelled by any other machine, regardless of name or price, and withal to confine the price within the reach of all classes of people; and success has crowned their efforts in the production of the celebrated WILSON UNDER-FEED SHUTTLE SEWING-MACHINES, which combine all the Elegance, Simplicity, Durability, and Strength possible for any sewing-machine to attain, and they are the First and Only First-Class moderate priced machines put in the market. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the U. S. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.—Mrs. Dr. W. TORRENCE, New York, uses her Wheeler & Wilson Lock-Stitch Machine for her own family sewing, and, besides doing her house-work, earns more than a dollar per day as pastime. See the new Improvements and Woods' Lock-Stitch Ripper. —[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NICOL, DAVIDSON, & CO.,
686 BROADWAY,
Near Great Jones Street, New York,
Offer a Quarter of a Million Dollars' worth of
REAL BRONZE CLOCKS;
MANTLE SETS, GROUPS, FIGURES;
BISQUE, PARIAN;
ENAMELED-BRONZE JEWEL-BOXES;
CHINA, GLASS;
GAS-FIXTURES AND CHANDELIERS,
in Crystal, Gilt, or Bronze,
At a small advance on cost of importation.

UNION ADAMS & CO.
Have manufactured, expressly for the present
HOLIDAY SEASON,
House Coats,
Smoking Jackets,
Robes de Chambre,
Railway Rugs,
Traveling Shawls,
Silk and Merino
UNDERWEAR.
Gloves in every style,
Including
Buttons, Buttoners, and Cleaners.
REVILLON AND CHASSEUR BRACES.
Silk and Cashmere Mufflers,
Linen & Silk Handkerchiefs,
With Initials and Monograms.
London and Paris
Sleeve-Buttons, Studs, and Charms.
Umbrellas and Canes,
&c., &c., &c.,
ELEGANT for PRESENTS.
637 BROADWAY.

FALL and WINTER SAMPLES now READY.
MRS. C. C. THOMSON
Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

"IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN" the particular "style" of some one or two rascally publishers to promise elegant framed engravings to subscribers and send none. The Star-Spangled Banner promises, and it sends AT ONCE, one of Prang's best 16-tint GENUINE chromos free, prepaid. In addition, you receive a large Ledger-size illustrated paper a whole year, ALL FOR $1. Why condemn any one UNTIL YOU KNOW? The "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" has been published for 10 years. Every newsman sells it. We refer to all the great News Co.'s, to Oliver Ditson & Co., to the N. Y. Tribune, Toledo Blade, and all other great papers or publishers. The Rogues' Corner exposes Humbugs, Quacks, and Swindlers. It saves money to the public. While we are attacked and slandered by rogues, rascals, and thieves, we give you a large family paper, a chromo unequaled, all for $1. We guarantee satisfaction, or we give you your money. Only $1. Specimens 6 cts. Agents wanted. Complete "Outfit" free. Do you DARE to try it for 1873? If so, send your dollar and secure papers for a whole year. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

BRIGGS & BRO.
SEEDSMEN & FLORISTS.
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
ILLUSTRATED WORK for January, 1873, now out. Issued as a Quarterly. The four numbers sent to any address by mail for 25 cents. The richest and most instructive Illustrated and Descriptive Floral Guide ever issued. You will miss it if you order Seeds before seeing BRIGGS & BRO.'s QUARTERLY. We challenge comparison on quality of Seed and prices and sizes of packets. Our "CALENDAR ADVANCE SHEET AND PRICE LIST FOR 1873" sent free.
Address BRIGGS & BROTHER,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.
Mr. LEON CENDRIER (designer from Paris). New and select assortment, suitable for spring and summer trade. Instruction Package sent by mail on receipt of $1 00. Send for Circular. Stamping done for the trade.
Madame L. CENDRIER, 84 Bleecker St., N. Y.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "A"
FOR $75.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 37½	$0 75
2 Barrie Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	2 50	5 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
4 Night Dresses	@	2 25	9 00
4 Slips	@	2 50	10 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			7 00
1 Basket Furnished			5 00
6 Pairs Socks	@	0 62½	3 75
2 Cambric Skirts	@	1 50	3 00
2 " " tucked	@	2 00	4 00
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
A set of Linen Diapers			2 00
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	0 50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			3 50
			$75 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Wardrobes "B" for $100, and "C" for $125, sent by mail if desired.
LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

FURS. FURS. FURS.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
Are now offering, to close the season, previous to taking their semi-annual inventory,
GENUINE SABLE, SILVER FOX,
ERMINE, BLACK MARTIN,
CHINCHILLA, MINK AND SEAL SETS,
FUR TRIMMINGS, FUR ROBES, &c.,
At 25 per Cent. Less than the Cost of Importation.
Also,
PARIS AND CITY MADE
EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES,
CLOAKS, &c.,
BELOW THE COST OF MANUFACTURE.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.
Something entirely New.
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.
Price in Felt, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.
" " Chamois, $4 00, $5 00, $6 00.
For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.
Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.
WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.
A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

LADIES' FURS
IN EVERY VARIETY;
SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,
All at the Lowest Prices.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS, 719 Broadway, N.Y.

TO THE LADIES!
BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING
Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.
No Lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.
B. F. BROWN & CO., Boston.

REAL LACES
CLOAK VELVETS, FINE FURS, &c. Cheapest in the country. Send for full Winter Price-List to
EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

CHENEY BRO'S
American Gros-Grain Silks,
IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

THREE PAIR of BEST 2-BUTTON KID GLOVES for $2 75. All Colors and Sizes. Single pair sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1 00.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAAR, 353 Eighth Ave., N. Y.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.
DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.
The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

HOLIDAYS
are drawing near! and those intending useful GIFTS for ANY of their FRIENDS, whether Men, Women, Boys or Girls, could not bestow one that would be BETTER appreciated than a
NOVELTY PRINTING PRESS
Send for a descriptive, illustrated Pamphlet, containing the various Agents' addresses, to
BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer,
349—351 Federal & 152 Kneeland-st's, Boston.
No suspension of Business on account of Fire!

WE WANT EVERY LADY who reads Harper's Bazar to try one of
LORING'S DOLLAR BOXES
Of ELEGANT FRENCH NOTE-PAPER.
Thousands all over the country use them. They contain just what a lady requires for daily use, and have no equal in quality and beauty. We stamp her INITIAL or PET name on each sheet and mail to her on receipt of One Dollar.
A. K. LORING,
Box 5011, Boston.

"Best in the Market."
ASHWORTH'S
SIX-CORD
SPOOL COTTON.
SOLD BY
The GROVER & BAKER Sewing-Machine Company.
ALEX. KING & Co., Agents, New York.

MATHUSHEK PIANO M'F'G CO. New Haven, Conn.
The most durable pianos.
The most powerful tone.
The finest touch & action.
The purchasers delighted.
The pamphlets sent free.

A GREAT OFFER! JANUARY!
HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, New York, will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of first-class makers, including Waters', at extremely low prices for cash, during this MONTH. New 7-octave first-class PIANOS, modern improvements, for $275 cash. The CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices low for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

MOTHERS,
SAVE YOUR INFANTS.
NESTLÉ'S LACTEOUS FARINA,
THE MOTHER'S MILK SUBSTITUTE.
Extensively used and recommended by the most eminent physicians.
Sold by Druggists and Grocers.
H. ASTIÉ & CO., Sole Agents,
15 South William Street, New York.

MAGIC FOR THE PARLOR.
Send a stamp for the new price-list.
HARTZ CONJURING REPOSITORY, 743 Broadway, New York; also at 850 Broadway, near 14th Street.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
WOOD CARPETING.
942 BROADWAY.
Send Stamp for Designs.

TO THE WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp,
M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt St., New York.

BIG MONEY! AGENTS' outfit free. J. R. HOLCOMB, Mallet Creek, O.
Read! Read! The Young Mothers' Book. Ask news ag'ts.

Hosted by Google

1829. CHARTER PERPETUAL. 1872.

FRANKLIN
FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF
PHILADELPHIA.

Capital, - - - - - -	$ 400,000 00
Accrued Surplus and Premiums,	2,916,316 88
Cash Assets, November 30, 1872,	$3,316,316 88
Premiums, October, 1872, -	$252,780 70
Premiums, November, 1872, -	301,876 64
	$554,657 34
Amount insured in the Burned District, Boston, - - -	$458,196 00
Amount insured on Outskirts of same, - - - - -	39,500 00

It has been definitely ascertained that $2000 will cover all claims upon the last item, while salvages already determined indicate a net loss of not over $400,000.

ALFRED G. BAKER, Pres't.
GEORGE FALES, Vice-President.
J. W. McALLISTER, Second Vice-Pres't.
THEO. M. REGER, Secretary.
SAML. W. KAY, Assistant Secretary.

BRANCH OFFICE,
No. 243 Broadway, New York City,
GEO. F. REGER, Manager.

The Agents of the FRANKLIN throughout the U. S. number nearly 1000.

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.
SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.
RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,
Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

No Lady should be without
Mrs. GILMAN'S PATENT WORK HOLDER,
For sale by A. T. STEWART & CO., New York; and at the works of the manufacturers,
BILLINGS & SPENCER CO., Lawrence St., Hartford, Conn.

ESTABLISHED 1837 — GRAND GOLD MEDAL AWARDED — HIGHEST PREMIUM
PARR'S TECHNICAL GUIDE
NEW, USEFUL, VALUABLE!
Devoted to home enjoyment, instruction, improvement. Containing over 350 illustrations and naming 1160 scientific appliances; description and price of Tool Chests; Amateur Lathes, Tools and Machines; Model Steam Engines, Steamboats, Sailing Vessels; Mathematical Instruments; Microscopes; Chemical Cabinets, etc. Also series of 145 Chemical experiments and treatise on preparing objects for Microscope; instructions for making Fret or Scroll Work, with home talent, and illustrations of 110 useful parlor requisites, viz.: Bird Cages, Book Shelves, Brackets, Flower Stands, Writing Desks, Work Baskets, etc. Mailed on receipt of 25c., and with first order for $1.00 worth of Designs will send extra copies to refund price of Book free.
GEORGE PARR, BUFFALO, N. Y., Manf. Mechanics' Tools.
SIXTH EDITION FIFTIETH THOUSAND

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING"
"DOMESTIC"

presents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.

Agents wanted everywhere.

Address
"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

AGENTS WANTED for Great Fires of History. Chicago, Boston, N. York. London etc. Causes. Systems of Extinguishing Fire. Sates, Fire-Proof Buildings, Bank Vaults, Insurance, &c. Thrilling, Humorous, Pathetic. Illustrated. Going like Hot Cakes. Address Worthington, Dustin & Co., Hartford, Ct.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
"CASHMERE BOUQUET."
COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

LADIES, DO YOU LOVE FLOWERS?

Send for Specimen Copies (free) of
THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET
and Pictorial Home Companion,

A new and beautiful Paper, devoted specially to the Culture of Flowers for the Flower Garden and Plants for Window Gardening or indoor ornament. Has an abundance of pictorial Home Reading, and will be popular with the Family Circle.

Ladies will also find in it choice reading on Household Work, Fashion, Dress, Home Comforts and Elegances; also, good hints to young people on Manners, Society, Self-Improvement, Amusement, Courtship, Marriage, &c. Club Agents wanted every where.

Price $1 00, including two beautiful Chromos.

☞ Window Gardening, a new book, exquisitely illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Flowers, and Bulbs for indoors; also, Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Book-stores have it.

☞ Prospectus and Premium Lists free for P. O. stamp.

☞ 100 Papers at Club Rates.—Send stamp for List.

☞ Agents wanted to canvass in every village.

Address LADIES' CABINET, Box 2445, N. Y.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE

NEW YORK FIRESIDE COMPANION.

The Great Story Paper of America, and the Best Popular, Illustrated, Family Newspaper.

Splendid Announcements for 1873.

A NEW STORY BY EDMUND YATES, ENTITLED,
A BAD LOT.

Humorous Articles by Petroleum V. Nasby.

A NEW STORY BY OLIVER OPTIC.

ARTICLES FOR WOMEN
BY EMILY FAITHFULL AND ELIZABETH DUDLEY.

These distinguished authors, with the following list of old favorites, who have made the FIRESIDE COMPANION heretofore so popular, have all been engaged for the new year:

Mrs. Sumner Hayden,	Lucy Randall Comfort,	Bricktop,
Clara Percy,	J. W. Mackey,	G. L. Aiken,
Mary Grace Halpine,	Captain Carleton,	Tony Pastor,
Elizabeth Dudley,	S. W. Pearce,	John Elderkin.

A SERIES OF SHORT ARTICLES BY POPULAR AMERICAN WRITERS.

A SERIES OF ORIGINAL ARTICLES ON PARLOR GAMES AND HOME AMUSEMENTS,

Parlor Theatricals, Charades, Magical Delusions, Scientific Experiments, Legerdemain, Divining Oracles, Card Games, etc., including all that is humorous, droll, and amusing, in the whole range of games.

During 1873 the FIRESIDE COMPANION will contain More New and Powerful Continued Stories than have ever appeared in any American paper. Our arrangements for the new year surpass all previous efforts; the vastly increased circulation of THE FIRESIDE COMPANION enabling us to complete our engagements upon a scale of unexampled liberality.

Short Stories, Sketches, Poetry and Biography: Answers to Correspondents, Humorous Articles, Reading for the Little Folks, Fashionable Chit-Chat for the Ladies, and other interesting departments, will be maintained without regard to expense.

We endeavor to make THE FIRESIDE COMPANION the best, most useful, and most desirable paper in America.

OUR TERMS FOR 1873.—NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

One Year—Single Copy	$3 00	One Year—Four Copies ($2.50 each)	$10 00
One Year—Two Copies	5 00	One Year—Eight Copies	20 00

Those sending $20 for a Club of Eight, all sent at one time, will be entitled to a copy FREE. Getter up of Clubs can afterward add single copies at $2.50 each. Specimen copies sent free.

GEORGE MUNRO, Publisher, 84 Beekman Street, New York.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

Manufactured by the Florence Sewing Mach. Co. The simplest, cheapest, and best in use! Has but one needle! A Child can run it. Agents wanted in every town. Send for Circular and Sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

$1 50. THE NURSERY. A MONTHLY MAGAZINE for YOUNGEST READERS. Superbly Illustrated. ☞ Send stamp for a sample number. NOW is the time to subscribe.
JOHN L. SHOREY, 36 Bromfield St., Boston.

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?
WHY BE ANNOYED WITH
CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?
WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL
REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,
AT SO SMALL A COST,
BY USING WRIGHT'S
"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."
Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS
ARE PURE AND THEIR
PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)	" 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP	" 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt	" 49
WATTEAU MANTLE, with 3-Pleat Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 50

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postlion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron Over-skirt with Watteau Postilion, and Walking Skirt	" 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt	" 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt	" 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT	" 51

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS

PITTSBURGH, PA.
Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 582 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

An engaged young gentleman got rather neatly out of a little scrape with his intended. She taxed him with having kissed two ladies at some party at which she was not present. He owned it, but said that their united ages made only twenty-one. The simple-minded girl thought of ten and eleven, and laughed off her pout. He did not explain that one was nineteen and the other two years of age. Wasn't it artful?

They say crocodiles do not really weep; we know a sailor, though, who has seen whale's blubber.

It makes all the difference if you put Dr. before instead of after a man's name.

"'Tis not a day or two shows us a man," remarks Mrs. Emily Iago. Or a woman. I know a family in which there was an old maiden lady, who by the united voice of every body was declared "the sweetest old lady in the world." Yet the family did nothing but quarrel. When she became extinct, so did all the quarreling.

Be temperate in diet—our first parents ate themselves out of house and home.

A STOCK-IN'-TRADE—Hosiery.

HINTS TO MASQUERADERS.—A tall, slim fellow is in trouble. He wants to know what character to assume at a masquerade. A fashionable journal advises him to braid his legs and go as a whip-lash; roll himself round and round a few dozen times and go as a roll of tape; wrap himself in the national flag and go as a barber's pole; bristle his hair up and go as a whitewash brush; swallow a few marbles and go as a rattle-box; put an insulator into his mouth and go as a telegraph pole; or walk in on his hands as a pair of scissors.

WHAT WILL SHE DO WITH IT?

At an English Christmas cattle-show a "silver-mounted claret jug was taken by a cow." No one will grudge the cow this or any other distinction which its merits and good conduct deserve, but it is not easy to see what pleasure or benefit such an animal (strictly teetotal in its habits) can derive from the possession of a claret jug. Claret is not the usual beverage of cows, and even if it were, the jugs which hold it are so constructed that it would be impossible for those creatures to drink out of them; and the mere contemplation of a claret jug, silver mountings and all, must be a matter of indifference even to the most high-bred cows. Altogether, one feels that a new wooden pail, filled with ordinary fresh-water, would have been a far more useful present.

GENTLEMEN AT LARGE.

JIM. "Bill, I say, show us the skeleton in your cupboard."

BILL. "I ain't a-got no skellinton in ne'er a cupboard, but (indicating his waistcoat pocket with his thumb) 'ere's a bunch of skellinton-keys!"

A BAD GLASS FOR THE EYES—Your sixth glass of hot brandy-and-water.

TO SPINSTERS AND OTHERS.—We advise all young women to marry gardeners, if possible, for then they are sure to be well off, for the gardener gets his (mush)rooms cheap, makes his own beds (his wife can go out and get some chars), sets his own (vege)tables, has lots of pans(ies) and (flower)pots and (ra)dishes; and as for food and drink, he is never at a loss, for he is sure to have cows(lips) and phlox of all kinds, mustard and pepper cress, (seak)ale, Port(ulaca), (holly)-hock, shrub(s), and plenty of picotee(s) (Pekon tea), and (most important of all) abundance of cole(wort).

VAULTING AMBITION.—A rope-dancer lately applied to the magistrate of a little town in Switzerland for permission to perform within his jurisdiction. The magistrate refused, observing that the country was overrun with mountebanks. "But," said the dancer, "I am not one of the common class; here is a proof of my superiority." With these words he leaped completely over the head of the magistrate, and this feat of agility gained him the indulgence he applied for.

"A bumper at parting," as the drunken man said when he ran up against the post.

Woman was made from a rib-bone: she loves rib-bon(e)s to this day.

A publisher gave a very good reason for preferring deceased authors to living ones. He said that the former never kept him waiting for copy.

A lame soldier halts when he marches.

LIKE CURES LIKE.—Not always: nothing like a smart shower for spoiling a smart bonnet.

Mr. Gladstone (in his beautiful valedictory address to the University of Edinburgh) mentioned that among the Greeks ugliness was regarded as a kind of sin. I have heard strong-minded ladies assert that in America there exists a similar superstition.

AN EFFECTIVE PEACE (PIECE) MAKER—A bull in a china-shop.

The new mode of coiffure, better known as the chignon, is now described as "the knobby head of hair."

TAKING IT FOR GRANTED.

ENGAGING PHOTOGRAPHER. "Just look a little Pleasant, Miss! Think of 'Im!"

"Ua hookohora e ko kiaaina o Oahu, J. Kaona ma kahi o J. Kaaukai ka mea i make iho nei."—Honolulu (Sandwich Islands) Polynesian. We hope the reader will deeply ponder the important fact stated in the above. It is to be considered strictly confidential.

That was a sly old Scotchman who, on marrying a very young wife, was rallied by his friends on the inequality of their ages. "She will be near me," he replied, "to close my een." "Weel," remarked another of the party, "I've had twa wives, and they opened my een."

SEASICKNESS ABOLISHED: EVERY ONE HIS OWN BESSEMER.—[See English Gossip, Page 55.]

"One ought every day," says Goethe, "at least to hear a little song, read a good poem, see a fine picture, and, if possible, speak a few reasonable words." I always do this. I sing and read something of my own, look into my glass, and remark how very superior I am to the rest of creation.

THEATRICAL MAXIMS.

A stick on the boards is no stay for a theatre.

A caul is said by nautical folk to prevent a man from drowning; but when an actor gets a call, it is generally a sign that he will go down.

The man who comes on the stage exactly at his cue is prompt; but the man who does not come on at all is prompter.

How absurdly are things named on the stage! The man who can barely get his bread on it is spoken of as "a souper."

What two classes of paupers are best known in the Indies?—The East Indy-gent and the West Indy-gent.

SHOCKING CRUELTY.—A small boy, while loitering on an errand in the neighborhood of a pillar-box, observed an old gentleman of seemingly humane appearance deliberately dispatching a letter. The inhuman murder was reported to the authorities, and the police are on the track.

OUR EYES!—A young lady who let her lids drop on being spoken to tenderly by a young gentleman is anxious to recover them, and offers a handsome reward for their restoration. A nautical gentleman of her acquaintance assures her that they could not have been properly lashed or they would not have been lost.

PEOPLE YOU OBJECT TO MEET.

Mr. Whiner, who never sees you without saying how very fat you've grown, or how very pale you look.

Mr. Humdrum, who, when in society, confines his conversation to the changes of the weather and the rising price of coal.

Mrs. Dawddler, who, if you meet her in the Park, is pretty sure to ask you to carry her fat lap-dog for her.

Mr. Quaver, who raves about the music of the future, and never says a word of sense about the music of the present.

Captain Blusterham, who bellows out your name when he meets you in the street, and shakes you by the hand till he nearly wrings your fingers off.

Mr. Wheezer, who fancies that he is an invalid, and explains to you the symptoms of his latest ailment.

Mr. Harduppe, who, upon the strength of old school-fellowship, will never miss a chance of borrowing five dollars of you.

Mr. Borer, who even now discusses the merits of the Tichborne case.

Messrs. Sawbones and Pilgarlic, who, when they happen to meet at dinner, invariably talk shop together, and take away your appetite.

Mr. Jeremiah Doldrums, who thinks he has a grievance against one of your best friends, and takes you by the button-hole in order to explain it.

Baron Munchausen, Junior, who was once captured by the brigands, and every time he sees you embellishes the incident.

Mr. and Mrs. Cadger, who, if you invite them for a day or two, always come provided with luggage for a fortnight.

DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE.—Houses are run up in a few weeks by landlords, and run down by tenants ever after.

A German settler in Ohio, found guilty of selling liquor contrary to law, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the county jail for thirty days, protested as follows: "Chail! Go to chail! Me go to chail! But I can't go! Dere's my piziness—my pakery. Who pakes my bread when I been gone?" Then casting his eyes about the court appealingly, they fell upon the good-natured face of jolly Chris Ellwaner, a fellow-countryman, who had no "piziness," and forthwith a brilliant idea struck him. Turning to the judge, he said, in sober earnest: "Dere's Chris Ellwaner! He's got noddings to do. Send him!"

PAINFUL SUSPENSE—Hanging.

ADVICE GRATIS.—Two things you should never borrow: Trouble, and a copy of the Bazar. The former will be sure to come; the latter can be had for the paltry sum of ten cents.

MALAPROPIANA.—Our esteemed friend Mrs. Malaprop has been making what she terms a tower on the Continent. She was especially delighted with the good monks of St. Bernard, where, she says, she supped in the refractory, and found it much more cozy than a bustling salamander.

FORECASTS.

Should it rain next week we are likely to have wet weather; but if, on the contrary, it holds up, dry weather will probably be the consequence.

During the whole of next week—indeed, till the end of the month—the sun will rise every morning and set every night.

If there is much wind we may look out for squalls.

WHEN FOUND MAKE A NOTE OF IT.—What notes compose the most favorite tunes; and how many tunes do they compose?—Bank-notes; they make for-tunes.

HIGH LIFE IN THE COUNTRY.

DOCTOR. "I am pleased to say, Mrs. Fitzbrowne, that I shall be able to Vaccinate your Baby from a very Healthy Child of your Neighbor, Mrs. Jones—"
MRS. FITZBROWNE. "Oh dear, Doctor! I could not permit that. We do not care to be mixed up with the Joneses in any way."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 5.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

"TOO OLD A BIRD TO BE CAUGHT WITH CHAFF."

Hosted by Google

LATE REPENTANCE.

WHEN first he asked me for my heart,
I said him "Nay," with great decision,
Unmindful of his bitter part,
And of my possible contrition.

When next he asked me for my hand,
Grown wiser then, I answered, "No;
Your earnest pleadings I withstand,
To save you from a keener woe."

But by my side he still would stay,
And still his passion seemed to sigh,
"Though love should be denied to-day,
'Twill prove the sweeter by-and-by!"

And now the winter turned to spring,
My own cold heart, warmed through and through,
Answers, as does the blossoming
Of way-side flowers, which sunbeams sue:

Since 'tis my soul's inspired way
To follow him unto the end,
Bitter it is to hear him say,
"Count me forever as your friend!"

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1873.

☞ IN the present Number of HARPER'S BAZAR is commenced a new serial story, entitled

"MURPHY'S MASTER,"

by the author of "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "A Woman's Vengeance," and other popular novels. "MURPHY'S MASTER" is a story of surpassing interest. It is laid in scenes new to modern fiction, and the dénouement is striking and novel.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of full-sized patterns, descriptions, and illustrations of Ladies' Ball, Evening, and Reception Toilettes; Walking Suits; Dresses for Children under Four Years old; Fichus, Bretelles, Fans, Hair Ornaments, Cigar-Holders, Key-Bags, Easy-Chairs, Tidies, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

BILLS OF FARE FOR DINNER.

By PIERRE BLOT.

AN ordinary daily dinner is easily served when it is composed of only one dish of meat, one or two vegetables, and a dessert; but when there are several dishes it is necessary to serve them in proper order; they not only taste better, but they are also more easily digested. For instance, soup would not be good after salad, beef after game, or vegetables after cakes.

The general order is, after the soup the fish; then butchers' meat, chicken, game, vegetables, sweet dishes, cakes, and dessert.

There is no order for the dessert; after the cheese, which should be partaken of first, the rest of the dessert is served according to taste, there being no precedence.

Hygienic rules should be followed regularly, our health and welfare being affected by them. Besides, we do not all live alike, any more than we all dress alike. Some make their dinner on one dish of meat and vegetables, others have several dishes. It is a question of taste as much as of means.

When several dishes of each course are served at large dinners the above order is not followed, as will be seen in the models we give below.

No vegetables, except those used as garniture, should be served with the dishes of entrées, because they are all made-up dishes, of meat and of fish, and are served generally with delicate sauces.

At large dinners game is sometimes served before chicken, and meat before fish, as will be seen in bill of fare No. 5. Meat may be served as relevé, and fish as entrée. A boiled fish served whole is invariably a relevé, but when served in pieces, as in matelote, it is an entrée. Game may be served as an entrée, and chicken as a roast piece afterward. After the roast pieces come the entremets, which are composed of vegetables, cooked fruits, eggs, macaroni, cakes, etc.

Dishes of vegetables may be served with the fish, after the soup; potatoes, for instance, do not neutralize the taste of the fish, but would somewhat neutralize that delicate entrée.

Bread has not the same effect as vegetables; being by itself almost tasteless, it can be eaten with every kind of dish; and instead of neutralizing the flavors, it seems to add to the savor of the most delicate dishes. Even some fruits taste better when eaten with a little good bread.

Salads of greens taste best when served with or immediately after the roast pieces. They have the same property that cheese has after the entremets, that of taking off the taste that may be left in the mouth from the preceding dishes, thus preparing the palate for new delicacies.

Soup, or oysters, or both, are always served for the beginning of the dinner. Besides tasting better then, they are of a light nature; therefore they digest easily, and prepare the digestive organs for the heavier dishes coming after them.

Hors-d'œuvre dishes are appetizers that are passed around at any time during the dinner, between each dish from the soup to the dessert.

To illustrate the above explanations we will give our readers a few models of bills of fare for dinners.

BILL No. 1.

Pickled beets. Roast beef. Mashed potatoes. Sweet-corn. Rice-pudding. Apples.

BILL No. 2.

Pickled cauliflowers. Halibut, cream sauce. Roast venison, cranberry sauce. Potatoes sautées. Spinach au jus. Tapioca-pudding. Cheese. Pears.

BILL No. 3.

Potage vermicelli. Chowchow. Carp, anchovy sauce. Potatoes Duchesse. Beef à la mode. Roast quails. Salad of petticus. Stuffed cabbage. Macaroni Italienne. Plum-pudding. Cheese. Grapes. Nuts.

BILL No. 4.

HORS-D'ŒUVRE.

Ox-tail or mock-turtle soup. Pickled cucumbers. Olives. Sardines. Celery.

RELEVÉ.

Pickerel, Hollandaise sauce.

ENTRÉES.

Mutton-chops à la jardinière. Chicken suprême.

RÔTI.

Prairie-chicken. Salad of chiccory.

ENTREMETS.

Mashed potatoes. Carrots fines herbes. Omelet soufflée. Almond cake.

DESSERT.

Cheese. Éclair au chocolat. Compote of peaches. Oranges. Nuts.

BILL No. 5.

POTAGES.

Purée of chestnuts. Tomato soup.

HORS-D'ŒUVRE.

Pickled cherries. Celery. Horse-radish. Tunny.

RELEVÉS.

Turbot, oyster sauce. Bass Génoise.

ENTRÉES.

Fillet of beef with mushrooms. Chicken fricassée. Grouse in Chartreuse. Matelote marinière.

RÔTIS.

Turkey, with currant jelly. Canvas-back duck. Salads of chiccory, lettuce.

ENTREMETS.

Mashed potatoes and turnips. Parsnips sautées. Lima beans au jus. Fried celery. Wine jelly. Soufflé au café. Macaroni-pudding. Charlotte-Russe.

DESSERT.

Cheese. Chocolate biscuits. Quince jelly. Compote of currants. Kisses. Macaroons. Glazed oranges. Iced coffee. Apples. Pears. Oranges. Mendiants. Nuts.

This subject will be continued in a future number.

THE PLAY-GROUND.

THE frequently quoted saying of FLETCHER of Saltoun, "Let me make the ballads of a people, and I care not who may make the laws," is a significant testimony to the influence of the diversions of a nation upon its conduct and character.

Constitutions, codes, and ordinances imposed by all the dignity of the sovereign, the severity of the judge, and the watchfulness of the policeman, are often of far less efficacy in controlling and directing the popular will than the show of a favorite puppet or the sound of a familiar song. A stave of the Marseillaise makes imperial edicts void and of no effect, and Punch summons with more authority than a whole bench of magistrates.

The surest road to the heart of man is through his pleasurable sensations. It is the same with the boy and girl; and we doubt not that the play-ground has more to do with their education, for good or evil, than the school-room. It is not under the magisterial eye that the child's natural disposition reveals itself, and becomes moulded into the permanent forms of character. The school is an unvarying formula, by which all are drilled into a uniform intellectual discipline, and severe restraint is essential to its efficacy. Boys and girls are thus, during their school hours, like so many private soldiers in the ranks—mere machines, moving at the will of their superiors. Apart from more or less quickness of apprehension in learning, or flexibility of disposition in yielding to the scholastic system, there is no opportunity for the show of individual peculiarities. It is notorious that no one is so ignorant of the real character of his pupils as the pedagogue, whose estimate of them is proportioned according to their degrees of readiness in conjugating τύπτω.

The youngsters are, however, no sooner out of school, away from the eye of the master and the reach of the rod, than nature vindicates itself. As they go scampering, running, jumping, leaping, hopping, and tumbling, the variety of muscular movements is a fair illustration of the diversity of character, which, as you follow them to the play-ground, you will soon see them exhibit. It is here, and not in the school-room, where the boy is found to be "father to the man." Children in the freedom of play show in their intercourse with each other all the qualities, whether they be good or ill, which are characteristic of men and women. Here you may see in a juvenile all the virtues and vices—pride and humility, meanness and generosity, cruelty and compassion, bravery and cowardice.

If this be so—and no one with the remembrance of his own childhood can refuse to believe it—does it not seem of the utmost importance that the influence of the play-ground in the education of the young should be fully recognized and discreetly guided by parent and teacher? It is, however, a nice point to determine how far the supervision of children in their amusements should be allowed to interfere with the freedom of action essential to self-reliance. There are some experienced persons who have the tact of so ingratiating themselves with the young that these, even in the most unrestrained moments, will accept their guidance without its being imposed by the severity of authority. Such persons are, however, rare; and it will be necessary, therefore, in most cases, to leave a wide discretion to children themselves in their amusements; but a great deal can be done toward giving a good tendency to the influence of these by the selection of fit companions and the supply of proper objects of interest. It is difficult to give specific directions in a matter which must be left, for the most part, to the tact and devotion of parents and teachers. We can do little more than remind them that children are not only educated in the school-room but in the play-ground.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Other Sex.

MY DEAR GERALD,—I hope that the holidays are not so long passed that I may not wish you a happy New-Year, which I do with all my heart, and with a profound conviction that a "certain event" will be very sure to make my wishes good. I had the pleasure of calling upon her on the first day of the year, and as I admired her simple manners and her sprightly grace, I wondered whether you—or, indeed, any of us—were worthy. How much better they are than we, my dear Gerald! How we live in two different worlds while we live in the same! I recall all kinds of festivities—of "stag feasts," as we call them, of little parties and stories and expeditions and conversations—I think that you know what I mean—and how unspeakably low they make us seem! If our sisters should know what we do! Above all, if she should hear the jokes and the insinuations to which you, my young friend, listen with a feeble smile, what would she think? But if we men knew that she, and "the likes" of her, engaged in similar conversations, what should we think of them?

The other evening I stopped at Delmonico's—no matter for what; probably I wanted to warm my hands—and as I stood engaged in that harmless business I overheard the talk of a group of you young fellows. They were sons of gentlemen, as they are called; but if I had a daughter, and they came to my house a-wooing, I would put them out with the tongs. Gentlemen indeed! Honor, Sir, purity, manliness, modesty, truth—these are the gentleman's qualities. But the youth whom I heard talking might have been Charles the Second and Rochester in their cups. They had the dress and the air and the name of gentlemen? Was poor Nell Gwynne a lady? Was the Duchess of Portsmouth a lady? It was she that the French king sent over to fascinate the English king and serve as a French spy, and she did it.

The young fellows to whom I listened—whose talk I could not help overhearing—were going later in the evening to a ball. They were to see the sweetest and most innocent of maidens. They were to clasp them in the delicious dance. They were to chat and laugh and plan. What do I know? They were to breathe vows, perhaps; they were to whisper the words—I suppose you understand. What I say is that, for all that, they dwell in different worlds, and the soft, palpitating little baggage in the conservatory who says that she will be the wife of that Spanish-looking young brigand with the captivating dark eyes, and who dances so divinely, does not know in the least who it is to whom she gives herself. No, my young friend, they do not know us; and there are huge parts of our lives that we hustle out of their sight. I have heard husbands and fathers chattering, when they knew that none of the family could overhear. Fortunate deafness; for there are true and loving hearts that would be miserably wrung and broken if they could hear what we hear. There is no fairy tale, no enchantment in the books, more surprising and striking than that of our daily life. And when I say so to Hero, she answers, "But suppose that my Leander does seem to be a beast; do you not know that it is the prince under that hairy skin that I admire?"

I do not deny it. Those gentle hearts make a kind of celestial allowance. They suspect the truth, perhaps, and they instantly repel its force by some sweet theory. Have you never watched a mother in the car, when her most unmannerly and headstrong boy is snarling and roaring and making himself a pest? "Tommy is sleepy," says that crafty parent. "Does Tommy's poor little stomach ache? Where does Tommy feel bad? Is he very tired with the long journey?" It is not the long journey, nor the stomach-ache, because Tommy ramps in the same way in the nursery at home and upon all occasions. But the mother's instinct shields him. "You think," it says to the bald-headed traveler who is trying to read or to sleep, and who, although his aspect is bland, wishes Tommy in the unmentionable place—"you think that this is a snarling little beast. Heaven pity you, Sir! 'tis a prince in disguise majestically moaning."

In like manner, when we see that gross Orson, the huge fellow who is always feeding and drinking, that red-faced, indolent good-for-nothing, whose chief delight is horse-racing and cock-fighting—when we see him carrying off in holy matrimony that delicate, flower-like, gentle Fiamma, it is bewildering, it is preposterous. Her eyes are open. She sees him, and she hears of him, and she knows about him. What does it mean? How do such things happen? Happen! Why, how did Titania happen to fancy Bottom? It is the familiar old story of Beauty and the Beast. Do you suppose Fiamma sees the Orson that we see? Do you suppose that a young woman tenderly reared, with maidenly delicacy and reserve, and a fine womanly instinct, kneels at the nuptial altar with a boozing booby? Not she. She gives her faith and her vows to the noble hero, the puissant prince, who thinks fit to masquerade in the shape of this red-faced, lazy idler. And because you are blind, because your wretched perceptions stick fast in the hairy hide, do you think that Fiamma does not see the truth and rejoice in it?

What is to be done? You and I, probably, if we are men about town, know the truth of Orson. How can we save her? Alas! she is not to be saved by us. She must work out her own salvation, or she will be lost. When I see her coming into the church on her wedding-day, and observe the pretty groups in the pews, and hear the blithe music from the organ, and smell the orange flowers as the beautiful bride passes, and watch her kneeling in a soft white cloud of lace and other fluffiness, and then strain my ears to listen whether she does actually vow to honor and obey that utter zany, I think that the fairy stories are commonplace and Blue-Beard the prosaic history of every day. Of course, if I were a younger and marriageable man, I should probably think, as you doubtless used to before you were pledged to take part in a similar ceremony, that there are persons—who shall be nameless—to whom it would not be monstrous to hear the beautiful Fiamma vowing eternal love and fidelity. Their names might be Gerald, for instance, or Bachelor. Yes—and don't you suppose that the other Orsons think precisely the same thing?

Meanwhile I reflect that Fiamma does sometimes work out her salvation. The point of the old story is that the beast was a prince, after all. It was only a horrible enchantment. And even old Bottom was not a veritable jackass. Fiamma believes, despite all that appears, despite all that you and I, with much head-shaking, know, that the hulking Orson is an enchanted prince. She does not deny, she admits, all that we—of course as impartial friends—reveal to her of his coarseness and unworthiness. "Certainly," says that gently persistent lady; "that is the hide. I see it as you do; but I also see beyond it, as you do not. You are wrong, and I am right. He is not a beast, but a gallant and noble prince."

There is nothing like it in the world, this simple and defiant devotion. At this very moment of writing—and it is I don't know how much o'clock at night—I reflect that I have been calling upon Mrs. Loveall, from whose house I came only an hour or two since. We had a very interesting talk of a thousand things. She is most thoughtful, most cultivated, and, above all, a woman of the steadiest character, and a most efficient head of the family. It was nearly midnight when I left her, and I doubt if she has gone to bed yet. During the time that I sat with her I knew that she heard the least sound in the hall, and once when the outer door closed she went out of the room. Her whole soul seemed to be intent upon those sounds; yet she calmly talked with me. It was a man she was awaiting—not her husband, for he is dead long ago, but her son, her oldest child, the bright-eyed boy, the pride and hope of her young married life—a man of forty now, and nobody's pride or hope for evermore.

Hosted by Google

I know how it will be. Some time after midnight there will be a fumbling at the door, and Mrs. Loveall will descend and open it. She will close it quietly, and then she will help him up stairs to his room. You can imagine how he looks, the sound of his voice, the terrible fumes that envelop him. Can you see that sweet, matronly face beside him, full of tenderness and pity? Can you look into that mother's heart, in which is no censure, no reproach, no conscious, withering disappointment even, but only love, love depthless and unspeakable? Is that her son, that stupefied, reeling, inarticulate sot? He has ceased to be himself: how can she love him? He is truly a beast, if ever a man is. Does she see the prince in him? Certainly she does; for what else could support her? That heart, so steady and true, is full of excuses and extenuations. Even if she thinks his condition is the consequence of mere weakness of will, she does not blame him, but some circumstance, some ancestor. "My poor boy," she thinks, remembering that his great-grandmother's uncle by marriage was too fond of punch, "the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children."

Is it otherwise with Fiamma? One, at least, of that name I knew, who married Orson; and she went on believing and believing in the prince, expecting and expecting him to dissolve the enchantment and come forth; and lo! at length he came. He gradually grew to be interested, sympathetic, industrious. He left card clubs and their companions, and cock-fighting and aimless lounging. He became a good-natured, quiet, friendly companion. And if we saw that, what must not she have seen? If we thought him good-humored, how fascinating must he not have been to Fiamma? No: we live in different worlds while we inhabit the same. Those gentle eyes do not see what we are, but what we might be. They do not hear our wretched talk; and if they hear of it, they do not believe, or they softly extenuate. My dear Gerald, your happy day draws near. It is the beginning of the year. Your heart is eager for all kinds of vows. Well, there is a trivial gift more precious than diamonds, more useful than porcelain and silver, that you can give her. It is the resolution—not to be broken, you rascal, but surely kept—to try to be the man that she believes you to be.

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BALL DRESSES.

THE ball season has opened, and brought into notice the low, round, Josephine corsage described early in the fall. Many ladies still wear pointed waists and low-necked basques, but these have been in vogue a long time, and will be gradually superseded by the Josephine style. The bertha of lace, or puffs, or of Grecian folds, is universally worn. The short puffed sleeves are scarcely visible below the bertha, and in some instances are omitted altogether, the armhole being finished by a frill of lace. The sensible abridgment of the train is plainly shown in the demi-trained skirts in vogue.

Silk gauze is the fabric preferred above tulle or tarlatan for ball dresses. Lustrous Chambéry gauzes, in solid colors, or clouded, or in intricate arabesque figures, are the first choice; striped gauzes are slightly passée; plain white grenadine and the armure grenadines are used instead of gauze for the sake of economy, and will produce a similar effect. Few entire dresses are made of gauze. The skirt and waist are usually of silk, the over-skirt and waist covering one of clouded or damask gauze; the pleated flounces on the lower skirt are of plain gauze, as figured gauzes do not make effective flounces. White clouded gauze over dresses and flounces on colored silk skirts are the most admired ball dresses of the season. Blue and rose-colored gauzes are sometimes worn over white silk, but are not very effective. Garlands of flowers, used in profusion, are the garniture for gauze dresses. Very little lace is combined with gauze fabrics; real blonde lace is considered most congruous with this thin glossy silk.

Among very rich ball dresses, perhaps the handsomest are those with tabliers and headings of embroidered tulle. These embroideries are of silk floss of a single color, or else flowers in their natural colors are wrought on the tulle, and are then transferred to the silk of the dress. These make an exquisite garniture for white and delicate fade silks. Chenille embroidery also appears on tulle, silk, and satin. The chenille cord is stitched down with gold or silver thread.

The most elegant tulle dresses are those trimmed with velvet flounces, velvet apron, and a velvet sash. The foundation for such a dress is, of course, a silk skirt; puffs of tulle separated by velvet ruffles trim the skirt to the waist. The over-skirt is merely a short velvet apron, with ample sashes of velvet lined with silk. White tulle with rose-colored velvet makes a charming dress; salmon-colored tulle is worn with black velvet; light blue tulle has velvet of darkest sapphire hue.

Fanciful silks are more used abroad than plain failles for evening dress. Conspicuous among these are the velvet brocades, having raised velvet arabesques on a silk ground, and the failles with moiré stripes. Ruffles and flounces of sheer white organdy, with the edges notched like sawteeth, are again in vogue for trimming light silks for small parties. Trained over-skirts like that illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. V., are seen with many dressy toilettes.

Sicilienne is the most fashionable fabric for evening wraps, and pale tints, such as pearl gray and sky blue, are preferred to pure white. Velvet and cascades of lace are the trimmings. For white opera cloaks the richest material is camel's-hair, almost covered with cord soutache and edged with white yak lace. The Dolman is the shape most worn. It is said that Parisian ladies have adopted undressed kid gloves for evening wear. These are made very long, and without buttons; they are easily slipped on the hand, and extend half-way to the elbow. Very pale-tinted gloves are far prettier by gas-light than dead white gloves. Fans are very large, and are covered with Watteau pictures.

A trained crinoline skirt, with a trained muslin skirt the length of the dress skirt, is necessary with evening dresses. The best crinoline skirts have the three front breadths of soft white muslin, while the back is of stiffly starched barred muslin, or else the regular crinoline. A muslin flounce, beginning at the knee, extends around the whole skirt. Above this, on the back breadths, are a succession of stiff muslin flounces and a puff, which is gathered by drawing-strings to form a bustle. The muslin skirt worn next the dress is sometimes elaborately trimmed to the knee with Valenciennes insertion and embroidered medallions, arranged diagonally. A simple fashion is to have a wide Spanish flounce of muslin, edged with narrow side pleating and Valenciennes. As these skirts drag upon the floor and receive very hard usage, the Italian machine-made Valenciennes is generally used upon them. This lace is stronger than "real" hand-made Valenciennes, and is now produced in very handsome patterns.

THE DORA D'ISTRIA COSTUME.

A costume called the Dora d'Istria is a novelty just now in vogue in Europe. It consists of a polonaise, with a simulated hussar jacket and intricately draped skirt, on which are frog buttons and olive-shaped ornaments of passementerie. This polonaise is made of gray cloth or camel's-hair, bordered with a band of silver-fox fur. The skirt is chestnut brown velvet, trimmed to match the polonaise.

The simplicity with which velvet skirts were trimmed early in the season has disappeared, and they are now covered with flounces and fringed or edged with fur, lace, or faille pleating. This elaborate trimming makes them too heavy for comfort. The polonaise worn with such skirts is of rough camel's-hair cloth, edged with a border of fur.

SCARF VEILS, ETC.

French bonnets are accompanied by scarf veils. These are made of a long, straight piece of net about two finger-lengths broad, edged all around with Chantilly or with Spanish blonde lace. The middle of the veil covers the face plainly, and the ends are tied behind or fastened by a jet or gold arrow, and left hanging in loops.

Flowers are scarcely seen on the bonnets worn for midwinter. Feathers are used in abundance. Natural undyed wings and ostrich feathers are found on Parisian hats. An eccentric novelty is a long curled ostrich plume drooping from the back of the bonnet, and wound around the neck like a boa. Bonnets are worn in most capricious fashion. The Rabagas, or sailor shape, is placed very far back, or else is perched on one side; while the high Rubens, with one side turned up, is worn very far forward on the forehead.

THE FILLET, ETC.

The Greek fillet, a band of black velvet tied around the head, is quite in favor at present. The velvet is nearly an inch wide, passes just above the forehead, is tied behind, and long ends are left hanging.

Coiffures are merely small clusters of flowers placed far forward in front, or on top, and also on the left side. Vines of smilax or of dwarfed ivy are placed about in the finger puffs. The Récamier bow of hair directly on top of the head is much worn. Small erect aigrettes and curled ostrich feather tips are very fashionable. Powdered hair fell into disfavor last year, but is again revived. Violet powder is the most effective, but is floury, and very difficult to brush out from the hair. Snow-flake powder shakes off easily, and injures the hair less. Diamond powder is little used. The powder should be sprinkled through coarse lace or gauze on the hair before it is put up, in order to whiten it evenly; the hair should be dusted again after it is dressed.

THE ULSTER, ETC.

A midwinter overcoat, adopted by gentlemen as a sleighing or traveling wrap, is called the Ulster. It is made of Irish frieze—a rough, grayish cloth. The shape is a loose double-breasted sack, made long enough to reach almost to the ankles. It is worn with a belt of the same, fastened loosely around the waist, and has outside pockets and a hood. It is a warm, comfortable garment, and is in great favor with gentlemen who delight in English fashions. It is found, ready-made, at prices ranging from $25 to $65.

Gentlemen who dress in the extreme of fashion are wearing very long double-breasted surtouts for overcoats. These are made of light drab cloths for opera and other full-dress occasions, and in dark invisible colors, trimmed with fur. They give decidedly a Dundreary appearance, and are as little to be commended for beauty as are the Ulsters noted above.

White silk handkerchiefs, large squares worn folded, are placed inside the neck of overcoats. Pale twilled silk handkerchiefs, especially light blue ones, are worn in the same way. White neck-ties are worn not alone with full dress, but also with the semi-dress suits with which lavender ties were formerly used. Black ties for day wear, and white for evening, are almost universal with stylishly dressed gentlemen. Few colored scarfs are seen, though blue scarfs are not entirely banished from favor.

GOSSAMER OVERSHOES.

Overshoes for ladies are of very thin rubber, so light as to be of scarcely perceptible weight, but perfectly water-proof, are neatly shaped over the toes, and extend in a high point above the heel, like the Marie Antoinette slipper. This point prevents them from slipping off the heel, as rubbers are apt to do. Price $1.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and W. R. BOWNE.

PERSONAL.

MISS EMILY FAITHFULL, speaking of the disadvantages under which women labor in England, says that only three months before she left England she spent a day in the potteries, and there were women and girls turning heavy wheels and lifting enormous weights; their physical strength was being drawn upon ad libitum, but they were carefully excluded from the lighter branches of the business; they were freely used as beasts of burden, but no encouragement was given them to undertake any skilled labor. And yet, by-the-way, we are told that women can not serve in haberdashers' shops because they are too weak to lift the bales of goods. In Liverpool and Dublin women earn sixpence a day by carrying immense loads of sand; nearly 50,000 hawk fish, fruit, and hardware through the streets of London, their average earnings varying from fifty cents to one dollar a week.

—MRS. SARAH WARNER BROOKS, known as the FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE of Massachusetts, was on Christmas the recipient of a handsomely engrossed testimonial from the convicts in the State-prison at Charlestown.

—Miss SOPHIE BARNEY was recently awarded the premium at the Montgomery (Alabama) Fair as being the most capable of making the best wife for a poor man.

—It comes to us in the papers, and we therefore suppose it must be believed, that LORENZA SILVA, a Mexican woman of San Felipa de Aqua, State of Oaxaca, died November 19, aged one hundred and fifty years, less eleven days. Up to within two weeks of her death she was able to read without spectacles and walk without assistance.

—CARLOTTA PATTI declines an offer of $20,000, gold, for ten concerts in Havana, on account of her engagement with MAX STRAKOSCH. After the present season she will retire to private life.

—Miss AGNES ETHEL is said to be about to marry a scion of one of our old Knickerbocker families. Ten years ago she was married to a Virginian named LEWIS, from whom two years later she was divorced.

—M. LEON SAY, the new French Minister of Finance, is a man of large fortune; controls the Journal des Débats; has long been the confidential friend of the ROTHSCHILDS, and rendered them great service in their railway operations; is concededly an Orleanist, and known among his friends as thoroughly in favor of free trade.

—JOHN CLEVELAND is the name of an odd character who died recently at Martha's Vineyard at the age of eighty-five. He never drank a glass of strong liquor of any kind in his life, never used tobacco in any form, never fired a gun or pistol, and never caught a fish with a hook and line. He was largely interested in the Mattakeeset herring creeks, and as a capturer of the consolatory herring was a success.

—Mrs. GARIBALDI, the second wife of the patriot, is thirty-five years old, and is described as a dark, handsome woman, with fierce eyes, and thick hair parted at the side of the head.

—A bricklayer, recently deceased, in London, was found to have the heaviest brain on record. It weighed sixty-seven ounces. The man could neither read nor write.

—CHARLES LEVER'S two daughters inherit from their father the inconsiderable fortune of about $5000.

—The Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin has refused to sanction the marriage of his daughter to the Russian Grand Duke VLADIMIR, notwithstanding the latter offered to forego the usual stipulation of a change of creed, and consent to her remaining a Protestant.

—Mrs. SAMUEL COLT'S income from her manufacturing property last year is stated to have been $800,000, and some newspaper man has intimated that her fortune of $8,000,000, more or less, "will be inherited by her lovely daughter." This part of it is ruthlessly punctured by the Hartford Post, which says that the "lovely daughter" happens to be a son with a will of his own.

—Mrs. JOAQUIN MILLER, who is about to alight upon the Atlantic slope, has taken occasion to remark to a Chicago interviewer that she was "very willing to sail down the stream of time alongside of Lady BYRON, Lady BULWER, and Mrs. DICKENS."

—The venerable Madame BONAPARTE is said to be seriously ill at her home in Baltimore, and her recovery doubtful. She was married to JEROME BONAPARTE, the youngest brother of NAPOLEON (afterward King of Westphalia), in Baltimore, December 27, 1803. Her legal name is Mrs. ELIZABETH PATTERSON.

—ADELINA PATTI has just had a memorable benefit at Moscow. It took place on the birthday of the Crown Princess. Before the performance commenced all the Russian and Italian artists, including PATTI, came forward in full dress and sang the Russian Hymn, which was vociferously encored. The heroine of the evening then appeared as Amina in La Sonnambula, her entrance being the signal for a perfect ovation. A corbeille of flowers, containing a casket in which was a gold circlet ornamented with a star of diamonds, was presented to her, and the jewel placed upon her head. From the clouds appeared to fall showers of bouquets and other presents, the stage being literally covered. The finale was redemanded, and during the performance the popular prima donna had to return nearly a hundred times to bow her acknowledgments. The night's receipts which fell to PATTI'S share amounted, it is said, to over $6000.

—Several of the eminent authors of France, who commenced with nothing, are now counted men of wealth. VICTOR HUGO is rated at 600,000 francs; "George Sand," nearly twice as much; EMILE DE GIRARDIN, 3,500,000 francs; ADOLPHE THIERS, 1,000,000 francs; ALEXANDRE DUMAS, fils, 400,000 francs; EDMOND ABOUT, 250,000 francs; ALPHONSE KARR, 100,000 francs; JULES JANIN, 750,000 francs; EDOUARD LABOULAYE, 100,000 francs; VICTORIEN SARDOU, 500,000 francs. THÉOPHILE GAUTIER died a millionaire, and the widows of SCRIBE and PONSARD live in affluence. But the widow of the celebrated PROUDHON has to eke out a precarious living as a washer-woman.

—A Miss SCHNEIDER, of Liverpool, England, has had her feelings soothed by the recovery of $125,000 from the curate of St. Mary's Church for breach of promise of marriage. That is about the heaviest pecuniary valuation of grief known in the human heart market.

—The Maharajah of Cashmere keeps a poet, and, from all accounts, compensates him well for his rhymed depreciation of the sun, moon, etc., in favor of his master's refulgent mind and person.

—The foreign ladies who are to "receive" during the present season at Washington are Lady THORNTON, wife of the British minister; Madame BLACQUE, wife of the Turkish minister; the wives of the representatives of Brazil, Peru, and Portugal; and the Marquise of Noailles, of France. The marquise is very pretty and vivacious, and speaks excellent English with a charming accent. She is of medium height and rather full figure, with dark hair, eyes, and complexion, and a face decidedly French and unmistakably Parisian in expression. Aided by her husband's rank, wealth, and pedigree, and by the handsome young attachés with whom he is surrounded, the marquise will reign this season by common consent.

—The ROTHSCHILD brothers, in conformity with the wishes of their late father, have sent $10,600 for the payment of the winter's rent of poor persons not actually paupers. The sums distributed by this family are immense. They support a Jews' hospital, a free dispensary, and medical office (the last two open to all creeds), a boys' school, a girls' school, a retreat for aged and infirm Hebrews. No woman in childbed appeals to them without receiving pecuniary assistance; no person in distress applies to them who (if his story prove true, and they keep two rabbis constantly engaged in investigating these applications) is not relieved. The Jewish ecclesiastical authorities are authorized to draw upon them to relieve any distress among their Hebrew brethren. If any general calamity fall upon a Hebrew community (for instance, the expulsion of the Jews from Tangiers during the Spanish invasion of Morocco, or the ill treatment of Hebrews in the Danubian principalities), they instantly dispatch agents with large supplies of money to the scene of suffering. They support a synagogue, with charitable institutions attached to it, at Jerusalem. Indeed, there is no end to their liberality.

—Good old Mrs. DORCAS RICE, of Jaffrey, New Hampshire, has tallied one hundred and five years on life's score, and goes about the house, makes her bed, reads her Bible, and chats as fluently as a young girl of fifty or sixty.

—"Virtue is its own reward" has again been verified in the person of Miss ADDIE TAYLOR, of Bridgeport, Connecticut. An unfortunate Frenchman inadvertently took the small-pox. Miss ADDIE came to the rescue, looked after him in a general and rather nice way, for the which she has received from Frenchman the pleasant $50,000.

—Miss MARY BABSON, recently deceased in Manchester, New Hampshire, at eighty-two, was a granddaughter of the famous General STARK, and resided with the old warrior during the later years of his life.

—Chief Justice CHASE rejoiceth in this, that he hath five grandchildren—three SPRAGUES and two HOYTS, which makes a "full" of happiness.

—Mr. GREELEY'S death has been made the subject of editorials in over eight hundred newspapers in the United States. Copies of these notices have been sent to Mr. CORNELL.

—Mrs. JESSIE BENTON FREMONT is described as having grown stout and gray, and never in the days of her girlish beauty was so fascinating as at the present time.

—When SYDNEY SMITH had gravely listened to the details of a mad dog's course through the streets of London—how he frightened a bishop, and was at length dispatched with difficulty—the clerical wit remarked that he "should like to have heard the dog's side of the story."

—Lady REMBOLD, wife of the recently appointed British minister to Brazil, has lately deceased. She was well known in Washington as Miss CARRIE HARRINGTON, second daughter of Hon. GEORGE HARRINGTON, late Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and at present president of the Automatic Telegraph Company.

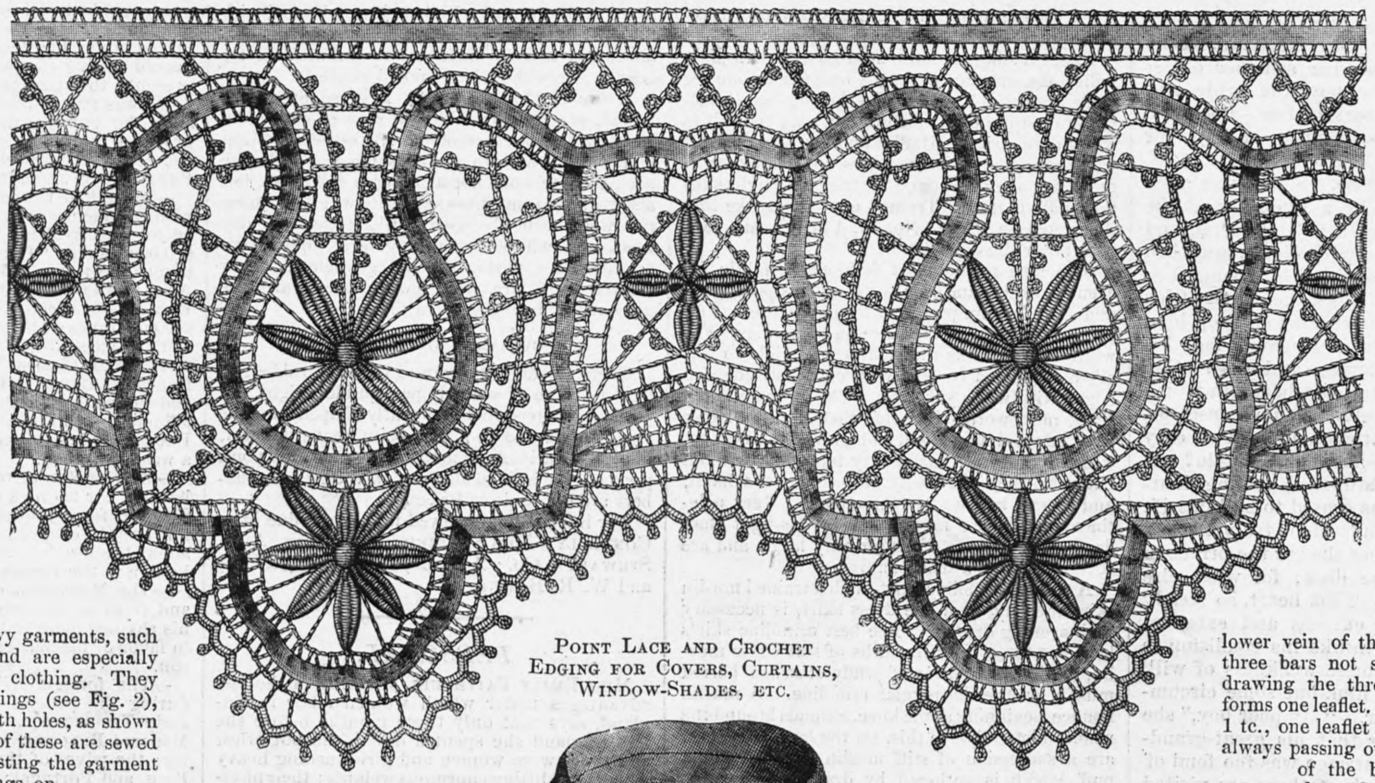
—Mrs. EDWIN FORREST was one of those who attended the funeral of her husband. A reporter says when she arrived at the house she moved nervously toward the rear parlor, where the remains were lying. There were but five or six persons in the room. Throwing aside her veil, she stood for nearly ten minutes, placed her hand upon his head, and followed the arm down to the hand, which she grasped for a few minutes. Then she glided toward the foot of the coffin, and plucked one or two flowers from the cross which lay upon the dead man's feet. She then moved rapidly to the front parlor, where she was seated until the coffin left the house.

—Who would "parse," or "decline" to read, such an announcement as this: "Mrs. MARY GRAMMAR, of Nashville, tired of conjunction with Mr. GRAMMAR, who, it appears, is too much addicted to the imperative mood, has put herself in the accusative case and sues for a divorce."

—BARNUM having been thrice burned out, it is suggested by an unfeeling man from Boston that his name should be changed to that of BURN-EM.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—METAL CHAIN FOR HANGING UP CLOTHING.



POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR COVERS, CURTAINS, WINDOW-SHADES, ETC.

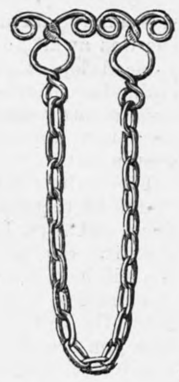


Fig. 2.—METAL CHAIN FOR HANGING UP CLOTHING.

Metal Chains for hanging up Clothing, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE illustrations show two styles of metal chains, which are very useful for hanging up heavy garments, such as winter cloaks, etc., and are especially adapted for gentlemen's clothing. They are fastened on curved rings (see Fig. 2), or on a plate furnished with holes, as shown by Fig. 1, and by means of these are sewed to the garment. In adjusting the garment the chain, of course, hangs on the inside.

Point Lace and Crochet Edging for Covers, Curtains, Window-Shades, etc.

To make this edging first draw the lines for the point lace braid on paper or linen, and then run on the braid along these lines, laying it in a pleat at each corner and gathering it slightly at the curves. Next work with medium-sized cotton the star-shaped figures in point de reprise, and in the middle of these the small dots in satin stitch, and between the leaves of the figures work the bars as shown by the illustration, winding the working thread stretched for the bars once, going back. Work the smaller four-leaved figure between every two scallops of the lace all in point de reprise as shown by the illustration. Work the remaining bars of the foundation in crochet-work with chain stitches and picots, and in working the cross-bars pass the working thread, which should not be too long, along the edge of the braid, winding it several times. Fasten the vertical bars to the bars just mentioned with one slip stitch each. Border the lace on the outer edge first with button-hole stitch scallops stretched loosely, and then cover these closely with button-hole stitches, in doing which crochet with the same working thread one picot of several chain stitches in the middle of each scallop. Instead of crocheting the bars and picots in the foundation of the edging, they may be worked in button-hole stitch, or else a piece of guipure cord may be stretched for the bars and picots.

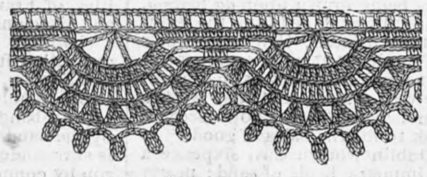

Fig. 2.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

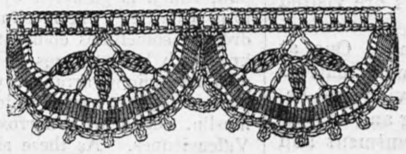

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

SCARF OF SILK GAUZE, LACE, AND CORD.

Point Lace and Crochet Edgings for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING. Work with twisted crochet cotton on one side of the point lace braid two rounds as follows: 1st round.—∗ 5 sc. (single crochet) on the edge of the braid, 14 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over half an inch of the edge, 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the edge of the braid, 2 stc. (short treble crochet) on the lower vein of the tc., working off these three bars not separately, but together, drawing the thread through once; this forms one leaflet. Twice alternately work 1 tc., one leaflet on the edge of the braid, always passing over a quarter of an inch of the braid between these, as shown by the illustration; 3 ch., drop the last of these from the needle, insert the needle in the fourth of the 14 ch. (counting from the end of these), and draw through the dropped st. (stitch), 10 ch., and repeat from ∗. 2d round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on every second following st. of the preceding round; after every dc. 1 ch. Then crochet one round on the other side of the braid as follows: ∗ 1 stc., as shown by the illustration, in the hollow between two scallops of the braid, 4 sc. on the edge of the braid, 1 p. (picot—that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), six times alternately 3 sc. on the edge of the braid, 1 p., then 4 sc.; repeat from ∗, but in the course of the work crochet, instead of the first p. of each scallop, 5 ch., fasten to the last p. of the preceding scallop, crochet, going back, 1 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the middle of the 5 ch., then 2 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of the same 5 ch.

Fig. 2.—CROCHET EDGING. This edging is worked with twisted cotton, No. 120, on a chain stitch foundation of the requisite length in six rounds: 1st round.—1 dc. on every second following foundation stitch, after this always 1 ch. 2d round.—9 sc., ∗ 2 ch., 5 tc. separated each by 2 ch. on the sixth following st. of the preceding round, 2 ch., pass over 5 st., 17 sc. on the following 17 st., and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—5 sc. on the first 5 st. of the preceding round, ∗ 3 ch., pass over the next 4 st., 17 dc. on the following 17 st., 3 ch., 9 sc. on the middle of the next 17 sc., and repeat from ∗. 4th round.—2 sc. on the first 2 st. of the preceding round, ∗ 3 ch., 1 dc. on each of the next 17 dc., after every dc. always 1 ch., then 3 ch., 3 sc. on the middle 3 st. of the next 9 sc., and repeat from ∗. 5th round.—1 sc. on the first st. of the preceding round, ∗ nine times always 4 dc. on the fourth following st., 1 sc. on the middle of the 3 sc. in the preceding round, and repeat from ∗. 6th round.—1 sc. always between 4 dc. of the preceding round; after each sc. work one scallop of 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch.

FOOT-MUFF WITH CROSS STITCH EMBROIDERY.

VELVETEEN SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

BLUE CASHMERE DRESS FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

SCOTCH PLAID SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

Hosted by Google

PREPARING TO CONQUER.

WE see here one of our modern Amazons, buckling on the last piece of armor before the mirror ere she goes forth to the field of battle. But it is no longer in steel gorget and breastplate that she arrays herself for conquest. Our modern dames find silk and velvet and glittering gems a more effective panoply than the finest-tempered coat of mail, and sparkling eyes and smiling lips surer weapons than a Damascus blade. They have learned that victories won by gentle words are better and more enduring than those gained at the point of the sword. They must remember, however, that light-armed warriors fight the best, and that simple elegance always leads more captives in its train than cumbrous extravagance, whose beauty is only counted by its cost.

PREPARING TO CONQUER.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

IT would be easier to tell what is not than what is worn. Nothing is excepted, either in fabrics, trimmings, or ornaments. There are seen as many embroidered as plain dresses, and as much worsted embroidery as silk, chenille, or silver.

The sorties du bal, which used to be made exclusively of cashmere, are this year also of a fabric called bourre de soie, with stripes alternately lustreless and a little rough, color on color. Light gray, light olive, and light sage green are the favorite shades for these opera and ball wrappings, which are commonly wadded, and lined with bright colored silk (rose or cherry), and occasionally fur lined. The newest of these that I have seen was of light olive bourre de soie, with gold embroidery, and lined with gold-colored silk.

One of the most common articles of morning costume has been transferred to the domain of ball dresses — the petticoat with perpendicular tucks. A dress of this sort had an under-skirt of white satin; a skirt of white silk tulle, tucked perpendicularly, and a low corsage, covered with tulle, tucked like that of the skirt. Over this were two or three tiers of over-skirts, both of tulle and lace, the former being puffed and trimmed with flounces and rolls of satin or velvet, or gold or silver embroidery.

The embroidery most in vogue at this moment is wrought with jet beads—not round, but long and flat. This is of white jet for evening toilettes, and of black jet for street, and some dinner and reception dresses.

Silk gauze, of all colors, is worn more than ever, and will be used to compose the novelty of the spring, when the trimmings of silk dresses, such as the flounces, bias folds, sashes, puffs, etc., will be made of silk gauze of the same color as the dress, or else of a darker shade; or, in a few rare instances, of a contrasting color—pink or blue gauze on gray or brown silk, or pink or lilac gauze on sage green silk. The bonnet will always match the dress, and will be of the same gauze, trimmed with silk like the dress. These combinations of silk and faille have already appeared at a few evening parties. I have seen in preparation for a dinner a dress of golden chestnut faille, trimmed with two pleated flounces of different widths (the lower one being the wider), made of rose-colored silk gauze. Then came four over-skirts of the same gauze, draped on the left side, each with a different scarf, one of broad brown ribbon embroidered with rose-color, the next of rose-colored ribbon embroidered with brown, and so on, alternating for the four over-skirts. Low waist with a double basque, made of rose-colored gauze. Short sleeves.

Another dinner dress had a brown and white striped skirt, the white stripes being silk and the brown ones velvet. This skirt had a high waist and close sleeves of the same material, trimmed with two puffs. The dress was completed by a sleeveless polonaise of chestnut velvet, with a low waist. In front this polonaise was no longer than the waist, which had a basque; it lengthened gradually on the hips, and was long enough in the back to be draped in a pouf; its trimmings consisted of a pleated ruche of white faille, veiled with chestnut lace. This trimming was repeated twice, and was surmounted by a wreath embroidered with chestnut and white silk. Over the high waist was worn a large necklace of topazes. Topaz ear-rings and diadem. This is a historical costume of the time of Henri III., and is called a Valois dress.

For the same dinner a simpler dress was in preparation. This had a plain skirt of black faille about a yard and three-quarters in length. The two back breadths were two yards and a half long, and were draped in a pouf. The waist, which was high, but open en cœur, had points in front, and was finished in the back with very narrow basques, trimmed with a ruffle, and made of pale blue faille, veiled with black Chantilly lace. A fichu of pale blue crêpe de Chine and Valenciennes lace was worn over the waist. Half-flowing sleeves, trimmed with blue flounces, veiled with black lace, and bows of black faille lined with blue. A scarf of light blue faille extended from the opening of the waist to the pouf, which it seemed to drape.

Hosted by Google

A visiting dress had a skirt of plain olive green velvet a yard and a half in length, with a broad hem lined and wadded so as to make the skirt hang heavy. The two back breadths were lined, wadded, and quilted their whole length. Polonaise of pékin Sicilienne—that is, with stripes alternately satin and lustreless—a new and beautiful fabric, trimmed with passementerie guipure set on as an edging, and headed with a bias fold half faille and half satin, and draped in a pouf, the whole of the same color as the skirt.

A simple walking dress had a skirt of Russia leather faille, trimmed with two flounces eight inches wide, slightly gathered, and set on without any space between them. Cloth blouse of the same color, plain, and simply hemmed. The front was in the form of a plastron, closing at the side, and was trimmed with two rows of very large oxidized silver buttons, extending the whole length. Belt fastened with a large oxidized silver clasp.

A more elegant walking dress had a skirt of sage green faille, trimmed with a bias flounce edged on the bottom with three narrow bias folds, with a second flounce above, set on as a heading, and cut in points on the under edge. The front of the skirt was pleated perpendicularly. Polonaise of the same color, brocaded, color on color, and trimmed with light woolen guipure and a broad bias fold of plain faille. Vest with large pockets. Louis XIII. sleeves, tight to the arm, and trimmed with a closely pleated flounce.

It is predicted that in the spring short suits will be abolished, and that dresses will be worn long and draped in a pouf for the street. I do not believe this now any more than I did last autumn, when similar predictions were made without being confirmed. In the first place, revolutions that are to take place at a fixed date are almost sure to miscarry; in the second, a change like this would hardly be made on the threshold of summer. There are some reasons in favor of long dresses in winter, but none at all in summer, when every one is out-of-doors, and walking suits are the universal garb. Long dresses looped for walking are not ancient enough to be resumed, since they have not yet been forgotten. Now in fashion it is well known nothing is new that still lives in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. There would be no novelty in long dresses looped, which would only be an old fashion revived. Then if it were attempted to drape them to simulate over-skirts, we might better keep the present style, which is lighter and less cumbrous, and which can be worn without ruining the stuff of which it is made, which would inevitably be done in the case of long dresses draped, which would be spoiled by sitting on the folds. It is quite certain that a long dress that has been once draped for the street can never again be worn in the parlor, so badly will the back breadths be crushed and rumpled. I know very well that it is rash to predict too positively concerning the fashions, which are wont to know no rule, and to give the lie to all probability; still I do not think I can be mistaken in foretelling that short suits will last through another summer, and that long dresses, when worn, will not be draped in a pouf. There are vague rumors of dresses such as were worn under Louis XIV., with short skirts to match, and were draped for the street by being drawn through large slits made in the sides like pockets. In this way the long skirt would be lifted out of the way, and could be let down at pleasure without losing its freshness, while the short skirt would serve for the street. But this is only a rumor. Meanwhile, in spite of all predictions to the contrary, short suits prevail not only in the streets, but also in drawing-rooms, and not only by day, but also in the evening. In very cold weather the polonaise is not abandoned, but a fur-lined Dolman or talma is thrown over it, or for carriage wear a large paletot, with immense sleeves, all comfortably lined with fur.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

Scarf of Silk Gauze, Lace, and Cord.

See illustration on page 68.

THIS scarf is made of a bias strip of gauze forty-one inches and three-quarters long and six inches and a quarter wide. The ends of this strip are pointed, and are trimmed with black lace insertion an inch and a quarter wide and lace an inch and a quarter wide. The seams made by joining the insertion, lace, and material are covered with black silk cord, which is sewed on in loops. Cut away the material underneath the insertion, and sew both lengthwise sides of the scarf together.

Foot-Muff with Cross Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 68.

THIS foot-muff is made of leather, and is ornamented on the upper surface with cross stitch embroidery with green and brown worsted in different shades, in the design of the game-bag shown by Fig. 1, page 848, Harper's Bazar, No. 52, Vol. V., drawn on canvas. For manner of drawing the design see description of tapestry designs on page 592, Harper's Bazar, No. 36, Vol. V. The foot-muff is lined and trimmed with silver-fox fur.

Velveteen Suit for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

See illustration on page 68.

THIS suit is made of black velveteen, and consists of a skirt and polonaise. The latter is trimmed with strips of fur. Sash of gros grain ribbon. Beaver hat, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and feathers.

Blue Cashmere Dress for Child from 1 to 3 Years old.

See illustration on page 68.

THIS dress of blue cashmere is trimmed with a braiding of black soutache, a ruche of blue gros grain ribbon, and strips of black fur. Blouse with long sleeves of Swiss muslin and strips of needle-work. Cut the blouse from Figs. 69 and 72, No. XXV., of Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 26, Vol. V.

Scotch Plaid Suit for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

See illustration on page 68.

THIS Scotch plaid suit consists of a skirt and polonaise, trimmed with ruffles, folds, and bows of the material. Black velvet hat, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and feathers.

(Continued from No. 3, page 38.)

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XXXV.

MR. PODMORE WISHES TO BE INSTRUCTED UPON THE DOCTRINE OF RESPONSIBILITY, AND DECLARES THAT HE HAS A PRESENTIMENT.

EVENTFUL as this night had been to Lily, and destined as it was to live forever in her memory, it was pregnant with yet deeper meaning for her future, and an event was to occur which was to draw closer together the links of the chain of pure and unworthy love which bound her. On this night she saw clearly what before had been but dimly perceptible to her. She saw that Felix loved her; and also that Mr. Sheldrake had a passion for her. She was instinctively conscious that there was nothing in common in the sentiments of these two men. Their feelings for her were as wide apart as their characters were; and she had already estimated these correctly, although she did not realize the depth of baseness from which Mr. Sheldrake's passion sprung. She was too pure and innocent for that.

When the party left for the theatre old Wheels found the time pass slowly enough, although he was to some extent comforted by the knowledge that Felix had gone to watch over his beloved girl. For the purpose of whiling away a few minutes he went up to Gribble junior's room, and found that worthy man and his wife working cheerfully, as usual. Gribble junior's father, the victim of co-operative stores, was sitting in a corner nursing the baby, and had, as usual, been descanting upon the evils of co-operation, when old Wheels entered. Mr. and Mrs. Gribble junior were laughing heartily at something their father had just uttered.

"What do you think we're laughing at, Mr. Wheels?" asked Gribble junior, as the old man sat down.

Old Wheels expressed a desire to be enlightened.

"Father just said," explained Gribble junior, "that he supposed they would be trying next to bring babies into the world by co-operation."

At which, of course, the laughter recommenced.

"Why not?" grumbled Gribble senior. "You can buy pap at the stores, and you can buy coffins. Mind, John, when I'm dead, get my coffin made by an honest tradesman. If you was to buy one at a co-operative store, I shouldn't rest in my grave."

"Time enough for that, father," replied Gribble junior, in a business-like tone, and yet with affection; "you're good for twenty years yet, I hope and trust."

"I should be, John, if trade was allowed to go on in a proper way. But co-operation 'll be the death of me long before my proper time."

"My girl's gone to the theatre," observed old Wheels, to change the subject.

"It 'll do her good," said Mrs. Gribble; "she's been looking pale of late."

"I'm going to take father to the Music-hall to-night," said Gribble junior. "He's never been to one. You see, Mr. Wheels, what I complain of in father is, that he won't keep moving."

"It's too late, John; it's too late. My joints are stiff."

"Perhaps so, but there's no occasion to make 'em stiffer. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. Go in for every thing, I say—go in for work, and go in for play, and keep moving. How do you think baby's looking, Mr. Wheels?"

Old Wheels pinched the baby's cheek, and said, gayly, that the co-operative store could not turn out a baby like that.

"Do you hear that, father?" cried Mrs. Gribble junior, with a merry laugh. "Do you hear that?"

"Mr. Wheels is quite right," replied Gribble senior, faithful to his theories; "it ain't likely that any thing good and wholesome can come out of co-operation."

"How's trade, Mr. Gribble?"

"Well, it's no use grumbling, but it ain't as good as it should be. I had an idea yesterday, though. It was raining, you know, and I had no jobs on hand. The hospital ain't as full as it ought to be. I went out in the rain yesterday with three new umbrellas under my arm and one over my head. What for, now? you'll ask. To sell 'em? No. People never buy umbrellas in rainy weather of their own accord; they always wait for a fine day. No; I had an idea, and I carried it out in this way. I saw a respectable man with an umbrella over his head that wanted mending. I followed him home, and just as he knocked at his door I went up to him, and said I was an umbrella-maker, and would like the job of mending his umbrella. 'But I've only got this one,' he said, 'and I want to go out again.' 'I'm prepared for that, Sir,' I said; 'here's my card, and here's a new umbrella as good as yours. I'll leave this with you to use till I bring back your own, properly mended.' He was tickled at the idea, and was more tickled when I told him that, trade being slack, I had come out on purpose to look out for umbrellas that wanted mending. 'You're an industrious fellow,' he said, with a laugh. 'Yes, Sir,' I answered, 'if work won't come to you, you must go to work. Keep moving; that's my motto. If you can't get work, make it.' Well, he gave me his second-hand umbrella, and took my new one. In this way, in less than three hours, I got rid of my four new umbrellas, and got four jobs. I took them back this afternoon, and, would you believe it, Mr. Wheels? not only did I get paid well for the jobs, but two of the gentlemen bought two of my new umbrellas, and said I deserved to be encouraged. And I think I am," added Gribble junior, complacently. "I made a good job of that idea, and I dare say it 'll bring me in some money. You see, an umbrella is such an awkward thing to get mended when it's out of order. Not one person out of twenty knows where to take it to. Well, go to them. I hope it 'll rain to-morrow."

When old Wheels was in his room again, it was natural that his thoughts should dwell much on the conversation that had taken place between himself and Lily. It brought the past before him, and he was painfully startled by the resemblance which the present crisis in the life of his darling bore to that other event in the life of her mother which had wrecked the happiness of that unhappy woman. He opened the cupboard, and saw the little iron box. Very sad were the thoughts it suggested as he brought it to the table and opened it. There was a little money in it, sufficient for a few week's expenses of their humble home; two or three mementos of Lily, such as a piece of ribbon and a flower she had worn in her hair; and some old letters and papers, worn and faded. He took them from the box, and sadly read one and another. Among them were letters from Lily's father to her mother during their days of courtship; and certain terms of expression in them brought to him the remembrance of sentiments almost similarly expressed by Alfred. The same vague declarations of being able to make large sums of money by unexplained means; the same selfishness, the same boastfulness, were there embodied. But not the same remorse which Alfred had already experienced; that was to come afterward, and the despair which ever accompanies it. "We were happy then, my daughter and I," the old man murmured; "happy before he came. My daughter's life might not have ended as it did, in misery; might not have been passed, as it was, in miserable repinings. He brought a blight upon us." And then came the thought, "Like father, like son." He paced the room with disturbed steps. "Alfred's father," he thought, "wrecked the happiness of the woman who loved him, who trusted implicitly in him—wrecked the happiness of my daughter, who once was as bright as my darling Lily. And how she changed under the consequence of his vice and his folly! How she drooped and drooped until life became torture! As she trusted him and believed in him, and sacrificed herself for him, so Lily trusts and believes and is ready to sacrifice herself for Alfred. Shall I allow her to do this blindly? The end would not be the same, for Lily could not live through it. How can I save my darling? Would it not be better to inflict a sharp pain upon her now than to see her walk blindly, confidingly, lovingly, to a desolate future?" At this point of his musings he heard the street-door open and shut, and heard a stumbling step in the passage below. Looking over the papers in the iron box, he came upon two which he opened and read. They were the last two documents connected with the career of Lily's father. One was a full quittance for a sum of money which the unhappy man had embezzled; the wording of the other was as follows:

"In consideration of my father-in-law paying the money due to Mr. James Creamwell, which I have wrongfully used, I solemnly promise not to trouble my wife with my presence as long as I live, and not to make myself known to my children in the future, should we meet by any chance. For the wrong that I have done, I humbly ask their forgiveness.

"RICHARD MANNING."

"He has kept his word," mused old Wheels; "from that time I have never seen him, never heard of him. I have wondered often if he is alive. No one but I has ever read this paper, unless Alfred, when he took the money from this box— But no; he could have had no thought for any thing but his unhappy purpose."

Old Wheels was interrupted in his musing by the whining of a dog at the door. "That's Snap's voice," he said, and going to the door, he saw the faithful dog waiting for him. Snap, directly he saw the old man, looked into his face appealingly, and walked toward the stairs. Old Wheels, taking the candle, followed the dog down stairs, and found Jim Podmore asleep at the bottom. Snap, having fulfilled his mission, waited patiently for the old man to act.

"Come, Mr. Podmore," said old Wheels, gently shaking the sleeping man; "you mustn't sleep here. Come up stairs and get to bed."

The tired man murmured, "All right," and settled himself comfortably to continue his nap. But old Wheels shook him more roughly, and he rose to his feet wearily, and leaning against the wall, seemed disposed to fall asleep again in that position.

"Come, pull yourself together," urged old Wheels, taking Jim Podmore's arm; "you'll be more comfortable in your own room than here."

Thus advised, and being well shaken, Jim "pulled himself together," and, with many incoherent apologies, accompanied old Wheels up stairs. When he arrived at the first landing, he appeared to think he had gone far enough, and quite naturally he stumbled into the old man's room, and fell into a chair.

"Come, come," persisted old Wheels, "I am not going to allow you to fall asleep again. Bed's the proper place for you."

"I should like," murmured Jim, "to go to bed—and sleep—for a month."

Old Wheels laughed slightly at this.

"You wouldn't expect to wake up at the end of the time," he said, continuing to shake Jim Podmore.

"I don't know—I don't care—I'd like to go to bed—and sleep—for a year. All right, Mr. Wheels—don't shake me—any more! I'm awake—that is, as awake—as I shall be—till to-morrow morning. I beg you—a thousand pardons—for troubling you. I suppose—you found me asleep—somewhere. Where?"

"On the stairs."

"Ah—yes. I thought—I should ha' fell down—in the streets—as I walked along. I was so—dead beat. I'm glad—you woke me up—for I wanted to ask you something."

Old Wheels thought it best not to interrupt the current of Jim's thoughts, and therefore did not speak. Jim shook himself much as a dog does when he comes out of the water, and having, it is to be presumed, by that action aroused his mental faculties, proceeded:

"We've had a talk—to-day—me and some mates—and I made up my mind—that I'd speak—to some one—as might know—better than us. I meant you."

"Yes. What were you speaking about?"

"Well, you see—it come in this way. I never told you—about Dick Hart—did I?"

"No—not that I remember," replied old Wheels.

"He was a mate of our'n—Dick Hart was. As good a fellow—as ever drawed—God's breath. He was working—on our line—a many months ago. He ain't working there now—not him—ain't working any where—can't get it. Willing enough—Dick Hart is—and a-breaking his heart—because he can't get it. He's a doomed man—Mr. Wheels—a doomed man!—and might as well—be dead—as alive. Better—a damned sight better—if it warn't for his wife—and kids."

Jim Podmore was evidently warming up. His theme was powerful enough to master his fatigue. Old Wheels listened attentively.

"It might have happened—to me—it might happen—to me—any night—when I'm dead beat. What then?" he asked, excitedly, to the no small surprise of Snap, to whom this episode was so strange that he stood aside gazing gravely at his master. "What then?" Jim repeated. "Why, I should be—what Dick Hart is—a-wandering about—in rags—a-starving almost. I should be worse than him—for when I think—of the old woman up stairs—asleep—and my little Polly—that is my star—my star, Polly is!—and think of them—with nothing to eat—like Dick Hart's old woman and kids—I shouldn't be able—to keep my hands—to myself. And I shouldn't try to—I'm damned if I should!"

Old Wheels laid his hand with a soothing motion on the excited man's shoulder.

"Be cool, Mr. Podmore," he said. "Tell me calmly what you want. You are wandering from the subject."

"No, I ain't," responded Jim Podmore, doggedly. "I'm sticking to it. And it ain't likely—begging your pardon—for being so rough—that I can be calm—when I've got what I have got—in my mind."

"What's that?"

Jim Podmore looked with apprehension at old Wheels, and then turned away his eyes uneasily.

"Never mind that—it's my trouble—and mustn't be spoken of. Let's talk of Dick Hart."

"You were about," said old Wheels, gently, "to tell me some story connected with him."

"He was as good a fellow—as ever drawed breath—and had been in the Company's service—ever so many years. There was nothing agin him. He did his work—and drawed his screw. Little enough! He got overworked—often—as a good many of us gets—a many times too often—once too often for poor Dick—as I'm going to tell you, short. It must ha' been—eight months ago—full—when Dick Hart—worked off his legs—with long hours—and little rest—had a accident. He took a oath—afterward—that he was that dead beat—before the accident—that he felt fit to drop down dead with fatigue. He couldn't keep—his eyes open—as I can't, sometimes—and when the accident—takes place—he goes almost mad. But that doesn't alter it. The accident's done—and Dick Hart's made accountable. He's took up—and tried—and gets six months. If what he did—had ha' been his fault—he ought to have been—hung—but they didn't seem—quite to know—whether he was to blame—or whether—he wasn't—so they give him six months—to make things even, I suppose. While Dick's in prison—his wife's confined—with her second—and how they live—while he's away from 'em—God knows! Some of us gives a little—now and then. I give twice—but what Dick's wife got—in that way was—next to nothing—as much as we—could afford. Dick Hart—comes out of prison—a little while ago—and tries to get work—and can't. He gets a odd job—now and then—by telling lies about himself—and his old woman—gets a little charing—but they've not been able—to keep the wolf—from the door. It's got right in—and there they are—pretty nigh starving—him and the old woman—and the kids."

Jim Podmore's drowsiness coming upon him

Hosted by Google

powerfully here, he had as much as he could do to keep himself awake. He indulged himself with a few drowsy nods, and then proceeded as though there had been no interval of silence.

"Well, we had a talk about him—to-day, me and my mates. We made up—a little money—not much—but as much—as we could afford—about six shillings—and sent it to his old woman. But we can't go on—doing this—and one of the men said—that if it come to the officers' ears—or the directors'—that we'd been making up money—for a man as has been discharged—and's been in prison—and's cost the Company a lot o' money in damages—(for they had to pay two men—as was able—to afford a lawyer; there was others—as was poor—who didn't get any thing)—that if it come—to the directors' ears—we should likely—get into trouble ourselves."

Having come to the end of Dick Hart's story, Jim Podmore dozed off again, and would have fallen into deep sleep but for old Wheels nudging him briskly.

"Well?" asked the old man.

"Ah, yes!" said Jim, "I was almost forgetting. What I want to know is—is Dick Hart responsible—for what he's done? Is it right—that a respectable man—a hard-working man—a honest man—should be compelled—to work until he's lost—all control over hisself—till he's ready to drop—as I've told you before—and as I've been ready to myself—and that then—when a accident happens—which wouldn't have happened—if he'd been fresh—or if a fresh man had been—in his place—is it right, I want to know," and Jim Podmore raised his arm slowly and lowered it, and raised it again and lowered it again, as if it were a piston, "that that man—should be put—in prison—should be disgraced—should lose his honest name—shouldn't be able to get work—for his old woman—and the young uns—and that they should be almost starving—as Dick Hart's people's doing now?"

Fortunately for old Wheels, who would have found these questions very difficult to answer, Jim Podmore was too tired and too sleepy to wait for a reply.

"If I don't go up stairs—immediate," he said, rising slowly to his feet, "you'll have—to carry me. So I'll wish you—good-night, Mr. Wheels, and thank you."

He paused at the door for the purpose of asking one other question.

"Did you ever feel—that something was going to happen—without knowing exactly what it was?"

"Yes," replied old Wheels, good-humoredly, "but it never did happen."

"Ah," pondered the puzzled man, "but this will, though."

"What will?"

"Didn't I tell you—I didn't know what? But it 'll happen—as sure as my name's—Jim Podmore. It's buzzing about my head now—and I can't make it out."

"Nervousness," suggested old Wheels, "brought on by overwork."

"Mayhap, but there it is. What would you call it, now? Give it a name."

"It is a presentiment, I should say."

"That's it. I've got—a presentiment. Thank you. Good-night, Mr. Wheels. I've got—a presentiment—and it 'll come true—as sure as my name's—Jim."

With that Jim Podmore staggered up stairs, with faithful Snap at his heels, and within an hour old Wheels heard the street-door bell ring, and hurried down stairs.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

FELIX GAINS A CLEW.

FELIX intended to leave Lily after he had seen her safely within-doors, but the old man begged him to come in. A look from Lily decided him, and the three faithful souls ascended the stairs to the old man's room. Old Wheels entering first, gave Lily an opportunity to say, hurriedly, to Felix,

"Don't tell grandfather of my fainting, Felix. It might distress him."

He promised her.

"Nor of what passed between you and Mr. Sheldrake."

"Very well, Lily."

She spoke in a whisper; she was so thrilling with exquisite sensitiveness that any harsher sound would have been a disturbance to her happy state.

"I will think of what you have said to-night, Felix. You are right, I know—you must be right." (The unspoken words came to her, "My heart tells me so.") "Thank you for it, Felix, with all my heart."

Their hands met in a tender clasp. They entered the room the next moment, and old Wheels looked toward them with a pleased expression in his face, brought there by the circumstance of Lily and Felix lingering for a few moments in the passage. It betokened a confidence between them.

It was one o'clock before Felix took his departure. The conversation between him and old Wheels had turned principally upon the mental disturbance of Mr. Podmore, and upon his presentiment. This made a great impression upon Felix, and, although he was almost ashamed to confess it to himself, took fast hold of his mind. He was predisposed for some such influence from the thought of the crisis that seemed to be imminent in the life of the woman he loved. That it must come, and soon, he was convinced, and he thought to himself it would be almost a wise act to hasten it, if possible. He had quietly made it his business to acquaint himself with the nature of Mr. Sheldrake's transactions, and, notwithstanding that that gentleman was close and crafty, Felix had learned much concerning him. The knowledge sprang naturally, as it were, out of Felix's profession. He was correspondent for two country newspapers, and had managed to insert the thin end of his wedge into the wall of London journalism. Steadily and unobtrusively he was working his way, and was sanguine and confident of the future. Very many people suppose that cunning is one of the principal specialties of wisdom, but it is not always so. A rare strength, which shows itself almost invariably in great and good results, lies in the man who is wise and not cunning—who is wise from honesty of purpose. Felix was this. He was sincere in all he did, honest in all he did. It is a pleasure to be able to indicate, even by such mere outlines as these, a character which too many persons do not believe in.

Beginning to earn his living by his pen, and being enabled to act in a certain measure independently and to take his own view of things, it was natural that he should exercise his small power in the cause of right. It was not his ambition to be the Don Quixote of literature, but he could no more resist the inclination to strike hard blows at public shams and injustice than, being naturally truthful, he could resist the inclination to tell the truth. Of course he could effect but little good. The great shield behind which imposture and knavery found shelter, and which protected dishonesty and hypocrisy, suffered but little from his attacks; but here and there he made a dent, and that was a great satisfaction to him. He was a faithful soldier, and fought with courage.

He knew that in some way Lily's brother was in Mr. Sheldrake's power, and accident revealed to him the nature of the bond between them. In his crusade against knavery he became acquainted with the unmitigated roguery that was practiced under the protection of the institution which, with a grim and ghastly humor, has been denominated the great national sport. His friend Charley, who introduced him to the columns of the Penny Whistle, was the first who opened his eyes to the knavery. It seems to be a recognized necessity that all young men who have the means and the leisure should go through the formula known as "seeing life"—a process which to some is a sad tragedy, and which to nearly all is a bitter experience. Very few come out of that fire unscathed. Charley had gone through this formula—fortunately for him—in a superficial way. Charley's parents were good people enough, and had tacitly agreed that their son must "see life" before he settled; every body's sons saw life before settling, and Charley must not be an exception. So the young fellow went into the world, and in the natural course of things became mixed up in matters the mere mention of which would have brought a blush to his mother's cheek. But Charley was doing the proper thing; there was no doubt of that. However, the young fellow's inclinations were not inherently vicious, and he escaped the pitfalls in which so many weak and unfortunate ones are ingulfed. He and Felix had met some few times since Felix's installation as London correspondent to the Penny Whistle, and they had opened their hearts to each other. Thus it came out that Charley told Felix of his introduction to the racing world, and of his adventures therein.

"You see, Felix," he said, "I had outrun my allowance, and I thought I might be able to set things straight, and pay my few small debts, without coming on my father's purse. So, led away by the flaming accounts in the newspapers, I went into betting; was introduced by a friend to a club where I could bet, and for three months went regularly to races. It didn't turn out well, and after dropping nearly two hundred pounds I went to my father and made a clean breast of it. He paid my debts, and made me promise to give up the infatuation, as he called it. I promised willingly enough, for I had made up my mind before, and I am sure I shall never be drawn into the net again. The fact is, Felix, it didn't suit me; the men I met on the race-courses were such cads and blackguards that I soon became disgusted with myself for mixing with them. I tell you what it is, old fellow, I think being with you a great deal has done me good, and I have learned from you to hate things that are mean. You've been to races, of course?"

"I've been to Goodwood and Ascot and to the Derby. The Derby is a wonderful sight. I should like to go with you to one or two of the small meetings."

They went in company, and Felix, having a deeper purpose in his mind than idle amusement, saw much to astonish him. As they were making their way through a crowd of sharps and gulls, Charley pulled his sleeve, and said,

"There! There's a man who had over a hundred pounds of my money."

Turning, Felix saw Mr. David Sheldrake, evidently very much at home. Felix, not wishing to be seen by Mr. Sheldrake, walked away, and watched him from a distance.

"Is he a betting man?" asked Felix.

"Oh yes; and as sharp as a needle."

"Does he attend these meetings regularly?"

"You seem to be interested in him, Felix."

"Yes, I know him."

"And don't like him, evidently," observed Charley, judging from his friend's tone.

"That is true; I don't like him. But you haven't answered my question."

"I have met him on nearly every race-course I have been to; he is always to be seen in the 'ring,' I should say."

Felix did not pursue the subject, but later in the day said,

"Have you any documents, Charley, connected with your betting experiences, or have you destroyed them?"

"I have them all. By-the-bye, they might be useful to you; there are some strange things among them—well, perhaps not strange in themselves, but strange that such things should be allowed. It would be a good subject for you to take up."

"Any letters from that man?"

"Oh yes; suppose I send you the packet?"

"I should like to see them."

They were received in due course by Felix, and they so interested him that he began from that time to purchase the sporting papers, and to make a regular study of the usually unprofitable theme. Any person who did not know Felix's character might reasonably have supposed that he had been bitten by the mania, and that he was beginning to entertain the idea that he might make a fortune by betting with sharps. They would have had ample grounds for so supposing, if they had known that Felix actually sent small sums in stamps to the prophets and tipsters and the layers of odds who advertised in the sporting papers, for the purpose of obtaining the information necessary for the rapid and certain realization of "fabulous sums"—a phrase which many of the advertisers used in the traps they set, unconscious of the ironical truth it contained. But what Felix was doing was a means to another end, and he lost his money cheerfully. He began to frequent race-courses also, and on one occasion, early in his experience, he saw Lily's brother, as he expected to see him, running hither and thither in a state of blind excitement. With a set determination, Felix watched the young man during the whole of the day; saw the fatal infatuation which urged him onward; and saw him pass through the various stages of hope, suspense, and agony. Felix saw more, with the eyes of his mind; he saw ruin waiting at Alfred's heels. Felix had met with an old legend which stated how every human being was attended by two angels, one bad, one good, and how they strove for mastery over the soul they attended. As the recollection of this legend came to him, Felix looked up and saw Alfred's bad angel, Mr. David Sheldrake, talking to Alfred, and Alfred eagerly listening. It saddened Felix to see this, although he fully expected it, and was prepared for it. "Alfred's good angel," he thought, "is love. But love has no sword to strike this false friend dead." But Felix went home that evening with a clew in his hand.

On this night, as Felix walked away from Lily's house, he thought of these things, and was too disturbed to go home. He walked about the quiet streets, and at the end of an hour found himself on the Thames Embankment. As he stood there, musing, gazing into the solemn river, he became conscious of a sudden tremor in the air. He looked around with a feeling of vague alarm upon him; but he saw nothing, heard nothing. "Pshaw!" he muttered. "Mr. Podmore's presentiment is frightening me with shadows. I'll stroll past Lily's house, and then go home to bed."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"LONDON fogs" have a world-wide reputation, though not an enviable one. And recently New York has had some experiences which will enable her to sympathize with the chronic sufferings of the dwellers in the great metropolis across the waters. Though occurring in January, some days that we have had are well described by Hood's familiar lines:

"No sun, no moon,
No morn, no noon,
No dawn, no dusk, no proper time of day;
No sky, no earthly view,
No distance looking blue,
No road, no street, no 't'other side the way;'" and we might appropriately extend the quotation, for not a few fog-bewildered people, with vivid remembrance of their late discomforts, would most appreciatively respond to—

"No top to any steeple,
No recognitions of familiar people,
No courtesies for showing 'em,
No knowing 'em!
No traveling at all, no locomotion,
No inkling of the way, no notion—
'No go' by land or ocean."

During the period of greatest "befogment"—to coin a word—in this city nothing could be discerned a few feet from the visual organs. Faith and memory were the faculties most relied upon in attempting locomotion. Navigation on the North and East rivers became a matter of extreme difficulty and danger. Many strange and amusing incidents occurred, or at least they would have been amusing had not multitudes been put to serious inconvenience. One ferry-boat, having left the Brooklyn pier, cautiously and slowly felt its way through the waters, but could not find its landing wharf. The boat kept floundering around the ends of various piers, to the great anxiety of the passengers, who did not understand what was the precise difficulty. At length a vigilant watchman on a pier shouted, "Ship ahoy, there! Where are you going?" The pilot replied that he didn't know till he found out where he was. "Why, you're in Hoboken," answered the watchman. Whereupon the chagrined pilot turned "about face," and finally his boat sagaciously found Fulton Street wharf, where it belonged. A foggy day is only one of many undesirable episodes in this, thus far, most severe winter; and the end is not yet.

The Russian Christmas is observed on January 6, in consequence of the Russians still retaining the Julian calendar, and thereby being twelve days behind the time of other nations. In this city religious services were held on that occasion in the Greek chapel in Second Avenue.

A physician renowned for both wit and wisdom has said: "Physic should be given only to dying men. Nine-tenths of the sick men need only a rush of blood to the boots."

A balloon trip across the Atlantic is the proposed divertisement for next summer. Professor John Wise, a well-known aeronaut, is now making preparations for this aerial voyage. We presume it is too late to apply for a passage in his ship, as a number of scientific gentlemen, having made early application to accompany the professor, have been supplied with tickets for the occasion. Professor Wise made the famous air trip from St. Louis to the eastern extremity of Lake Ontario, a distance of over twelve hundred miles, in the short space of nineteen hours, or at a rate of about sixty-three miles an hour. He feels entirely confident of his ability to make the quickest trip on record across the Atlantic.

When we consider how narrow has been the escape from great loss of life in some of the recent fires, there is reason for great thankfulness. The Brooklyn Tabernacle was burned about an hour before the usual time for the Sunday morning service. If Barnum's menagerie and museum had taken fire in the daytime or evening, crowds of frightened children, as well as men and women, might have shared the fate of the animals. The flames burst out in the Fifth Avenue Theatre about twenty minutes after the large holiday audience at the matinée had been dismissed, and a few hours later it would again have been crowded with human beings.

The London Telegraph discourses at length upon the long three years' cruise which the Challenge has recently started on, and in the course of which she plans to fight her way southward to the mysterious regions of thick-ribbed ice that hem in the southern pole. The substance of the theory advanced by the Telegraph is that there is no open sea at the south pole, but rather a quasi-spherical continent, against whose shores rises up the warm equatorial current. Drifting off again toward the equator, this gradually congeals into a colossal ring of ice, against which explorer after explorer has in vain attempted to make his way. From south pole, as from north, a huge glacier runs toward the tropics. Beyond this wall of ice, and in its very heart, lies a land of the hyperboreans, where the climate is forever warm and equable, and where six months of perpetual darkness follow six months of perpetual sunlight. Beyond all question, at the very heart of the south pole there lies a pleasant region, possibly inhabited, with a warm sea lapping its shores, which, nevertheless, some 200 or 300 miles from its coast line, is locked in by an iron ring of icebergs rising high as the Himalayas. The inhabitants, if any there be, of this strange clime are dwellers in a valley shut in by a huge circular wall of crystal, while between them and their glassy barrier rolls that very circumambient Oceanos of which the Greek cosmogonists sung. The Challenge is fitted out with all kinds of scientific apparatus, and carries 200 miles of sounding line. It is expected that after her long voyage she will return with valuable geographic and scientific records.

We have come in these days to be dependent upon the telegraph. And when a wintry rain turns to ice as it falls, weighing down the telegraph wires with frozen pendants, causing one after another to break from the strain, business every where is thrown into complete confusion. The Police and Fire departments are deprived of their chief reliance in cases of emergencies, and the Signal Service Bureau loses its working tools. New York feels it hard to be cut off from hourly communication with Washington, and even complains when no daily messages come from Europe. Such a catastrophe as recently befell the telegraph wires and poles in this vicinity will cause us all to experience a fresh realization of the value of this ever-wonderful mode of communication.

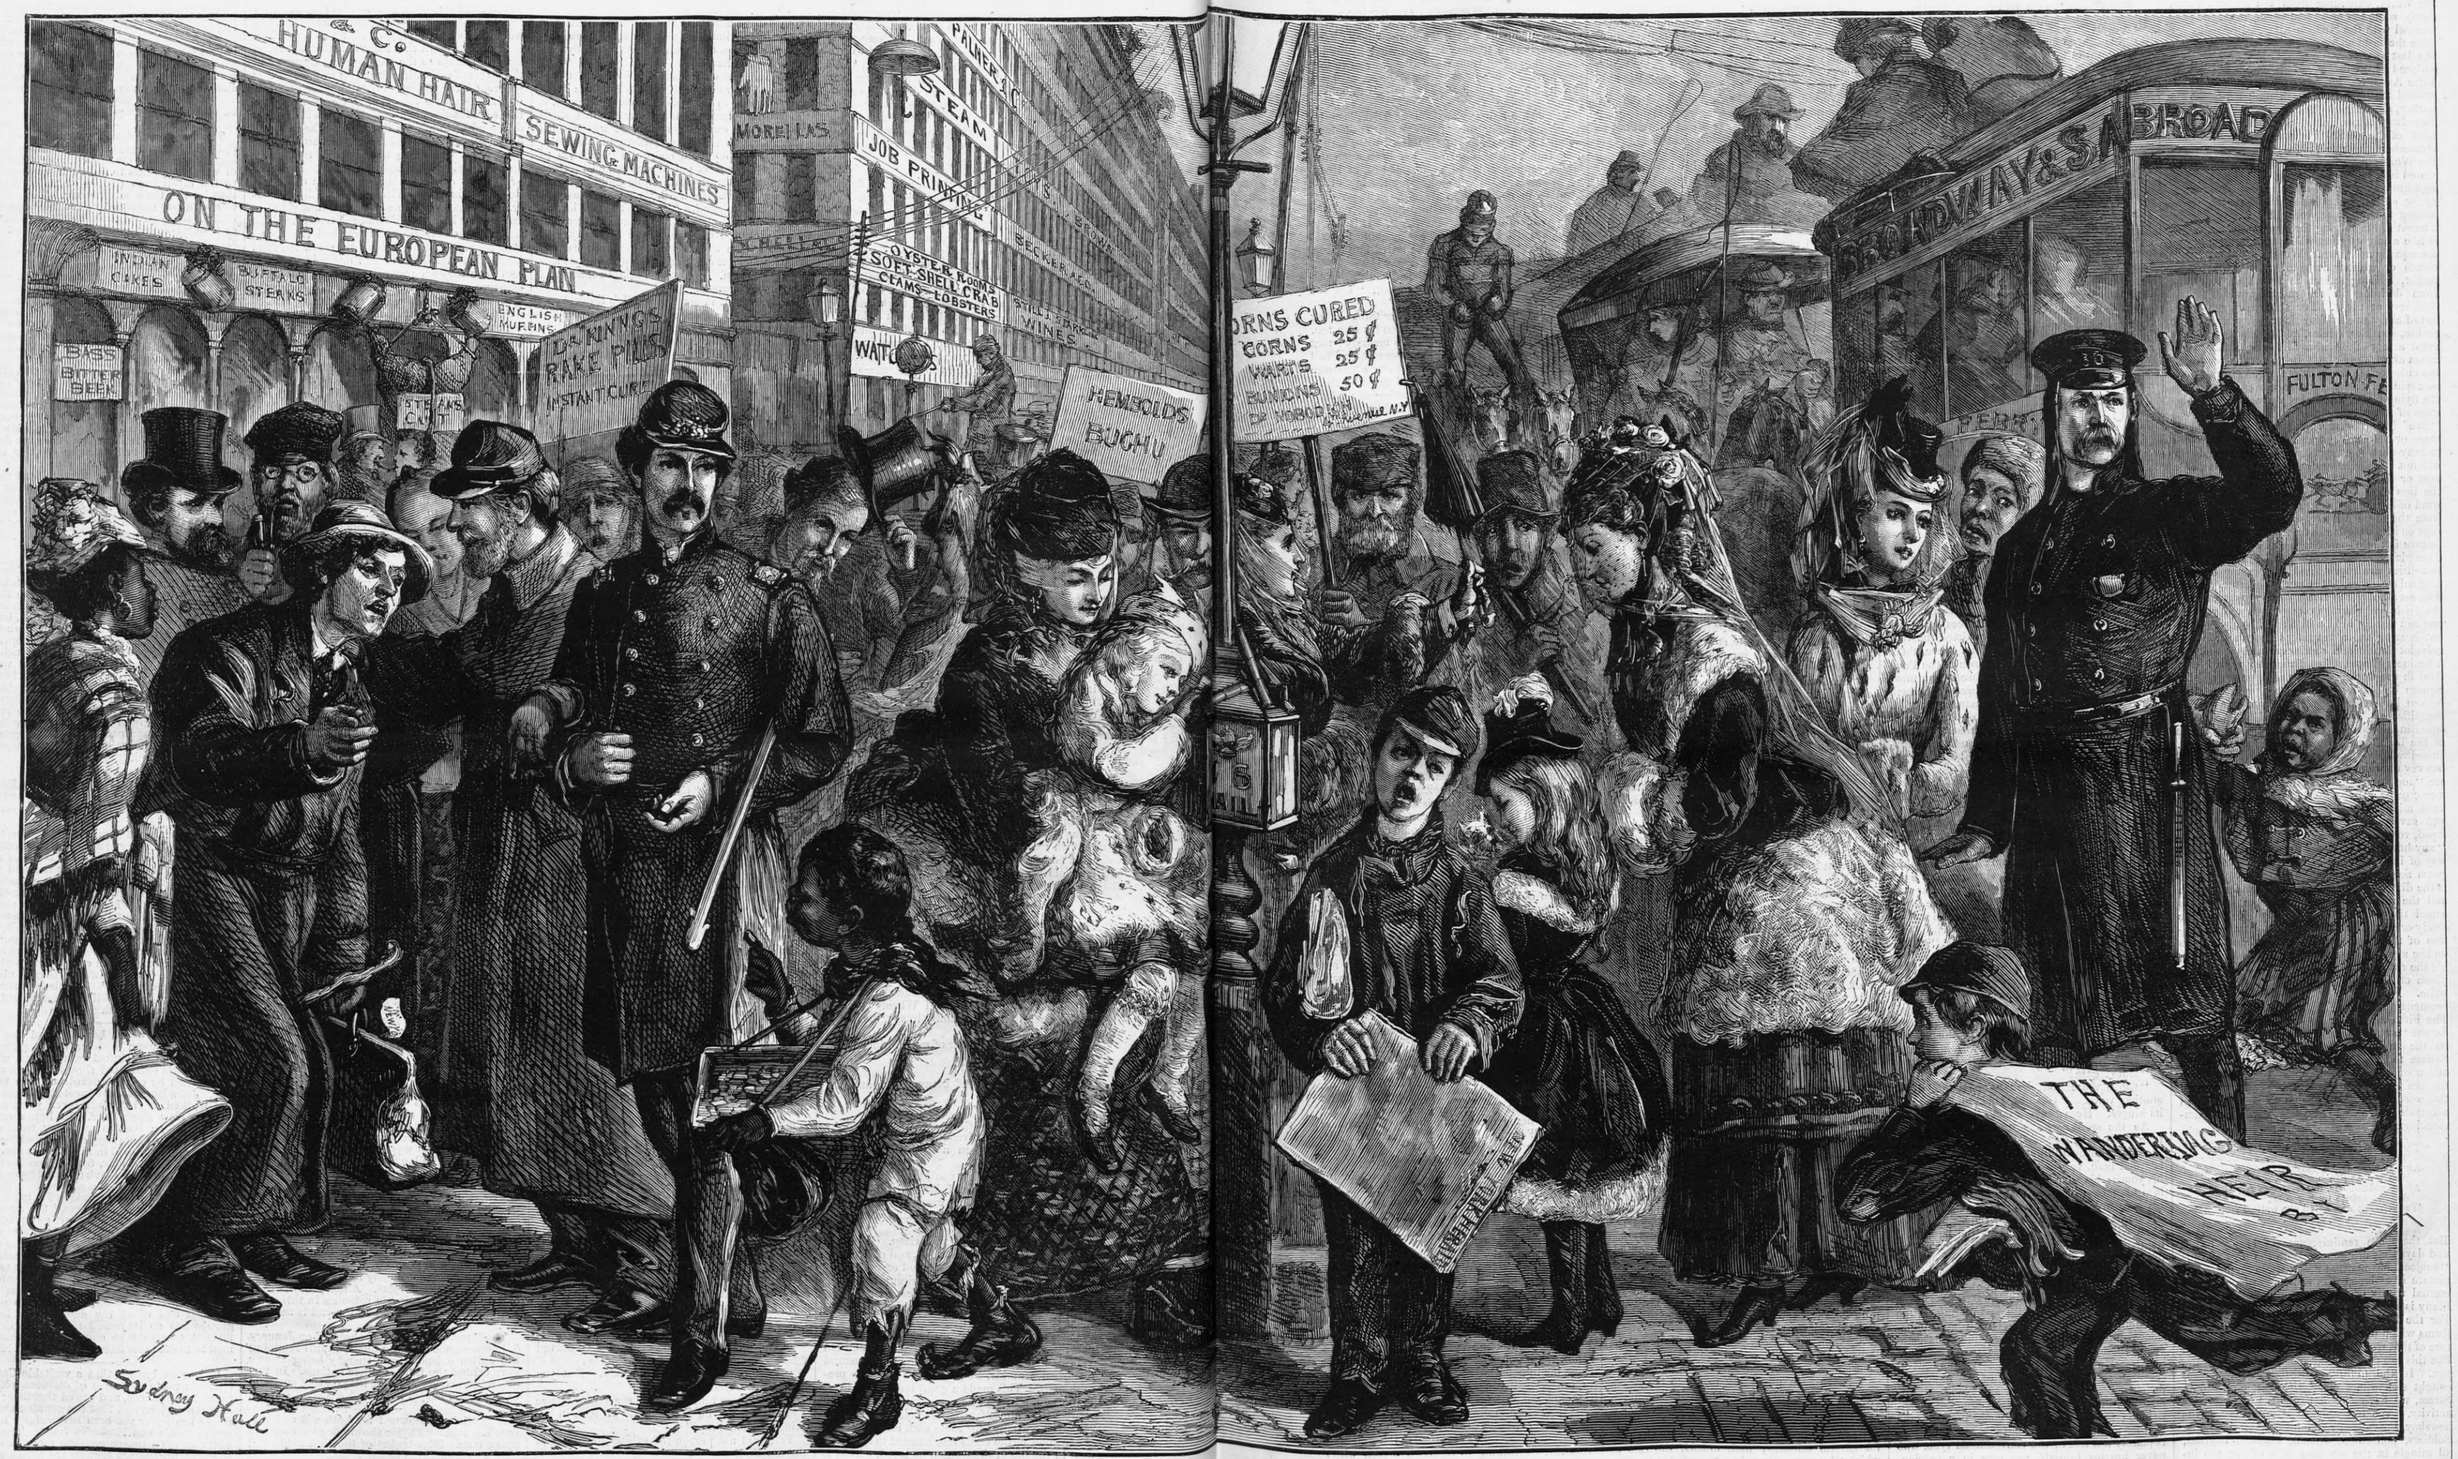
A Western paper thus briefly gives its views of France: "France is a tinder-box, and President Thiers is sitting on the safety-valve."

On the evening of January 1, 1790, Mrs. George Washington held her first levee at the President's residence in this city. The weather was unusually mild and pleasant. The ladies and gentlemen having been introduced, plain refreshments were served, and then familiar and friendly conversation ensued. Mrs. Washington stood by the side of the General in receiving the respects of the visitors. Amidst the social chitchat of the evening the clock struck nine. Mrs. Washington thereupon rose with dignity, and looking around the circle with a complacent smile, observed, "The General always retires at nine, and I usually precede him." At this hint the ladies instantly rose, adjusted their dresses, made their salutations, and retired.

The success which has attended the labors of the well-known modeler whose groups and statuettes are in almost every home where a love of art is cultivated shows what may be accomplished by earnest devotion to an inspired idea. John Rogers was educated as a machinist, and worked at that trade seven years in Manchester, New Hampshire. In hours snatched from sleep he studied modeling, from simple love for art. While employed as assistant civil engineer on a railroad in Missouri he discovered a peculiar kind of clay, from which he made a statuette, which was much admired by an artistic friend who was in his confidence. When city surveyor of Chicago he modeled a group, entitled "The Game of Checkers," the success of which decided him to adopt art as a profession. He came to New York. One of his first groups was "The Slave Auction," in which the artist's feelings for the oppressed were expressed at a time when antislavery sentiments were unpopular. This group was exhibited in the gallery of the New York Art Union, where it was an object of special interest. After years of hard struggle and effort the demand for Rogers's groups has so increased that the artist now finds it necessary to employ more than sixty men to make casts from the original models.

It is well known that a veritable Cashmere shawl is made of scores of different pieces arranged in patterns, and sewed together; and it is also a curious fact that the genuine Cashmere fabric has never yet been successfully imitated out of Persia and Northern India. The desirability of a Cashmere consists more in the elegance of the pattern than in the actual fineness of the fabric; and yet the makers of these shawls regard any innovation in the designs as sacrilege. A few years ago one of our largest dry-goods merchants conceived the idea of importing to this country the pieces of Cashmere in large quantities, and of having them put together in New York in original and artistic patterns. This idea has been successfully carried out, and the result is that New York has the handsomest designed Cashmere shawls in the world.

Hosted by Google



LIFE IN BROADWAY, NEW YORK.—[See Page 74.]

Hosted by Google

BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

See illustration on double page.

AS "the street called Straight" is only a little less crooked than its fellow-sinuosities in the ancient city of Damascus, so the famous Broadway of New York is not much broader than the streets that intersect it or run parallel with it. Its more proper name would be the Longway, as it is doubtless the longest street in the world, extending from the Battery in the south, some ten miles due north, in an irregular parallel with the Hudson River. Broadway was once the fashionable street of New York, but for the last twenty-five years it has been entirely eclipsed by the more pretentious and aristocratic Fifth Avenue. Fifty years ago there clustered around the Battery, a small park bordering the harbor, all the crème de la crème of the city, and Broadway below Fulton Street was the "West End" of the town. The present generation still remembers the fine mansions of the Clausons, the Whitneys, the Wilmerdings, etc., now converted into warehouses, while the scions of those well-known "houses" may now be found occupying still more palatial mansions far away among the upper ten of Fifth Avenue. The current of life surging through Broadway to-day is like a mighty river whose beginning and end are equally unknown. We know not whence it comes or whither it goes. Only the broad, bright, flashing stream is before us, emerging from darkness in the morning, vanishing in darkness at night. For some eighteen hours out of every twenty-four this mighty river of life rushes, sparkles, eddies, and whirls through the great artery of Broadway like the rapids of Niagara above the Falls. In no other street in all the cities of the world does the human tide rush so rapidly. Every body seems eager to catch the flying hours, and to keep pace with the footsteps of the advancing day. The maxim of the "live" New Yorker is, "I must get ahead of time, or time will get ahead of me." To use a railway phrase, every business man is afraid he will not "make his connections." The loss of a post or the loss of an "appointment" may be the loss of his fortune. It is this mad whirlwind of human activity that first strikes a visitor from the more leisurely and lazy cities of Europe on his first glimpse of Broadway. The next feature is the cosmopolitan character and kaleidoscopic appearance of the inhabitants. All nationalities are represented, with many of their original costumes. The raw immigrants are seldom seen above the Battery—the great mass of the Irish and Germans only touch and go; but one can hardly walk a block in Broadway without hearing more languages spoken than any polyglot Continental courier can understand. As a business thoroughfare Broadway is without a rival in the world. From the Battery to Union Square both sides of the street present an unbroken line of stores, many of which are truly magnificent. Stewart's dry-goods palace has no equal in Europe or America, either in the size of the building or the variety of its contents. Broadway also has its theatres and its banks, but few churches. Its oyster and music saloons are "too numerous to mention." Into the former crowds are constantly diving from mid-day until midnight to feast on the large, luscious, and savory bivalves—raw, stewed, fried, scalloped, roasted, or, as one famous sign has it, "any how," with the following classic touch by way of invitation to the hurrying crowd: Nunquam non paratus. Another Broadway feature is the difference in its two sides—the fashionable and the unfashionable. These are sometimes called the sunny or the shilling side, and the shady or sixpenny side. It is a striking illustration of the force of fashion that the shop rents on the sunny side of Broadway are almost double the rents on the shady side. Of the feminine phase of Broadway one can hardly venture to write. Fashionable ladies are now seldom seen promenading below Tenth Street for pleasure. The Fifth Avenue has become the show parade for the "swells" of both sexes. Formerly it was on the sunny side of Broadway from Union Square to Canal Street that one met on a fine afternoon all that was beau and belle in upper-tendom. It was the poet Willis who invented this word, and who wrote that touching poem on a certain Broadway beauty, fatal as fair, commencing:

"The shadows lay along Broadway—
'Twas near the twilight tide—
And slowly there a lady fair
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walked she, but viewlessly
Walked spirits by her side;
'Twixt Want and Scorn she walked forlorn," etc., etc., etc.

But these are reminiscences of beauty bright and days that are gone. Both the poet and his "subject" have passed away, while the beautiful picture lives laden with sad suggestions of that eternal trinity of Love, Sin, and Sorrow whose litany is written in the wreck of human hearts. For the Broadway of to-day look at the varied forms which our artist has crowded into his picture of that wonderful river of life. For a sketch like this the pencil is far more graphic than the pen. In the multitude of figures introduced, caught somewhere about the corner of Fulton Street, we have a vivid panorama of Broadway activity. We can almost hear the cry of the newsboy, the rush of feet, and the roar of wheels. Soldiers, policemen, women, beggars, negroes, all mingle in the whirling rush of life, too intense to last, too much in haste not to stumble often. Since the late "unpleasantness" with the South the soldier maimed in the war has become a prominent feature of the street. Some years before the war a certain Yankee, on visiting Europe, remarked that in almost every city he met a great many men with one leg, one arm, and lots of medals, adding that he would "a darned sight rather live in a country where every body had two legs, two arms, and nary medal." Sensible Yankee, that. Nevertheless, these relics of the war are becoming rarer, and will soon be viewed with as much curiosity as the veterans of 1812.

A POSSIBILITY.

The Thought of a Mourning Mother.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

My little baby is buried to-day;
Gone—down in the depths of the church-yard clay,
Up in the sky so dim and gray.
Who will take care of my little baby?

Who will kiss her?—her waxen feet,
That have never walked, and her small hands sweet,
Where I left a white lily, as was meet—
Who, who will kiss my little baby?

Who will teach her?—her wings to fly,
Her tiny limbs their new work to ply,
Her soft, dumb lips to sing gloriously—
Oh, who will teach my little baby?

I have a mother, who long ago died;
We speak of her now with our tears all dried;
She may know my pretty one, come to her side,
And be glad to see my little baby.

Christ, born of a woman, hear, oh, hear!
Thine angels are far off—she seems near.
Give Thou my child to my mother dear,
And I'll weep no more for my little baby.

Surely in heaven, Thy saints so blest
Keep a mother's heart in a mother's breast.
Give her my lamb, and I shall rest
If my mother takes care of my little baby.

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER I.

PURSUED.

IT was a boisterous winter's night; and although the long straight road which I have in my mind (for to the first scene of this strange story my own eyes were witness) was many a mile distant from the coast, you might have thought, from the roaring of the trees that lined one side of it for miles, that it skirted the very shore. Now and then, for a brief space, there was a lull, but only that the Prince of the Powers of the Air might collect his forces for a more strenuous effort, as though to sweep the earth of all that cumbered it which man had made. The young moon had hidden herself, as though in terror, and it was but seldom that the clouds permitted a single star to peer through their hurrying ranks as they fled like a beaten army across the sky.

A white toll-house and a white gate that stretched across the road could, however, be just made out, gleaming through the stormful gloom; but even these, from their color, looked weird and ghost-like, and by no means relieved the loneliness and desolation of the scene. Opposite the toll-house was an inn; but being built of darker material, it was not visible: not a light shone from its many windows, for the hour was three o'clock, and all its inmates, save one, were abed and slept—rocked to slumber by the storm. Suddenly, after an outburst of elemental violence that outdid all that had preceded it, and which was dying away like the passionate cry of some disappointed beast of prey, there was heard a human voice: "Gate! gate!" It must have proceeded from powerful lungs indeed, since it was repeated before the galloping of horse's hoofs and the noise of wheels could be heard, which proclaimed the approach of the vehicle which carried him who uttered this impetuous summons.

"Gate! gate!"

"Curse the fellow, he's asleep!" exclaimed another voice. "Get out, Dick, and lift it off its hinges. Here; take a lamp."

As the speaker leans hurriedly forward to take one of the dog-cart lamps from its place, the light is thrown full upon him. A tall, black-bearded man, very handsome, though long past his youth; his stooping position brings the blood into his face a little, else it would be very pale; his eyes are fiery and blood-shot. You would say he was a drunkard but for the steadiness of hand with which he disengages the lamp, and hands it to his fellow, notwithstanding the fury of the wind, which is once more up and roaring, and the impatient pawing of the mare he holds in his iron gripe. She is bay, but, flecked with her own foam, she looks in the darkness black and white. His lower lip is bleeding, bitten through, perhaps, in his irritation and impatience; and on his shirt-front, among its coral studs, there is a red spot which is not coral, but blood. He is in evening dress, and notwithstanding the wild inclemency of the night, has no great-coat or wrapper of any kind. By his face and dress, you would take him for a gentleman; no one with brains could possibly take him for a vulgar person; but if a gentleman, he is plainly not one of the conventional type, who never hurries himself, nor gets in a passion. His eyes are flaming with rage; and he pours upon the turnpike gate anathemas so choice, and yet various, that it seems quite a pity to waste them on an inanimate object. If the turnpike man would but put his head out of window! But that neglectful official, who has a son at sea, is dreaming of a great tempest in the tropics, which Jack described to him in his last letter (six months old); and though he dimly hears that familiar cry of "Gate! gate!" confuses it with the captain's orders, howled through the speaking-trumpet.

"Quiet, quiet! you devil!"—this to the mare; and the tall man (you can now see he is very tall) stands up in the dog-cart, and peers back upon the road he has come, and listens: nothing is to be seen but a wall of darkness, and nothing to be heard but the roaring wind. Somewhat appeased, as it seems, by this negative result, he then addresses his companion (to whose tardiness in opening the gate he has never once alluded, notwithstanding his impatience with the obstacle itself): "Shall I come and help you, Dick, or shall I break this scoundrel's windows with my whip-handle?"

"No, no, Masther Frank," returned the other, straining and striving at the hinges; "I'll have it up in a minute. It is just as well not to be seen by more people than we can help. One—two: there it is, off at last."

He crossed the road with his burden, to let the vehicle pass through, and then placed the gate half open, and fastened it in that position with a huge stone.

"There, now: they'll think the way is clear," observed he, grimly; "and if it's wheels that is afther us, I pity the next comer."

"They'll ride, Dick; you may take your oath of that."

"I suppose they will," growled the other as he climbed into his seat. "If I'd 'a given it a thought, I'd 'a hamstrung the horses."

The speaker of this truculent speech was a short, broad-shouldered man, of rough, though by no means ruffianly, exterior. A cloth cap partly concealed his features, but what could be seen of them was rather attractive than otherwise, unless, indeed, you happened to be very anti-Milesian, for they were of that careless Irish type which seems to presage little of evil beyond dirt and drunkenness, and to promise faithfulness and endless fun. He wore a long frieze overcoat that reached to his gaiters, and though apparently of the same age as his companion, his appearance had nothing else in common with him. Their mutual relation in life would, in fact, at once have been taken for that of servant and master, except for the unusual warmth of manner that distinguished both, whenever they addressed one another. Dick sat on the hind seat, in order, doubtless, to watch the road along which their pursuers were expected, but always sideways, so that he could talk, as it were, into the other's ear—a nearness of communication, indeed, which the raging of the gale demanded.

"You'll be gettin' cold, Masther Frank," observed he, presently, the strong Irish accent in which he spoke now intensified by affectionate emotion. "Just put this about you."

"No wraps for me, Dick, to-night; I feel, even as it is, as though my very neck-tie choked me. Besides, that's your own coat, my good fellow;" and he put aside the frieze that his companion offered him with a steady but gentle hand.

"Sure and why wouldn't it be?" urged the other. "Ain't I used to cold and such-like? Haven't I been reared up hard from the cradle?—not like you, Masther Frank, though we fed at the same mother's breast."

"We did so, Dick; but that's no reason why you should literally give me the coat off your back; though I well know you would do more than that to serve me any day."

"Yes, a deal more, in troth!"

"And yet, why should you, Dick? That sometimes puzzles me; for really I've done little for you."

"Nothin' at all, Sir, bar watchin' me like a mother, for weeks, when nobody else would come nigh me, for fear of catchin' the spots! Nothin' at all, bar seein' me through that bad piece of work at Limerick Sessions, when I'd never have seen ould Ireland again at all, at all, but for you speakin' up for me, before them all, in the court-house. I owe you nothin' but life and liberty, that's true, Sir; and they are things which nobody values!"

"But, my good fellow, I ran no personal risk in either of those things. I had been vaccinated, and was therefore secure from catching the small-pox; and as for speaking up for you in the court-house, why, I was tarred with the same brush myself, and it would have been a mean and cowardly act indeed, had I left you to bear the consequences of my own counsel."

"You're always right, Masther Frank. I dare say, if the thing was properly put, you're more obligated to me nor I am to you. But in the mean time" (and here he changed his bantering tone for one of uncommon earnestness and fervor) "I'm your friend and servant—yes, just that, with the blessin' of God" (he took off his cloth cap, and made the sign of the cross); "drunk or sober, hale or sick, I'm your slave for life. I know it's foolish, Sir" (for he saw the other was about to speak), "but it's the same milk does it. It's stronger, by far, nor the same blood."

A groan burst from the other's lips, and he lashed the mare, who was already going at headlong speed.

"That was a nice thing to say to the young masther, after what has happened," muttered Dick to himself. "Holy Moses, what an omadhawn I am!"

Not a word was exchanged between the pair for several minutes; and, indeed, the rate at which they were going almost precluded it. But presently, as the pace slackened somewhat in consequence of some rising ground, the one who was called Master Frank once more broke silence.

"Dick," said he, "I want you to listen to me with all the sense you have, and as little of the fantastic notions belonging to County Tipperary as possible. You have shown your devotion to my person; and if I were to part with you to-day forever, I should say you were the most faithful friend that ever man had. In accompanying me to Falston, I little thought, of course, that I was causing risk either to myself or you; but, as it has happened, I have done you a most serious injury. Are you aware, Dick, that, in the eye of the law, you have become an accessory after the fact?"

"Bedad, I'm not, Sir; but it's yourself that's always afther tellin' me fine news, and I can easily believe it. It must be a grand thing, sure!"

Richard Murphy's countenance, as it reposed almost upon his companion's shoulder, was so singularly free from expression, that it was impossible to glean from it whether he was in joke or earnest. Frank Kavanagh, however, knew his henchman much too well to be in doubt as to his meaning.

"You are hiding your feelings, Dick," continued he, with irritation, "under a mask of humor, when I wish you, above all things, to be serious and frank. The deed that has been done this night—unpremeditated, undreamed of, as Heaven knows it was—will be held by the law of the land to be no less than Murder. The provocation will never be taken into account, nor the long years of hypocrisy and deceit. If it was to do again, Dick—if I saw his mocking face set close to mine once more, and heard him sneer, 'You bastard—'"

"Did he say that, Masther Frank?" interrupted Dick, with intense excitement. "Oh, the villain!"

"He flouted me; he spoke bitter things of my mother, as though she had not been his own too. And then he attacked our father's memory: that was too much. When I remembered how I had seen Louis fawn and flatter, and strive to cozen the kind old man every way, and saw him then, triumphant in his fraud, and sneering at the folly of his dead benefactor, I took him by the throat, Dick—I—"

"Hush, hush! Put my coat on, Masther Frank; there's a spot on your shirt-front that is not iron-mowld. I saw that from the first, though I didn't like to speak. Hide it, Masther Frank, lest them might see it that has less right than I to know how it got there;" and he wrapped the coat around his stalwart companion, who seemed neither to consent nor to resist, as tenderly as a mother cloaks her babe.

"He brought it on his own head, I tell you," cried the other, fiercely, as though in answer to some reproachful question. "He denied me my rights, my natural rights, and what, but for him, would have been my legal ones. If he had only been fair-spoken, though dishonest—"

"Bah! why trouble yourself," broke in Dick, "with thinkin' about the Thing! It's vain to cry over spilt—"

"He struck me first," continued Master Frank, not heeding the other's interruption; "I feel the blow on my cheek yet. He was a dead man then, and he knew it. I had no idea there was such strength in him, Dick."

"He came of a good stock, you see," observed Murphy, coolly. "The breedin' told at last with him, though it was rather late. Upon my life, Masther Frank, I can't see what you are makin' this bother about, for conscience' sake. He was a bad lot altogether, savin' his brother's presence, and his end is a good riddance to all that's in it. If this had but happened in the ould counthry, the boys would have stuck by you with alibis and every thing necessary, and there would have been no trouble about the matter at all, at all."

"That may be, Dick; but, unhappily, what has been done, has been done here; and at the very best, it is quite certain that I shall never see the boys again. I must put the broad seas between myself and England, if I would save my neck. And that brings me to what I wished to say at first. If the law takes hold of me, and finds you in my company, it will go hard with you also; for it is as like as not that some one down yonder"—he pointed to the road behind them—"may recognize your honest face. As for me, I am a lost man, unless I can leave Europe, and get somewhere out of the reach of what these fools call Justice."

"It's as bad as that, Sir, is it?" answered Murphy. "I'd no idea they'd be so hard upon you. It's the divil gives them the gumption to do it: he knows that if you were with us, the Good Cause at home must triumph, sooner or later; and so, all along of a family squabble, he gets you put out of the way."

"No, Dick, no," replied the other, mournfully; "the Good Cause is dead, at all events for my lifetime. The match was applied too soon, and so, after a brief flicker, the fire went out, and will now be harder to kindle than ever. I told you how it would be when you struck the light; and my advice to you now is to go home as quickly as possible, and lie there quiet, and persuade the boys to do the like. I have plenty of money for you—"

"You're not goin' to bribe me to leave you, Masther Frank?" interrupted the other. "It's hard enough to put it so to me, anyway."

"Bribe you? of course not, you foolish fellow; I do but point out what is the sensible and, I think, the proper course for you to adopt. You leave me in good health, and, so far as funds go, in prosperity; you have nothing, therefore, to reproach yourself with."

"Holy Moses, only hear him talk?" ejaculated Murphy. "It isn't Masther Frank at all that I am listenin' to, but Pat Morris, the Limerick attorney. 'Nothing to reproach myself with!' The boys would not think that when I got back to County Tipperary, I reckon. 'And how did you leave the young masther, whom we all love so?' inquires one. 'Oh, finely,' says I, 'unless they've hanged him. I didn't stay to see it out, but filled my own pockets, and—' As sure as death, Masther Frank, I hear horses' hoofs behind us."

"I know it," answered the other, calmly; "I have heard them for some minutes. There are two men at least, but it is no matter if there were half a dozen. I will not be taken alive."

Hosted by Google

"Divil a fear of you, Masther Frank. It is much more these gentlemen's look-out nor ours. I've got the pistols under the sate here."

"What pistols?"

"Why, your own, of course. A gentleman never moves without his pistols. I packed them up when I heerd tell of you goin' to Falston; 'for,' says I to myself, 'they'll quarrel, will Masther Frank and Louis, to a certainty; and then what a comfort it will be to both to know that every thin' is at hand to settle the business like gentlemen.'"

"Did you think, then, that I should shoot in cold blood at my own brother?"

"I thought that there would be a difficulty of some sort—such as one of you, at laste, wouldn't be willin' the lawyers should meddle with. But since that has been got over in another way, so much the better; the pistols are still to the fore. If these gentlemen only knew what was waitin' for them they wouldn't be in such an infernal hurry. Don't you disturb yourself, Masther Frank. I never was so beautifully fixed for shootin' in my life—it's quite a luxury. But keep the mare well in hand, for she isn't used to standin' fire."

While he was thus speaking Dick stooped beneath the seat, and drawing from their case a couple of pistols, deliberately capped them, and then sat calmly with one in each hand, awaiting events.

"There has enough blood been spilled to-night already," said the other, earnestly, without, however, interfering with these preparations for receiving cavalry; "and I would give much to escape these fellows, even upon their own account. Surely it is about here that the road forks to Ascot. If we could only take that turning, and so double upon them, we should be safe so long as the dark held."

"True; but the dark is so divilish dark I doubt we shall hardly see the turnin'. It must, however, as you say, be somewhere nigh at hand. Keep the mare well in hand, Sir, and I'll douse the glims, so that they may not see we have left the road."

"That's well thought of. But they ride fast, those fellows, and you must be quick about it."

"We have five good minutes, Masther Frank. This tearin' wind is with them, and brings up the sound—"

"Stop! Hi! Stop!"

The cry arose right in front of them; and the flaring lamps, one of which Murphy was in the act to remove, fell full upon a gesticulating figure standing in the midst of the dark road. It was that of a very young man, attired in homely garments, and bearing the homeliest luggage of the wayfarer—a hedge stick across his shoulder, at the end of which depended a small bundle.

"Clear the way!" cried Kavanagh, stung to reckless fury by the imminence of the peril behind him, "or, by Heaven, I'll drive over you."

But the boy, throwing down his bundle, cast himself upon the bridle of the mare, and clung to it fast, though in her fierce career she carried him along with her, and never ceased his cry of "Stop, stop, stop!"

"I'll 'stop' you, young fellow," muttered Murphy, between his teeth, as he clambered back over the dog-cart for a pistol.

"The tree—the fallen tree!" screamed the boy. "Keep to the right, or you are both dead men."

At that piercing cry Kavanagh mechanically pulled his right rein, and the vehicle sprang into the air, once, twice, thrice, and then came to a full stop. To leap out was with the two men the work of an instant.

"Hold the mare, boy. Help me here, Dick, to pull the tree right across—so. I don't hear the horses now—how's that?"

"We must have passed the turnin', and they are stoppin' there in doubt of which road to take."

"Just so. Boy, you have done us a good turn," said Kavanagh, kindly. "Another foot to the left, and we should have gone to the devil; whereas, as it is, we have but got a shaking over the branches. What can we do for you?"

"If you'd give me a lift, Sir, toward town, I'd be very grateful," said the lad. He was a wholesome, blue-eyed young fellow, with a comely face, flushed with his late exertions, and a bright, eager air.

"You shall have it, lad. Go fetch your bundle."

"Nay, Masther Frank," remonstrated Murphy, as the young fellow obeyed, "that is surely most imprudent; and there—see—he has noticed how the tree lies."

The boy, whose attention had been hitherto absorbed in holding the mare, was now, indeed, observing with surprise that that which had been before an obstacle difficult to avoid was now become an effectual barricade. "Begging your pardon, Sir," said he, ingenuously, "I fear you have made things worse for the next comers instead of better."

"What the blazes is that to you, Sir?" cried Murphy, angrily.

"Hush, hush! The lad is an honest lad," said Kavanagh, "and wants to do right to every body. I was like that myself at one time, God help me! Look here, boy. If you were followed by persons who wished to punish you for what they deemed a crime, but of which your conscience held you innocent, would you not do your best to balk them?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir," exclaimed the boy, warmly. "Moreover, that is just what might be happening to myself now."

"What! Have you been transgressing the laws already? Why, this must be a countryman of our own, Dick!"

Dick muttered something which sounded like a compliment to his country at the expense of the new-comer.

"I have broken no laws, Sir," said the boy, steadily; "I have only run away from step-father."

"Very right, very proper," remarked Master Frank, approvingly. "Curiously enough, I also am running away from my step-mother, Mrs. England. By gad! they're coming, Dick!"

"Of course they are. That's what comes of wasting precious moments in chatterin' to every young vagabond one meets with upon the road, and all the time with them gig-lamps turned right round, as much as to say, 'This way; here we are. You've taken the wrong turnin', gentlemen.'"

"They will prove wreckers' lights, to lure them to destruction, Dick. Douse them; douse them."

In one instant all was dark; not a trace of trunk or branch could now be seen of the huge tree that lay before them like a rampart. On the still furious wind was borne once more the sound of galloping hoofs and clanging steel.

"It is the patrol from the Heath," murmured the lad, in awe-stricken tones; "I hear the clanging of their scabbards."

The wind was behind their pursuers: the hill sloped from them toward the tree; they were riding at headlong speed.

"Oh, Sir! they will be killed. As you would have—"

A heavy hand was laid on the lad's mouth, a grasp of iron upon his wrist. He could neither speak nor move, but only listen. Nearer and nearer came the beat of feet, the clang of steel; the very champing of the bits could be heard; then crash, crash came horse and man, with one terrible cry, that seemed to pierce the wintry sky!

CHAPTER II.

TAKING SERVICE.

THERE was silence for a minute, save for the roaring of the gale, then the boy felt himself lifted into the cart, and away sped the bay mare on her road again, as though she knew that Death and Ruin were at her heels.

"They're grueled, Masther Frank," was the first observation that was made in allusion to this catastrophe; "them patrols is too heavy for steeple-chasin'."

"I didn't cut down the tree. Their blood be on their own heads," muttered Kavanagh, gloomily. Then with eagerness, "Where's the boy? I hope he got no hurt?"

"He's here, Sir, safe enough. He wanted a lift, so I thought it just as well to give it to him for a mile or two, so as to keep him out of harm's way. If I hadn't gagged the young divil he'd 'a given warnin' to them fellows."

"Put him here in front."

"No, no, Masther Frank; you've got your hands full with the mare; and he wriggles like an eel."

"Put him here, I say!" repeated Kavanagh, imperiously.

The next instant the lad was swung on to the front seat, with as much ease as though he had been a carpet-bag. And yet he was a fine grown young fellow of seventeen or eighteen, with plenty of strength and vigor of his own, as had been already evidenced by his stopping the mare.

"What is your name, lad?" asked Kavanagh, kindly.

A stifled cough was the only reply.

"You're throttling the boy, Murphy. Did not I tell you to leave him to me?"

"I only put my finger in his neckhankecher to keep him stiddy," exclaimed Murphy, apologetically.

"Then take it out. He has done us a great benefit at the risk of his own life and limb, and I will not have him ill used. Do you hear me, Murphy?"

It was clear that Murphy had no good-will toward the boy, not to say that, on the whole, he would far rather have strangled him than not; yet his tone was that of absolute submission as he answered, "I hear you, Masther Frank, and it is done."

"My name is Robert Chesney," said the lad, articulating with some difficulty.

"Take a drop of the crater, Robert Chesney," observed Dick, at the same time handing him a whisky flask. "There's nothin' like it for a sore throat. Never mind av it does burn you a bit: can't you see the masther wants you to talk to him?"

He spoke with entire simplicity; it seemed to him that what Master Frank desired must needs be acceded to by every body, at no matter what personal inconvenience.

"If it does not hurt you, let me hear your story, boy," said Kavanagh. "How came you to be out on the high-road in such a mad night as this?"

"There are worse things than the winter winds, Sir," said the lad, bitterly, "such as cruelty, poverty, and hopelessness, and it was they that drove me out into it to-night. I am seventeen, and too old to be beaten any longer by a drunken step-father."

"Unless, by bearing that, you could help your mother," said Kavanagh. There was a tenderness in his voice which contrasted very strangely with the passion he had so lately exhibited, and with the vindictive coolness which had permitted the patrol to rush upon their doom.

"My mother died last year, Sir. There is nobody at home to care for me. Step-father is one of the keepers in the Queen's forest; he never liked me; but of late he has taken to cudgel me, and I could not stand that, even for mother's sake."

"I don't blame you for that, Robert. On the contrary, I should have cudgeled him."

"So I did, Sir," replied the other, naïvely.

"We had a rough-and-tumble out in the oak copse, and I got the worst of it. I knew it was not so bad as I should get if I waited till to-morrow morning; and so, when he went out to watch, I packed up the few things I could call my own, and ran away. I had scarce got into the road yonder, when the big tree fell, within a yard of me; and seeing your lamps, I ran on ahead to warn you. That's my story."

"All of it?" asked Kavanagh, casting a searching glance at his companion. The rage of the tempest had spent itself, and the stars had begun to peep through the thinning clouds.

"Yes, all of it; so far, at least" (and here, notwithstanding his bold speech, the young fellow blushed like a girl), "as it concerns you to know."

"'Tis best you keep a civil tongue in your head," exclaimed Murphy, scandalized at this audacity, "when the masther does you the honor to ask a question."

"The lad is quite right," said Master Frank, good-naturedly. "We don't boast of our sweethearts at seventeen, do we, Robert? So the wide world is before you, where to choose, and only one friend in it?"

"Nay, Sir; I have not one friend."

"You are wrong there, my lad; for no man ever did a good turn to Frank Kavanagh, let me tell you, without making a friend."

An ejaculation of horror burst from Murphy's lips. "There, now, we must kill him, Masther Frank, since you've told him who ye are. Did ever man hear of such madness!" and once more the lad felt his wrist compressed as in a vise. while an arm like a cable stole round his waist.

"Leave the boy, I say!" cried Kavanagh, furiously, and for the first time speaking with an Irish accent. "Thousand thunders! have I to speak three times? If you do him hurt, by Heaven, you shall answer to me for it!"

"But he'll tell, Masther Frank."

"Let him tell. It would be only *un*doing what he has done for us, if he did. Yes, boy, I am Frank Kavanagh—a name that you will soon hear identified with that of a murderer. Do I look like that? I don't deny I did the deed; but yet, I am no murderer. Will you believe them, or me?"

The young fellow looked up in his companion's handsome face, and answered, ingenuously, "I shall believe you, Mr. Kavanagh; still, I don't think you did right to leave the tree in the road."

"It was a question of those men's lives or mine, Robert Chesney. A hunted man can not afford to be squeamish. Now, look you, I like your face, and would gladly do you a good turn, in guerdon for that you have done to me. What shall it be? You need not fear to ask, boy."

"I was thinking, could you take me into your service, Sir?" answered the lad, hesitatingly.

"You would find it a very poor one, my good lad," said Kavanagh, sadly. "I am a desperate man in desperate case. In a few days, if I escape the vengeance of the law, I shall be leaving England for a distant land, and perhaps forever."

"So be it, Sir. Let me go with you. I have heard my step-father say that England is not the place for a moneyless lad."

"But what had you in your mind to do before we met?"

"I was bound for London, to try my fortune."

"Thinking the streets were paved with gold, like Whittington, I suppose! Have you got a cat in your bundle?"

"He'll have one in his bag—more's the pity," muttered Murphy, despondently; "and, mark my word, he'll let it out."

"Well, you can hardly be said to change your plan for a worse, since you have none at all, lad," continued Kavanagh. "What can you do with your hands or your head?"

"I can carpenter fairly, Sir; and was pretty good at school, in the way of accounts."

"Do you hear that, Dick?" said Kavanagh, merrily. "The lad knows accounts—a thing which you and I could never compass. Suppose we make him our treasurer and controller?"

This change in Kavanagh's mood from grave to gay, from passionate self-justification to almost levity, was by no means shared by his henchman. "You will do as you like, Masther Frank," said he, moodily. "I only trust the young man will be grateful and faithful."

"As for faithful, I say nothing of that," said Chesney, modestly, "though I will endeavor to prove myself so, if I am taken into your service, Sir; but grateful for your good intentions and your kindness, believe me, I already am."

"That's well said, lad," said Kavanagh, heartily. "And you have 'no objection to travel,' as the advertisements say?" In the midst of a light laugh he stopped, and added, gravely, "I am not offering you a place in the household of a man of fortune, nor is it a tour of pleasure that we are about to take. We shall have a hard life, and an up-hill fight of it; but if you are content to link your lot with that of an outcast, remember— Well, there's my hand upon it."

"Thank you, Sir, thank you," cried the boy, with grateful emotion. "I trust you will never have cause to repent the bargain."

"Amen! but I doubt it," muttered Murphy; then, in louder tones, "Ye'll surely make him take the oath, Masther Frank?"

"Not I," laughed Kavanagh. "Why, my poor Dick, do you suppose that the words which bind the boys of County Tipperary will have the same effect on a lad from the royal forest of Windsor? He would not even know their meaning. He has an honest face, and I will take his bare word. Come, you must shake hands with our new friend, as I have done, and then we three will meet the world together."

It was curious, and even comical, to mark the conflict of feeling in Mr. Richard Murphy's face as he received this order. Obedience to Kavanagh was a paramount obligation with him, but he could not conceal the intense disfavor with which he regarded this command.

"It's downright mad you are, Masther Frank. Here's my hand, if you must have it so, but—"

"Give it to him, man, not to me," cried the other, more merrily than ever. "You're as bad to drive as a pig to market. Hold it tight, Dick, and now say these words after me;" and he spoke a long sentence in what Chesney rightly judged to be his native Irish. Slowly and reluctantly, with a face such as a child wears who is taking physic, with no jam to follow, Murphy repeated this Abracadabra.

"Now, Dick is your friend as well as mine, lad," said Kavanagh, assuringly.

Murphy muttered something in his own tongue which sounded like a menace.

"Don't be rude, Dick; you should never speak the classical languages before those who have not enjoyed the opportunities of making them their own. What he said, my lad, was, as it is only fair to tell you, that he reserved to himself the right of putting you to death, in case you should not keep silence as respects what has happened to-night. Now all is settled satisfactorily; and see, there are the lights of London; our journey is coming to an end."

Robert Chesney looked with eagerness in the direction thus indicated, and

"Along the dusky highway, near and nearer drawn,
Saw in heaven the light of London flaring like a dreary dawn;
And his spirit leaped within him to be gone before him then,
Underneath the light he looked at, in among the throngs of men."

If he had not met with his present fellow-traveler his excitement would probably have been far greater; for now (although he knew them not) his future plans were to be laid out for him by another; he was not about to plunge alone into that unknown and fathomless human sea. His crude purpose had been to plod through street after street until he should see a carpenter's shop, and there to stop and ask for employment—a dream which was not destined to become reality. Neither foot-sore nor friendless, but seated at his ease, and without any immediate cares, he was at liberty to look about him in the great city.

The dawn was breaking as they entered it, and already the streams of traffic were setting in toward the markets. With the country produce carried in the carts and wagons he was familiar enough, but that only made the amount of it more striking; what was all that he had ever seen in Windsor Street upon a market-day to be compared with it? Then what a noise and tumult arose as the day wore on! How different from the stillness of the forest glades to which he had been accustomed, where the scamper of a rabbit through the fern would startle the ear. The streets at first were shuttered, and the gas feebly strove in them against the daylight; then shops began to open, and the thoroughfares to fill; and then again they entered a region where sleep reigned once more. Here the houses were far larger and handsomer; there were statues, too, and gardens; and many a question rose to Chesney's lips, which, however, did not pass them. His companion's face had become pale and moody; the excitement of the night was probably wearing off, and its consequences making themselves clear to him; at all events, he was disinclined for converse. With scarce the interchange of a word the three passed through the suburbs, the West End, and part of the City. At last Kavanagh pulled up the mare in an unfrequented street.

"She has done a good night's work," said he; then added to himself, with a groan, "I wish to Heaven I could say as much for her driver. See that they treat her well at the inn, Dick; you will not have much longer to perform that service, since there will be no room for her on shipboard, even if we are so lucky as to get there. Here; take the reins."

"But where are you goin' to, Masther Frank?" asked Dick, aghast.

"To the old place in Herne Street. It will be much better for both of us that we should not be seen together for the present. Take the boy with you to Mulvaney's, and let him want for nothing; and stay there till you hear from me. —Chesney, if, in a moment of rash impulse, I have done wrong in coupling your fate with my own desperate fortunes, there is still time for you to cry off the bargain. You hold to it? Good! Then I conclude you will need no warning, but be in readiness to start with us at a moment's notice—it may be to-morrow night, though Heaven alone knows whither. In the mean time, here are the means to make merry with."

The next instant the speaker had pressed two pieces of money into the lad's hand, and was retracing with rapid strides the way that he had come. At the end of the street was a warehouse, with a crane projecting from its third floor, from which depended a thick rope; under this he stopped, looked up at it significantly, and placed his hands around his neck, then walked on at increased speed.

"Blessed St. Francis, did you see that?" inquired Murphy, in an awe-stricken whisper.

"I did," said Chesney; "but I don't think Mr. Kavanagh knew that he was doing it."

"Not know what he was doin'? D'ye mean to say that the young masther has got the faver in his brain again, that— But maybe he was only jokin'. He was always full of jokes, and fun, and thricks in the ould days—in the ould, ould days."

There was a tremor in Murphy's voice that instantly drew his companion's eyes upon him. "Don't laugh at me, lad," exclaimed he, fiercely, as he shook the bridle, and the gallant mare made shift to trot once more; "don't jeer me, lest I strike you dead." The tears were coursing down Dick's weather-beaten cheeks like rain.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Hosted by Google

MY LAST NIGHT IN THE OLD COUNTRY.

LONG before the huge hotel and Charing Cross terminus of the Southeastern Railway had risen so imposingly at the western end of the Strand an event happened on that site which, strange and terrible as it was, would have become a stirring episode at the Central Criminal Court had not the imperative and immediate departure from England of a most important witness delayed the solution of the mystery until the occurrence had all but passed out of men's minds, and the death of an obscure waif of humanity had removed all possibility of the retributive justice of the law. There are several reasons why a too minute description of the exact spot should not be given; but my purpose will be served if the nature and character of the locality be indicated.

I lodged in rooms which looked out upon the river in the front, and at the back upon a small sort of yard belonging to a public-house, called the Fife and Drum, situated in an adjoining alley. This hostelry was not frequented by a very reputable class, but by a mixture of the low water-side population, itinerant musicians, jugglers, Punch-and-Judy men, and mountebanks of every description. Brawls and rows sometimes went on there far into the night, and rendered the establishment by no means a pleasant neighbor. But it suited me to live where I did, and as it was not to be for long, I bore the occasional inconvenience rather than undergo the trouble of moving. Moreover, the situation was pleasant, and at times very quiet; for there was no thoroughfare for vehicles, of course, as the street, at the river end of which stood the house in which I lodged, terminated by an iron railing. The hay and coal barges, during high tides, were raised sometimes within a few feet of the pavement here, when the small mud-larks of urchins about the place would establish a highway through the bars, backward and forward between street and boats. There was a short-cut to my door from the adjoining street by the alley where the public-house was, and in making it I often had an opportunity of studying the manners and customs in private life of the bespangled and flesh-tighted tumblers, who, in those days more frequently than now, I believe, were to be seen in the London streets mounting on each other's shoulders, or clambering up a pole supported by one of their fellows. Not a very profitable study perhaps this, but it was one that fascinated me, and set me thinking; and I could not fail at last to become acquainted, by sight, with many of the leading stars of this nomadic profession, who all, in turn, seemed for a time to be my neighbors.

The public performances, too, of these artistes, and, indeed, all street entertainments, had ever been a source of attraction to me. My boyish tastes had lingered on into manhood, and I therefore submitted to my proximity to the home of these gentry with rather a better grace, perhaps, than most people would have done. As the days lengthened, and windows were kept more constantly open, scraps of their conversation would reach me when in my bedroom, which, being at the back, as I have said, looked out upon the rear of the Fife and Drum. The talk was never very edifying, perhaps, to ears polite, but it was always amusing to me, and gave me an insight into the character of a curious although a rather worthless set of people. By the time, however, that midsummer had arrived my stay in England was drawing to a close. In a week more I should be on my way to the Antipodes, and my mind began now to be far too full of the future to give much heed to the petty squabbles of the poor miserable street tumblers. Nearly all my connections and friends had emigrated and done well, so that, at the time I was leaving, scarcely any one in London knew me except my landlady, and when I too should have departed, her notion of my whereabouts would have been of the vaguest. Australia was my future address, and as I expected no letters which would require forwarding, I gave her no nearer clew to my future home.

The last night in the old country has arrived. All my preparations are complete. I have to leave very early in the morning to catch a train for Liverpool. Good-by has been said, bills have been paid, and with a small hand-bag, the only portion of my impedimenta not sent forward, I am to quit the house before any one is astir. It is intensely hot. The days are at their longest, and dawn is almost breaking ere I rise from the open window of my sitting-room, where I have been gazing out upon the silvery river, wondering what fortunes will betide before I again look upon the huge city.

I have been speculating, now that it has come to the last hours, upon the policy of the step that I am taking. Animated by conflicting emotions, hoping yet doubting, full of sanguine anticipations mingled with painful regrets, I have worked myself into any thing but a sleepful state. Pipe after pipe has been smoked, and the approaching daylight alone has recalled me to a sense of the necessity of going to bed at all. I do so at last, however; but as my noisy neighbors, for a wonder, are perfectly quiet, and as the heat is overwhelming, I leave the window looking out upon the little yard wide open, despite its proximity to the foot of my bed. I hear St. Paul's and the myriad other clocks one after another, and some all together, strike three, and it is broad daylight ere I drop off to sleep. I begin to dream, immediately awake with a start, close my eyes, drop off, dream again—this time a very bad dream. I fancy I am at sea; I climb high into the rigging of the ship, crawl out to the end of one of the yards, try to stand up, lose my footing, and fall quite gently and pleasantly, and, as it seems, into the sea. I begin to swim, but can make no progress; my arms and legs move with difficulty. I catch hold of a rope which has been thrown to me; another instant, and I shall be safe!—when, ugh! horrible sensation! The cold nose of a shark touches my foot, and in a paroxysm of anguish I wake myself with the effort to draw my leg up out of the way.

Yes, I awake. At first with a sense of relief that it is only a dream, but a strange sort of cold shiver passes through me. The next moment a renewed and unaccountable anxiety is upon me again. Am I ill? I sit upright, trying to collect my scared wits, believing almost that I am still dreaming, when a large, dark, ominous-looking mark upon the white counterpane at the foot of the bed, which was not there before, catches my eye. I spring out to examine it, and to my horror find that it is the imprint, in blood and dirt, of a human hand.

A closer observation verifies this fact, and on the window-sill I see even a more glaring token of the same kind. Shuddering, I throw the sash wider open and look out. The drain-pipe which runs from the roof down the side of the house, close to my window, bears, as high up as where I stand, scratches and stains, showing to my now preternaturally sharpened senses, that some one has recently gained an entrance by that way to my room. I gaze around it. The bright morning sun is now streaming straight in, and, as I instinctively stoop to look under the bed, I see evidence of foot-prints as far as the door leading on to the staircase. I try to open it, but it is locked on the outside. Bewildered, but not losing my presence of mind, I go through by the folding-doors into my sitting-room overlooking the river. The tide is high, and as I crane forward out of the window to catch a glimpse of the end of the street, a man is in the act of dropping from the iron railings there on to one of the barges. I can not see his face, for in another second he is running and jumping with the agility of a cat from one boat to another, and is suddenly lost to my view behind a huge load of hay. My first impulse is to shout, but I am quickly checked by the striking of the clocks, and as I count five, remember that I should be in another ten minutes on my way to the railway station.

The truth flashes across me that if I give an alarm I shall be detained, lose my train and ship, and all the prospects upon which I have built so many earnest hopes will be lost to me forever. I dare not hesitate. Whatever dark mystery I have thus unwittingly come upon must be cleared up by others, not by me!

Dressing in the direst haste, I pass out on to the landing by my front-room door, which is not locked.

"Who's that?" cries the well-known voice of my landlady from above.

"Only I. Good-by, Mrs. Hart, once more."

"Dear me! I thought I heard you go a quarter of an hour ago; somebody went down stairs!"

"It was not I; but I am late as it is. Good-by again and again!"

I can not even give her a hint of what has happened, for doing so will cause fatal delay to me. I must risk all consequences to save my train, so I pass down the stairs and out by the street-door, which I see has been left ajar. Not a soul is stirring; I take a farewell look at the old quarters, and rush away through the bright but silent streets to Euston Square, carrying with me unavoidably a load of dreadful and hideous suspicions, which years and years do not efface.

* * * * * *

Prosperity in the New World followed my every act, and by the time the sequel to "my last night in the old country" was worked out, I was living in very different quarters from those by the river-side at Hungerford Market. Again, I need not particularize too minutely the locality. To intimate that I was well established in Melbourne as a merchant, and that I walked to and fro between my suburban villa and my office daily, is sufficient. The old inclination to stop and watch all shows and street performances was as strong as ever, and, laudably or not, I never failed, as the profession expressed it, to "encourage talent;" but, at that time, there were but few of the "tumbling" fraternity to be seen in our thoroughfares. They are the result of an overgrown population, and do not flourish much in the open air in a country where men of thews and sinews are often almost worth their weight in gold. The theatres and circus monopolized such acrobatic and dramatic genius as the soil produced; but occasionally the mild performances of dancing on stilts, or the exhibiting an accomplished monkey, might be met with.

When, therefore, one afternoon as I was returning home I saw a large crowd assembled, and a huge pole rising from its midst, it is not to be supposed I passed by on the other side. A good deal of shouting and drum-beating was going on, and as I came up I discovered that the pole was balanced and supported in the socket of a leathern belt, passed round the loins of a sturdy acrobat. Another of the tribe, slighter in figure, was preparing to ascend this sort of mast, and did so, even as I watched. It was the old trick which I had witnessed many a time before in England; but I do not remember that it was then dignified, as it has since been, by the high-sounding name of "la perche." When the mountebank had reached the top of the pole, he exhibited several feats of daring and strength, such as we are all familiar with; but at last he assumed, when at the utmost height, the attitude of a man swimming, supporting himself with one arm and hand, while his stomach rested on the top of the pole, so that, in fact, man and pole together formed the letter T. Then he began to strike out with his legs and disengaged arm, whilst the balancer of the pole beneath walked round and round in a small circle. It was not badly done; the balance and position were steadily maintained for several minutes. The drums and Pandean pipes were played with an air of noisy triumph, and a murmur of applause arose from the crowd, as they stood gaping at the perilous performance with upturned faces.

Presently the acrobat was just above where I was standing. I had at that moment removed my hat the easier to watch him. He appeared to observe my action, and our eyes met. Then, suddenly, he gave a sort of jerk, seemed to lose his balance, tried to recover himself, failed, and in a second fell straight down upon the ground head-foremost, the pole at the same time also escaping from the grip of the holder!

A terrific shout and a scene of wild excitement followed. The pole had in its descent felled several of the spectators like oxen, and they and the unhappy tumbler, who was apparently dead, were eventually carried off to the hospital.

Two days later I was seated by the side of one of the small beds in the accident ward. On it lay the crushed and maimed but yet living acrobat. I had called the next morning to inquire after the sufferers, and had been told that this man was hopelessly injured in the spine, but that he might live for some weeks, though he could never move his legs again. His intellect, it was thought, had also sustained a shock; for when he recovered his speech he appeared to wander, and had talked about having been frightened; frightened by a ghost that he had seen in the crowd, which had taken its hat off to him, and had threatened him with its eyes. My action immediately recurred to me. I explained to the surgeon that I had taken my hat off the moment before the poor fellow fell, and I asked to be allowed to speak with him; for a strange, anomalous feeling took possession of me. I felt at once compassion for and a curious repugnance toward him. I was both irresistibly attracted to and repelled from that bedside.

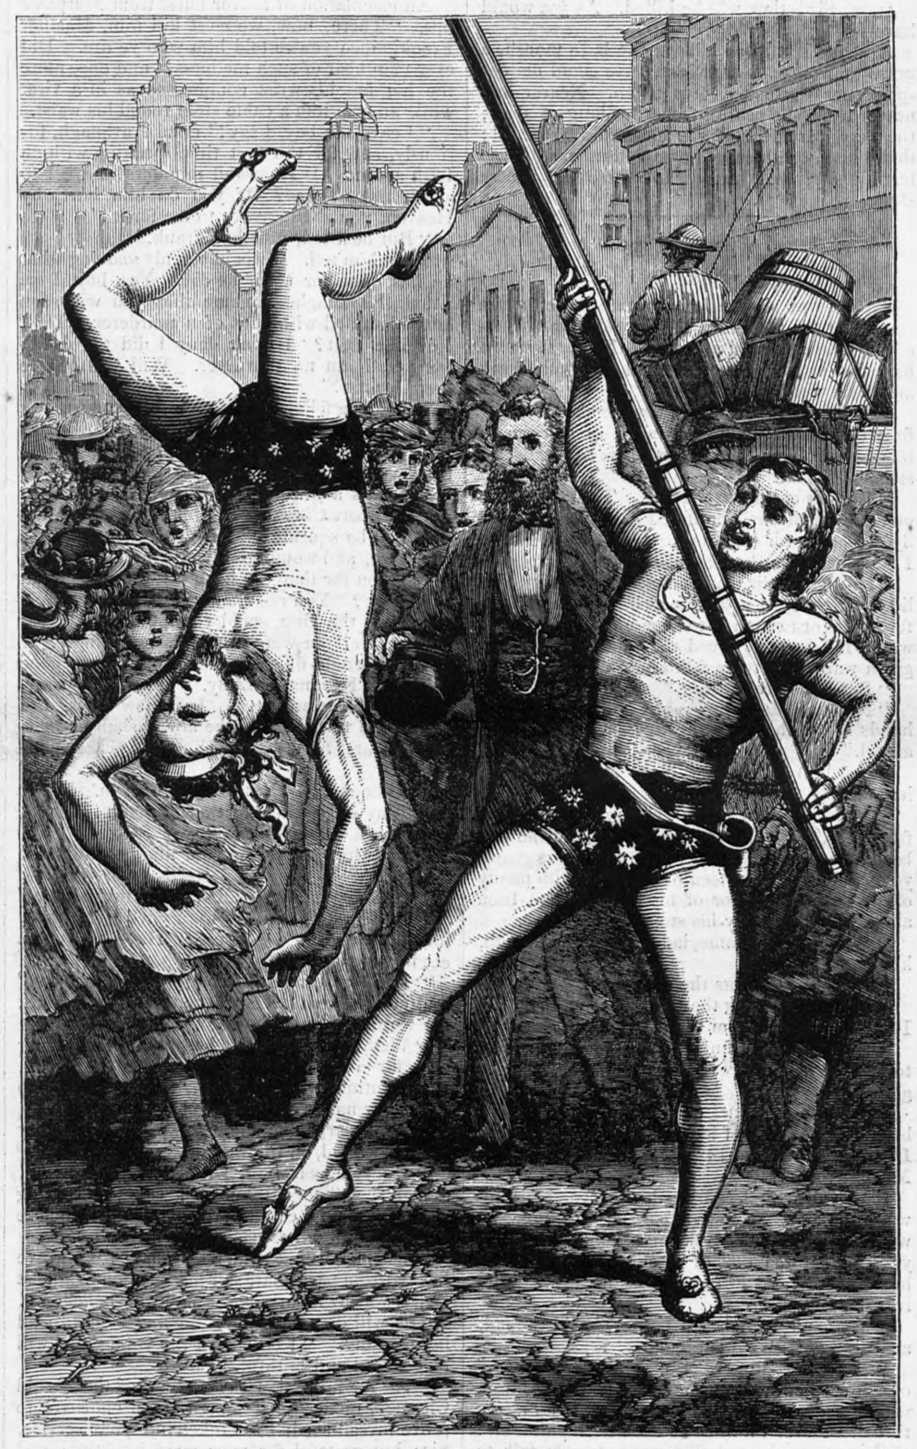
"I fear from what they tell me," I began, "that I was in some way the cause of your losing your balance; that by taking my hat off I drew your attention from—"

"No, no!" hastily interrupted the sufferer, turning his haggard pale face and wild eyes upon me. "No, it wasn't that. Many people take their hats off, but they haven't all got faces like yours! They haven't all been sent straight across here from England; they don't all bring back times as I'd wish to forget! They don't all seem to say to me as yours did, 'I know what you've done! I saw you just after you did it! I'll have you hanged for it!' They don't all say this to me;" and he looked anxiously round to see whether the nurse and surgeon were within hearing. Finding that they were not, and that indeed we were quite by ourselves, and closely shut in by a screen in a corner of the ward, he resumed, in a whisper:

"I heard 'em say as I couldn't live long, and if so be that's true, I'd like to tell you what has lain heavy on my mind these six years past. If you be him as I suspect you are, you must have been sent on purpose to make me say what I believe no other man could ever have made me say. Your face made me miss my tip, and now I seems to feel as if it was a kind o' justice brought upon me; and if I am to die, you can't do me more harm than you have, and my mind will be the easier."

He stretched out his thin but muscular hand and laid it on my arm, which was now trembling with a renewal of the old, horrible, long-haunting suspicion.

"This is not the first time as I've had my hand on you," continued the man; "and it's well for you you didn't move then as much as you are doin' now, or there might have been two to answer for instead of one! Put your ear down close, quite close. I climbed into your bedroom just after I'd done it—just after I'd paid off old scores with Tom Smart; just after I'd murdered him down there in the tap-room of the Fife and Drum, there by Hungerford Market. I and he were sleeping there; he'd got more than a month's swag lying under his head, for he was a regular miser, and he had never so much as given me a tenth part of our earnings for weeks. I grew savage as I saw it there right within my reach, and he seemingly so dead asleep; but I never meant to murder him! No, I never did; only when he caught hold of me just as I'd got it, and saw what my game was, he'd have strangled me like a dog if I hadn't caught up a knife that was lying on the table, and driven it straight into his throat. He dropped like a stone, and the blood spurted all over my hands! Then, when I saw what I'd done, I knew I must get off somehow. So I crept out into the yard, and I was like a rat in a pit; but I saw a window open just above, and I swarmed up the drain-pipe, feeling sure I could get out there somehow. As I was a stepping into the room I stumbled, and, trying to save myself, put my hand right on your foot before I knew it. Then, for the first time, I saw there was some one in the bed. The sun shone straight on your face, or else I shouldn't have remembered it so well; and I thought you was a-going to wake, for you drew your legs up quite quick, but you never opened your eyes; and maybe it's well for you you didn't; so I got away, and locked your door to make all safe. I crept down stairs, and out into the street, and nipped over on to



"HE FELL STRAIGHT DOWN UPON THE GROUND HEAD-FOREMOST."

Hosted by Google

the barges, and was never taken! No, nor so much as ever suspected! I found my way to the docks, managed to get aboard a ship that was dropping down the river that day, bound for this country, and hid myself (a stow-away they called me) till we got to sea. They threatened to throw me overboard, but I showed them I was strong and active; they let me help them, and we was all good friends at parting. Hereabouts I've been ever since, in the old line, but I've had a hard time of it in my mind, and have been well-nigh mad more than once, it preyed so on me. I've been going to give myself up over and over again, for I could not bear my thoughts; and I see poor old Tom night after night sometimes, just as I left him. Then all of a sudden comes your face, for I knew it again, ah! just at once! I turned reg'lar giddy, I lost my hold, and remember nothing more till I found myself in this bed."

Here, then, was that horrible imprint on the foot of my bed accounted for. The cold nose of the shark and the whole surroundings of that terrible dream had been suggested to my sleeping brain by the single and instantaneous touch of the murderer's hand on my foot. The incidents, which appeared to cover a considerable time, had been engendered in and flashed through my mind with that lightning-like rapidity which constitutes the greatest wonder of dream-land. It was well, indeed, for me that I did not immediately awake, as I supposed I had done, or, with such a desperate character as this man then was standing over me, that night might not only have been "my last in the old country," but my last on earth. The miserable but repentant criminal died suddenly the day after he had made his confession to me. I told the authorities all about it, and they duly communicated with those of Scotland Yard. The mysterious murder naturally had created much excitement in the neighborhood at the time of my departure, but the obscurity of the wretched victim, and the absence of any clew to the perpetrator of the deed, beyond the marks on the drain-pipe and in my room, showing the manner of his escape, together with the impossibility of finding me, allowed it to merge into that oblivion which has encompassed so many other crimes of the same kind.

My presence, however, on the scene of the acrobat's final performance had acted as a Nemesis, and had avenged the murder perhaps more terribly than if it had been dealt with by the hands of the law.

THE YOUNG RAVENS AT THEIR CHRISTMAS DINNER.

THE YOUNG RAVENS AT THEIR CHRISTMAS DINNER.

THIS interesting scene was repeated again and again on Christmas in the many charitable institutions of the land which make it a point to celebrate each holiday by gathering in the hungry young ravens that flutter, houseless and homeless, about the purlieus of the great cities, and giving them a bountiful meal. It is a happy sign of the times that this kind of practical philanthropy is daily becoming more common. Associations for befriending these poor waifs of humanity, by withdrawing them from vicious surroundings and training them for an honest life, are fast springing up, to supplement the schools which supply food for the mind but not the body. And, recognizing that famished children can not study, numerous ragged schools wisely provide a daily meal of plain, substantial food, which keeps many a child from beggary or theft. A table surrounded by these hungry children, enjoying their frugal fare with the keen appetite of childhood, is a sight that may well gladden the heart of a philanthropist, and stimulate him to further exertions in their behalf.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. N. C.—At a dinner-party the lady who is the greatest stranger should be taken down by the host, and the gentleman who is the greatest stranger should conduct the hostess. The host precedes the guests to the dining-room, and the hostess brings up the rear. The host and hostess sit opposite at each end of the table, and the daughters and sons are mingled among the guests. It is difficult to lay down rules about paying your way in cars and to places of entertainment when you are a guest, beyond the general ones of never incurring a pecuniary obligation when you can help it, and always tendering your part of the expense when you can do so without marked discourtesy.

MRS. J. M. M.—Dark blue English water-proof is most in favor at present. You will find all about such cloaks in Bazar No. 11, Vol. V. A cut paper pattern will be furnished you from this office for 25 cents. For a girl's water-proof cloak send for cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. IV.

G. G.—We do not care to commend one cook-book above another.

K. F. D.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 49, Vol. V., for hints about coiffures.

MRS. R. C. W.—The double-breasted redingote pattern is an excellent design for a water-proof dress, or for a suit of any cloth.

MRS. H. V. D.—Boys wear drawers that are not visible with the kilt skirts.

SPARKLING RUBIES.—Your black sample is faille of very fair quality. Make it by the Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. The chêné silk sample will make you a gay Dolly Varden for small parties. A suit of gray-green cashmere, made by the Double-breasted Redingote Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., would be very stylish.

LEE.—We can not send you the pattern mentioned.

H. G.—Professor Morse invented the electric telegraph.

MARY J. L.—Crochet is pronounced as if spelled croshay, with the accent on the last syllable.—Supplements are not sold separately, but cost, with the Bazar to which they belong, 10 cents. They are given usually once in a fortnight.

MRS. A. M.—A vest-polonaise of gray and black would be very becoming to you.

X. Y. Z.—Your flounces must entirely conceal the green stripes in the silk.

A FRIEND.—Make your girl's blue poplin by pattern of Girl's Princesse Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. V. For your black dress use Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.

ETTA.—The tight sleeves are very close fitting, yet large enough at the wrist to thrust the hand through. In Paris they are made in the way you suggest, and a linen cuff is worn on the outside of the sleeve.

E. W.—Cut a velvet cloak by the Dolman pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. V.

J. F. K.—Trim your gray serge with wide black Hercules braid and a box-pleated flounce of the material.

STEPHANIE.—The Double-breasted Redingote Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., is the simple stylish model you need for your navy blue satine.

MRS. G. V. T.—Bazar No. 24, Vol. I., will tell you how to do point Russe embroidery.

L. E. W.—For your pretty blue armure you should use the Double-breasted Redingote Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. A double-breasted jacket would be suitable for an extra wrap. See pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. V.

MRS. J. C. G.—We do not make purchases for our readers.

ROMAN GOLD.

IT was somewhere about the year 1845 or 1846, we believe, that the accomplished, brilliant, and now venerable Duke of Sermoneta, the head of the Roman nobility, and an artist by nature, directed the attention of a protégé of his, the jeweler Castellani, to the process of deepening the color and softening the metallic lustre of gold, which has since made the tour of the world. The special merit of the "Roman gold," as it is now called, though it was originally called "Etruscan," and, more correctly, consists in this: that by lowering the lustre and heightening the tone of the metal, the artist who works in it is enabled to make the setting of his jewels, his paintings, his Cameos, enhance and not detract from any brilliancy of color or of light which the jewels, the paintings, or the Cameos may possess. Illustrations of this in abundance may be seen at the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John St. (up stairs). But not of this only. The "Roman gold" has an intrinsic beauty of its own, which, when skillfully and tastefully turned to advantage, enables the jeweler to supply his customers with ornaments at once unique, striking, "distinguished," as the French say, and comparatively inexpensive. It gives, in short, to gold thus treated, all the value of a pigment; and no gem could have a more positive warmth and glow of its own than have the bracelets, the antique ear-rings, the Etruscan rings and brooches which are manufactured now out of this noble and beautiful composition.—[Com.]

THE NEW WILSON UNDER-FEED SEWING-MACHINE is a perfect lock-stitch machine making a seam alike on both sides, and is adapted to every grade and variety of famiy sewing. It does to perfection embroidery, hemming, cording, braiding, fine and coarse sewing of all kinds, with less machinery and complications than any other machine in use, and is sold at two-thirds the price of all other first-class machines. Be sure to call and see it. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

UNION ADAMS & CO.

Have manufactured, expressly for the present

HOLIDAY SEASON,

House Coats,
Smoking Jackets,
Robes de Chambre,
Railway Rugs,
Traveling Shawls,

Silk and Merino

UNDERWEAR.

Gloves in every style,

Including

Buttons, Buttoners, and Cleaners.
REVILLON AND CHASSEUR BRACES.
Silk and Cashmere Mufflers,
Linen & Silk Handkerchiefs,
With Initials and Monograms.
London and Paris
Sleeve-Buttons, Studs, and Charms.
Umbrellas and Canes,
&c., &c., &c.,
ELEGANT for PRESENTS.

637 BROADWAY.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by MRS. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

MATHUSHEK PIANO M'F'G CO. New Haven, Conn. The most durable pianos. The most powerful tone. The finest touch & action. The purchasers delighted. The pamphlets sent free.

MOTHERS,

SAVE YOUR INFANTS.

NESTLÉ'S LACTEOUS FARINA,
THE MOTHER'S MILK SUBSTITUTE.
Extensively used and recommended by the most eminent physicians. Sold by Druggists and Grocers.
H. ASTIÉ & CO., Sole Agents,
15 South William Street, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

REAL LACES

Embroideries, Cloak Velvets, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION, 287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,
IN BLACK STRIPES,
AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,
Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

THE heart dropsy cure by Dr. N. S. Dodge of Albany, N.Y., was discov'd by blood experiments.—New Era.

GREAT BARGAINS BY

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

4-4 SHIRTING LINENS.
PILLOW AND SHEETING LINENS.
DAMASK TABLE-CLOTHS AND NAPKINS.
DAMASK BY THE YARD.
HUCKABUCK IN TOWELS AND BY THE YARD.
GUIPURE-LACE BORDERED TOWELS AND SPREADS.
FANCY DAMASK AND COLORED BORDERED TOWELS.

WHITE GOODS

Of every description. BLANKETS, FLANNELS, &c., together with a general assortment of

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS,

AT EXTREMELY ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

NEW EMBROIDERIES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., are offering an extra fine line of HAMBURG EDGINGS and INSERTINGS greatly below market prices.
500 dozen FRENCH EMBROIDERED double Linen CHEMISE BANDS, from 65c. each and upward. Much below the cost of importation.
PERCALE AND LINEN EMBROIDERED NIGHT-DRESS SETS AND YOKES.
An entirely new style of SHIRTING EMBROIDERY.
SWISS AND LAWN PLAITED AND RUFFLED TRIMMINGS, IN ALL THE NEW STYLES.
Together with a fine assortment of other articles, appertaining to this department, at equally low prices.
Also, a fine line of NEW PIQUES, just received.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "A"

FOR $150.

3 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 00	$6 00
2 Linen "	@	4 75	14 25
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			12 00
3 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 00	6 00
3 " Linen "	@	2 75	8 25
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00	9 00
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@	3 50	10 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	5 00	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@	7 00	21 00
1 Flannel Skirt			5 00
1 " " Embroidered			8 25
2 Corset Covers	@	3 25	6 50
2 Dressing Sacques	@	3 50	7 00
1 Robe de Chambre			14 50
			$150 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "B" for $200, and "C" for $250, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

A. T. STEWART & CO.,

Having completed their Semi-annual Inventory, are offering

A complete assortment of 28-inch RICH COLORED SATINS, All boiled silk,	$3 00 per yard.	Reduced from $6 50.
A large collection of RICH MOIRE FRANÇAIS 28 inches wide, Superb shades and quality,	$2 50 per yard.	Reduced from $4 50.
24-inch COLORED GROS DE LONDRES,	$2 00 per yard.	Reduced from $2 75.
FANCY SILKS,	$1 00 per yard.	Reduced from $1 50.
1000 pieces RICH DRESS SILKS For Promenade and Evening wear, In five different grades.	At an average reduction of $1 00 per yard.

The celebrated
A. T. STEWART & CO.'S FAMILY BLACK SILKS
Reduced TWENTY per cent.

Mail orders for samples and prices promptly filled.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.
Something entirely New.
ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.
Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.
For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.
Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.
WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.
A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer, No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.
Instruction Package sent by mail on receipt of $1 00. Send for Circular. Stamping done for the trade.
Madame L. CENDRIER, 84 Bleecker St., N. Y.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

FASHIONS FOR WINTER.

1170—GODIVA. This Polonaise is one of our latest Paris novelties. It contains many new and very valuable features. Without looping, it can be worn as a demi-train; tight-fitting basquine, or looped (as shown in cut), it is a most elegant Polonaise. The ornamental back piece passes over the shoulders, and forms a neat bustle-cape in front, and is adjustable; may be worn or not as fancy dictates, thus constituting two styles of different appearance. The back piece is sometimes made of velvet or satin, and richly trimmed, and worn with a basque; and is also worn with a house dress. Besides its beautiful variations, it is well adapted to any material. Take six yards of twenty-fourinch goods. Price of pattern, with cloth model, ONE DOLLAR. See GRAND PREMIUM below.

1133—DOLMA CLOAK. Needs no lengthy description to win universal favor. For comfort, neatness, and elegance combined, its equal is not to be found among the novelties of this winter's productions. Takes two and a half yards double-fold ladies' cloth. Pattern, with cloth model, 50 cents.

361—LA PIERRE OVERSKIRT. The most attractive and elegant style for making, in all kinds of material. And though for a season Polonaise have reigned, yet a spirit of change is quite evident, and we gladly accept this beautiful novelty which will gratify the wishes of thousands who desired to see overskirts again in high favor. Takes three yards thirty-inch goods. Pattern, with cloth model, 50 cents.

We give a CLOTH MODEL with each pattern, which SHOWS every seam, pleat, gather, loop, &c., how to put the garment together by the pattern, and how it will look when completed. By the use of our Cloth Models any person who can sew can FINISH the most difficult garment as easily as the plainest. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

Either of the above Patterns mailed on receipt of marked price.

GRAND PREMIUM OFFER.

By inclosing One Dollar and Two Stamps to A. BURDETTE SMITH, BEFORE the 21ST day of FEBRUARY NEXT, you will be made a Yearly Subscriber to SMITH'S ILLUSTRATED PATTERN BAZAAR; and the Patterns, with their Cloth Models complete, of the Three above Engravings will be mailed to you Free, as Premium.

TO PLEASE EVERY BODY.—If the above patterns are NOT just such as you now need, and you prefer to select your Premium from our Magazine, we will send you a receipt for your Subscription, and also a COUPON CHECK, which will entitle you to select patterns to the value of ONE DOLLAR FREE at any time, as your premium! Note! When you send your subscription, be sure to tell us which you prefer, "Grand Premium Offer," or "To Please Every Body."

BE IN TIME! Send in your subscriptions BEFORE the 21st day of FEBRUARY, 1873.

Send Stamp for Winter Catalogue of Styles. You will never have a better opportunity!

It is the Finest, Best, and Cheapest Fashion Magazine in the world. It has no rival! It is the New York City Ladies' Authority in all matters of Fashion. It is the Only Publication that Imports Styles and furnishes Paper Patterns of them. It gives thorough instruction in Dressmaking, Foreign News, Hints, Criticisms, Stories, &c., &c. Be in Time. Address, very plainly, A. BURDETTE SMITH, Smith's Pattern Bazaar, Post-Office Box 5055. 914 Broadway, N. Y.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;
SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,
All at the Lowest Prices.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS, 719 Broadway, N. Y.

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?
WHY BE ANNOYED WITH
CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?
WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL
REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,
AT SO SMALL A COST,
BY USING WRIGHT'S
"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."
Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.
DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only $3 00
24 " " " " " 3 50
26 " " " " " 4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

HOLIDAYS

are drawing near! and those intending useful GIFTS for ANY of their FRIENDS, whether Men, Women, Boys or Girls, could not bestow one that would be BETTER appreciated than a

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESS

Send for a descriptive, illustrated Pamphlet, containing the various Agents' addresses, to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 349—351 Federal & 152 Kneeland-st's, Boston.

No suspension of Business on account of Fire!

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER ..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK ..... " 11
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old) ..... " 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old) ..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old) ..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old) .... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old) ..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt) .. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER ..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP ..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt ..... " 49
WATTEAU MANTLE, with 3-Pleat Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt .. " 50

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) .... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER ..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers) ..... " 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron Over-skirt with Watteau Postilion, and Walking Skirt ..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt ..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER .. " 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt ..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old) ..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt ..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT ..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown) ..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old) ..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt ..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT .. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT ..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT ..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT .... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old) ..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt ..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT ..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT ..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt ..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT ..... " 51

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, January 11, 1873.

Harper & Brothers' List of New Books.

1.

NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Seventh Thousand just ready. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

This book stands, as few books do, one of the best tests for general interest. Open it where you will, and you find yourself at once attracted both by the subject and the style. Mr. Nordhoff knows how to use his eyes, and he knows how to use his pen. We advise every one who wants to find out a great deal about that beautiful State, put in a compact, readable, and workmanlike form, and to enjoy at the same time one of the pleasantest books of the season, to read Mr. Nordhoff's "California."—N. Y. Times.

2.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

In "Middlemarch, a Study of Provincial Life," we have a most vivid and delightful illustration of the qualities which have given George Eliot the position of the first of living novelists. The personages of the story are at once typical and individual. They are representative of English provincial life, and are at the same time as racy as though they had been selected at hap-hazard from the population, on account of their peculiarities and oddities. Without any apparent effort on the part of the author, they are made to live in our imaginations as real beings, independent of each other, and yet aiding to develop each other. * * * It is our deliberate judgment that it indicates a genius superior to that of any other novelist now living.—Boston Globe.

The author exhibits an insight into the secret heart of our nature scarcely less subtle and manifold than that of Shakespeare. * * * Such a rare cabinet of character sketches is perhaps not to be found in any other single production of English literature.—N. Y. Tribune.

3.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERICK HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

The book is interesting from beginning to end. No page but has its item of curious information or its piquant anecdote.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

4.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

5.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS.

6.

TALMAGE'S SERMONS. Sermons by the Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Second Series. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

Uniform with the First Series of Talmage's Sermons.

7.

SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.

FORCE. Being Vol. IV. of Science for the Young, by JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HEAT.—LIGHT.—WATER AND LAND.—FORCE. 4 vols. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

I.

MIDDLEMARCH. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "Romola," &c. 2vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

II.

THE WANDERING HEIR. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

III.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

IV.

DR. WAINWRIGHT'S PATIENT. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Wrecked in Port," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

V.

A WOMAN'S VENGEANCE. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Cecil's Tryst," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VI.

FOR THE KING. An Historical Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "For Lack of Gold," "Robin Gray," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VII.

HARPER'S HOUSEHOLD DICKENS. With Original English and American Illustrations by Thomas Nast, W. L. Sheppard, Thomas Worth, C. S. Reinhart, J. Barnard, J. Mahoney, and others.

The following volumes are now ready:

OLIVER TWIST. With 28 Illustrations by J. Mahoney. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. With 59 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. With 54 Illustrations by Thomas Worth. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

DAVID COPPERFIELD. With Portrait of Author and 61 Illustrations by J. Barnard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

DOMBEY AND SON. With 52 Illustrations by W. L. Sheppard. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

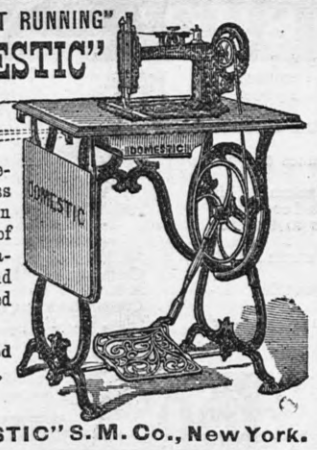
Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

No Lady should be without
Mrs. GILMAN'S PATENT WORK HOLDER,
For sale by A. T. STEWART & CO., New York; and at the works of the manufacturers,
BILLINGS & SPENCER CO., Lawrence St., Hartford, Conn.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING"
"DOMESTIC"



presents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.

Agents wanted everywhere.

Address
"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

A GREAT OFFER! JANUARY!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, New York, will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of first-class makers, including Waters', at extremely low prices for cash, during this MONTH. New 7-octave first-class PIANOS, modern improvements, for* $275 cash. The CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices low for cash. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS
ARE PURE AND THEIR
PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING.

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY, 1873.

CONTENTS:

LIFE IN THE DIAMOND FIELDS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—En Route to the Mines.—In the Diamond Fields.—Jumping a Claim.—"Some of you had better Stand on the Table."—Our down East Native.—"Throw it up, old Fellow!"—A close Fit.—The Promenade.—"I am no Nigger!"—A Whirlwind.—Drowned out.—The Market-Master.—Map of Diamond Fields.—Working in the Excavations.

ROBIN'S-EGG BLUE.

THE MONT-DE-PIÉTÉ.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Initial.—The Exit.—"Salle d'Engagements."—The Cashier.—The Council.—The Auction-Room.—Victim of the Mont-de-Piét—Tail-Piece.

SONG OF THE PALM.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mary Queen of Scots.—Lord Darnley.—Holyrood Palace.—Lochleven Castle.—Tomb of Queen Mary.—Queen Elizabeth.

THE LIFE OF AN EASTERN WOMAN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Interior of a Harem.—The Story-Teller in the Harem.—Reception at a Soirée—At the Table.

SUB ROSA.

THE GREAT FAIRS AND MARKETS OF EUROPE. By R. H. HORNE.

DELUSIONS OF MEDICINE. By Prof. HENRY DRAPER, M.D.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Gnomes terrifying a Miner.—St. Dunstan's Negotiation with the Devil.—Protection from Witches by a Horseshoe.—Domination of the Zodiac over Man.—Whether the Sick would live or dye, and what his Disease was.—Cannel-Coal making Revelations to Dr. Dee.—Gettatura.—Dutch Alchemist and his starving Wife.—Alchemical Symbols.

OLD KENSINGTON. By Miss THACKERAY.
CHAPTER XXXVII. In an empty Room.
CHAPTER XXXVIII. The Pollard-Trees.
CHAPTER XXXIX. Thus far the Miles are measured from thy Friend.
CHAPTER XL. Under the Clock-Tower.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Head-Piece.—"Her Heart began to beat so that she could scarcely speak."

A WAIF AND ESTRAY.

A SIMPLETON.—A STORY OF THE DAY. By CHARLES READE.

RECOLLECTIONS OF AN OLD STAGER.

ONE QUIET EPISODE.

MY QUEEN.—A SONNET. By JOHN G. SAXE.

THE NEW MAGDALEN. By WILKIE COLLINS.
CHAPTER XVI. They meet again.
CHAPTER XVII. The Guardian Angel.
CHAPTER XVIII. The Search in the Grounds.
CHAPTER XIX. The Evil Genius.

MY LADY'S CHOICE.

VALENTINES—FOR MY TWO.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

This Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains, in addition to the three Serials contributed by CHARLES READE, WILKIE COLLINS, and Miss THACKERAY, numerous papers of unusual interest, most of which are illustrated; two Short Stories of great power; Poems by JOHN G. SAXE, ROSE TERRY, etc.; and five Editorial Departments covering every matter of current interest in Art, Society, History, Literature, and Anecdote.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"IT STILL WAVES!" The old, original, and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," THE FAMILY PAPER of America. It is a paper for THE MILLION. Old and young, rich and poor, saint or sinner, will find it JUST the paper for them. It is a large, illustrated, 40 column paper; 8 pages, Ledger size, and filled to overflowing with charming Stories, Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor and Fun. It makes a specialty of "showing up" and exposing Dupes, Rascals, Swindlers, Quacks and Humbugs. IT EXPOSES RASCALITY, and saves money to its readers. Every subscriber, for only $1.00, will receive the BANNER a whole year; and also, FREE OF GRATIS, and prepaid, a superb FRANC CHROMO, a "BOUQUET OF AUTUMN LEAVES." Satisfaction guaranteed, or money refunded. $1.00 a year; 3 months, 15 Cents. Sample SENT FREE. NOW IS THE TIME. AGENTS WANTED. Now! NOW! NOW! don't put it off. Address, STAR SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

THE ART OF ADORNING THE BODY to Captivate, reduced to Rules and Maxims, 50 cents. Address Box 338, San Francisco, Cal.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 632 B'dway, N.Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

BIG MONEY! AGENTS' outfit free. J. R. HOLCOMB, Mallet Creek, O.

Read! Read! The Young Mothers' Book. Ask news ag'ts.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

OUGHT you to reckon a dog's worth by what he will fetch, or by what he will bring?

ZODIACAL ZANYISMS.

Aries, the Ram, harbors need for defense.
Taurus, John Bull, will be put to expense.
Gemini, Twins, make their sires doubly blest.
Cancer, the Crab, is oft hard to digest.
Leo, the Lion, as Byron hath said,
Will turn tail and flee before Virgo, the Maid.
Libra, the Balance, at banks is the thing.
Scorpio, the Scorpion, can both pinch and sting.
Capricornus, the Billy-Goat, Taffy knows well.
Sagittarius, the Archer, they called William Tell.
Aquarius, the Waterman, carries two pails.
Pisces, the Fishes, have true fins and scales,
My dears, but you always confound them with whales.

An expensive wife makes a pensive husband.

IMPOLITE THING.—To grumble at the high price of coals when you are dining with a colliery owner.

ATHLETIC SPORTS.—Note. A Creature of Impulse—Football.

A SCIENTIFIC WANT.—We have statics and hydrostatics, pneumatics and rheumatics; but none of these exactly represent the feelings of young ladies when they see a new bonnet or a new baby, or hear of another ball or a fresh party—this is ecstatics.

A female shop-lifter, who was detected in the act of secreting some valuable lace in a New York dry-goods store the other day, stated that she was unconscious of what she had done—that she had taken it in a fit of abstraction.

CONTINGENT ADVANTAGES.

EMILY. "What has made you take to those great Gloves, Gertrude? They make your Hands look Gigantic!"
GERTRUDE (engaged). "Oh, my dear, my Hand is disposed of; and when that's the case, one can give up Appearances, and go in for Comfort."

PECULIAR PEOPLE.

Mr. Brown begins to light his fire according to the almanac instead of the thermometer.
Mr. Jones dare not praise a picture until he knows who painted it.
Mr. Robinson once journeyed to Jerusalem, and can not meet you for five minutes without saying he has done so.
Mr. Fluker never plays a game of billiards with a friend without alleging that he has not touched a cue for upward of a twelvemonth.
Mr. Growler never misses any chance, when the other party is in power, of proclaiming his opinion of the decadence of the republic.
Mr. Tomkins can't enjoy a puppet-show because he won't restrain himself from looking at the wires.
Mrs. Fussie keeps an album, pets a pug dog, and collects old postage stamps.
Mr. Grabb is always ready to borrow a cigar of you, but never volunteers to lend you one.
Miss Simperton can't travel half a dozen miles without a lady's-maid and half a dozen bandboxes.
Mr. Hurry hires a cab to take him to an omnibus.
Mr. Moneybagge aspires to be a school trustee, although he calls intelligence "reliable," and peculiar "pecoolier."
Miss Dawdleton can crochet, knit, and tat, but except in great emergencies can not sew a button on.
Mr. Hunks prefers, he says, to travel second class, because the first class is so stuffy.
Mr. Duffer gives to beggars, and avoids a poor-box.

WHERE CAN WE FIND THEM?

Where is the eating-house waiter correct in his arithmetic?
Where is the after-dinner speech-maker who, having to propose the toast of the evening, does not regret that it has not been placed in abler hands?
Where is the railway conductor of sufficient self-control to shut a carriage door without giving a good bang to it?
Where is the tourist who can turn his thalers into francs and not lose a few centimes by it?
Where is the light-cart driver who ever dreams of slackening his pace when going round a corner where there is a crowded crossing?
Where is the man who keeps a diary and ever lives to find the slightest use in doing so?
Where is the young gentleman who can abstain for a whole month from sticking flowers in his button-hole?
Where is the young lady who, after going to a ball, is unable to describe in detail all the dresses that were worn there?
Where is the workman who, when he gets a rise in wages, ever dreams of saving money by it?
Where is the amateur who can open oysters quickly without leaving the shell sticking to them?

ODD THING.—To encore a song, and to be quite satisfied when another is sung in its stead.

COMIC CHRONOLOGY.

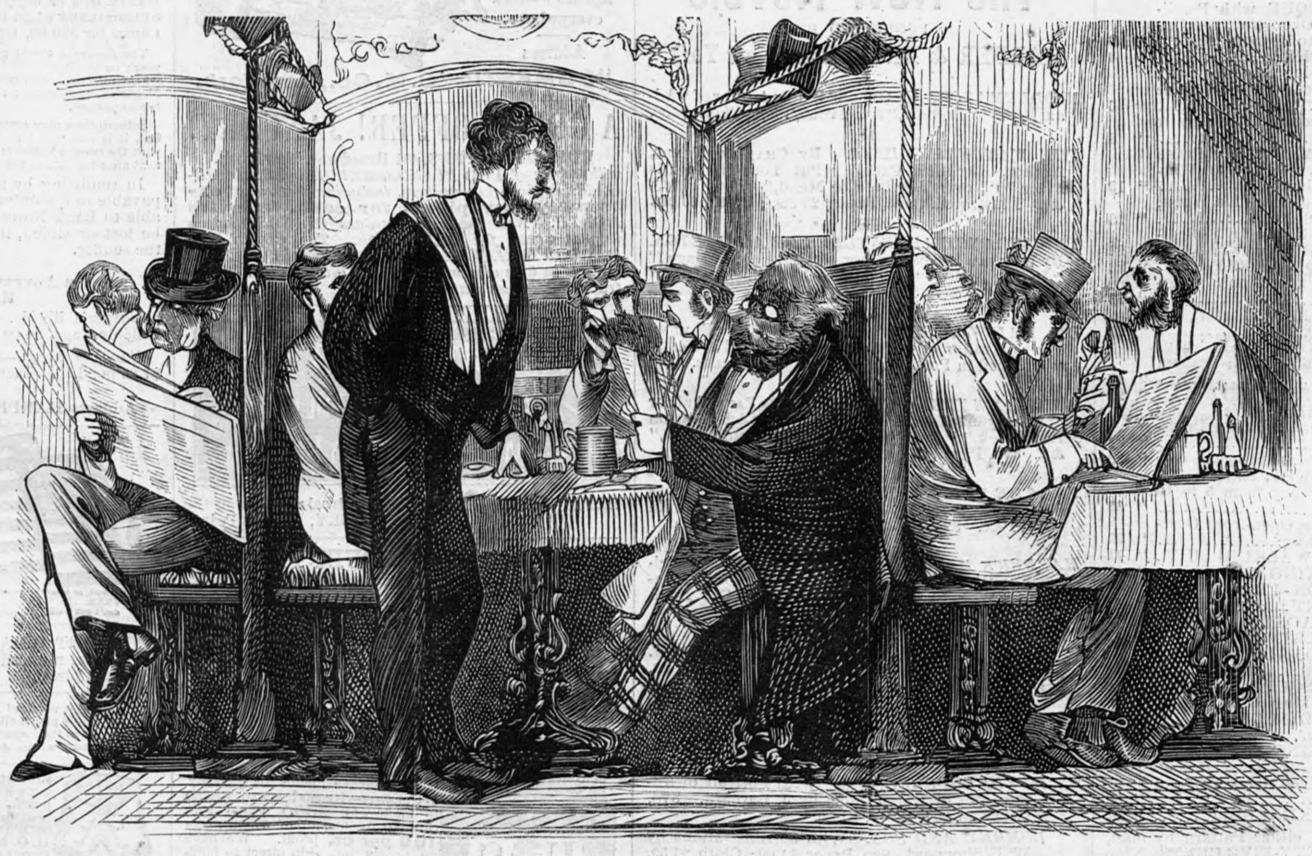
A.D. 1001.—Invention of the riddle, "When is a door not a door?"
A.D. 1220.—First asking of the question, "Where was Moses when the candle went out?"
A.D. 1349.—Discovery of the conundrum, "Why does a miller wear a white hat?"
A.D. 1508.—A tongue is cut at supper, and for the first time a joke is cut upon it.
A.D. 1659.—Introduction of the pleasant saying, "Who stole the donkey?"
A.D. 1703.—Jones helps Smith to trifle, and has the happiness of making the first pun ever made upon it.

WORK OF THE PAST YEAR.

Airing French.
Building castles in the air.
Chopping logic.
Cracking jokes.
Cleansing Augean stables.
Cutting and drying.
Fencing questions.
Hedging bets.
Imprinting kisses.
Knitting brows.
Nursing omnibuses.
Putting shoulders to wheels.
Scouring the country.
Skinning flints.
Sowing wild oats.
Reaping the consequences.
Splitting hairs.
Ventilating grievances.
Wading through books.
Wool-gathering.
Spinning yarns.
Cheese-paring.
Trimming.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE.

COMMANDER. "Confound you! where do you come from?"
A.B. "Fell Overboard, Sir."
COMMANDER. "Confound you! the next time you leave the Ship without Permission, I'll—I'll put you in Irons."



DRY AND CRUSTY.

OLD FUBSBY. "Waiter! Bring me half a pint of Sherry."
WAITER. "Sherry, Sir, yessir!" (A pause.) "Dry, Sir?"
OLD F. "Well, if I am, what's that to you?"

OFFENSES OF THE PAST YEAR.

Knocking people down with a feather.
Throwing dust in their eyes.
Blowing them up.
Stealing kisses.
"Taking silk."
Murdering tunes.
Robbing Peter to pay Paul.
Setting fire to the North River.
Roasting friends.
Cutting up authors.
Quarreling with bread-and-butter.

GARDENING NOTES.

A tidy sort of a tree is a spruce fir.
Grass that can't be expected to grow straight is evidently rye-grass.

DEVOTION TO SCIENCE.—Our friend Wylde Flowers is an enthusiastic naturalist. His wife has lately presented him with twin daughters. He has called them Flora and Fauna.

RUDE THING—To take out your watch during the sermon.

RUDER THING—To take yourself out during that discourse.

The man who is equal to himself is generally a match for others.

HOW TO ROLL IN WEALTH—Marry a rich carriage-maker's daughter.

UNSEASONABLE THING—To say "Good-morning" on a very foggy day.

A French writer says, "The seasons in London are equally divided—there are four months of winter, four of fog, and four of rain."

YOUNG AMERICA.—The Boston Gazette is responsible for the following slander. It says that the young ladies of that city can quote Goethe and Schiller fluently, but can not quote a single couplet of Pope, nor tell whether Washington Irving was an Englishman or an American.

ASTROLOGY AND MYTHOLOGY.—In the beginning of March, according to Zadkiel, "Saturn steals on." Does he, the old thief? But we thought the thief-god, or god of thieves, was Mercury.

Editing a newspaper is very much like raking a fire—every one thinks he can perform the operation better than the man who holds the poker.

MEDITATIONS UPON MATRIMONY.

(BY A MARRIED MAN.)

Life is beset with dangerous temptations. When you take your wife down Broadway always leave your purse at home.
In connubial arithmetic a husband must be reckoned as less than half a man when his better half is with him.
Pity the poor gentleman whose wife will have a latch-key!
Marriage would in many cases be a blissful state if it were not for cold mutton.
When you detect a wife's unusual affection for her husband, you may expect to see her before long in a new bonnet.
Pleasant are the races with bachelor acquaintances; but a trip to a jeweler's is a costly price to pay for it.
If your wife says, "Dear mamma is coming for a week or so," you may prepare your mind to receive her for a month or two.
Lovers sometimes rave about the sunshine that gilds a married life; but when they come to bask in it, they find it is mere moonshine.

A poet asks: "Where are the dead, the vanished dead, who trod the earth that now we tread?" If we were to make a random guess, we should say the most of them are buried—though this may not be the right answer.

When is an army like a tuck in a lady's skirt?—When it is hemmed in.

Mrs. Partington, reading of the strike of the wire-drawers, remarked, "Ah me! what new-fangled things won't they wear next!"

A WESTERN STYLE OF PUFFING.—Moore, in his Lalla Rookh, tells a charming story, commencing,

"One morn a peri at the gate
Of Eden stood, disconsolate," and describes how, with drooping wings, she looked in longingly, but could not enter. We thought of her as we paid a visit to Thorpe's Hotel and Gardens. There was no St. Peter there to bar our entrance, as in the case of poor peri. We passed a pleasant time, as every body who goes there can not fail to do, and returned along the San Bruno Road, thinking that if Thorpe's Gardens had been started at the time of Adam and Eve, the Garden of Eden would have received a very small share of public patronage.

Bow-Wow.—A well-bred dog generally bows to strangers.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF THE PAST YEAR.

Beating about the bush.
Drawing the long bow.
Fishing in troubled waters.
Catching Tartars.
Hooking husbands.
Flying in the face of society.
Harping on one string.
House-hunting.
Killing two birds with one stone.
Outrunning the constable.
Ringing the changes.
Sailing close to the wind.
Shooting folly flying.
Tuft-hunting.
Walking over the course.
Going on a wild-goose chase.

STICKING TO THEM.—Beards are not so much worn as they were; but the oysters, always tenacious, have made no change.

If Adam is accountable for "consequential damages," he will have a rough time of it.

A LARGE FAMILY PARTY—All of us!

MEAN THING—To ask for discount when you buy the wedding-ring.

"Mamma, a brooklet means a little brook, doesn't it? and an eaglet a little eagle?"
"Yes, my darling."
"Then, ma, does an eyelet mean a little eye, and a hamlet a little ham?"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 6.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

THE PURSUIT OF POETRY.

IF people could shape their homes exactly as they wish, we imagine there would be few homes exactly as they are. Circumstances and not inclinations are the architects of these structures; and whereas our fancies would locate the pamphleteer who dilates on drawing-rooms and the splendors of sumptuous life in a palace, these stern architects have given him only a garret; and where we would think of no residence less ideal for a poet than a castle in the air, we find him in a substantial manor or brown-stone front—for poverty and poetry no longer go inseparably together, as the proper thing used to be in the dear old days of the Dunciad.

In England this opulence of the poet is very marked, and if not so strongly marked in America, yet the old poverty has been ameliorated here by a comfortable affluence that must be gratifying to the Muses, if they can still be gratified by sublunary things; and since Jupiter himself confessed a kindness for those heroes who gave him the rich sacrificial smoke of roasting beeves, we imagine the Muses can hardly hold their heads any higher than the great father of all the gods, or refuse to be gratified in their turn.

Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet, according to Milton, has been relegated at last to baser companions, it being no longer found necessary to starve the stomach in order to feed the brain, and the best odes and lyrics of the fancy being but the sublimation of the best steaks and cutlets of the dinner-table. In England almost any poet, who signifies his willingness, receives either a pension or some sinecure or other situation under government. Nor in America are there many poets that are not comfortably housed and fed. Walt Whitman, William O'Connor, John James Piatt, and a host more are in the departments at Washington or in the custom-house service elsewhere. Others, like James Russel Lowell and Dr. Holmes and Professor Cutler, are or have been in the service of the universities; and a few, such as George H. Boker and Henry W. Longfellow, are independently rich.

The fact is that healthy poetry is a healthy product, and the low, thin blood of starvation does not secrete it. Once in a century concurrent circumstances bring into existence some individual the breath of whose being is from the everlasting sources of poetic life—in whom the poetic strength is like a flame that feeds upon itself, and springs up mighty and irresistible. But that is phenomenal; and the average poetry needs a good substratum of golden honey, red beef, juicy fruits, rich wines, and vivifying stimulants in general, and it is a pleasant thing to know that for the most part this choice substratum does not altogether fail.

Good poetry always commands good pay. Browning and Tennyson, of course, receive what might be called fancy prices—there being no absolute register of the value of such wares; but fair rate is usually dealt to the rest, so far as the gold in the scale can weigh down the aerial and intangible conceits of the poet.

Let us take, for instance, the homes of any two professed poets, one on either side the water, which may illustrate the subject. We might, on this side, take Mr. Lowell's home, where his father lived before him; but he being absent from it in Europe, and another poet, Mr. Aldrich, inhabiting it, it is hardly a fit illustration; nor is the charming home of James T. Fields, with its city windows commanding miles of the open bay and the distant hills, since his poems having been printed but not published, to instance him would be an intrusion; nor do we think that those prosperous poets who have two homes, one in town and another in the country, are quite to our purpose in citing the average circumstances of the poet. Let us take the home that is permanent and unchanged the year round—John G. Whittier's, for example. Mr. Whittier lives in a little Massachusetts town, where he is venerated as if he were an apostle still living among the people. His simple dwelling stands a little back from the highway, with some pretty shrubbery and grass-plots between the door and the steps to the street, and some tall trees round about it. Behind the house lie smooth meadows, rich in variety of tints from green to russet; before it rises the great turfy swell of Poe Hill, whence lovely quiet scenery is to be seen in every direction: the Powow River, and the Merrimac threading its salt marshes, or winding far up in sapphire stretches between the hills, the yellow reach of Salisbury Sands, the black rocks of Hampton River mouth, the rusty Ipswich hills, green woods, and everlasting sea—scenes fit to kindle a poet's fancy, and with which the poet of whom we speak has imperishably inwoven his name in the ballads and legends connected with them which he has sung. Inside the poet's house the quaint rooms open one within another. The carpets and furniture in them are so simple and so pleasing to the eye that you forget to note any thing out of all the general harmony. In the inner room is the poet's own sanctum; there are sunny windows on either side—one commanding the fields, the other the great hillside; there is an open fire, there are comfortable chairs and lounges, there are book-shelves fixed in the wall, a writing-desk, and several choice paintings—one water-color of a scene on the Isles of Shoals, where the sea lifts itself between some great rocks; another of the strange rude streets of Marblehead, as picturesque as Naples, and where one of the poet's best poems is located; another a bunch of faded ferns in the sunlight, painted in oils. Here the poet sits, and here he spins from his tender fancies the songs which are sweet as any thing, if not sweeter than any thing, in the whole of American literature. Without the least hint of splendor, there is a delightful comfort every where visible—a sense of pastoral quiet and gentle tastes. The wild war notes with which he used to urge on the fray in the old days of anti-slavery might, indeed, have been sounded in a sterner place, but the peaceful and perfect pictures of such work as is Snowbound needed this place of repose to be recalled and dreamed over and made what they are, real cameos of New England life.

Take then the home of some English poet: Tennyson's, if impertinent curiosity had not driven him from his retreat in the Isle of Wight to one in the heart of the city, though we believe he is building now somewhere on the banks of the Thames; or the home where Christina Rossetti lives with her brother William and her sister Maria Francesca, and where she wrote that charming baby Sing Song without a baby any where in the family, as we hear; or the plain but elegant one which Jean Ingelow is just about leaving for another; or Dante Gabriel Rossetti's, where, since his wife's death, he has lived alone in a house lined with his paintings; or, there being so many, and all so pleasant, let us take one which is more characteristic than any of the rest—the house of William Morris, the author of Jason, and of that almost perfect poem, the Lovers of Gudrun. Mr. Morris lives in a dark old London square in a large four-story house, which you may know by the small sign at the door, that runs "Morris & Company." The lower floor of this building is used for business purposes, and is stocked with all manner of antiques and curiosities—ancient furniture, ancient suits of armor, bits of rare old bronze, and all those dainty treasures which are known under the untranslatable heads of rococo and bric-à-brac. Here a quiet clerk or two receive orders and make sales. Mr. Morris himself is in his den in the fourth story; there he attends to his special pursuit, which is the invention of designs for any thing and every thing where art and beauty can go hand in hand with utility, designs for vases, chairs, brocades, carpets, wall-papers, and all objects where the subtilties and intricacies of lines and colors can produce effect, and

LADY'S CLOTH WALKING SUIT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–4.

Hosted by Google

for his excellence in which he is far more widely known than for his poems. Doubtless there are many manufacturers yet who only know of him as the invaluable designer, and would be shocked and amazed, and possibly would think twice about employing him further, if they learned that he had ever done so crack-brained a thing as to write a verse; and if they know any thing at all about the authorship of those weird tales of the Earthly Paradise, imagine it to be a totally different Morris from their own Morris. In this attic apartment, where he works out his designs, Mr. Morris also writes his verses. On shelves around the room are numbers of books, many of them in the Icelandic tongue, in which he is thoroughly proficient. It is from such substance as the stories in several of these volumes afford that he has created many of his poems; the Lovers of Gudrun, for instance, being the statement of the old Icelandic tale, unaltered so far as original details go, but illuminated by all the graces of the poet's own imagination, which has made the men and women real, and which, scorning to gloss over prosaic facts, indues all the character and action with a beauty that is ideal, with a force that is actual, and a pathos that perpetually brings the tears. The third-floor of the house, or that directly beneath this study and work-room, is devoted to sleeping and other family rooms, and on the floor beneath is one large drawing-room. Here hangs Rossetti's wonderful portrait of Mrs. Morris, said to be the most beautiful woman of England—a dark, sweet beauty; and here, in perfect freedom of outgoing and incoming, the circle of poets and painters and Pre-Raphaelite critics meet to drink tea and exchange their thoughts.

Certainly in the inspection and review of such homes as these we are led to think that the lines of poets have nowadays fallen in pleasant places. No more do they hunger and thirst, or sleep with their harps beneath the hedges, or sit at any patron's table below the salt. They have seen the error of the idea that poverty is a necessary element of genius; they are no longer the poor troubadour to whom a coin is flung; they control a market, and create a demand which they alone can supply. They have discovered that inspiration and a check are not incompatible, and they have remembered that if the former is not directly dependent upon the latter, yet that the god has been known to come to his chosen, and may come again, in a shower of gold.

"I LOVE, YOU LOVE."

OLD Jones, the village pedagogue,
The grammar lesson called one day.
Young Bess, a maid of sweet sixteen,
Began the well-known words to say.
"First person, I love," first she said.
Sly Tom, beside her, whispered, "Me?"
"Second person, you love," Bess went on.
"Ay, that I do!" said Tom—"love thee!"

"Third person, he loves," still said Bess.
Tom whispers, "Who the deuce is 'he?'"
"Oh, Tom!" said Bessie, pleading low,
"Do hold your peace, and let me be!"
"No whispering!" calls the master, loud,
And frowned upon the forward youth.
"First person, we love," Bessie said.
"By George!" Tom whispered, "that's the truth!"

The lesson o'er at last, poor Bess,
With cheeks all crimson, took her seat,
While Tom, sly fellow, tried in vain
The maiden's soft blue eyes to meet.
But when the recess hour was come
Tom begged a walk with coaxing tone,
And 'neath the trees Bess said again
The lesson o'er—for him alone.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1873.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new Spring Polonaise will be published with the next Number.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' and Children's Walking Suits, Home and Evening Dresses; Jackets, Blouses, Bretelles, Fichu-Collars, Hoods, Sashes, Veils, etc.; Girls' Knitted and Crochet Muffs, Collars, and Cuffs; Bed Furniture, etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

THE DINNER-TABLE.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

AS people have not all either the same tastes or the same means, our object has been, in giving different models of bills of fare, to enable every housekeeper to order a complicated dinner as well as a simple one.

It is not indispensable to have all the dishes we mention, or to be restricted to them, or to have exactly the same dishes. For instance, in bill No. 1, in the preceding article on this subject, roast pork, roast turkey, or roast mutton may be substituted for beef. In No. 2 cod may be substituted for halibut, etc. In No. 4 the mashed potatoes may be served with the pickerel; but the other dishes, of vegetables or of meat, must be served in the order in which we have given them.

To make a matelote as indicated in No. 5, the best kind of fish are eels, bass, carp, and pike. In No. 5 a dish of meat, such as beef à la mode, a leg or saddle of mutton, a leg or shoulder of veal, a large piece of fresh pork, a calf's head, a sucking pig, a ham, or the like, may be served in place of one of fish, as a relevé.

When there are many persons at dinner, dishes are duplicated in order to facilitate the service. They may be quadrupled as well, if necessary. The dishes of hors-d'œuvre and of dessert should be numerous enough to have some within the reach of every one at table.

The service is the same for six as for two; that is, the same number of dishes is served, but the quantity or size of the articles must be according to the number of guests. One tureen of soup is enough for six persons; but if there are only two at table, it must be of a much smaller size than if it were for six. The same rule is followed for the dishes of all the other courses. The number of entrées is double that of soups, relevés, and rôtis.

The number of dishes for six persons at dinner (a dinner of ceremony we mean) is, one potage, two or four hors-d'œuvres, one relevé, two entrées, one rôti, one salad, two or four entremets, and four kinds of dessert. Thus, consommé au riz, piccalilli, olives, sardines, tongue in slices, trout Génoise, chops in papillotes, chicken sauté, canvas-back duck roasted, salad of chiccory, mashed potatoes, green pease au jus, macaroni au gratin, wine jelly, cheese, vanilla biscuits, compote of raspberries, fresh fruit, nuts, oranges. The mashed potatoes may be served with the fish, if liked.

For twelve or fourteen persons the above number of dishes and plates should be doubled. An odd number of dishes or plates should be avoided when more than one of the same course are served. For instance, supposing that eighteen persons were at table, if two tureens of soup are thought not enough, then four should be served; but two kinds of it are enough—that is, two tureens of each kind. The same rule is followed for all the other courses.

Let our readers understand that it is a mistake to think that to give a dinner to friends, to relatives, or even a dinner of ceremony, it is necessary, nay, indispensable, to have just such dishes and such wines because other people have them served on their tables. It is much better and much more pleasing to the guests to be original—we mean, to make one's own bill of fare, and not imitate other people's dinners. We once heard a frequent diner-out exclaim, "These dinners are shockingly monotonous; one knows in advance what dishes are coming: there are the classic salmon, the chronic fillet of beef, the innumerable roasts, accompanied by the matter-of-course ice-cream to chill the stomach, instead of something that would help digestion." We are of the same opinion. Ice-cream is good, but not as a dessert. An hour at least should be allowed the stomach after dinner before taxing it with the hard work of digesting so chilly a dish.

The dinner is the principal meal of the day, and the one that restores the waste of the system the most, being generally taken after the day's tasks are done, and being composed of more nutritious and more numerous dishes than the other meals. As the mind and stomach can not both work well at once, it is certainly according to hygienic laws not to eat much or heavy food at breakfast and lunch. It is different at dinner; besides having no work to perform after it, the enjoyment of having the whole family assembled is one of the best condiments that can accompany the meal.

Wives and mothers, have flowers on the dinner-table! have attractive-looking dishes! have palatable food! have cheerfulness! have a cup of warm coffee or tea after the dinner! You are then pretty sure to have warm hearts around you. Do not freeze the stomachs of the members of your family at the dinner-table, and then run the risk of freezing their hearts. Keep the ice-cream for the evening, to refresh the palates that may have been parched by conversation or singing.

Another important thing, and which, like nearly all other domestic duties, devolves on the wife and mother, is the selection of the daily food. We have explained what to serve, and how to serve it; we will add a few directions as a guide. First, understand that by good and proper food we do not mean costly food. Many have poor food, and consequently poor dinners, though they have paid a high price for it, while others have good and properly prepared food for a reasonable price, the difference between the two being only in its selection and preparation.

Cookery is a branch of chemistry as well as an art. Soups, sauces, gravies, stews, etc., are compounded as carefully as a chemical preparation. They act on the system according to preparation—that is, if well prepared, they do good; if not, the opposite. Cookery is the science that keeps in order the animal mechanism of humanity. The physician is only called in when, through causes entirely independent of cookery, that mechanism is out of order.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Temperate Travelers.

MY DEAR LEMUEL,—When you asked me the other day if I did not think that the feast of New-Year's Day was not much more temperately celebrated than formerly, you were evidently surprised by my rather doubting assent. The truth is that I was thinking of some of my calls, and of what I saw and thought. Have you never seen old-fashioned Quaker ladies whose dresses were of the richest Quaker material, and who were evidently as much concerned for the true Quaker "cut" as a certain young woman whom you know about the Parisian style of her robe du soir? The spectacle of one such excellent lady, in her spotless drab silk handkerchief, exquisitely prim, intoning a denunciation of carnal pomps and vanities, always reminds me of the dapper little orator in full evening dress rising to lecture at a mechanics' institute, drawing off his neat kid gloves, waving his delicate hand so that his diamond ring sparkles, and beginning, "Labor, my friends—labor, not luxury—is the real thing." I hope that his hearers were impressed by that great truth. It is very quaint and pretty, that Quaker dress, upon lovely young women; but that the belles of Arch Street in its most orthodox days did not think as much of their raiment as their conforming sisters, I am yet to be persuaded.

In the same way, I am not profoundly convinced of the temperance of some of the most temperate ladies to whom I made my New-Year bow. But do not misunderstand me. I do not suspect that they surreptitiously suck a straw behind the door, nor would they evade their own professions by consuming liqueur in confections. Far from it. They drink water only and innocent tea. I mean merely that temperance is a relative term. Our virtue is dislocated often and disproportioned. In younger days I met Mr. Wasser, the famous temperance lecturer, in the waiting and refreshment room at Babylon. We had just jumped from the train and ran for our lives to get a piece of pie. Mr. Warner, in his Back-log Studies, with fond humor defends pie. But I doubt if he could have shielded that particular pie. It would have been too much even for the bowels of his charity.

Mr. Wasser eating pie in the struggling half minute of the stop for "refreshments" was a memorable spectacle. He brought to the work great resolution, and he grappled with the hugest cantles of the difficulty. Having seized a large piece in both hands, he turned toward me silently—there was no time for speech, and he bolted the food. It died of galloping consumption. And more of it followed. Then, puffing, so to speak, from the fray, he turned with large eyes and still distended cheeks toward the coffee. I believe they still call it coffee in the railroad saloons. He pushed successfully between two other warriors closely engaged with pie, who tried to impale him upon their elbows, but could only spare time to scowl without attempting to speak. He seized a cup, the liquid slopping over into the saucer in a cold puddle, and Mr. Wasser gulped it down, his eyes regarding me solemnly over the rim of the cup. The train puffed, and we ran and jumped upon the platform, where he stopped and offered me an enormous cigar. I declined his courtesy, and he hastily smoked with the greedy ferocity of a toper over his glass. "I was so afraid," he said, as the swift ceremony ended, "that I should not have a bite and a cigar before my lecture, which is to be at the very next town." "What is your subject?" I asked. "Oh, temperance, temperance," said he, smiling; "I always preach temperance." As I sat silently musing I wondered if he practiced it.

When, on New-Year's morning, I came to Mrs. Pump's I was impressed with the magnificent livery of the lackey who opened the door and who asked me my name and passed it on to another superb menial, so that I really think that I blushed as I ascended the staircase to the drawing-room amidst a prolonged echo of my name. Mrs. Pump has recently returned from Europe, and she says that there are many things there which show its superior civilization. But she is very forbearing toward her own country; and no one can see without admiration her spirit of Christian forgiveness of America for not being Europe. But, as she remarks, why should the refined and truly fashionable, who are also rich, return from other lands without bringing with them some blessings for their own? So my name was echoed along the spacious hall, and I entered the room to a symphony, as it were, in many keys, of "Mr. Bachelor! Mr. Bachelor!"

How shall I describe Mrs. Pump as she appeared that day? She was a ragout or omelette soufflé of jewels and laces and feathers and frills and flounces, presenting a generally hunched and puffy aspect. I do not remember that I ever saw the costliest French doll so finely dressed as Mrs. Pump; and the most celebrated ladies of the demi-monde, who were pointed out to me when I was in Paris, were not so superb as she. It would take a great many of our yearly incomes to supply all that splendor. "Happy New-Year, Mr. Bachelor. Take a glass of chocolate: no punch, no wine: you know we are 'temperance.'"

"Good Heavens! madame," I exclaimed, unguardedly—remembering the lackeys, and beholding the lavish profusion of her dress—"temperate! in what?"

"In all things, I hope, Mr. Bachelor," replied Mrs. Pump, dropping a profound courtesy.

"I hope so too, ma'am," I answered; and then I said that I had just been at Mrs. Canary's.

"And did she sing for you?" laughed Mrs. Pump. "Did you ever hear my owl? Sing! Why on earth does that woman pretend to sing?"

I hastened from that text, but this fluent and flippant preacher was equally ready upon all. She devastated her neighbors with her terrible tongue. I never heard such insinuation, such tattle, such vile scandal, as flowed from this expensively bedizened woman. And as she poured it out she played with her necklace, she turned the bracelets upon her arm, she studied her rings, she quivered in her silken attire as if she were set upon wires. And as I was turning away from the odious figure, she said again, "You know we are 'temperance,' Mr. Bachelor: do take a cup of beef tea."

Temperance! What kind of temperance? How are you temperate? I asked myself as I passed out between the solemn and superb lackeys. What kind of temperance is it that apes Europe, and squanders treasure upon clothes, and slanders neighbors? I thought of little Mrs. Jenny Wren and her sweet tongue and simple, tasteful dress, and quick sympathy and charity; Mrs. Jenny Wren visiting the widow and the fatherless and the forsaken prisoner; and as I remembered those evenings when there was—can it be possible!—a glass of wine whey, or even of hot water with sugar and nutmeg, and a glass of sherry in it—I wondered which of the two households was the more refining and humane? I know that Mr. Logic and Master Conscience are waiting to ask me if I mean to be sophistical. Is it not better, they say, that Mrs. Pump should not add the temptation of wine to the other temptations of her web? I answer yes: bad as she is, she might be worse. But if she preaches temperance, let her practice it.

Might not the same advice be respectfully offered to the reverend gentleman who occasionally exchanges with the rector of Saint Rainbow's? That excellent Boanerges persuades us toward the strait gate and the narrow way with such appalling vehemence that it ceases to seem the pleasant way. When he describes the Divine wrath with sinners, and depicts what in his lurid style seems to be the eager rage of infinite Omnipotence toward a poor little finite worm, I confess that he entirely perverts my sympathy. It goes out to my miserable fellow-sinner, and the poor little worm seems to be—and the excellent Boanerges is responsible for the impression—at such tragical disadvantage with his adversary that I come away from that discourse with a feeling which once led me to say to my neighbor, "I wish Mr. Boanerges would join the Temperance Society!"

"Good gracious!" replied my neighbor, "do you think he had been drinking?"

Temperance in drinking is a great virtue. But temperance also in eating and smoking seems to be comely. There are those who insist upon drinking nothing but cold water, but they cherish feelings full of very bad whisky, and their talk is fury and drunkenness. You remember that the wish was denounced as sin in the heart. And when I see fellow-sinners who evidently suppose that they are just opening the strait gate because they avoid ardent spirits and are intemperate in all other drinking, and in eating, thinking, and speaking—when I see Mrs. Pump clad in cloth of gold, and calumniating her neighbors, and ruining the weak sister by frantic envy and rivalry of an unattainable extravagance, yet saying, "We are 'temperance,' you know"—I answer, "No: I do not know it. You are one of the most intemperate persons in the world." When I hear one of the reverend clergy cursing us, as it were, for swearing, and condemning us to hell if we do not straightway follow him to heaven; when the editor, with a fine air of morality and independence, lies about his opponents, and deliberately misinterprets their words and deeds, and tries to cover them with personal disgrace; when Mawworm, who drinks only water, stabs his neighbor's character, and Mrs. Candour, who is "temperance," steals reputations—I cry that it is time to preach the temperance reform.

For the temperate fellow-passenger upon our journey, Lemuel, is the man who does not suffer his feelings or his words, his heart or his tongue, to be drunk. His manners are sober. His brain is steady. Indeed, if he must choose, he prefers, for instance, the intemperance that lays a man in the gutter to that which lights the flames of religious hatred. The victim of the first hurts himself, poor fellow, but the tool of the last hurts mankind. Perhaps it would be better if next New-Year's Mrs. Jenny Wren should not have that claret punch on the table; but with it last New-Year's she was a truer "Martha Washingtonian" than Mrs. Pump.

Hosted by Google

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING SILKS.

IN midwinter prepare for spring, is the importer's motto; and amidst snow and ice we have the first glimpse of those tender hues that are to appear with the balmy spring days. An inspection of spring silks is full of suggestion. The fabrics are not new—soft lustrous failles of medium heavy cord being retained—but the colors are a study. Importers and buyers just returned from the Lyons factories assert that blue will be the leading color of the season. The turquoise blue and lophophore (greenish-blue) now so prominently worn in Europe form a conspicuous part of spring importations, and it is said an effort will be made here to have them take the place so long held by gray and brown shades. But as these mongrel shades can only be well worn by blondes, they will scarcely supersede the bronze and réséda hues that can be made becoming to all complexions by the colors associated with them. All the peculiar quaint colors of the winter are again presented, but in the light, delicate shades appropriate for spring. Paradis, lizard, peacock, and various kindred names are given to the half-effaced tints of greenish-blue already mentioned. These differ from the colors now worn merely in being the faintest possible shadows of shades. Very pale gray shades tinged with green are also imported. Among these are Souchong, or tea-color, absinthe gray with deep green hues, and the well-known réséda and sage colors. Norwegian gray is a charming cool shade with blue tints. Alma is black, shading into gray. A tender gray called printemps is pretty, though not new. What the French call gris clair is scarcely to be found; and the same is true of brown hues, as these also are affected by the all-pervading green. The stylish brown is called airain, or copper-color. Verd-antique, black bronze, and various other metallic shades are shown. The purest brown is mordoré, a light golden hue. Pervenche, or periwinkle, is the new purple shade. For evening failles there are quantities of blanc mat, a creamy unpolished white; blue-whites may answer for day wear, but they look gray by gas-light.

SOLID COLORS AND STRIPES.

Solid colors will prevail among rich heavy silks, and two shades will still appear in a costume. Figured and broché silks have not been largely invested in. Cheap light silks for spring and summer wear retain the stripes of last season, en camaïeu, that is, in dark shades on a light ground, and also in stripes of a color contrasting with the ground. Little broken stripes—one wide and the next narrow, and irregular clusters of stripes—are the new styles. Among the cameos are two shades of lophophore or two of réséda, or the new copper shades, having the darker stripe displayed on a lighter surface. The beauty of the contrasting stripes consists in the grounds being very slightly tinted, while the stripes are bold and dark. Thus, on Nile green are bronze lines, écru buff has green stripes, lavender has cherry pencilings, palest gray is seen with blue lines, and wood-color with periwinkle stripes. Ombré or shaded stripes are also reproduced in blondine, marron, and purple. The staple grisaille silks, that always find favor in the spring, are now brought out in argentine shades. The grounds are silvery gray and almost white, with clusters and broken lines of black.

POLKA DOTS.

Polka dots promise to be the fashionable design for all spring goods of qualities below the fine grades of silk. This was foreshadowed in French dresses of last year, and among the new importations one of the most evident features is this round, moon-like spot of white on a dark ground, or else a broché dot of self-color. These are found in foulards, pongees, grenadines, and prints.

FOULARDS.

Foulards have come slowly and gradually into favor, just as cashmeres did, and they promise now to be equally as popular. The serge foulards with heavy twill are very serviceable, but those with plain surface fray and become sleazy in wearing. Instead of the faded tints fashionable for failles, foulards are brought out in very dark hues, probably to contrast well with the white polka dot, stars, crescents, or Japanese figures that are sprinkled upon them. Copper-color, dark absinthe, and all the deepest hues of the new shades, dotted with white, are found in this fabric.

NAPOLEON BLUE.

Among spring foulards blue is a conspicuous color, especially Napoleon blue, a new dark shade as deep as lapis or as indigo, but without the reddish-purple tinges of indigo. This hue came into vogue last summer in Paris, and was manufactured in various fabrics, notably in glazed linens for costumes. Napoleon blue foulards with white polka dots varying in size from a pea to those an inch in diameter are largely imported; these, with bronze and absinthe grounds similarly dotted, promise to be favorite spring materials.

FOULARD LAINE.

A novelty for early spring costumes is foulard laine, an all-wool fabric, fine and closely woven, as soft and flexible as cashmere, yet of as little weight as foulard. It is, after all, merely an improvement on the old-fashioned mousseline de laines that did such service years ago. It is twenty-six inches wide, reversible, and is shown in all the blue, gray, and bronze tints that fashion now dictates. Foulard-laine broché is a similar fabric with silk finish. This is brought out in Napoleon blue with small white polka dots, or else large broché dots of darker blue.

PONGEE, ETC.

The soft silk pongees so admirable for drapery reappear in the unbleached and dust-colored hues worn last season. The only novelty about these goods is that very few have plain surfaces, but instead are overcast with broché figures, polka dots, or twilled stripes. A sort of pongee grenadine has open armure stripes like canvas grenadine alternating with satin-faced stripes. Figured pongees are now imported from England at much less expense than those made in France.

Other novelties for costumes are fine thin wool goods in crape-finished stripes, serge twills, and armure checks. These have the requisite pliability, the light quality, and the fade colors to insure their popularity.

GAUZES AND GRENADINES.

A few of the gay Marie Antoinette and Pompadour gauzes are retained, but greater favor is predicted for the damask and polka-dotted gauzes similar to those worn at present for evening dresses. Black grenadines will again be standard summer dresses. They show armure squares, silk stripes, and polka dots precisely like those worn last summer. White grenadines, with small figures in bright colors, are prepared for the Southern trade. These make pretty house dresses for midsummer.

SATIN JEAN.

Among wash goods, perhaps the prettiest is the new satin jean, of far lighter quality than that formerly worn. This is a cotton fabric with fine glossy twilled surface, like satin. It is shown in solid colors of light hue, and in quaint dark shades sprinkled with the inevitable polka dots.

New percales have dark grounds, instead of the white once preferred. Violet, lavender, gray, and brown grounds have tiny figures, dashes, sprigs, and Greek squares of white at intervals. French percales for blouses have twilled stripes of color on a white ground, or else cameo stripes of a dark shade on a lighter one. Grayish-blue, maroon, and crimson percales will be stylish for the box-pleated waists worn by ladies and children.

POPLINS.

New Japanese poplins in the familiar grisaille colors have crape-finished stripes with polka dots between. French poplins of mixed cotton and wool are "heavily rolled," as the merchants say, thereby meaning thickly repped. These show all the new queer shades. Wash poplins to be sold for 25 cents a yard are in the ordinary serviceable gray shades, with black stripes of three or four lines together.

ENGLISH PRINTS.

The English prints made in Manchester now rival French calicoes in beauty of design and texture; they also cost less, and will wear longer. The last importations are half-inch stripes of gray, green, violet, black, or buff, alternating with white stripes, on which are gayly colored palm leaves; others have autumn leaves, Chinese figures, and tiny sprigs, with watered stripes between: 31 cents a yard is the price. French prints for dressing-gowns have black and white stripes strewn with gray frescoings, and vines in bright blue or purple. The gay Dolly Varden patterns have lost favor.

THE SPRING JACKET.

Among the garments in preparation for spring at the furnishing houses there is an improved edition of the English walking jacket worn at present. This garment of marine blue cloth, with silver buttons, is as much like a gentleman's sack-coat as a lady's wrap could well be. It is double-breasted, with revers and square pockets, and is far longer in the waist than the sacques of this season; hence it fits smoothly over the tournure, and does not draw or "bag" in the back. The trimming is a single band of very thickly repped black gros grain piped with white Italian cloth. The cloth is summer tricot, very lightly twilled. Price $28.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

New kilt suits for boys not yet in trowsers are of green cloth, trimmed with leaves wrought of gilt thread, and rows of gilt buttons. The jacket is cut away in front to show a double-pointed vest, made brave with bright buttons. A single rosette of black ribbon, with streaming ends and two gilt leaves, ornaments the plain front of the kilt skirt.

The height of extravagance is seen in the clothing prepared for little girls just in short clothes. An instance of this is an over dress to be worn by a child of two years when taken out for a drive. It is a sort of wadded pelisse and cape, made of heavy white gros grain, and trimmed with three rows of Valenciennes lace. The bonnet is a Normandy cap of palest blue gros grain, made with a high pointed crown, and trimmed with Valenciennes and pink rose-buds. A blue sash of the same fabric is worn with the pelisse, and knotted on the left side. The pelisse costs $60, the Normandy bonnet is $20.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MANSFIELD TRACY WALWORTH, in his novel of Delaplaine, introduced a sketch of the military career of ABBAS MIRZA, the ancestor of the present Shah of Persia, who commanded the Persian army at the famous battle of Echmiadzin, when the Russians were routed. With such accuracy did Mr. W. give the description that the present Shah has sent to Mr. WALWORTH the identical sabre worn by ABBAS MIRZA in the fight. The sheath is of chased gold, and the sword-knot and tassel are decorated with pearls, estimated to be worth in gold about $3500. It is the intention of Mr. WALWORTH to deposit this present in the State Library at Albany, in the glass case which incloses the swords of General WORTH and other American officers, for safe-keeping until next year. It can be seen there for about a year from this time. After that the author will resume possession of it.

—The King of Saxony is said to be engaged on a polyglot collection of poetry from the masterpieces of all nations, to be issued in the most sumptuous style. It will not be sold by the trade, but given as a present to the royal relatives and friends of the king on his impending abdication.

—JOSEPH SMITH, of Ipswich, Massachusetts, celebrated on the 11th of January his ninetieth birthday by a gathering of relatives and friends. He has lived nearly seventy years in one house, which he himself built, and which stands on the lands granted to his ancestor, Deacon JOHN SHATSWELL, at the settlement of the town in 1634.

—The Newark Advertiser says that the only sister of EDGAR A. POE is living at Hicks Landing, on the James River, Virginia, in the utmost poverty.

—The Khedive of Egypt does the nice thing for his daughter by ordering her wedding outfit to be made in Paris. One of the items of the order is flounces of point d'Alençon at $800 a yard, and $30,000 worth of other laces is to be added.

—A German countess, who is a devoted admirer of the Pope, has made a vow that every year she will send him a purse of gold and a converted Jew. She has made good her vow, and her first offering to the Church was received with imposing ceremonies.

—The Methodist Advocate having asked the question, "Was the late WILLIAM H. SEWARD a Christian?" the question is answered and other interesting information given by an Episcopal clergyman as to the religious proclivities of several historical characters. He says: "I had a pew in St. John's Church, Washington, during the war. I shall never forget my first view of General SCOTT, as I heard a heavy tread along the aisle of that church, and the old hero came into a double pew next in front of me, and kneeled for silent prayer. He then went reverently and devoutly through the whole service. And who were his fellow-worshipers? Secretary SEWARD and his son FREDERICK kneeled close by the pulpit; Secretary CHASE was near by; Postmaster-General BLAIR was a little further off; Secretary WELLES opposite him; Secretary STANTON was there too, or at the Epiphany; and there, among the generals, were HALLECK and AUGUR and MEADE and DIX and HUNTER and MEIGS and BARNARD and TOTTEN and FRY; and of the navy, Commodores GOLDSBOROUGH and WILKES. No wonder our cause prevailed, when the leading men of the army and navy were prostrate in church, praying in the same service of MARSHALL, JAY, HAMILTON, and WASHINGTON!"

—The late EDWIN FORREST seldom gave large dinners at his house, but when he did so, did it liberally. Of late years he was in the habit of taking his solitary meals in his library, or in a little room attached thereto, and his food was sent up to him on a dumb-waiter. The duties of the table he would discharge himself, and his lonely repast would soon be dispatched. In his daily life he was exemplary. He was an early riser, and breakfasted if not exactly with, only a little after, the lark. After breakfast he took a constitutional walk, and returning, retired to his study, where he read till dinner-time, of which meal he partook about four o'clock. In the evening he remained at home in his library, occasionally going to the theatre when any thing of more than ordinary interest was transpiring. His average bed hour, when not acting, was eleven o'clock.

—Miss ADELAIDE NEILSON, the beautiful and clever English actress now starring in this country, is a native of Spain, her father being Spanish, her mother English. She went on the stage in London in 1865, at the age of sixteen, as Juliet, having played only six times in provincial towns. Before going on the stage she married Mr. LEE, the son of an Episcopal clergyman, rector of a parish near London. She has always confined herself to the characters of her choice. She became thoroughly introduced to the London public last season as heroine of the great spectacular play of Rebecca, which was produced with great magnificence at Drury Lane, and enjoyed a long run. Every body saw it, and consequently every body saw and admired Miss NEILSON. Her acting was fine, and her beauty great. Her face, notwithstanding her Spanish birth, is of English type. Her liquid eyes are soft and winning, her hair is a dark brown, and her cheeks wear a rich glow of health. She is of good height, and classically symmetrical. The stage name used by her is that of her mother. It was thought preferable, for an English actress, to the Spanish name of her father. Her slight foreign accent has been long since overcome.

—The fact is not generally known that the wives of nearly all the officers of VICTOR EMANUEL'S household are Americans.

—MARTIN LUTHER'S translation of the Bible is said to have had a circulation thus far of 361,000,000 copies.

—"Miss Grundy" writes that unquestionably the most beautiful woman in Washington is the bride of the minister resident from Ecuador. Imagine a rounded yet slender girlish figure, a perfect oval face, transparent skin of creamy whiteness, large velvety dark eyes beaming with intelligence, soft brown hair, a delicately formed nose, and a rose-bud mouth, which opening discloses perfect teeth, and you have a faint idea of Madame FLORES. Add to this that the little mouth never essays to speak without saying something charming, and that the great gift of a wonderful voice in singing has been added, and you may believe there is occasion to congratulate the proud husband and Washington society as well because of this latest acquisition to the diplomatic corps.

—This is the peculiarity of a widow in Dorchester, Massachusetts: She has been thrice married. Her first husband was ROBB, the second ROBBINS, and the third ROBBINSON. The same door-plate has served for the whole three, and the conundrum is, Is the plate long enough for a longer name of the same general style?

—Mr. and Mrs. LORIMER GRAHAM are said to give the finest social entertainments in Florence. Mr. GRAHAM has discharged the duties of consul with an ability and acceptance that are proverbial, and made him alike popular with the people among whom he resides and his countrymen. His ample income is dispensed with most liberal and refined hospitality.

—KEIJO KAWAMOORA, a young Japan painter sojourning in this country, has developed remarkable artistic capacity, and is highly commended by professionals and amateurs.

—When LAPLACE met the late Mrs. SOMERVILLE for the first time he said, in his lofty way, "Madam, there have been only three women who have understood me—yourself, CAROLINE HERSCHEL, and a Mrs. GREIG, of whom I have never been able to learn any thing." "I was Mrs. GREIG," said the modest little woman. "So, then, there are only two of you," exclaimed the philosopher.

—In reference to the marriage of WILLIAM H. GOOD to SUSAN A. WOOD, at Spunky Point, some one versifies thus:

> "Said WILLIAM GOOD to SUSAN WOOD,
> 'I really wish you would be Good.'
> Said SUSAN WOOD to WILLIAM GOOD,
> 'I will, as you my heart have Woo'd.'"

—Mr. ROBERT CHARLETON, a member of the Society of Friends, who was a prominent public man in Bristol, and was one of the party of Quakers who had an interview with the Emperor NICHOLAS just before the breaking out of the Crimean war, died a few days ago, at the age of sixty-four. The party of Quakers did much to convince the Czar that England would not wage war, and thereby were the innocent cause, to some extent, of bringing it about.

—Dr. LIVINGSTONE'S daughter is living very quietly and unostentatiously in Glasgow, Scotland, devoting her time to literature and the fine arts.

—M. l'Abbé HOUSSAYE, one of the most distinguished of the Paris clergy, has just published the first installment of a life of Cardinal DE BÉRULLE, so well known as a diplomatist, and also as having founded the French Oratory. The principal feature of this work consists in the cardinal's correspondence relating to the marriage of CHARLES I. with the Princess HENRIETTA of France. Several letters forming part of this series, which had never been printed before, will appear in the second volume.

—The widow of General CHESNEY, of the English army, the designer of the Euphrates Valley Railway and many valuable scientific works, has been recommended by Mr. GLADSTONE for a pension of £100. An application has also been made in her behalf to the Indian government for a similar grant.

—Several dons, deans, and dignitaries in and about Oxford have got up a letter to the university authorities designed to prevent the appointment of Dean STANLEY as one of the select preachers to that university. In the letter to the dean Dr. GOULBURN expresses his unlimited admiration for his character and abilities, and explains his motive for the course he has taken, which is that Dean STANLEY is "in the habit of throwing the whole weight of his high character, brilliant abilities, and eminent position into the support of the rationalistic school—a school which seeks to eliminate from Christianity both its doctrinal and supernatural elements."

—Prince BORGHESE, whose wedding was recently celebrated with so much splendor, finds himself not married after all. Disregarding the law of the kingdom of Italy, which allows no man to change his name, nor to take his wife's name, as was customary under the papal government, he added his wife's name, TORLONIA, to his own. The government has, therefore, informed the prince that his marriage is illegal, and the notary and others who signed the settlement have been heavily fined for being parties to an illegal marriage.

—Signor LANZA, Minister of the Interior of Italy, has become so irate against the gypsies that he has addressed a circular to all the prefects in the kingdom directing them to expel every gypsy, according to the provisions of the penal code. "The gypsies," he says, "go about explaining dreams and telling fortunes, and thus extort money by fraud and robbery. They are nuisances in the cities, dangerous in the country places, and indecent every where."

—It is intimated that Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY, a frequent contributor to the publications of HARPER & BROTHERS, proposes to come hither to lecture, and that ROBERT BROWNING also thinks of beaming upon the U. S.

—Lieutenant STEEVER, of the United States army, will probably head an expedition during the present year to ascertain if Jordan be really the difficult road to traverse as is stated in song by the minstrel of the period.

—Miss ALICE M. WELLINGTON, who has written several poems that have attracted attention recently, is a teacher of modern languages in the Girls' High School, Boston.

—Mr. BIRDSALL, who for sixteen years past has been at the head of the coin department at the Sub-Treasury in this city, has resigned that position, and is succeeded by GEORGE ASHLEY, of Little Falls, New York. Mr. BIRDSALL is one of the most remarkable coin experts in the world, and his wonderful dexterity as a detector of spurious coin is almost incredible.

—Mrs. MARY BALDWIN, who died on the 8th ult. at Trenton, Illinois, was a direct descendant in the third generation of Rev. JAMES WETMORE, assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, from 1723 to 1726, and rector of Rye, Westchester County, from 1726 to 1760.

—The Neapolitan papers record the curious fact that the local authorities have granted permission to Madame THALBERG to preserve the embalmed body of her famed husband in a glass case above-ground, at the villa of her father, the celebrated LABLACHE, where she resides.

Hosted by Google

Music Portfolio with Application Embroidery in Twisted Stitch, Figs. 1-3.

THIS portfolio is made of bronzed and black polished cane. The front is furnished with a foundation of green cloth, scalloped in the middle, under which is set a medallion of gray gros grain with raised embroidery worked in twisted stitch. Fig. 2 shows the middle of the foundation in full size, and Fig. 3 the manner of working the twisted stitch. As seen in the illustration, tie the end of a double thread passed through the eye of a sewing or darning needle together with the end of a single thread, wind the latter on the needle, and slip the windings on the double thread; these windings should lie regularly side by side, so as to form a roll of even thickness. To work the flowers and leaves of the design similar rolls made with worsted and silk in various colors and shades of different lengths are sewed together on the wrong side, as seen by Fig. 2, so as not to show the stitches.—The finished design figures are also sewed on the foundation as shown by Fig. 2.

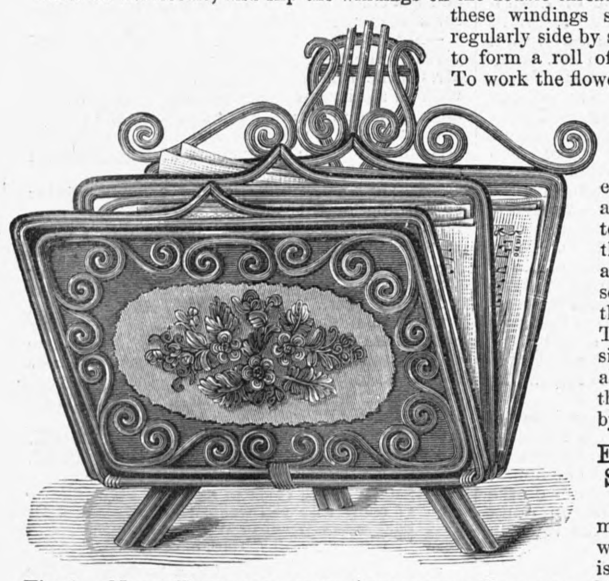

Fig. 1.—MUSIC PORTFOLIO WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY IN TWISTED STITCH.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

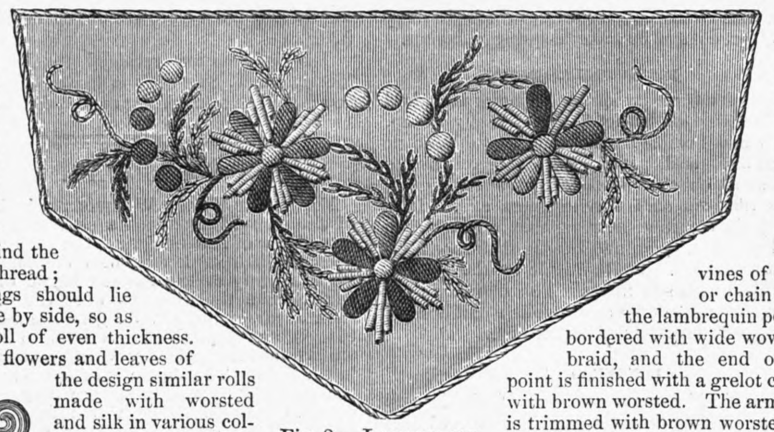

Fig. 2.—LAMBREQUIN FOR SMOKING STAND.

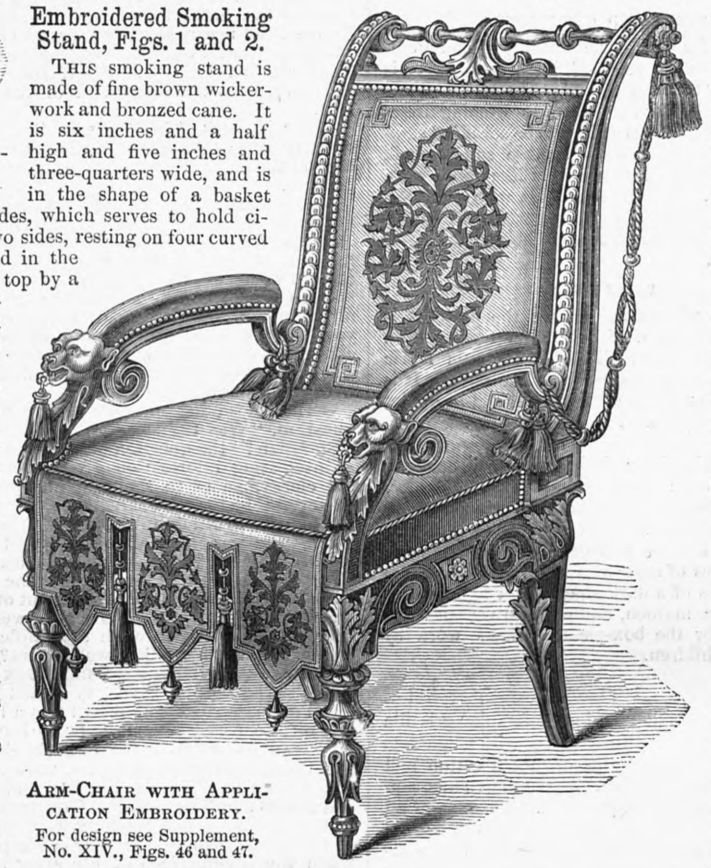
Fig. 3.—MANNER OF MAKING TWISTED STITCH FOR PORTFOLIO.

Embroidered Smoking Stand, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS smoking stand is made of fine brown wickerwork and bronzed cane. It is six inches and a half high and five inches and three-quarters wide, and is in the shape of a basket open at the sides, which serves to hold cigars. The two sides, resting on four curved legs, are joined in the middle of the top by a broad flat handle, into which are set a bronze tray covered with sand-paper for lighting matches, a small bronze case for matches, and a bronze ash-receiver. The sides and handle of the stand are ornamented, as shown by Fig. 1, with small embroidered green gros grain lambrequins, one of which, for the sides, is shown in full size by Fig. 2. The embroidery is worked in satin and half-polka stitch and in point Russe embroidery with gray saddler's silk in several shades, and with gold bullion and gold thread. The lambrequins are edged with fine gold cord and bronze grelots.

GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS.
For description see Supplement.



ARM-CHAIR WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
For design see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 46 and 47.

Arm-Chair with Application Embroidery.

THIS chair is made of black polished and brown stained wood richly carved. The cushion is covered with fawn-colored cloth ornamented in application embroidery with brown gros grain in a darker shade. Lambrequin points, embroidered in a similar manner, are joined to the seat. Fig. 47, Supplement, gives a quarter section of the design for the embroidery on the back of the chair, and Fig. 46 gives one-half of the design for one of the lambrequin points on the seat. The application design figures are edged with fine brown silk cord. For the stems and vines of the design sew on brown silk braid with a cross seam of saddler's silk of the same color. Instead of this, the application design figures may be surrounded with button-hole or chain stitches, and the stems and vines of the design may be worked with several rows of half-polka or chain stitches. The embroidery on the back of the chair and on the lambrequin points is bordered with wide woven silk braid, and the end of each point is finished with a grelot covered with brown worsted. The arm-chair is trimmed with brown worsted cord and tassels as shown by the illustration.

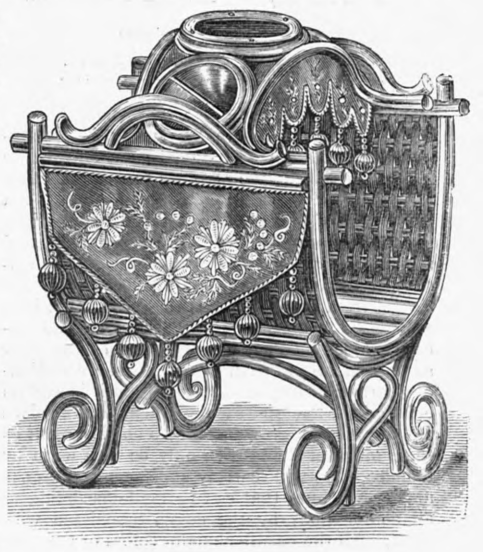


Fig. 1.—SMOKING STAND.—[See Fig. 2.]

Cigar-Tray with Application Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 85.

THIS oval cigar-tray, of red Russia leather, is supported by small feet, and is ten inches and seven-eighths long, and seven inches and three-quarters wide through the middle. The inlaid rim is two inches wide. The bottom is covered on the inside with application embroidery, which is shown in full size by Fig. 2. The foundation of the embroidery is of gray cloth. The flowers of the design, which simulate the flowers of the tobacco plant, are applied in light gray gros grain or faille, and the outlines and veins are worked in half-polka stitch with pink saddler's silk in two shades, and the filaments in knotted stitch with yellow silk. The leaves are worked with saddler's silk in several shades of green and brown, the outlines and veins in half-polka stitch; one-half of the leaves are filled with similar silk in back stitch, and the vines are worked with green and brown silk in half-polka stitch and point Russe. This is a very pretty adjunct to a gentleman's room, and can be made with little difficulty. In the absence of Russia leather, the tray may be made of carriage leather or morocco.

GROS GRAIN AND VELVET CRAVAT BOW WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS.
For description see Supplement.

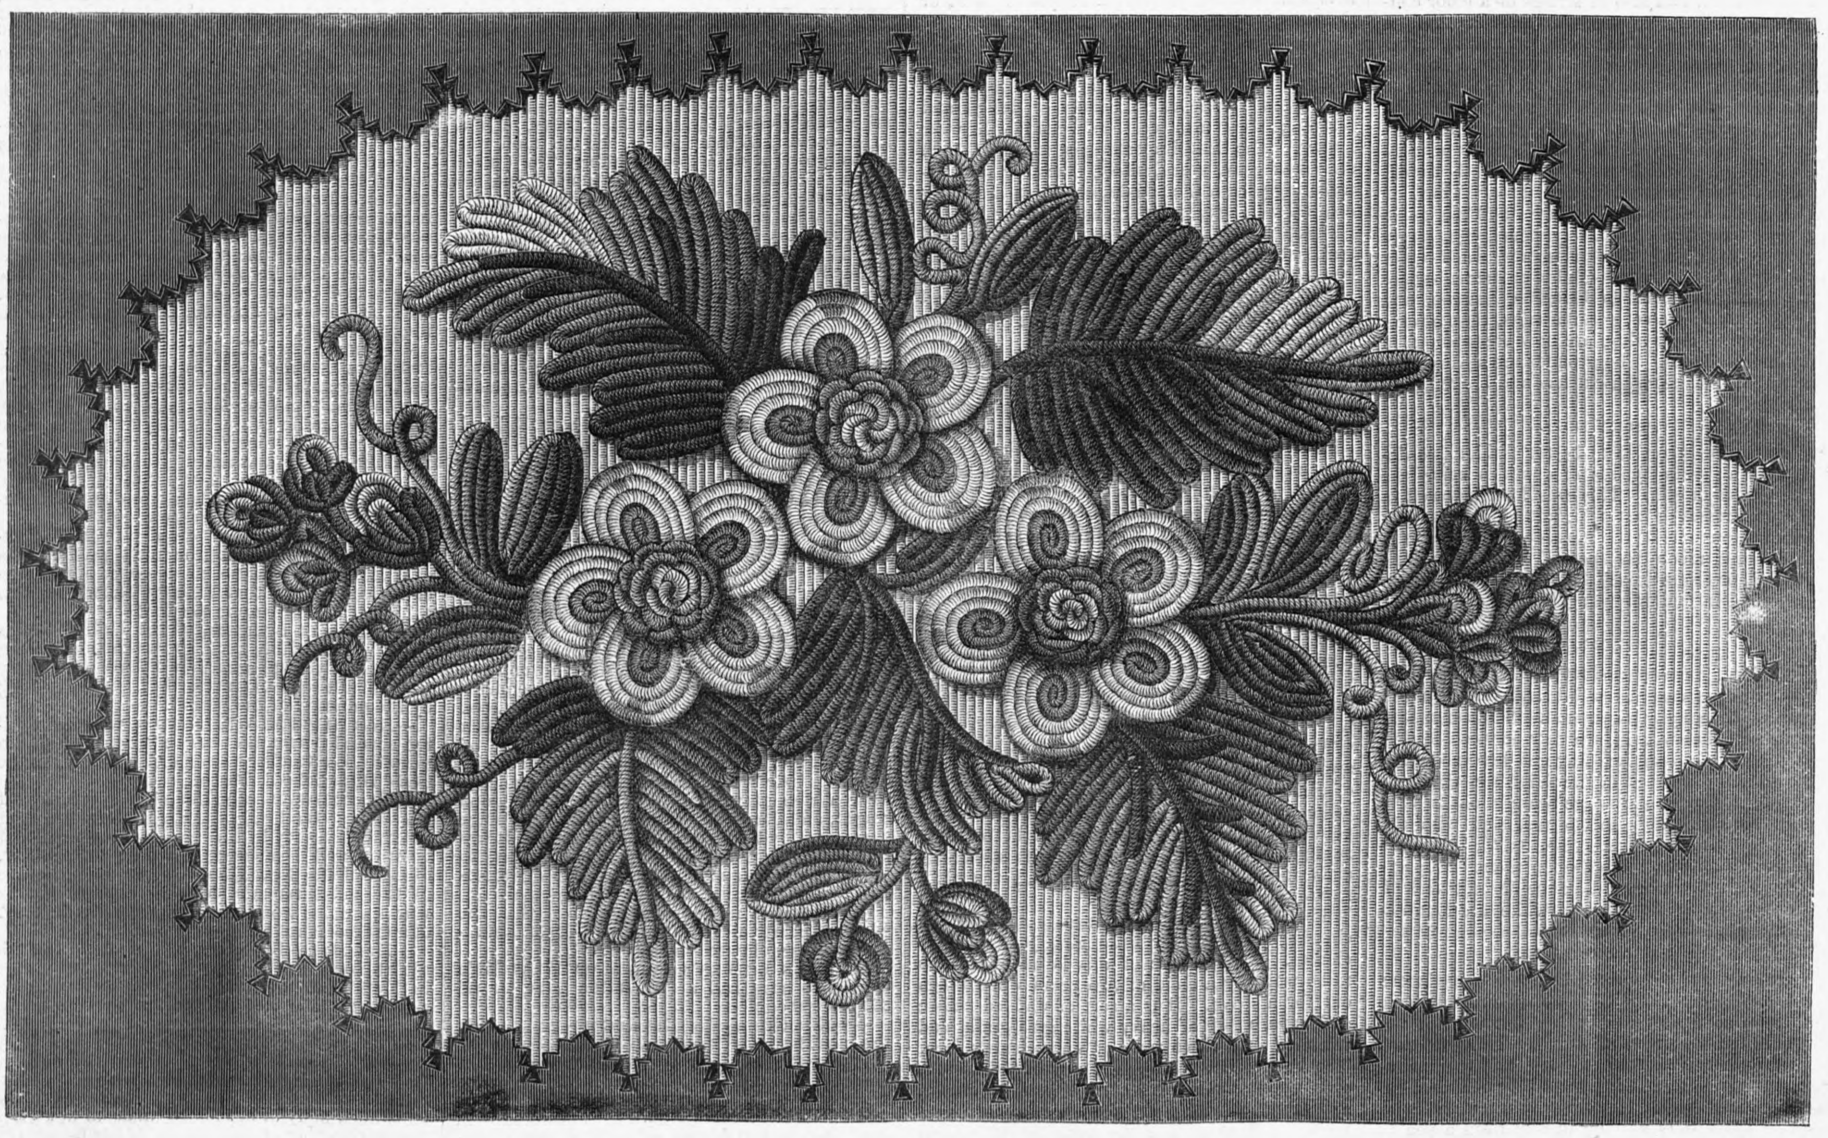

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY IN TWISTED STITCH FOR PORTFOLIO.—[See Fig. 3.]

Hosted by Google

Embroidered Key-Pocket.

THIS key-pocket is made of brown silk and enameled cloth, and is ornamented in half-polka stitch and point Russe embroidery with dark and light brown saddler's silk. Cut of both materials one whole piece from Fig. 48, Supplement, for the back, and of the outer material only one piece for the front of the pocket; for the lining cut of enameled cloth two equal pieces from Fig. 49. Work, first, on the silk designed for the front the embroidery as partly indicated on the pattern and as shown by the illustration, cut a slit along the double line on Fig. 48, baste the silk on the enameled cloth so that the revers of the latter rest on the silk as shown by the illustration; border the revers first with long and then with close button-hole stitches of dark brown silk, and sew the revers on the silk, above the button-hole stitches, with a row of half-polka stitches of similar silk. On the corners of the revers set small buttons covered with brown silk; underneath one of these buttons fasten a loop of elastic cord, which serves for closing the pocket. Having worked an embroidered border on the silk for the back similar to that of the front, baste the former on the lining, and overseam both parts of the pocket together on the outer edge. The pocket is also edged with fine brown silk cord, which is button-hole stitched on with lighter brown saddler's silk. Instead of enameled cloth and silk, the pocket may be made entirely of leather.

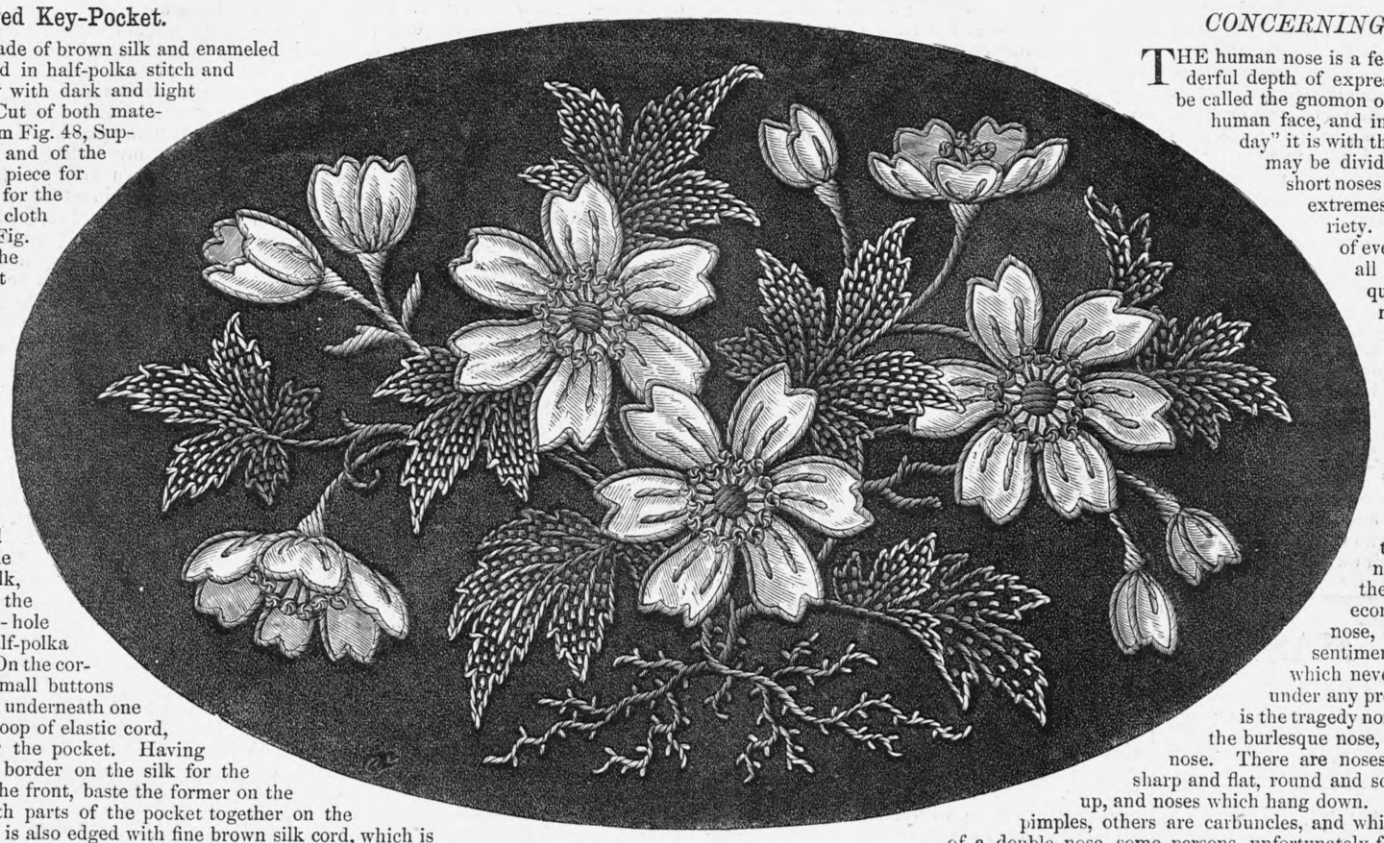

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY FOR CIGAR-TRAY.

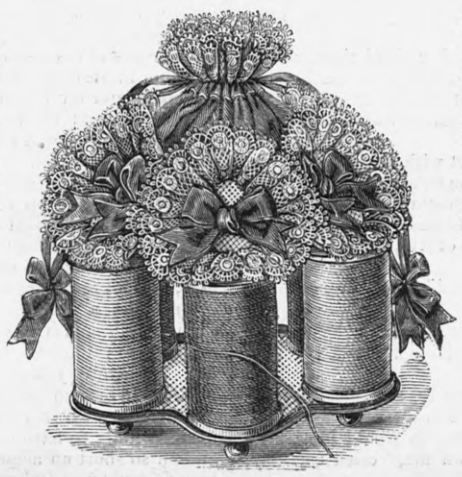
Spool-Stand trimmed with Silk and Lace.

To make this spool-stand, which is furnished with a small bag for holding sewing utensils, remnants of thread, etc., cut, first, of card-board two whole pieces, and of coarse perforated board four equal pieces, from Fig. 25, Supplement. On both sides of each piece of card-board paste one of the pieces of perforated board, and edge each of the plates thus formed on the scalloped outer edge with a bias strip of blue silk. On one (the upper) plate, a quarter of an inch from each hollow between the scallops, set a bag edged on the upper edge with guipure lace seven-eighths of an inch wide, which is made of a straight strip of blue silk eight inches long and two inches and a half wide, sewed up on the ends and hemmed on the outer edge, and furnished with two pieces of narrow blue silk ribbon run through the hem on the upper edge in opposite directions, for the shirr; the ends of the ribbons are tied in a bow each. In order to fasten the spools between the plates take a thread of coarse black silk, or fine silk cord, six inches long, slip a large black bead to the middle of the cord (these beads serve to support the spool-stand), pass each half of the cord separately through the points marked ● on the lower plate, then pass both halves together through the spool, and again pass each half of the cord separately through the points indicated on the upper plate, then tie the ends together and cut them off. To conceal the knots trim the upper plate, as shown by the illustration, with six diamonds of perforated board seven-eighths of an inch square each, surround them with lace, and finish each in the middle with a bow of narrow blue silk ribbon. These diamonds are fastened with one corner on the outer edge of the plate in the middle of a scallop, and with the opposite corner on the bag, while at the other two corners the points of two diamonds are fastened together. This is an extremely convenient and ornamental appendage to a work-stand, and is very easily made with the help of the illustration.

Fig. 1.—CIGAR-TRAY WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 2.]



SPOOL-STAND WITH SILK AND LACE TRIMMING.

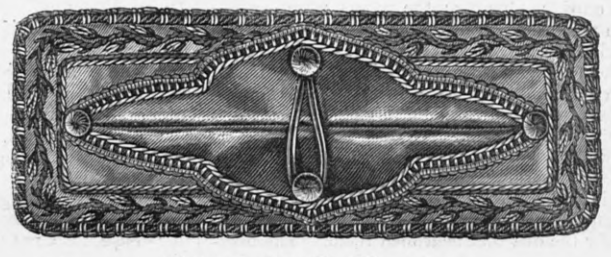
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 25.

CONCERNING NOSES.

THE human nose is a feature capable of a wonderful depth of expression. It may, indeed, be called the gnomon of the mental dial in the human face, and indicates what "time of day" it is with the individual. Mankind may be divided into long noses and short noses; but between these two extremes there is an infinite variety. There are, indeed, noses of every kind and degree, and all clearly express some quality or condition of the moral and intellectual man. The difficulty is how to classify so numerous a collection. There is the cogitative nose, the apprehensive nose, the inquisitive nose, the combative nose, the defensive nose, the aggressive nose, the irritable nose, the secretive nose, the confiding nose, the acquisitive nose, the economical nose, the toper's nose, the pugilist's nose, the sentimental nose, and the nose which never can look sentimental under any provocation. Then there is the tragedy nose and low comedy nose, the burlesque nose, and even the vegetable nose. There are noses hooked and crooked, sharp and flat, round and square, noses which turn up, and noses which hang down. Some noses are merely pimples, others are carbuncles, and while we occasionally hear of a double nose, some persons, unfortunately for them, have no noses at all. There are some noses one meets with in the street which one can not help envying; they are so prying and pertinacious, so prominent and important, that they appear sure to make their way in the world. Looking at this organ as a sign of mental development, it might be said that the Roman nose means executiveness, martial courage; the Greek nose, refinement; the Jewish nose, commercialism; the Celestial nose, inquisitiveness; and the snub, undevelopment. The men with snub noses, it has been remarked, are, however, rather an amiable class of individuals. There is a rich store of humor and drollery about their noses, which causes their wearers to be much sought after as boon companions. They are often cunning shavers, "fellows of infinite jest, and most excellent fancy." Abstractedly considered, a nez retroussé is not prepossessing. Looking at the nose itself, we would not form a high opinion of the mental or moral qualities of the bearer of such a nose; yet it is an undeniable fact that many men who have been born into the world with snub noses have risen to great eminence, and in the race of life have often left behind them men with far better ones. Nay, we know instances in which men with most ridiculous-looking little snub noses have contrived to step over the heads of men with large, imposing, aristocratic-looking Roman noses. As a rule, however, the long nose carries the day.

A thin, pinched nose is universally admitted to be a characteristic of sordid, self-mortifying, and miserly individuals, and is so employed by painters, novelists, and dramatists. A sharp, hooked, flexible one accompanies a propensity to scandal. The cock-nosed men are a busy, bustling race, remarkable for their self-conceit, their cool assurance, and loquacity—the sort of men that will not be "put down by vulgar clamor, Sir." Persons gifted with a nasal expansion (vulgarly, horse-nosed) are generally individuals of an enthusiastic temperament. A slight dilation of nostril, to express triumph, is assigned to the Apollo Belvidere. By the same rule, pabulous and breathing nostrils are given by sculptors and painters to their evil demons and Titans, as the outward sign of arrogance and defiance.

It is curious to notice the different ideas which different nations



EMBROIDERED KEY-POCKET.

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 48 and 49.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 4 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 9-15.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 16 and 17.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 18-23.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR CHILD UNDER 1 YEAR OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 24.

Hosted by Google

have on the subject of personal beauty. In ancient Persia an aquiline nose was deemed worthy of the highest honors. The Mexicans take great pains to give their children long noses, while in Tartary the greatest beauties are those who have the shortest noses. In some other countries this feature in young children is broken by their mothers, who consider it a piece of folly to have their noses standing before their eyes. The mother of Tamerlane, we are told, was regarded as a celebrated beauty because she had only two holes for a nose. Solomon entertained a very different notion on the subject, for he compared his mistress's nose to a tower, and our Saxon ancestors could find no better synonym to express a headland or promontory than ness (French nez), a nose, as Sheerness, Inverness. In his Notes in England and Italy, Hawthorne expresses the opinion that the Scotch have handsomer noses than the English. "I suspect," he writes, "the English suffer from having been mixed up with Danes and Northmen so much, and 'all Northmen are liable to have potato noses,' says Miss Bremer. I suppose the Scotch are a less mongrel race. Let this be as it may, their noses have a finer line. Perhaps some Romans who strayed up there rectified their forms with their own classic contours."

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER III.

MULVANEY'S.

THE rest of their journey was soon ended. Murphy stopped at an inn, where he saw the mare rubbed down and fed, with his own eyes, ere he took his young companion to the lodgings hard by which Kavanagh had indicated. Mulvaney's was an eating-house of humble exterior, situated in a secluded street, whereof the houses were old and gabled, and mostly built of wood: a piece of streaky bacon and some potatoes appealed to hungry stomachs in the ground-floor window; while above the words "Good Beds" addressed themselves to tired limbs. The inside of this house, which modestly drew back a little from its neighbors, was of more pretension than the outside. Though the rooms were small—with the exception of the public one, which was divided into boxes, shining with grease and age—they were very numerous, and wainscoted with oak. Most persons, finding it in so humble a place, would have taken this paneling for discolored deal, but Chesney, familiar with timber, knew better, and marveled at it. The staircase was of the same material, its steps broad and shining, its balustrades curiously carved with fruit and flowers, though these were hardly discernible for the dirt that begrimed them. The mansion had doubtless been the residence of some rich and thrifty citizen in the olden time; it had been the pride of some Dame Margery to keep the oak well polished, and to see that the sleeping-rooms smelled of dried lavender. But Dame Margery had been dead these hundred years and more; and if Widow Mulvaney, who reigned in her stead, had a preference for any odorous herb above another, it was for onions.

The smell of onions always arising from the kitchen, like a perpetual incense, pervaded the whole establishment, which was impregnated with it. You might have taken a square inch of wood-work in the spring-time from any part of the interior of the house, carried it to the Land's End, and stuck it up there for a windy summer, then placed it in a chest of ottar of roses for the winter, and in the spring again, when you took it out, your nose should tell you still, "This came from Mulvaney's." You might steep, you might shatter the wood at your will, but the scent of those onions would cling round it still. They were the chief ingredient in that Irish stew to which the frequenters of Mulvaney's (who were all from the Emerald Isle) were so patriotically partial. Even at the early hour at which our travelers arrived under this hospitable roof the grateful perfume was stealing up the kitchen stairs, and renewing its powers every where. Only one chamber, as in the case of Blue-beard's wife, was denied to it. At the back of the great eating-room was a smaller apartment, used probably, in ancient times, as the citizen's own parlor, from whence he could keep his eye upon the 'prentices in the shop, but now set apart as a withdrawing-room for smokers. Here the smell of tobacco and the reek of whisky devoured, like an Aaron's rod, all other odors.

"We'll breakfast in the smoke-room, tell Misthress Mulvaney," had been Murphy's first words to the girl who admitted them within-doors; and in this more private chamber their meal had accordingly been spread. While the travelers were doing ample justice to it there entered through an inner door the proprietress herself, a stout and rosy-cheeked widow, whom Mr. Richard Murphy, rising hastily from his chair, and sweeping the back of his hand across his lips, saluted with a very audible kiss.

"Be aisy, Dick," said she, but so calmly that the words were robbed of their rebuke, "and behave yourself before folk. Who is this?"

"A friend of the young masther's," answered Murphy.

"Good! Then he is welcome, as, of course, are you, Dick; though I am sorry to see you here." She looked around her significantly. "What's the matter now, that you must needs have a room with two doors to it?"

"The very divil's loose!" said Murphy; "I mustn't talk about it even to you. There's nothin' agin myself this time; but Chesney—that's the boy yonder—and me are to be quiet here till we have our orders. Can you put us away up stairs somewhere?"

"To be sure I can, if it was for a twelvemonth. You shall have the front-room, and Biddy shall leave hers and come to mine—that will give one to the masther's friend. It is but an attic, but—"

"Any place will do for me, ma'am," interrupted Chesney, simply.

"Oh, he ain't a young prince disguised, if that's what you mean," said Murphy, with a coarse laugh.

"He's a sight better-looking, and a deal better-spoken, than ever you were, anyway, Mr. Imperence!" returned the widow. "You've been up all night, I reckon, my good lad, and would not be sorry to feel your bed, so I'll see that it is got ready for you." And off she hurried.

"You'll not take your clothes off, boy, mind that," said Murphy, imperiously. "Remember what the young masther said: that you must be ready for a start at a moment's notice; and you'll hould your tongue, no matter how the widow yonder may blarney you; and you'll swear not to leave this house, neither night nor day—"

"I shall obey Mr. Kavanagh in every particular," observed Chesney, haughtily, and with a strong stress upon the name.

"It will be your better plan, Master Smoothface, for the hour in which he comes to harm through fault of yours will be your last, as sure as my name's Richard Murphy."

The color deepened in the lad's wholesome cheek, and his blue eyes flashed scornfully as he replied: "I have seen enough of one bully in my life, Mr. Murphy, to make me very resolute against putting up with another. I was not afraid of your pistol when you wanted to murder me for stopping your horse and saving your life, and I am not afraid of your big words; so you may spare your breath for other purposes than to threaten me. You have laid your ugly hand upon me twice—"

"Begorra, and I'll do it a third time, and to some purpose!" cried Murphy, with a hideous oath, as he rose to put his words into effect. Chesney also rose, and snatched up a knife from the table.

"This is keeping quiet with a vengeance, Mr. Murphy!" exclaimed the widow, re-entering the room at this critical moment, and precipitating herself between the would-be combatants; "and very pretty treatment of the young master's friend, I'm sure."

"He's got a knife," said Dick, abashed and apologetically.

"And quite right too, when he has to deal with a mad dog. Did Masther Frank give you orders to beat the lad?"

"No," said Dick, humbly, and resuming his seat. "I was wrong. I'm sorry."

"Not half so sorry as you would have been had you laid a finger on me," cried Chesney, angrily.

"Tush, tush, put the steel by, lad," whispered the widow. "Dick has not had his whisky this morning, and is not himself. Come, let me show you your room."

Robert Chesney picked up his bundle and followed her without even bestowing a glance at his late antagonist.

"You mustn't mind Dick," said she, confidentially, on their way up stairs: "if any body else had offered to hurt you, he'd have flown at them just the same. Here's your sleeping-room, which is but small; but if you want any thing, you have only to name it."

"I should like some ink, if you please," said the lad; "that's all."

"Ink?" answered the widow, admiringly. "What! you can write, can you? Why, Dick couldn't write his name to save his life!"

"Pen and paper I have in my bundle," observed Chesney: "it's only ink I want, and the favor of getting my note posted when I have written it."

"I thought from the first he was one of the quality," murmured Widow Mulvaney, as she went down stairs: "his hair curled so, and he was so soft spoken, and now he is for writing notes. I wonder whether it will be to his mother, poor lad. He ain't one of our own boys, who fall in love before they are short-coated, or I should say, since he is in such haste, that it must needs be to his sweetheart."

Weary and travel-stained as he looked, Robert Chesney was indeed a well-favored youth, very different from the majority of customers with whom Mrs. Mulvaney was wont to deal. Though humbly born and rudely bred, he had had the advantage of a good schooling, and took a pride in his personal appearance unusual with those of his own age and position in life. But for the circumstances of a drunken step-father and an unhappy home, he might have risen from being the head pupil of a national school to any pinnacle of parochial greatness; but domestic injustice and tyranny had warped a mind naturally sensitive enough to the claims of authority, and set his feet on a far different path. Of kindness, to which he was but little used, he was very susceptible, and Kavanagh's words and manner had won his heart at a time peculiarly opportune for making a pact of friendship. Unimpulsive himself, he had been attracted by the other's reckless confidence to a degree that astonished him, as he now reviewed in quiet the stirring events of the past night. It was satisfactory, of course, that within a few hours from his voluntary exile from his step-father's roof he should have found a helpful friend, a temporary home, and possibly a career for the future: but what price might not he have to pay for these undoubted advantages? Nay, what price might he not have already paid for them? He had been seen by many in company with one who, even by his own account, had incurred the highest penalty of the law. He did not for a moment believe him to be guilty in a moral sense; his own experience of life, which had somehow placed the sense of justice in opposition to obedience to authority, inclined him to take this view; while Kavanagh himself, independent of his disclaimer, impressed him as being quite incapable of an atrocity; but still his fortunes had evidently become linked with that of a dangerous and desperate man. The measure of precaution that had been taken to insure his new friend's escape from his pursuers was, to say the least of it, a strong one. If Murphy had not prevented him, he, for his part, it is true, would have given warning of their danger to the hapless patrol who, for all he knew, had met with their deaths from the fallen tree; but he had not done so, and he was now the willing companion of those who had caused the catastrophe. For all that he had run away from home with nothing beyond what he carried on his back, and with very hazy notions of gaining a livelihood, Robert Chesney was a sensible English lad, who looked matters in the face even when they were serious.

As to breaking the word he had passed to Kavanagh to keep silence upon his late adventure, that never entered into his mind; but he did ponder with precocious gravity upon the advisability of cutting his new connections altogether. Murphy was abhorrent to him, of course—a brutal copy of his own drunken step-father; but there was this difference: from early association his relative by marriage had obtained a certain ascendency over him; until quite recently, indeed, he had never even resisted his correction; but as for this hulking savage (his thoughts were pregnant with unsavory epithets for him), he did not fear him one whit. His society—so much of it, at least, as would be necessary for him to endure—would, doubtless, be distasteful to him; but his pride revolted against making this a very important item in his calculations. And, on the other hand, he had taken something more than a fancy for Murphy's master. Robert had met with gentlemen, and very grand ones, in his time—magnates of his own and other countries, who had shot in the royal park, under his step-father's guidance, and for whom he had acted as beater or game-bearer; but he had never seen so kindly a face, never heard such gentle tones, as those of Frank Kavanagh. No doubt, the kindliness and gentleness had gained by contrast with the moodiness, and even ferocity, he had also exhibited: the self-willed and passionate man has always that advantage over his more equable fellows, that when he does make himself agreeable, it is all the more appreciated, like a clump of trees on a bare moor; and Kavanagh had showed his genial side only to the boy, his rougher attributes to others. Moreover, he had trusted to his word, just as though he had been a gentleman instead of a poor lad, and that in a matter of the gravest sort. It was a rash and reckless thing to have done in so serious a case, and on so short an acquaintanceship, as the boy himself could well understand; and this endeared his new friend to him all the more. Lastly, to have his vague plan for the future fashioned for him into some practical shape would have been very welcome, even had it taken a less attractive guise; and this suggestion of leaving England, and seeking his fortune in some far-away region, exactly chimed in with his own longings. But perhaps what, more than aught else, finally decided Robert Chesney to accept, on reflection, the proposal which he had so hastily embraced, was this trifling circumstance: as he stood in the national attitude for reflection, with one hand scratching his head and the other thrust into his breeches pocket, the jingle of golden coin fell upon his ear. With the rattle of copper he was familiar, with the clink of silver even he had some acquaintance; but to rub one piece of gold against another had never yet fallen within his own experience. He pulled out the two sovereigns which his patron had given him to make merry with, and gazed on them as an Esquimau gazes on a clasp-knife, or an Otaheitan woman on a looking-glass.

Hope is cheerful, and ambition is seductive; but the possession of ready money in the unaccustomed hand is the realization of man's brightest dream.

CHAPTER IV.

A LOVE-LETTER.

Two golden sovereigns to make merry with! He had slipped them into his pocket, taking them for shillings, his attention—to do him justice—being occupied at the time with bidding adieu to the donor; and he had not thought of them since. How profitable should that service be in which such a sum was bestowed as the means of mere amusement! And yet Robert Chesney's mind was not a grasping one, nor even unduly set upon what is miscalled "the main chance"—as though that could be "chance" which every man may acquire for himself, if he be prudent or roguish enough; or as if that chance were "the main" one in which self is alone concerned! No, it was not on his own account that his heart leaped within him at the sight of that golden store, but because it reminded him of one with whom he could instantly share it.

He untied his little bundle, and took from it pen and paper; and standing beside the mantelpiece—for the attic did not boast a table—wrote, in a good clerkly hand (Mrs. Mulvaney having kept her word as to the ink-bottle) the following letter:

"MY DARLING LIZZY,—Little did I think, when I bade you good-by last night, that I should have great news to tell you so soon. I have met with a kind friend—whose name, for the present, you must be content to guess at, since he has reasons for its concealment—and I am in hopes he will put me in the way of making my living. I can not even give you my present address, for he is not at hand to give me leave to do so; and, besides, whether I shall be here even to-morrow is more than doubtful. You are too sensible, I know, to fret, when I tell you that I am going abroad—an uncertain word, you will say, and yet I have nothing to tell you more distinctly—a great way off, my darling—beyond seas. Well, that was my own wish, you know. Step-father was seldom right in word or deed as respected me, but he spoke truth (I feel) when he used to say that England was no place for a young fellow who would make his way in the world quickly; and I have the sweetest reason—have I not?—to make it quickly. I shall write to you whenever I can. I shall think of you always—of the long summer days (that seemed so short) which we have spent together in the forest glades. I see them now in this place, where there is not a tree; I see the beech wood by our lodge, with your red cloak glinting through their silver stems; I see the mighty elm in front of your cottage door, nodding to me as though in farewell. I do not write thus to pain you, you may be sure, but to convince you that I am still with you in my thoughts. Enough of myself. I conclude nothing has occurred within these few hours to you, though so much has happened to me. It was a comfort to remember that the wind would blow the elm away from your roof, not on it. You will be talking of nothing but the gale to-day—I mean your mother and James will be doing so. Then, about eleven (it is only seven o'clock when I write this), step-father will come in with the news that I have left home. Then you will look surprised (little hypocrite!), and your mother will weep, I know. God bless her! I fear there are hard times approaching for her. James will never get your poor father's place unless he is more careful: I know he is suspected of poaching. It seems hard, in a land where so much is inherited, to have been left nothing but a taste in which we are forbidden to indulge. If any opening should occur for him where I am going, I will let him know. I need not tell you to credit nothing that step-father says of me; but see your mother is not misled: I should be loath indeed to lose the good opinion of one who has been so kind to me. A time may come when I may repay it; and, Lizzy darling, I believe it will. I noticed yesterday how thin her shawl was got: give her this sovereign, with my dear love, to buy her a warmer one on this Christmas-tide. When she looks at it she will remember me; and before the remembrance is worn out—who knows!—I may come home—I mean to your home—to remind her of myself in person. How did I get it? Well, never mind, it was honestly come by. And don't think that I need it. There has been already a drizzle of sovereigns upon me; and if it should come on to pour, in the tropics somewhere, I shall hold out my hat, turn up my umbrella (a palm leaf) the wrong way, and get thoroughly soaked; then come back to England to be dried. Since you may like to know where I have kissed this paper, I make a mark: I already feel your lips there, and tremble. How grown you will be when I see you next! but you will never be more beautiful in my eyes, for that is impossible. I have got your sampler, with 'Trust in me' upon it. I do; I will: and believe me always, for my part, your loving sweetheart,

"ROBERT CHESNEY.

"I promised to tell you every thing, even if it should not be good news, as you have promised to tell me. Well, my new friend has a companion who is not pleasant—a sullen brute of a fellow, with whom I may have some trouble: even he, however, has his good point—an unreasoning attachment to his master, such as I have never seen except in step-father's dog Fang."

Robert had the pen of a ready writer, but this note took him long to compose: he was permitted by the nature of the case to say so little about his own adventures; and when he wrote of Lizzy he had a way of lingering lovingly over the words, and even (as we have seen) of kissing them, which prolonged the process. He had done at last, however; and having addressed the letter to "Lizzy Alston, Green Lane Gate, Windsor Park," was about to get it posted, when he found his door had been locked on the outside. There was no bell in the room—indeed, his habits did not lead him to look for such—and he began to shake the door-handle and kick the panel.

"Hush, hush, in Heaven's name!" said the landlady's voice through the key-hole.

"I will not hush," was the lad's angry reply; "I will not be locked in, as though I were a spy and a liar."

"Mr. Murphy has gone out, and, I suppose, taken the key with him; he will be back soon, and shall open the door, I promise you. No honest lad shall be kept a prisoner in my house. In the mean time, what is it you want?"

"I want this letter posted."

"Very good. Put it under the door."

"Can I trust her?" thought Robert, hesitating.

"I will not deceive you, my good lad," continued she, guessing the cause of the delay; "I will put it into the box with my own hands." She took the letter and went down stairs with it at once; as she did so her eyes lit on the superscription, and a smile spread over her good-natured face. "So he has a sweetheart, after all," she murmured. "What luck it is for her to have a lover as can write! It would be something, now that my poor dear Miles is with the saints, to have an ould letter or two in his own hand to keep by one; but I could never teach him even the capitals. Lor, Mr. Murphy, how you frightened me! What is it?"

"Nothin', sweetheart: only I want that letter;" and suiting the action to the word, Mr.

Hosted by Google

'Kavanagh's henchman snatched it from her, and retreated backward, holding it behind him, into the smoking-room, from which he had suddenly emerged.

Mrs. Mulvaney's face grew two shades nearer scarlet than heretofore. "Bad scran to you, you thief!" cried she, following him quickly into the room. "Give me up that letter! Sweetheart, indeed! Your lips shall never touch Bridget Mulvaney's cheek again, if once you break that seal. I'll tell the young masther what a mane sneak of a foster-brother he has."

"Tush, tush! it's for his sake I do it, woman. Yon lad is new to us all, and we know nothin' of him. The masther's in trouble—sore trouble, that I dare not speak of even to yourself. How much less, then, should I trust a gossoon like that?"

"How came you to trust him at all, then?" inquired the widow, incredulously. "If he knows, he knows."

"He knows something, and is in a position to tell it, which is more than he should have been if I had had my way; but you know what the young masther is—if he takes a fancy to man or woman, all's out."

"I believe the lad is as true as steel."

"That's because you're a woman, and the young fellow is good-looking, like myself. Well, he may be steel, and yet, without knowing it, he may have written something here which would bring Frank Kavanagh to the gallows."

"The gallows!" cried the widow, with a shudder. "Is it as bad as that, Mr. Murphy? and not a spy nor a gauger in all England to excuse the matter."

"That is so, Misthress Mulvaney; and you had best ask me no more questions. The point is this: though the lad up yonder knows nothing of the trouble, he knows of something that happened afterward to a couple of dirty policemen that followed us on horseback."

"Ah, the blackguards!" ejaculated the widow; "bad luck to them."

"Well, they hadn't good luck, and that's a fact," said Murphy, grimly; "and if the lad has chanced to mention it to his friends, they may put two and two together, and find out more than he has. Besides, in his pride at staying at a private hotel, he may have written 'Mulvaney's' at the top of the note, and it's very particular to keep our whereabouts dark for the present."

"There's something in that," assented the widow, won over, perhaps, no less by this complimentary reference to her establishment than by his arguments. "But you needn't have snatched the letter out of my hand like a footpad. Here; give it to me—for it's no more use to yourself than a mass-book to a monkey—and I'll read it out to you aloud."

"You'll promise to read every word of it?" said Murphy, hesitating, and holding the letter high above his head; "and not to hide any thing, out of softness for the lad?"

"Yes, yes, I will," answered the widow, impatiently. Perhaps she was not altogether sorry thus to satisfy her own curiosity as to the contents of the young fellow's love-letter under compulsion and without twinge of conscience; and Murphy put it into her hand.

"Begorra, there's money in the seal!" cried she; "and what a mane crature am I to meddle with it! He's sending his sweetheart a bit of gold, just as my Miles, when he was courting myself, once sent me half a sovereign on my birthday, only it was stolen in the post. 'MY DARLING LIZZY,' it begins, just as his did, saving my name was Bridget.—Now, Murphy, if there's any thing particularly sweet in it, you must look another way, plaze, while I read it out. Now silence, and be aisy, Sir." The last words had reference to a tender movement on the part of Mr. Murphy, who had stolen his arm round her buxom waist, under the pretense (somewhat transparent, considering that he could not read) of commanding a full view of the letter. It was curious to watch the rapid change from excess of anger to the height of good-humor in these late antagonists, and the mutual friendliness that had taken the place of what had so lately threatened to be a very pretty quarrel.

"'Little did I think, when I bade you good-by last night, that I should have great news to tell you so soon.'"

"There, didn't I say he was going to tell, the sneaking spalpeen!" ejaculated Murphy.

"'I have met with a kind friend—whose name, for the present, you must be content to guess at, since he has reasons for its concealment.'

"There, you see!" cried the widow, triumphantly; "if you did say he was a-going to tell, Dick, you was a liar."

"Well, any way, he's set a woman to guess at it," answered Murphy, obstinately; "and that's very nigh as bad as telling."

"'I can not even give you my present address, for he is not at hand to give me leave to do so.'

"Come, what do you think of that, Murphy? Is he not the broth of a boy, and as true as I told you?"

"She'll be coming after him, and find it out," argued the other, doubtfully. "There was a Pagan woman as did that onst, from Palestine, as had no other address to go by beyond London. Nothing stops them."

"Don't talk to me of your painted women, Mr. Murphy."

"Pagan, Misthress Mulvaney—Pagan," explained Dick, apologetically. "There's a song written about it, as the young masther sings."

"Then he ought to be ashamed of himself, and you for listening to him. Listen to this, Sir, and learn a lesson in good behavior from yon poor lad. How kindly he speaks of his Lizzy's mother, as is old and poor." And she read the extract out, approvingly.

"Sure, she isn't his mother-in-law yet," observed Mr. Murphy, cunningly, "or he would not speak of her that way. Now it's one of the many merits as would make yourself a blessing to any man that your mother (rest her soul!) is with the saints, and—"

"Be quiet, Dick, with your flattery, and let me seal up the gold again, and put the poor lad's letter into the post."

"You are deceiving me, Bridget," cried Murphy, with sudden seriousness; "I can see it in your eye; you've not read out all he says."

"Well, it's just the postscript, Dick," explained the widow, with well-affected reluctance. "There's nothing about the masther in that, I do assure you."

"I'm the best judge of that, Misthress Mulvaney, and I'll just tear the letter up from top to toe unless I hear it. So, there!"

"Well, 'I promised to tell you every thing,' writes he."

"Ay, now it's coming!" said Murphy, grimly: "them lads as has learned to write puts the main thing in their postscripts, like the girls themselves."

"'I promised to tell you every thing, even if it should not be good news. Well, my new friend'—that's the young masther, you know—'has a companion, who is not so pleasant—a sullen brute of a fellow'—this is you, Murphy—'with whom I may have some trouble.'"

"Begorra, that's like enough!" ejaculated Dick, with a great oath.

"Hush, hush, ye hathen!" said the widow, rebukefully; "and only hear how he praises you afterward.

"'Even he, however, has his good point'—there's for you—'an unreasoning attachment to his master, such as I have never seen, except—except—'"

"That's well, anyways," exclaimed Murphy, complacently; "and I'd like to know where he finds my equal in that respect.'

"'Except in step-father's dog Fang.'"

"The impudent young blackguard! Does he say that?" exclaimed Murphy, scratching his shock head.

"Yes, indeed, he does, you omadhawn," answered the widow, laughing heartily; "and now you know what comes of prying into other folk's letters. It is you that have been listening to it all, and it's the listeners that never hears any good of themselves. Come, light me a candle, Mr. Fang, while I get the sealing-wax, and try to mend what never ought to have been broken."

Doubtless Mrs. Mulvaney well knew the man with whom she was dealing, or she would have abstained from thus reminding him of Robert Chesney's sarcasm, even if she had not concealed it from him altogether; but the fact was that Murphy was rather pleased than otherwise with the testimony that had been paid to the one virtue on which he plumed himself—his fidelity—though illustrated by so homely a metaphor, and regarded its author with no increase of disfavor on account of it, but rather the reverse. A proof of this was immediately forth-coming in his giving up the key of Robert's attic to the widow, and bidding her tell him that (with the exception of the public room) he was free of the house, though forbidden to place his foot outside the door. This was not a great range of liberty; but unable, notwithstanding the fatigues of the previous night, to sleep, and tired of remaining in his own apartment without the solace of a single book, the young fellow was glad enough to take advantage of it. Without being by any means afraid of the sturdy Irishman, he would not have sought his society had it been avoidable, and, on descending to the smoke-room, it was a relief to his mind to find it empty. The time, however, hung very heavily on his hands; he was used to the free air of the forest and an out-door life, and the sense of confinement was almost unbearable. Mrs. Mulvaney's stock of literature was limited to a prophetic almanac, and a work of Catholic devotion in the Latin tongue; so that he had really nothing to do but watch the company in the coffee-room from behind the curtains of the glass door. They were a motley crew, and ranged from the mechanic in the receipt of good wages, down to the linenless wight who was spending his last copper in a go of whisky, but they were all of one type, that of working (or pretending-to-work) Irish. They all seemed to know one another, and to be known to Mrs. Mulvaney, who served them with her own hands, and had a word of friendly greeting for each of them.

She brought in Robert's own dinner at midday, but she did not dine with him; doubtless Murphy had laid injunctions on her to the contrary. Later in the day, however, the former made his appearance, and, without any allusion to their previous disagreement, informed Chesney that he had seen Mr. Kavanagh, who had made an appointment for them both to visit him on the ensuing day. Then Mrs. Mulvaney joined them, and talked to Murphy about "the boys," whom, at first, Robert took to mean her children, but afterward understood to be certain grown-up habitués of the establishment who had come under his own notice that day. In the evening some of them returned, and were spoken with apart by Murphy: they were all of the more poverty-stricken class, and seemed to regard that gentleman with great respect, and receive what he had to say to them with assent and gratitude. About eight o'clock a curious incident happened. Murphy, Mrs. Mulvaney, and Robert were sitting at supper in the little room, when the hoarse voice of a broad-sheet seller was heard in the street.

"There's news of some sort," observed the widow. "Listen!"

"It's nothing," said Murphy, roughly, and making an unnecessary clatter with his knife and fork. "These fellows always tell a parcel of lies. If you were to buy his paper, it would be only money thrown away; there would be nothing in it."

"Still it can cost nothing to listen," argued the widow. "It's Murder. Hark!"

Her warning was unnecessary, for, urged either by an instinct of imitation or by a curiosity that overwhelmed all other considerations, Murphy himself was now straining his ears to catch the fragmentary news.

"Horrible murder—murder in Buckinghamshire—murder and 'cide—horseback—mounted policemen."

"What is it?" inquired Robert, rising eagerly from his chair. His ears were unused to the sing-song style of the street newsman, but the first words and the last had fallen on them distinctly enough.

"It is murder and suicide," said the widow; "but there was also something about folks on horseback. Here are some coppers: run out, my lad, and buy a copy."

"Give them to me, and I'll buy it," said Murphy, snatching at the money: "a boy like that is sure to be made to pay twice as much as it is worth;" and he went out accordingly.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Cesnola collection of Phœnician antiquities will soon be placed on exhibition in the Metropolitan Museum. The greater portion of this interesting collection has already arrived; about one thousand pieces, which are still in Cyprus, will be forwarded immediately. Archæological treasures obtained from the sites of ancient tombs and temples in Cyprus, dating back, as it is believed by eminent British antiquarians, to 1200 or 1800 B.C., and comprising about ten thousand pieces illustrative of the history of art, religion, and race in the island where they were found, will form a most valuable addition to our Metropolitan Museum of Art. There are statues, vases, gold ornaments, vessels of glass, earthenware, bronzes, and a variety of objects too numerous to mention in detail. The statues are not wrought in marble, but in a calcareous stone common in Cyprus, and seem to be in a remarkable state of preservation. This collection was the result of seven years' labor; and some idea may be formed of its extent from the fact that General Di Cesnola and eight professional packers were occupied seven weeks in packing that portion which was carried to London, before it was purchased by Mr. John Taylor Johnston for the Metropolitan Museum. In June, 1872, sixty-three boxes of coins, engraved gems, vases, and other small articles were shipped from Cyprus for Boston; but the vessel took fire at sea, and they were all lost. The British Museum—to which institution the collection was not sold because it would not agree to keep it entire, and allow it to bear the name of the collector—has taken casts and photographs of the most important statues, and copies of all the inscriptions. The price paid for the "Cesnola Collection" is $50,000 in gold.

The grand ball for the benefit of the New York Infant Asylum, given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, January 16, was one of the most brilliant affairs of the season. The arrangements having been in the hands of a large and influential committée, the preparations for it were most excellent and complete. The music, under the direction of Grafulla, inspired every listener, the decorations were of unusual elegance, and the large hall adjacent to the Academy having been secured for a supper-room, such refreshments as Delmonico provides satisfied the most fastidious epicure.

The noble charity in aid of which this ball was given commends itself to every benevolent heart. The New York Infant Asylum was first chartered in 1865, through the efforts of Mrs. Sarah A. Richmond, who labored faithfully for it until her death. In November, 1871, several ladies of this city, seeing that the enterprise needed energetic support, put forth their united exertions, and under a revised grant of the charter opened rooms for the reception of infants at No. 24 Clinton Place. It is not merely to save helpless infants that this asylum home exists. It has ever been one of the chief aims of the managers of the institution to extend a helping and a loving hand to their erring sisters at a time when such help is most peculiarly needed. They have striven to save the unfortunate mother from further sin by offering her a home where she can take care of her child for a while, and by so cultivating her better nature while in the institution that she will be purer and stronger thereafter. In cases where it seems expedient, a veil of concealment is mercifully spread, preventing that exposure which often seems worse than death itself, and thus giving those who have made a sad mistake a chance once more to live purely and be respected. Many have been rescued from misery through the agency of this organization. More extensive accommodations are needed. Land has been purchased at the corner of Sixty-first Street and Tenth Avenue, with the building upon it. The wards are to be furnished, and donations of money, clothes, and of toys will be put to most excellent use in these new quarters.

There are many members of the house of Bonaparte still living, among whom are Prince Napoleon, who married Princess Clothilde, daughter of the King of Italy; Prince Pierre Bonaparte, who killed Victor Noir, and who is now reported to be in Corsica; Cardinal Lucien Bonaparte, who is one of the private secretaries of Pope Pius; Prince Antoine Bonaparte, who has also a position in the household of the Pope; and Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, who has borne the title of Imperial Highness. There are also several princesses of this family.

The discovery of an enormous diamond is reported from "the Cape." It is said to be of 288 carats, in color a light yellow, shape good, though slightly flawed on the surface. The actual value of this brilliant remains to be proved, but in weight it surpasses all known stones. The great Russian diamond weighs only 193 carats, and the Pitt diamond only 136. The Koh-i-noor was originally enormous—800 carats—but was "cut down" by a Venetian jeweler to 279 carats, which was its weight when exhibited in London in 1851 at the Great Exhibition. It was re-cut the next year, and now weighs 102¾ carats. The importation of Cape diamonds from South Africa has tended to depreciate the value of the inferior kinds with which they compete, though it has not affected the value of the higher qualities of precious stones.

When the weather is cold enough to admit of meat being kept for several days, it is much better for family use when at least one week old. Experts say that if a quarter of any kind of meat be hung with the cut end up, the reverse of the usual way, the juice will remain in the meat instead of running to the cut to be evaporated.

Nerves—human nerves—are to be "tuned" like harp-strings, and brought into harmony with each other when they jangle. Such, at least, is the belief of an Italian, who professes to have discovered how to remedy discords in the nervous system, and to possess the key wherewith to do the delicate work. This nerve-tuner—we are sorry his name is not made public—contracts to keep nerves in order by the month or year.

Some unknown gives the following "serious" advice to "green" skaters. It may be useful for them to read it carefully:

"Never try to skate in two directions at once. This always ends in sorrow.

"Eat a few apples for refreshment's sake while skating, and be sure to throw the cores on the ice for fast skaters to break their shins over.

"Sit down occasionally, no matter where. There is no law to prevent a new beginner from sitting down whenever he has an inclination to do so.

"Skate over all the small boys at once. Knock 'em down. It makes great fun, and they like it.

"If you skate into a hole in the ice, take it coolly. Think how you would feel if the water was boiling hot.

"If your skates are too slippery, buy a new pair. Keep buying new pairs until you find a pair that is not slippery.

"In sitting down, do it gradually. Don't be too sudden; you may break the ice.

"When you fall headlong, examine the straps of your skates very carefully before you get up. That will make every body think you fell because your skate was loose.

"Wear a heavy overcoat or cloak until you get thoroughly warmed up, then throw it off, and let the wind cool you. This will insure you a fine cold.

"After you get so you can skate tolerably well, skate three or four hours—skate frantically—skate till you can't stand."

It is said that an American lady had the chance of sharing the strangely varied fortunes of the third Napoleon, but declined the opportunity.

A Russian lady, "very young, and a native of Siberia," but who desires to be unknown to fame, has offered 50,000 rubles for a medical course for ladies, to be given at the Imperial College of Physicians.

A Chinese emperor can not select an empress from the imperial family. He must take a wife from the people, and she must belong to one of the "eight banners." When a bride was to be selected for the present emperor orders were issued to the chiefs who had daughters of the desired age to send them to the palace. Strange to say, families do not desire their daughters to become the wife of an emperor. She is not only lost, as it were, to her friends, but by her marriage her parents and family are brought into a prominent position, which is often dangerous in a country like China. However, on the appointed day six or seven hundred girls appeared. They were minutely inspected, and about sixty selected as the result of the examination. A second and a third inspection reduced the number to twenty; and finally, by a series of examinations, the empress was chosen. The young emperor seems to have felt some interest in this competitive examination, for while it was going on he had a dream. It was that he had fallen in love with a young lady, and that she was humpbacked. As lame and deformed were ordered to the palace—many being reported so by their parents to prevent their being summoned—a humpbacked girl was really among the number, and the emperor took the dream as an omen that this was the one who ought to be his wife. She was one of the first fifty or sixty selected, and medical men were consulted as to the possibility of curing the deformity. After some vain efforts it is said that a farrier, a very strong man, tried by force alone to push in the hump, and it ended in the death of the poor girl.

The trustees of the Free Library and Reading-Room of Cooper Union design to add a free circulating library to the present books, which are used only in the library-room. An endowment for this purpose has been made by Mr. Peter Cooper. There are now 277 papers and periodicals on file, and the number of volumes in the library is about 10,000. During the year 1872 397,728 persons availed themselves of the privileges of this reading-room.

The great snow-storm of December 26, 1872, has led to search among the records for snow-storms of the past. Memorable among them is a storm which occurred in February, 1829, for it is related that many persons engaged in festivities commemorative of Washington's birthday throughout the country were snowed up in halls, and had to remain in them for days. On January 15, 1831, a heavy snow-storm blocked up country and city. Churches were closed in many places the next Sunday after, partly because the high drifted snow prevented the doors from being opened. In December, 1853, and in January, 1857, there were remarkable snow-storms. On January 17, 1867, there commenced a severe storm, which raged for about twenty-five hours. The cold was intense, the wind furious, and many persons were bewildered in the blinding snow and frozen to death. There was no regular communication by rail between New York and Boston for four days.

When Louis Napoleon was released from the castle of Wilhelmshöhe and took refuge in England, he was received with friendly hospitality; and during all the time that he and his family have lived at Chiselhurst they have been treated with respect and consideration. The little village of Chiselhurst, in which Napoleon passed his last days, is in the County of Kent, about eleven miles southeast of London. The ex-emperor occupied Camden Place—a mansion which will hereafter possess great historic interest.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—Organdy Dress with Cashmere Opera Cloak.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—Gros Grain and Tulle Dress.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 39–42.

Fig. 3.—Silk Gauze Dress.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 43–45.

Fig. 4.—Faille Dress with Crêpe de Chine Opera Cloak.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—Gros Grain and Chambéry Gauze Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—Tarlatan Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 7.—Poult de Soie Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 8.—Illusion Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 9.—Gros Grain Watteau Costume.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 27ª, 27ᵇ–31.

Fig. 10.—Silk Gauze Dress.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 34–38.

Fig. 11.—Faille and Grenadine Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 12.—Poult de Soie Dress with Cashmere Opera Cloak.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 13.—Poult de Soie and Tulle Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 14.—Faille Dress.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 32 and 33.

Fig. 15.—Sea Blue Gros Grain Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 16.—Poult de Soie and Silk Gauze Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Figs. 1–16.—LADIES' BALL AND EVENING DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

THE GREATEST OF ALL IS CHARITY.

O FINE tongues, O lithe tongues, sharp-pointed to kill
The tenderest heart!
O dark words, O low words, shot swiftly, and still
With delicate art!
Whence come ye? O woman, your guilty cheeks burn—
Against your own sisters the weapons ye turn.
Go ye to the feet of the Master, and learn
That the greatest of all is Charity!

O warm faith, O firm faith, sublime canst thou be
In woman made strong!
O blind eyes, O closed eyes, refusing to see
A lover go wrong!
Believing the son, though he lies to your face;
Believing the husband through darkest disgrace:
Why can ye not rise to a still higher place
In the greatest of all, kind Charity?

O star hope, O far hope, how bright canst thou glow
In mother and wife!
O deaf ears, O closed ears, refusing to know
The wreck of a life!
Ye cheer fallen man with the very last breath;
Ye hope against hope to the gateway of death:
Why can ye not list to the message that saith,
Lo! the greatest of all is Charity!

Ye see not, ye dream not, the torturing grief
Of one at your side!
She suffers in silence, and finds no relief—
Her tears she must hide!
All wounded, all bleeding, the poor maiden heart,
Yet swift as the Indian's pitiless dart
Your keen words are sent to the tenderest part—
Though the greatest of all is Charity!

Ye see not, ye feel not, the trials that chill
A wife 'neath her load.
O'ertasked and o'erburdened, she struggles on still
'Neath duty's sharp goad.
Ye know not the length that her daily round makes;
Ye know not the cares that her feeble hand takes;
Ye add your hard words, and the straining heart breaks—
Though the greatest of all is Charity!

Ye know not, unruffled, the battle for life
A sister must wage;
Ye know not, untempted, in what deadly strife
Her heart must engage.
She reaches the brink, but the chasm appalls;
She clings with faint clutch to the slippery walls,
But down come your doubts, like a blow, and she falls—
Though the greatest of all is Charity!

Ye heed not, proud hearts, the hopeless condition
Of one who is lost:
It may be in waves of tears and contrition
Her poor soul is tossed.
Your pitiless scorn keeps her back from your door,
Your pitiless hand keeps her down evermore,
Though the Saviour himself said, "Go, sin no more"—
For the greatest of all is Charity!

O woman, O woman, the earth's sweetest flower,
Creation's bright crown!
How can ye, how can ye, still cherish the power
That holds your souls down?
O fairest, for whom all our youthful hearts burn!
O dearest, for whom all our aged eyes yearn!
O ready for Paradise, could ye but learn
That the greatest of all is Charity!

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THERE have been few balls as yet, though it is predicted that they will be numerous in January and February. In the present state of society, when our rulers are sedate old men, dinners and quiet receptions have taken the place of the noisy dancing-parties of the empire. The ladies, however, wear to these dinners and receptions precisely the same dresses that they would wear to balls—clouds of tulle, crape, and gauze, embroidered with gold, silver, silk, and, above all, with long and flat jet beads, both white and black; for jet, though it has not been out of vogue long enough to be forgotten, reappears every where, on wrappings, on dresses of tulle, silk, or black crape, in the hair, on bonnets—in fine, on every thing. With these beads are embroidered directly on the fabric galloon of different widths and Greek or Arabian borders. The prettiest trimming of this kind that I have seen was of white jet, embroidered on a tunic of white silk crape, and worn over a skirt of orange faille, trimmed with white lace. The tunic was looped on the side with a scarf of broad orange ribbon, embroidered and fringed with white jet. Orange nasturtiums and white jet lilies of the valley in the hair.

For evening dresses there are seen combinations of color which seem audacious, but which are so skillfully toned down and so ingeniously separated as to produce a most striking and beautiful effect. A dress of rose de Chine faille is about to be worn with a tunic of maize silk gauze. The rose dress is trimmed with flounces of white lace, which are separated from the ruche of white lace which forms the heading by broad maize folds. The maize tunic is trimmed in the same manner with white lace and rose folds. The same combination is made with bright green and maize, blue and pink, green and pink, gray and purple, etc.

Nothing is less exclusive than the present fashion; and as it does not adopt any thing exclusively, neither does it reject any thing, either as to the shape or material of garments or the combination of colors. A lady in these days does not study to be in the fashion, but to set a fashion for herself. There are as many long and scanty dresses worn as Louis XV. fronts, Louis XIV. trains, and Marie Antoinette toilettes. We even go much farther back in French history, and copy the Valois costume, with its deep collerettes, close gigot sleeves, and long waists. There is a perfect medley, a Babel-like confusion, in which all ages and epochs seem to be represented. The Henri III. bonnet salutes the Rabagas, and Marguerite de Valois bows to Madame de Pompadour. I defy any one to say, "Such a thing is not worn." Every thing is worn; every thing is in fashion. Never was there a reign of such diversity. After all, it is only the reflex of our political situation. If Babel is in the drawing-rooms, it is also in the legislative halls. If women wear, one the costume of the Directory, another that of the empire, a third that of the revolution, and a fourth that of the monarchy, it is in emulation of the mosaic Assembly which offers us Legitimists, Parliamentarians, a few Bonapartists, and far too many Jacobins, without forgetting a few escaped Communists. Order will come out of this chaos, it is to be hoped, but I shall believe in political unity on the day when I see unity in feminine toilettes, unity in fashion—in a word, uniformity, as of old, imposed on our sex, brought again under discipline.

But it must be admitted that in an artistic point of view the dress of the present day is more interesting to the spectator, and in some respects more reasonable, than that of yore. Instead of compelling all women to conform to one costume, each is now at liberty to choose what suits her best from the fashions of all ages.

Feather trimmings are disputing popular favor with fur, and will soon take their place, inasmuch as fur must be abandoned when spring comes in, while feathers may be worn much later. They are used for silk, satin, and velvet.

It is already to be foreseen that spring will usher in a rich display of passementeries, Brandenburgs, cobles, olives, and agrafes of all sizes and shapes, new fringes, guipures, etc., all of wool as well as of silk. Among these fringes I have seen a very original one, in which ends of flat cord took the place of the twisted or untwisted silk commonly used. These fringes are both light and heavy, both simple and loaded with ornament.

But there are also, in spite of this profusion of trimmings, and perhaps even on account of it, plain dresses, which are perhaps the most beautiful of all: a tunic with no other trimming than a plain hem, and simply looped in the back, whether the material be velvet, faille, or mere black alpaca. The skirt over which this tunic is worn is trimmed only with a pleated flounce, which does not always extend all the way around the skirt. Indeed, the fashion of skirts pleated perpendicularly is so generally adopted and followed that it is simulated by those who dislike the excessive weight of skirts pleated in this manner. Black velvet ribbon is set perpendicularly on the front breadths of the skirt, and the flounce stops at each side of the bottom of this tablier. In general the tunic is open in front, so as to display the perpendicular pleats, whether real or simulated.

Bridal dresses are invariably trimmed. Under the dress, of whatever material, is worn a petticoat of white silk, trimmed with three or four rather narrow flounces, which are visible only in front. The front breadths of the dress are very plain, the fullness all being carried to the back, and arranged in such a manner as to form a pouf behind without sensibly diminishing the train. A bunch of orange blossoms is set at the belt, to which is attached a long cordon of the same flowers, which is fastened near the pouf, and falls thence over the train. The waist is always high, with small basques in the back and points in front. There is no over-skirt except the illusion veil, which is long and full enough to envelop the whole figure. The dress is caught up a little, so as to show the flounces of the white silk petticoat.

Many more woolen than silk dresses are worn in the street. On the other hand, velvet dresses were never worn so much at home, for dinners and small gatherings, as now. Black velvet is no longer confined to full-dress occasions; and the same is true with velvet of dark colors. These dresses are often open in front, over a tablier of satin or moiré, and the sides of the velvet dress, which are fastened to the tablier, are trimmed with black lace, either narrow or very wide; in the latter case it is set on in coquilles. Instead of lace, ruches of ribbon, or even of silk gauze harmonizing in color, are sometimes used, when the tablier is also trimmed with pleated flounces or ruches of silk gauze.

Alsacian fichus, of black or colored crêpe de Chine, trimmed with white lace, and carelessly tied in front, are much worn over waists of all kinds, whether low, high, or half high. They are very convenient in many cases, among others when a low waist would be too dressy.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

THE WRONG ANSWER.

IN the old days, forty years ago, when country teachers boarded round from family to family, and when a dozen young men and women about midway in their teens might be found in every well-to-do rustic school-house during the winter term, young William Gladstone, now Judge Gladstone, of the United States Supreme Court, was school-teacher in the Bound Brook neighborhood. The young man, then reading law, comprehended that school-teaching would replenish his purse, and need not greatly interfere with his studies.

Our hero, making his way to the best school district in the adjoining town, found the principal trustee, and confidently made application for the vacant situation of pedagogue for the four and a half months, autumn and winter.

"Yes, young man, yes, I know all about you," answered the sharp old trustee. "You're Square Gladstone's son, and college bred, so we can calculate that you've got learning enough to suit us; but that don't say nothing against flirting! Now last winter the whole deestrict was pestered with flying rumors about love-making down there to the school. First it was one girl and then another the master wanted, and of course all the great boys followed suit. But come spring nothing had taken root deep enough to go on growing in warm weather. Now this year, mind, I am going to set my foot down against all that. You can have the school, and welcome, if you give me a pledge that you won't introduce courting as a fine art, taught either by precept nor yet by example. If you can be sure you have the nerve to set your face against all billing and cooing, you are the man we want exactly. We old fogies are not altogether against a young man's paying attentions and marrying at the proper time, when he really means it, but the trustees, to a man, have made up their minds that last year's doings can't be repeated in our school. Now, then, young square, what have you got to say about it?"

Young Gladstone's face beamed as sunnily as a May morning during this little harangue. He wheeled about, his open, laughing eye looking straight into the intensely earnest face of the trustee, and answered, frankly, "I give you my solemn pledge, Sir, not to flirt with the pretty girls, to teach the boys by example to be as exemplary in this respect as the quietest old gentleman in the neighborhood, and as far as I can consistently, I don't mind agreeing to add a very little precept also now and then."

"That 'll do nicely."

"I intend to go on with my studies in leisure hours, and shall be altogether too busy myself for flirtations or for love-making."

"It is a bargain. I engage you out of hand to begin the school from next Monday to the last Monday in October!" cried the delighted trustee, pulling at the great button on the front of his coat with such vigor that the weak threads snapped asunder.

The younger gentleman ratified the contract.

"You mean to get admitted to the bar next year, I calculate, Mr. Gladstone?"

"So I hope, Sir, if I am successful."

"Exactly. Nothing like real business to keep a youngster as steady as is respectable, and that is all we old fellows care about." This time the undermined button gave way suddenly at the energetic pull of the trustee's great thumb and finger. The good man sat looking down at it a little ruefully. "Curious," he mused, half to himself. "Wife will know now that I am pleased. I generally sacrifice that button on the altar of the very highest satisfaction. That, now, is a trick started with the school lessons, as low down as the spelling-book. Mebby it come in with the first primer."

In due time the school began. It may be as well to say just here that the new master was immensely popular all winter, both with the pupils and with the all-powerful trustees. Our young friend thought it would be the easiest thing in the world to keep his agreement in a quite exemplary manner. All his days he had been sufficiently popular with scores of charming young ladies without undue flirting, and at present his thoughts were not at all fixed upon matrimony.

But "young Squire Gladstone" had not yet seen Susie Auber. She was his best and most charming pupil—a distracting little beauty, with dimples, brown eyes, graceful, winsome ways, laughter like music, and a voice always sweeter than the ripple of a meadow brooklet. The very first night of the first school day Susie Auber stepped bodily down into his embryo lawyer dreams, moving about among "Higgins versus Babcock," both of her plump white hands full of deeds, contracts, and old wills, which made him think of the Day of Judgment; and directly after she was teaching the children about legal tenures, which changed to nouns, verbs, tens, hundreds, and all the rest, down to A B C's; and the girlish hands were much prettier than the law papers which she held in them, though these were crammed full both of law and learning.

The next night Susie's face was shining like a transparency in every writing-book as the master set the copies; and when he thought of shutting it up in his desk, Susie herself flew out from the opening lid, as bright and as swift as a sunbeam, springing directly into the centre of his own heart. He woke himself up by saying aloud, "If she wishes to stay there, I certainly shall never object."

After such a beginning what could we expect? It will not do to say that the fickle young man spent his winter in studying this absorbing girl much more diligently than he ever pored over his law-books. He never thought of studying Susie or of understanding her; but he did think about her ten times oftener than he thought of any thing else—if rose-colored reverie may be dignified with a name so profound—always deciding in his own mind that she was incomparably the sweetest, dearest little being in the universe, and that she was becoming yet more and more engaging every day, as she developed in beautiful womanliness under his very careful tuition.

Whenever this sunshiny pupil was away from school for a day, the whitewashed walls of the school-room looked as dingy as the blackboard in the eyes of the disgusted master. All the children had poor lessons, and were wonderfully stupid in catching his explanations. In those days the heavy boys' boots scraping the rough floor grated upon his nerves; the dresses and manners of the girls were hopelessly countryfied; and all the little ones had influenza. In those days the master studied diligently all through the nooning, even while he munched pie and bread-and-butter for lunch; but if any curious eye had looked over his shoulder, it might have discovered a little pencil drawing of Susie Auber's face doing duty as book-mark between the ponderous pages of Blackstone.

And what of the young girl herself? Can one be the object of so much earnest devotion without knowing it? Hardly. Pledges and good resolutions are rarely strong enough to bind glances from adoring eyes, and to hold the tones of a voice in fetters. At least there are unguarded moments when these will slip the leash to enjoy a brief moment of delightful freedom.

For the first six weeks of school Susie felt sure that she was becoming very dear to the young teacher; as a natural consequence, the teacher was fast becoming very dear also to his sympathetic pupil. It was her right. He had spent a fortnight of that time as boarder at her father's house, and in her own mind she was entirely assured that her parents believed in the young man as a very eligible party for general family adoption. Then our Susie had not been bright and pretty all her life for nothing. She expected every young gentleman of her acquaintance to be a little fascinated as a matter of course. But in this case she was not perversely disinclined to something more serious and more permanent.

The months went by, yet the master had become more reserved or shy than in the beginning. He had always chatted freely and cordially with his pupils, and in this excellent habit he still continued; but there had been no advances in love-making. Susie was piqued—perhaps a trifle indignant—with a growing sense of being somehow wronged and defrauded. Either the master sometimes looked too much, or he said altogether too little; and the child found herself quite unable to solve the puzzle.

It was only a fortnight now before the school would close, yet no progress had been made. They met one evening, unexpectedly to both, at the house of a neighbor. When it was time to return home, Mr. Gladstone could hardly do less than to act as attendant; but that half hour in the bewitching presence, with all its school-girlishness laid aside, had entirely overcome his prudent resolution to delay the period of his love-making. He forgot that Susie had shared none of the golden reveries in which he had lived all winter, and where in his thought she had reigned as queen of a realm sacred to themselves. Delighted, excited, and irrepressibly in earnest as they left the house, quite too hastily and abruptly he asked her to become his wife.

Susie was startled; her best feelings received a shock. To become engaged without any of those sweet preliminaries of which she had always shyly dreamed, seemed like a perversion of right. Spirited and wayward, without taking time to consider, she said no promptly, perhaps a little indignantly.

Even then it might all have come right during the ten minutes' walk which followed; but unluckily they were overtaken by a party of chattering young people. Mr. Gladstone, in his present reckless mood, kept them in merry conversation till they left Susie at her own door, when he turned back alone into the darkness and tramped over the frozen ground, feeling a kind of satisfaction, as though he were stamping out all the remnants of sentiment in his own chilled heart. Susie, shut up in the darkness of her room, repented at leisure. Evidently at the bottom of this odd style of wooing there was an intense sincerity. Why, then, had all this happened? and could they remain still at cross-purposes? Could two people throw away happiness so perversely?

The next day she found that they undoubtedly could. Something still and lifeless in the manner of the young teacher toward herself chilled the blood in her veins, making reconciliation seem impossible. Her smiles fell like moonlight upon an iceberg.

So the days crept slowly on. Every body was demonstrative of their regrets at the approaching close of the school term; but the teacher, and one pupil at least, would have given much to feel that it was well over at once and forever. To meet every day as before seemed to both of them too severe a lesson in self-control. They counted the days, and at night they were both sincerely thankful that there was one less. Their estrangement grew with every thing which occurred. Neither looked willingly in the face of the other, or exchanged a syllable more than was necessary between teacher and scholar; but two young hearts were both aching sorely.

And now there were but two more days to the close of the school. These over, they could go their several ways again, each learning to bear alone the sharp sting of that painful but not easily forgotten past. Alas! how often has this happened before!

"Good-night, Square Auber, and ladies both of you," said the principal trustee, stumbling into the little sitting-room of the family, and rubbing his unmittened fingers with zest. "This spring weather is colder than a real winter, I calculate. When every thing snaps like icicles, then the cold seems brittle and dry; but this wet cold is terrible!"

Once comfortably seated and warmed, the trustee began afresh:

"Well, we have had a good school this winter. Every body admits that. The young man was the right sort. The truth is, between you and me, if Miss Susie there can keep a secret, I pledged the young fellow, to begin with, that he would set his face like a flint against school courting and all that. No flirtations heard of this winter! It has worked like a charm. The scholars never learned so much before in one winter, in my opinion; eh, Susie?"

"Perhaps not," answered the girl, quietly. But her heart was in her throat. Was that the reason, then, or any part of the reason, for the unwitting glances which had first won her heart without a word, only to toss it away at last upon the point of a word too abruptly spoken? Susie didn't know. There was nothing which could help her to decide. But she formed a plan which aroused all the courage in her heart, kindling fresh light in her eyes that flashed from every glance like arrows, and arrested the attention of the master the moment she entered the school-room next morning. "What did it mean?" he began to ask himself, and to look doubtfully. This question waited a solution.

They were to have a review in geography in the afternoon.

"What cape south of Greenland?" questioned the master.

"Cape Lookout," answered Susie, promptly and steadily.

The color leaped rosily into the white brow of the master; his eye glanced on to the next pupil.

"Cape Farewell," was the wondering response. Susie never had missed before in geography.

"Cape Farewell?" echoed Susie, in a low tone, a look of regret at her failure written over every line of her pretty face.

"Where is Cape Lookout?" asked the teacher of the next pupil.

"East of North Carolina."

"What other cape east of North Carolina?"

"Cape Fear."

"Yes. Many of the prominent capes have significant names like these," said the master, in his pleasant, instructive tone. It was his custom to make the lessons interesting by remarks like this.

On went the questions down the line of a long class, and once more it was Susie's turn. "What cape south of Ireland?"

"Cape of Good Hope," smiled Susie, innocently. Every body laughed. "Oh no! I have given the wrong answer. I did that once before," added Susie, deliberately. "It is Cape Clear."

"Certainly, Cape Clear," affirmed the master. "Whether it signifies fair weather, the last tie to the land behind, or whether it is named as a warning against hidden rocks, I can not say."

"I think the law requires the best construction to be put on every thing, unless there is good reason to the contrary," retorted Susie, saucily, and with a little defiant laugh.

"Tell me the names of the principal countries of Europe," said the master, turning hastily to the next in class, his face at red-heat, and his voice crisp and cutting. It was nearly the last day; studying was over; the reins of government had been held rather loosely since the morning; yet now the girls opened their eyes frowning at the naughty classmate; and one boy nudged another with the audible whisper, "Susie is chaffing the master."

The master closed the examination after half a dozen more questions; yet every body noticed that his vexation was extremely short-lived. He smiled at the little ones who stumbled wofully over mental arithmetic in their eagerness to get out of school early, as he promised, if they would give close attention; and he excused all mistakes in the most genial manner possible. Susie caught a glint of sunshine and forgiveness in his eye, and was satisfied.

That evening Mr. Gladstone spent with Susie; and though he never repeated the old question, and Susie never gave the right answer, yet they must have learned how to compromise their mutual grievances; for only last week they celebrated the fortieth anniversary of their wedding in the presence of children and grandchildren. All is well that ends well; but it is currently understood that the spirited Mrs. Gladstone has claimed and received ample payment for all lack of the usual graceful courtesies of the courting days. Defrauded of a just preliminary amount of such attentions, her claim has been running at interest ever since—the portly judge, like a chivalrous gentleman as he is, having been for these forty years as tenderly attentive to his still bonny wife as any young lover. He has judicially decided that the old debt being of a kind which in the nature of the case can never be repaid as to the principal, it must lie against him as a perpetual claim forever.

SOIRÉES AT THE GERMAN COURT.

THE musical and artistic soirées that take place from time to time at the Emperor's palace in Berlin, when the great salons are crowded by a brilliant and fashionable assemblage, are eagerly sought after by foreigners. It is, however, not as easy a matter to gain admittance to these soirées as it is to attend a concert at Steinway Hall, or a performance of Italian opera at the Academy of Music. The plan on which the invitations are given out might be aptly stated in the words, "Many are called, but few are chosen."

It is the duty of the Lord Chamberlain of the Emperor, Colonel Count von Perponcher-Sedlintzki, to take proper care that the court etiquette prescribed for these entertainments is rigidly adhered to in all its details. The Emperor himself makes out a list of those who are to receive an "invitation" or "order" to attend the soirée. This important document his Majesty hands to the Lord Chamberlain, who, in his turn, imparts the names of the "elect" to an officer of the imperial household. Upon this official devolves the duty of informing each of the personages whose names appear on the list that his or her presence is desired at court on a certain evening. The members of the imperial family, as well as those princes or sovereigns who happen to be in Berlin at the time, are invited (geladen), while foreign embassadors, members of the cabinet, Mr. Botho von Huelsen, the general superintendent of the royal theatres in Berlin, and, in short, all those who lay claim to the honor of being considered courfähig, are ordered (befohlen).

The guests generally begin to arrive at about nine o'clock. Full evening dress is, of course, de rigueur, and it is hardly necessary to say that about the entire assemblage there is an air of marked culture and refinement.

The musical part of the soirée is under the direction of the royal Obercapellmeister and court pianist, Mr. W. Taubert, and commences at ten o'clock precisely. Only the very best musical talent, both vocal and instrumental, is heard at these entertainments. The first part of the programme consists of some choice instrumental music, executed by a small but well-trained orchestra, each member of which is an artist on his instrument. The selections performed comprise some of the most delicious outpourings of celebrated composers. During the second part of the programme the vocalists make their appearance. All the talented singers lay claim to the title "artist," and, as far as ability is concerned, they certainly deserve the honor of being called "court singers."

It is no exaggeration to say that for the past few years Madame Pauline Lucca has been the bright particular star of these concerts, before whose effulgence all lesser luminaries paled. Among the lady singers she invariably bore off the honors. It is now several years since the renowned prima donna, by a royal decree, received the appointment of Kammersängerin. This is the highest honor which in Prussia can be conferred upon any singer. Until recently Madame Lucca shared in this honor with the well-known songstress Madame Mathilde Mallinger and the celebrated tenors Messrs. Niemann and Wachtel.

The duty imposed on Madame Lucca by her appointment as court singer was to sing in all royal court concerts. Her position as Kammersängerin was an agreeable one, and the little prima donna was a great favorite both with the Emperor and Empress. From his Majesty the Emperor she received many costly presents. Shortly before leaving Germany en route for the United States he presented her with a pair of ear-rings, formed of gigantic pearls, oyster-shaped, and studded with brilliants of the purest water. The Empress gave her a splendid pearl necklace, all the pearls being Oriental.

Unsere kleine Pauline was never allowed to miss any of the soirées given at the Emperor's palace. But even in the presence of the imperial family and other distinguished personages, constituting the crème de la crème of Berlin society, the prima donna retained her well-known naïveté and frankness. Many instances could be cited in proof of this assertion, but we will mention only one, which can be relied on as true.

Last winter, at one of these soirées, the Lord Chamberlain, Colonel Count von Perponcher-Sedlintzki, informed Madame Lucca that his Majesty wished to see her. The court singer of his imperial highness replied, with a roguish smile, "When gentlemen want to see me they generally come to me." The Lord Chamberlain communicated to the Emperor the tenor of Madame Lucca's reply, but his Majesty, far from being offended by the language of the bold prima donna, laughed quite heartily, went up to Madame Lucca, and remained some time in conversation with her.

It is a well-known fact that all professional engagements entered into by Madame Lucca contain a stipulation which relieves her from filling a part in any of the operas of Wagner. A clause to this effect had been also inserted in her contract with the management of the Berlin Royal Opera, and the determined prima donna rigidly adhered to her resolution—i. e., to avoid Richard Wagner's larynx-destroying scores. Indeed, it is said she has refused to sing an air from Tannhäuser when the Emperor in person requested her to do so. This fact sufficiently proves her great dislike of "the music of the future."

The routine of the soirées at the Emperor's palace is always the same. Punctually at eleven o'clock the concert is over. It is a rule, prescribed by the etiquette of the court, that during the performance the audience refrain from manifesting outward signs of approval or displeasure. Consequently no hissing or clapping of hands is ever indulged in by any one present, and it is only occasionally that the Empress utters, in a subdued tone, the words "charmant!" or "magnifique!"

After the close of the concert the fair artistes who have sustained a part in the programme are presented to the Empress and to the other ladies of the imperial family, before whom they have to make their customary bow, and, in their turn, receive the stereotyped congratulations which are invariably bestowed upon them by the august personages. The Emperor also regularly addresses to the singers who enjoy the honor of presentation a few complimentary words relative to their artistic merits.

Soon after the concert is over a curtain rises in the background of the salon, and discloses to the view of the assemblage a handsomely fitted up little stage. The performance of a French vaudeville is then generally gone through with. This concludes the evening's programme.

Precisely at twelve o'clock the Lord Chamberlain announces that supper is ready. It is only when Colonel Count von Perponcher-Sedlintzki makes this communication to the Emperor that his Majesty gives him the names of the select few of the assembled personages who, in the language of the court etiquette, are to be "ordered" to stay to supper (zur Tafel befohlen). Those whom the Lord Chamberlain passes by in silence now quietly make their exit.

In this connection we will mention a peculiar fact which will interest our fair readers. It was the Kammersängerin, Madame Pauline Lucca, who was "ordered" to attend the soirée—i. e., to fill a part in the musical programme. She was also invariably one of the favorite few who were honored with the "order" to stay to supper. But it was not the Kammersängerin, Madame Pauline Lucca, it was the Baroness von Rhaden, who was shown to her seat at the table.

The Emperor and Empress generally withdraw about one o'clock, and soon after the guests also take their departure.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Dean Stanley's Victory.—Lady Beaconsfield.—The Coming K.—Winchester's "Last."—The Laureate's Question.

THE religious world in England and that of our metropolitan clubs have not many matters in common, but the late appointment of Dean Stanley to be a select preacher before the University of Oxford has been debated in our smoking-rooms as warmly, if not as bitterly, as by the professed theologians. The dean is very popular in London, not only by reason of his eloquence, which is considerable, but because he is known to have a large heart. His preaching in Westminster Abbey upon the death of Dickens was thought by small people to be a desecration of that national temple, though to you in America, probably, it would have seemed there could have been nothing more in accordance with the fitness of things, and we ourselves are getting broader views of these matters. The dean perceived, as Lord Jeffrey did, that the great novelist's works "had done more good, fostered more kindly feelings, and prompted more positive acts of benevolence than could be traced to all the pulpits in Christendom," and he honored his memory accordingly in the proper place; but our ecclesiastical sounding-boards are not accustomed to reverberate the praises of mere writers: it is necessary for a prince, or at all events a politician, to die to evoke them, and the dean's conduct shocked Mrs. Grundy and "conventional" Churchmen of all sorts. It is probable that if the votes of the country clergy had not been overbalanced by those of the lay Masters of Arts, who for once were moved to leave London and run down to give him their suffrages, Oxford would have rejected Stanley. Of course her acceptance of him by no means implies approval of his latitudinarian tendencies: he is latitudinarian, and but for that circumstance would long ago have been a bishop; as it was, nothing but the personal influence of the Queen—whose favorite maid of honor he married—could have made him Dean of Westminster. Every one admits that much; but the ground which his supporters took at Oxford was that a Church which boasts itself as "catholic" and comprehensive, and which includes Dean Close and Dr. Pusey within its limits, has certainly also room for Dean Stanley. The result of the contest has given the most unqualified satisfaction to the general public.

The Viscountess Beaconsfield, Mr. Disraeli's wife, was buried yesterday. She was greatly his senior (eighty-one), and when she married him was of mature years, a widow, and very wealthy. If death were not itself a quencher of all mirth, it would raise a smile to mark the attempts on the part of the press to build up a domestic romance upon these commonplace materials. Her ladyship was not that political aid-de-camp to her husband which our politicians' wives often prove themselves to be. She could not fix a wavering supporter by her smile, far less win over an opponent; but she was an excellent wife, and is said to have been devoted to her husband. An anecdote is told of her which, though not without a flavor of the ridiculous, has a touch of the heroic also. On a great "party night" at the House of Commons, when driving down with Mr. Disraeli to Westminster, she pinched her finger severely in the carriage door, yet never spoke of it lest pity for her should interfere with the oratorical effort that was about to be demanded from her husband. What was really most significant about her, however, was the title which her Majesty conferred upon her, and which Disraeli declined for himself, as Peel had done before him. Was it, in the former's case, that he felt that Benjamin Disraeli would always be a far greater man than a firenew peer, or did he really despise that hereditary order which, while belauding in his books and affecting to champion in the senate, he has really done more to humiliate than any politician of his time? Peel refused a peerage, as some say, because, cotton-spinner as he was, and notwithstanding that bitter saying that "it took three generations to make a gentleman," he knew that the title could add no dignity to him; as others say, because he foresaw that the son who was to succeed him would prove any thing but a "moral support" to the hereditary system.

The year's end, as you know, is with us the season for shooting shillings' worths of literary rubbish, in the shape of Christmas numbers, upon the public, though certainly not "over their heads;" indeed, the object of the compilers of these brochures seems to be to write down to the lowest level of the intellectual capacity of their readers. Well, there is this year a certain Christmas number, entitled The Coming K., in no way an exception to the rest as regards wit or wisdom, but which has attained, I am told, an enormous circulation from its flying its shafts at that very high personage whom our gilt youth entitle "Wales." It is undeniable, I fear, that since his illness H.R.H. has been "going on" in his old courses at a greater rate than ever. Perhaps it is the rebound from the public thanksgiving, which I always told you was "a little too much of a good thing," and must have astonished the convalescent himself beyond every body.

"The devil was sick; the devil a monk would be:
The devil was well; the devil a monk was he."

And upon this last circumstance The Coming K. has been founded. It is not sold, I believe, at the railway stations: the virtuous and conservative "W. H. Smith & Sons," who have the monopoly of the book-stalls, will have nothing to do with it, and its being so far an outlawed work of course only increases its popularity; but the straw shows which way the wind blows, and it is marvelous how so soon after that "gush" of enthusiasm for royalty a book like this, which is in fact a personal lampoon on "Wales," should become the rage. In the form of a sustained parody upon the Idyls of the King this precious production paints "Guelpho the Gay," whose brand is not, as Arthur's was, Excalibur.

"Whose brand is Henry Clay—brave brand to smoke,
But not to smite: another one in store
(Trade-mark triangular, 'twould cost a crown
To counterfeit) is Bass X calibre."

I copy out for you the dedication:

These to his memory—since he held them dear,
Perchance as finding there unwittingly
Some picture of himself—I dedicate,
I dedicate, I consecrate with smiles—
These Idle Lays.
Indeed, He seemed to me
Scarce other than my own ideal liege,
Who did not muchly care to trouble take;
But his concern was, comfortable ease;
To dress in well-cut tweeds, in doeskin suits,
In pants of patterns marvelous to see;
To smoke good brands; to quaff rare vintages;
To feed himself with dainty meats withal;
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade;
To toy with what Neræa calls her hair;
And, in a general way, to happy be,
If possible, and always debonair;
Who spake few wise things; did some foolish ones;
Who was good-hearted, and by no means stiff;
Who loved himself as well as any man;
He who throughout his realms to their last isle
Was known full well, whose portraiture was found
In ev'ry album.
* * * * * * *
Thou noble Father of her kings to be—
If fate so wills it, O most potent K——!
The patron once of Polo and of Poole,
Of actors and leviathan "comiques;"
Once dear to Science as to Art; once dear
To Sanscrit erudition as to either;
Dear to thy country in a double sense;
Dear to purveyors; ay, a liege, indeed,
Beyond all titles, and a household name,
Hereafter, through all times, Guelpho the Gay!

Another literary production of a very different kind from The Coming K. is also making another kind of sensation—namely, Middlemarch. It is said that the enormous sum of £7000 was paid for Romola (a story which, with all its power, is by far the least popular of Mrs. Lewis's books), and that report has doubtless combined with the extraordinary merit of her productions to make them "the most looked-for" in our modern literature. It is generally conceded that Middlemarch is the wisest of all her works—a sort of philosophic Cranford on a larger canvas, but, like it, without a sufficient backbone of "story." On this account the publication of it at intervals of two months had to be abandoned, and the remaining volumes issued more rapidly. What Browning's Ring and the Book is (only a great deal more) in poetry, Middlemarch is in prose: it is absolutely exhaustive, yet, at the same time, there seems no reason why it should not have gone on forever. The opinion of the many is, on the whole, and taking into account its great expectations, favorable; the opinion of the few and thoughtful, immensely favorable. What jars upon them is the sadness and hopelessness of its philosophy—which, however, was not unlooked for—and occasionally an almost painful suggestion of effort.

The enormous building, at one time Crockford's Club-house, in St. James Street, which I told you had been purchased by the proprietor of the Daily Telegraph, is at last definitely announced to be intended for a club-house, to be called the Junior Reform. Its site is the finest for such a purpose in London, and, notwithstanding the enormous outlay necessary for its adaptation, I believe it will prove a financial success. The half of the building was at one time the St. James Club, and very curious was it to behold the dingy splendors of those magnificent rooms wherein the former "Wales" and the knights of his "table round" had lost their hundreds of thousands: it would have cost a fortune even to regild the ceilings, and nothing of the sort was attempted. The discipline of the club, too, was lax, from which circumstance occurred the following incident, which I suppose is almost unparalleled in club life. Some friend had asked me to dine there after the Derby, and while we were in the smoking-room there entered an acquaintance of his, who thus addressed him: "They call this place a club, Brown, yet, would you believe it, there is no lobster-salad to be got here on the Derby day?" "That is shameful, my good fellow; but why did you not 'back your bill' and complain to the committee?" "Well, so I would," returned the other, with a slight look of confusion—the merest blush—"only, you see, the deuce of it is that I don't belong to the club."

Let me atone for narrating that sad piece of impudence by speaking of bishops. The Bishop of Winchester, who when of Oxford was held to be the most eloquent on the bench, and the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who does not enjoy a similar reputation, happened to meet on the same public platform. When Winchester had addressed the assembly at great length and with much applause, Gloucester and Bristol thought it better not to evoke comparison. "Really, brother," said he, "I think you have said all that can be said, and, besides, the people do not expect a speech from me, for, see, they are beginning to go away." "That shows they do expect it," said Winchester.

There is also an excellent story afloat about Alfred Tennyson. One Sunday evening, while staying with a certain admirer of his who loved his works not wisely though so well, he was besought to read Maud aloud, which he did in his deep, sonorous voice, to the great edification of the company. Presently, when he came to the verse,

"Birds in the high Hall-garden
When twilight was falling,
Maud, Maud, Maud, Maud,
They were crying and calling."

"What birds were those, Sir, do you think?" suddenly inquired the poet of his host. "Well—dear me, Mr. Tennyson—let me see—why, they must have been nightingales, of course." "No, Sir; they were rooks"—which they doubtless were.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

Hosted by Google

VISCOUNTESS BEACONSFIELD.

THE Right Honorable Mary Anne Disraeli, Viscountess Beaconsfield, of Beaconsfield, in the County of Bucks, a peeress in her own right, was the only daughter of Captain John Viney Evans, R.N., of Brampford-Speke, Devonshire, and niece of the late General Sir James Viney, K.C.B., C.B., of Taynton Manor, Gloucestershire, whose heir at law she became. Her ladyship was married, firstly, in 1815, to Wyndham Lewis, Esq., M.P., of Greenmeadow, Glamorganshire, who died, without leaving issue, in March, 1838; and secondly, in September, 1839, to Benjamin Disraeli, Esq., then M.P. for Maidstone. The union proved a very happy one, and Mr. Disraeli has taken many opportunities of testifying openly to the warmth and depth of his feeling for his wife. He dedicated his novel of Sybil to her in graceful words. Again, in a public speech at Edinburgh, in 1867, he spoke of his partner as "that gracious lady to whom he owed so much of the happiness and success of his life;" and when her Majesty, in 1868, raised Mrs. Disraeli to the peerage, it was felt that she could not have bestowed an honor more likely to be appreciated by the husband, who, from a comparatively humble position, had attained at that time to the office of the first minister of the crown. Mr. Disraeli was about to visit Glasgow for the purpose of being formally inducted as Lord Rector of the University, but was obliged to decline on account of the critical state of Lady Beaconsfield's health, which had been for some time in an unsatisfactory condition. After a protracted illness, she died at noon on Sunday, December 15, and was buried on the following Thursday in the family vault in Hughenden church. The ceremony differed little from a humble village funeral, and was touching in its simplicity. The weather was very wet; nevertheless Mr. Disraeli walked bareheaded through the rain, and reverently followed the remains of the late partner of his life to the vault. Several beautiful wreaths of flowers were placed on the coffin. Lady Beaconsfield was much beloved in Hughenden, where her simple deeds of kindness and charity toward the poor and sick, and her graceful affection for her husband, will not easily be forgotten. The engraving which we give herewith was copied from a portrait in possession of Mr. Disraeli. The London Times says of Lady Beaconsfield: "The secret of the spell she held her husband, Disraeli, by was a simple one: she loved him with her whole heart and soul, she believed in him above all men, and he appreciated at its real worth that single-minded self-sacrificing devotion. It is difficult to overrate the strength and support given by unstinted love like that, and few, we suspect, appreciate it more than those who would seem to need it the least. It is neither counsel nor sparkle, but observant, ready sympathy, that a man of energy and self-reliance longs for in moments of exhaustion and depression, and the more impassable the mask he wears, the greater the relief of being able to drop it in private. Lady Beaconsfield was very far from being a reserved woman. She must have often talked too fast and freely for her husband's liking; occasionally the expressions of her artless admiration of him were caught up and colored, to be circulated as "good stories" at dinner-tables; but the intuitive instinct of her affection set a seal on her lips in the minutest matters where her talk might do him an injury. She was very much in his confidence, and she was never known to betray it. Except for subtle influences of the home she made him, the help she brought was passive rather than active from first to last. All he had asked was fair play for his talents at the start; her fortune had given him that, and he did the rest for himself."

THE LATE VISCOUNTESS BEACONSFIELD.

COSTUME FOR AFTERNOON RECEPTION.

SEEDS OF GERANIUM.

PROFESSOR HANSTEIN has made some interesting observations on the seeds of several species of the plant known as "stork's-bill" (Geranium). He has ascertained that they enter the soil somewhat like an auger, and thereby resist the action of the wind, and secure greater certainty of germination. Every blossom develops five closely adjoining seeds with long processes, which are not unlike the beak of a bird. These burst open, and being very hygroscopic, twist and turn in accordance with the change of moisture in the atmosphere, and penetrate the soil. Professor Hanstein has observed seeds screwing themselves even into the hard surface of firmly trodden garden walks. The direction of the turns seems to be constant with the seeds of the particular species.

COSTUME FOR AFTERNOON RECEPTION.

THIS distinguished costume is made of faille of the new purple shade, called pervenche. The skirt is trimmed to the knee with flounces arranged in vandykes, headed by a band of black velvet and Valenciennes lace. Two ruffles with velvet bands and upright frills trim the upper part of the front breadths. The polonaise is sharply cut away in front, and has a low Pompadour vest of lace and velvet. Velvet cuffs, edged with lace, and ornamented with three gold buttons. Black velvet sash. Velvet dog-collar and locket. Roman gold ear-rings and ornaments in the hair. Purple wing in the coiffure.

Hosted by Google

Medallions in Application and Satin Stitch Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions are suitable for trimming memorandum-books, cigar-cases, etc. They are worked on a foundation of light gray gros grain in application of silk of another color, and with saddler's silk of various colors, partly in dovetailed satin stitch, and partly in half-polka stitch and point Russe.

Mantel-Piece with Cover in Application Embroidery.

THE mantel-piece is of gray and black marble elaborately carved. The cover is made of dark blue cloth with application embroidery, for which Fig. 26, Supplement, gives the design. The design figures are applied in yellow cloth, the outlines and all the lines of the figures are worked in half-polka stitch with brown saddler's silk. The points on the outer edge of the cover are edged with narrow and wide brown silk braid. A brown worsted tassel trims the end of each point. The colors, of course, may be varied to harmonize with the furniture of the room.

ARTISTIC DRESS-MAKING.

AS to the "cut" of the bodice, there are many forms, good and bad. The worst is, perhaps, the ordinary tight bodice, which we may christen the pincushion style, from its hardness and stuffiness, and which follows the form of the stays and never that of the body. But you may say, "Why is this 'neat' bodice ugly? It is a pity to conceal a pretty figure forever in loose folds. Why may we never see a clear outline?"

Certainly, if we did but see the outline of the body, and not the French milliner's idea of what the body should be! Nothing can be more beautiful than a close-fitting garment, such as that worn in the time of the Plantagenets, before the modern stays had come into being. But a box that stiffens the whole figure unnaturally, draws the waist into the shape of a V, when the female figure is much more like an H, is a detestable invention, and, indeed, only a kind of coffin; while as for the bodice fitting it, any garment containing so many unnecessary seams and wrong lines must always be an unpicturesque one.

As for the skirt (which ought to be, if it is not, a portion and a continuation of the bodice), it must partake of the character of the bodice—that is to say, if the bodice be cut tightly and formally to the figure, the skirt should be so. For instance, none but the plain gored skirt, without a single pleat, can properly go with a tight bodice. But if the bodice be full at the waist the skirt must contain pleats—for this style must signify a full and folded garment closed to the waist by a girdle. Nothing can be in worse (artistic) taste than to wear a loose bodice, such as a Garibaldi, with a tight gored skirt, which we have seen done, or a gathered skirt with a close bodice—no dress could be naturally cut in either way. It at once betrays that the skirt and bodice do not belong to each other, and are not cut together, or, as artists say, "not all painted with the same palette." The necks of dresses are always ugly when cut in a circle close up to the throat, just as a glove that ends exactly at the wrist-bone, or a boot at the ankle, with a straight line, is always ugly. It always looks incomplete, and seems to require some sort of ornament; it is not a natural form, and, besides, it gives the head a decapitated look. The corners taken off at once give us a natural form. The V may fairly be carried down to the waist—but in this case let me beg my fair country-women to wear a chemisette. The fashion in vogue last season, of wearing the chest bare to the waist while the dress was high behind and on the shoulders, was inexpressibly odious. We have seen these V-shaped bodices at evening parties, where the V was only stopped by the girdle! As to the picturesqueness of the dress, it was lost by the hard edge of the V upon the chest. A dress ought never to end upon the skin—there should always be a tucker; firstly for cleanliness, and secondly for softening the line of contrast.

Seams ought never to have been introduced into the backs of close bodices. Surely the human back would be easy enough to fit without these lines, sometimes contradicting so flatly the natural ones of the figure. What can be a more needless break in the line of the arm and shoulder than the seam that chops off the arm just beneath the joint, or the square seam that crosses the blade-bone? There is another seam, which is just as ugly and just as needless, which goes straight from the armpit to the waist. If a tight bodice demands a seam down the back, it can not need the side seams nor the seam under the arm. If the seam under the arm is conceded, no other is required at the back. In a diagonal bodice, however, the armhole is properly placed just at the joint. The old sacque of the seventeenth century was a very perfect pattern, as far as patterns go. The sleeve, whether tight or full, was put into the neck. The seam under the arm united with the pocket-hole, at the lower end of which an extra breadth was gathered in, necessary to admit of the sweep of the train; the seam of the back, giving the graceful line of the natural waist and hip, was concealed by the long folds of the sacque, while the line of the side of the neck, which was usually square, swept straight down to the ground, revealing the under vest or jacket and petticoat (both perfectly legitimate forms and distinct from each other). When a change of fashion brought the dress together on the bosom, with no under-jacket, the neck was cut heart-shaped, a very natural and honest form.

In all cases the seams of garments should follow and recognize the natural lines of the body. A seam reaching the throat, or one surmounting the shoulder joint, is a more natural and proper form than one cutting across the arm, and should be used in all close bodices where the eye is meant to take in a smooth outline without a break. In bodices less simple in construction, and where the sleeve rises into puffs or other capricious forms, the seam may be at the joint, or, in fact, any where where it is least obtrusive. In the making of dresses the lines that end nowhere and nohow, which are often apparent, never fail to offend the eye.

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN AND GAUZE GRENADINE EVENING DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5-8.

Fig. 2.—POULT DE SOIE EVENING DRESS.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION IN APPLICATION AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION IN APPLICATION AND SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

MANTEL-PIECE WITH COVER IN APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
For design see Supplement, No. VIII., Fig. 26.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. L. D. AND OTHERS.—The traditions concerning precious stones are so numerous and various that it is difficult to give them authoritatively. In some nations each gem is sacred to one month, and is appropriately worn by persons born therein. For instance, the garnet, emblematic of constancy and fidelity, is dedicated to January; the amethyst, sincerity, to February; the blood-stone, courage and presence of mind, to March; the diamond, innocence, to April; the emerald, success in love, to May; the agate, health and long life, to June; the carnelian, contented mind, to July; the sardonyx, conjugal fidelity, to August; the chrysolite, antidote against madness, to September; the opal, hope, to October; the topaz, fidelity, to November; the turquoise, sincerity, and the chrysoprase, moral courage and perseverance, to December. Emeralds are supposed to keep off the evil-eye, and to be a preventive of sickness. The amethyst is a charm against intoxication. The turquoise preserves the wearer from accidents. The ruby warns its wearer of coming misfortune by its changes of color. The sapphire gives the wearer a light heart. The chrysoprase bestows fluency of tongue and pen. The diamond protects its possessor from all sorts of enchantments, and secures his triumph over his enemies, while its loss betokens dire misfortunes. The opal was the most baleful stone of all, bringing calamity to the wearer, and subjecting him to the malign influence of demons. We do not know of any book on the subject, though many curious traditions may be gleaned from jewelers' manuals in the French, German, and other languages. We can not refer you, however, to any one in particular.

A SUBSCRIBER kindly furnishes the following directions for bleaching Parian ware, alabaster, marble, etc.:

"Place in the sun, on a warm day, a wash-tub filled with soft clear water. Lay the Parian or alabaster in the water from one to ten hours, until well bleached, and wash off the dust with a nail-brush, and dry in the sun. Should the alabaster loosen where cemented, renew by a little fresh plaster of Paris. For forty years, when house-cleaning, I have always bleached for an hour or two, and the Parian and alabaster come fresh from the sun and water, and look like new."

NEW YORK SUBSCRIBER.—A marriage is legal, provided both parties are single, under whatever name they may be married, whether real or assumed. Consult a lawyer about the measures necessary to change one's name in different States.

FORM PAPER.—It is news to us that "writers always use paper three inches narrower than ordinary letter." Our writers don't.

LATINA.—We can not put words into the mouth of the dumb, or tell a person what to answer when his friend expresses his delight in meeting him.—As to the Latin sentence you sent us, ipse was omitted, which made the whole phrase nonsensical.

ALDINE.—You should make the first call on your friend after her return from a long journey.

W. S.—Only very intimate friendship would authorize you to address a gentleman as "Dear Friend." "Dear Sir" is better, or "Dear Mr. ——."

PAULINE.—It is not necessary to write a letter of thanks in acknowledgment of so simple an attention as the receipt of a paper.

V. D. G.—The sewing-machines in the market number legions. We can not catalogue their respective points of excellence here, or recommend one above another. The reports of the American Institute Fair may give you some information on the subject.

J. Y. M.—We certainly should not advise a lady to leave a good country home for the sake of making a precarious livelihood as a seamstress in the city. Stay where you are.

CONSTANT READERS.—We don't know any thing about the troupe you mention.

MRS. MARY V. W.—Your friend is very fortunate in having trained a half-witted boy to be a perfect chambermaid, and we do not see any impropriety in it, so long as both parties are satisfied. Nevertheless, as a rule, semi-idiots are hardly to be relied on as model servants, and there are hardly enough eligible ones to be found for Bridget to fear their rivalry. As to the employment of men for household service, it is common enough in Europe and elsewhere, and there is nothing reprehensible in the custom.

SAN JOSÉ.—There is no international copyright between Europe and America, and you are at liberty to translate any French or other work without infringing on the rights of the author.

SUBSCRIBER.—An infant can not, we think, be baptized without sponsors in the Episcopal Church.

MIGNON.—You will find in our advertisements answers to your questions concerning contributions to Harper & Brothers' periodicals. We do not answer questions about MSS. in this column.

UNO.—When asked at table what you will have, always make a choice, and do not embarrass your entertainer with the responsibility.—It is highly unconventional for a young lady to take a gentleman to ride.—A girl of fifteen should wear her hair flowing.

JANE R.—Black velvet bonnets are as much worn as usual. You can always relieve them by a rose or plum-colored feather, and these match both your costumes.

S. A. L.—There is nothing better for chapped lips than glycerine tablets or camphor ice, though sweet-almond oil may be used when the lips are very sore.

MARTHA WASHINGTON.—Your friends show very bad taste in laughing at your hair. Braid it on crimping-pins, and dress it lightly and fluffily as possible. Brush it a great deal, and wash once a week thoroughly. Touch your eyebrows with salve of cold cream, melted, with walnut bark boiled in it a long while.

EDNA.—A bran poultice improves the complexion. A weak wash of carbolic acid—one tea-spoonful to a pint of rose-water—is very good. Vapor-baths can be taken alone.

C. G.—Gum-turpentine dissolves in alcohol, and the proportions are only to be found by trial. Cover the gum with proof spirit, and dilute as needed till the turpentine disappears.

F. Y.—The thimbles spoken of are not patented, nor does the article referred to say they are.

LIZZIE B.—Your cloth sample is too heavy for a redingote. You should get a light pliable fabric. Directions about quantity of material and the way of making up the garment will be found in the Bazar in which the redingote is illustrated, viz., No. 46, Vol. V. We do not write special directions on the pattern.

MARY JANE.—We have no pattern of a jockey basque. Your money will be returned.

JULIET B.—Mrs. Anna Cora Mowatt married Mr. Ritchie, and added his name to hers. She is dead.

CARRIE L.—Palest sky blue or Nile green ties are worn with plum-color by blondes.

AGNES MAURICE.—Very thick heavy black embroidery will be suitable on your blue cloth. Why do you not use cashmere for a spring garment?

LIVINGSTON.—It is too soon to decide positively about the spring styles. It is not probable that there will be any decided change, but you had better wait for small details before you make your dress.

RECLUSE.—For your spring suits get gray and purple solid-colored dresses. Wear a good deal of black and white with lavender, and then gradually add colors.

OHIO.—Make your calico dress with a pleated blouse, coat sleeves, and a plain skirt just escaping the floor. The three front breadths should be slightly gored. The Loose Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 29, Vol. V., and a plainly flounced skirt is the best model for your alpaca.

ELEANOR.—Make your bronze green satin by the Louis Quinze pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and the gray camel's-hair by the Redingote Suit pattern illustrated in the same number. Your ideas about the cashmere cloak are excellent. Line it with rose-colored silk. Twenty yards of light blue silk will make you a handsomely trimmed evening dress.

WATERS' CONCERTO PARLOR ORGAN supplies a long needed desideratum for home music. The effect, at once charming, soul stirring, and closely resembling the human voice, is produced by a third set of reeds, voiced peculiarly for that purpose. Its sound, voluminous and pure, produces the effect of a costly church organ, at a price within the reach of almost any lover of music.—The American Lutheran, York, Pa.—[Com.]

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, has just introduced a Concerto Parlor Organ, which is attracting much attention. It has a new concerto stop, produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, and the effect is charming.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.—[Com.]

TURQUOISES.

ON the picturesque old bridge over the Arno, in Florence, known as the Ponte Vecchio, the traveler finds himself strolling between two antique rows of toppling houses, the abode of the guild of goldsmiths. It would be strange indeed if even now there were nothing in the way of jewelry worth seeing in the city of Benvenuto Cellini. But that which most attracts and fixes the traveler's attention is the abundance and beauty of the Turquoises. This dainty and lovely stone, the name of which attests its Oriental origin, is to the charming capital of Tuscany what the Garnet is to Vienna and Coral to Naples. Yet the Turquoise is neither found in Tuscany nor in Turkey, but in Persia. Khorassan supplies it chiefly to commerce by way of the great fairs of Tiflis, in Armenia, and of Nischni-Novgorod, in Russia. Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, of 22 John St. (up stairs), have a number of fine specimens of this stone. The Shah of Persia is said to keep the best Turquoises, as the King of Burmah keeps the best Rubies. Yet it is so exquisitely adapted to the toilette, especially of our northern and golden-haired beauties, that we do contrive to obtain it. It harmonizes admirably with brilliants. We do not know that we quite accept the ancient superstition that the wearer of a Turquoise is safe from contagion; but we are quite disposed to believe that a susceptible person might not be safe, absolutely, from a lovely blonde wearing a set of Turquoises and Diamonds from the atelier in John Street.—[Com.]

A BIG VICTORY FOR THE NEW WILSON UNDER-FEED SEWING-MACHINE.—It will delight all the many friends of the Wilson Sewing-Machine to know that in the stubborn contest for superiority in samples of work at the great Northern Ohio Fair, their favorite has carried off the two great premiums, the medal for best six specimens machine work, and the diploma for best specimen braiding. As the great competition was in these two classes, it will be seen that the Wilson's victory is complete. We knew this would be so. It could not be otherwise. There is no talking down the fact that the Wilson is the best family sewing-machine now manufactured, the one capable of doing the best work on any kind of goods and under all circumstances. This award of the highest premium to the work of the Wilson Shuttle Sewing-Machine, should and will silence the talk of that large class of sewing-machine men who have made this machine the object of their special enmity, simply because it is a moderate price machine and undersells their expensive one. Go and see the first premium cards on those beautiful samples of work, and remember that you can buy this premium sewing-machine for fifty dollars.—From the Cleveland Daily Herald. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FALL and WINTER SAMPLES now READY.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

CHENEY BRO'S

American Gros-Grain Silks,

IN BLACK STRIPES,

AND ELEGANT FALL COLORS,

Of Shades especially adapted for Suitings.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

MOTHERS,

SAVE YOUR INFANTS.

NESTLÉ'S LACTEOUS FARINA,

THE MOTHER'S MILK SUBSTITUTE.

Extensively used and recommended by the most eminent physicians. Sold by Druggists and Grocers.

H. ASTIÉ & CO., Sole Agents, 15 South William Street, New York.

CLOSING SALE OF FURS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y., Are offering, to close the stock for the SEASON, the BALANCE of their

FURS and FUR TRIMMINGS

At an IMMENSE REDUCTION IN PRICES.

Also,

PARIS-MADE EVENING DRESSES & COSTUMES, At Equally Low Rates.

FINE FRENCH HAND-WORK EMBROIDERIES, BANDS, AND SKIRT TRIMMINGS.

A large invoice of the above desirable goods now open, MUCH BELOW REGULAR PRICES.

HAMBURG EDGINGS and INSERTINGS.

FRENCH EMBROIDERED double Linen CHEMISE BANDS, from 65c. each and upward.

PERCALE AND LINEN EMBROIDERED NIGHT-DRESS SETS AND YOKES.

An entirely new style of SKIRTING EMBROIDERY.

SWISS AND LAWN PLAITED AND RUFFLED TRIMMINGS, IN ALL THE NEW STYLES.

Together with a fine assortment of other articles, appertaining to this department, at equally low prices.

Also, a fine lot of NEW PIQUES, just received.

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS,

WHITE GOODS,

AND

GENERAL HOUSE-FURNISHING, &c., &c.

We are prepared to offer GREAT INDUCEMENTS to purchasers in

SHIRTING, PILLOW AND SHEETING LINENS, OF THE MOST APPROVED MAKES.

TABLE DAMASKS BY THE YARD;

CLOTHS, NAPKINS, AND DOYLIES;

HUCKABUCK AND DAMASK TOWELS AND TOWELLINGS;

GUIPURE LACE SPREADS AND TOWELS;

BLANKETS, FLANNELS, &c., &c.

Together with a general assortment of goods appertaining to this department.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Have opened a magnificent assortment of

CHANTILLY LACES, FICHUS, CAPES, SASHES, BARBES, VEILS, &c.;

Also,

CHANTILLY, GUIPURE, SPANISH, and VALENCIENNES TRIMMING LACES,

NEW STYLES AND NEW DESIGNS,

AT EXTREMELY ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

An elegant assortment of HAMBURG EDGINGS and SCALLOP TRIMMINGS; Ladies', Misses', and Children's UNDER-GARMENTS in every variety; CHILDREN'S OUTFITS;

WEDDING TROUSSEAUX, very elegant.

Also, one case

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,

Purchased at the last London Auction Sale, at lower prices than similar qualities have been purchased within the past ten years.

HANDSOME SQUARE SHAWLS, only $25.

Fine quality STRIPED, $20 upward.

FILLED CENTRE, large size, very handsome, $100 upward.

LONG SHAWLS, full size and very rich, only $100.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "B"

FOR $100.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 50	$1 00
2 Barrie Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	3 00	6 00
3 Cambric "	@	1 50	4 50
3 " " Tucked	@	2 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
6 Slips	@	2 50	15 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
2 Day Dresses	@	4 00	8 00
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, Furnished			6 50
6 Pairs Knitted Socks	@	0 62½	3 75
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			5 50
1 "Eureka" Diaper			1 00
A set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
2 Quilted Bibs	@	0 50	1 00
1 Lace Cap			4 75
			$100 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Wardrobe "A," for $75, and "C" for $125, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, { Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

CHEAP HOMES in Shenandoah Valley. For Circular send stamp to J. H. Bristor, Martinsburg, W. Va.

THE NEW BOOKS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

M. Elisée Reclus, so well known by his excellent work, "The Earth," has added a much needed companion piece to it. * * * Reclus has devoted fifteen years to the exploration of the earth, and it is the fruit of his travels and studies that we find in his two excellent books. He is not a mere writer about what he has seen, he endeavors to trace the law and make plain the connection with some antecedent fact. In other words, while having all the enthusiasm of the traveler and the polished ease of the man of the world, he has the training of the man of science. "The Ocean" is a very fascinating volume. * * * We do not think that we are wide of the mark in saying that the two volumes of Reclus's—"The Earth" and "The Ocean"—come nearer to supplying a real physical geography of the globe than any work or works in the English language.—World, N. Y.

2.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

Rev. Philip Schaff, D.D., has done the Christian public a valuable and timely service in editing a popular edition of the "Revision of the English Version of the New Testament," as discussed by Lightfoot, Ellicott, and Trench. Heretofore the able writings of these authors on this important subject have only been obtainable in separate volumes. Here they are presented in one compact book, with an able and scholarly introduction by Dr. Schaff, which gives a clear account of the origin and expediency of the revision now in progress, the composition and ability of the commission engaged upon it, and concise illustrations of the changes to be made. The volume is to be warmly commended, and is emphatically a multum in parvo.—Watchman and Reflector.

3.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

The book is interesting from beginning to end. No page but has its item of curious information or its piquant anecdote.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

There is no man better qualified to write the history of American Journalism than Mr. Hudson, and, accordingly, his history is well written. He possesses the various knowledge thereof that it is necessary to impart, and the skilled power that enables a man to impart his knowledge agreeably, and, therefore, usefully. He has brought together an immense number of facts, and the entire book is highly entertaining. His book is a good book—an excellent book.—Boston Traveller.

4.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

* * * It is our deliberate judgment that it indicates a genius superior to that of any other novelist now living.—Boston Globe.

The author exhibits an insight into the secret heart of our nature scarcely less subtle and manifold than that of Shakespeare. * * * Such a rare cabinet of character sketches is perhaps not to be found in any other single production of English literature.—N. Y. Tribune.

5.

NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Seventh Thousand just ready. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

A delightful and instructive volume. * * * The most entertaining, the most intelligent, and the most useful book on California we have ever read. * * * What particularly pleases us in this volume is the ease and felicity of the style. The author seems to be indulging simply in a quiet, genial talk with the reader. He escapes the predominant California rhetorical sin, the sin of eloquence. Good sense is his special characteristic.—Boston Daily Globe.

6.

TALMAGE'S SERMONS. Sermons by the Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Second Series. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

Uniform with the First Series of Talmage's Sermons.

These sermons abound in wit, humor, pathos, metaphor, simple poetic beauty and fine word-painting, startling declarations of truth, and some daring rhetorical extravagance. They are original, stirring, and refreshing, and reveal the remarkable mental characteristics which render their author one of the most popular preachers of this country at the present time.—Lutheran Observer, Phila.

7.

SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.

FORCE. Being Vol. IV. of Science for the Young, by JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HEAT. — LIGHT. — WATER AND LAND. — FORCE. 4 vols. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each.

8.

BOOKS FOR GIRLS. Written or Edited by the Author of "John Halifax." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY.—THE COUSIN FROM INDIA.—TWENTY YEARS AGO.—IS IT TRUE?—AN ONLY SISTER.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

For New Novels see next page.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.

Instruction Package sent by mail on receipt of $1 00. Send for Circular. Stamping done for the trade. Madame L. CENDRIER, 84 Bleecker St., N. Y.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only..... $3 00
24 " " " " " 3 50
26 " " " " " 4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

Swamp Angel Revolver.

The only five-shot POCKET DERRINGER made. Weight 12 oz. Can be loaded without removing cylinder. Send for circular to

ONION, HAIGH, & CORNWALL, 18 Warren St., N. Y.,

Dealers in all kinds of Revolvers, Breech and Muzzle Loading Guns and Rifles, Fishing Tackle, &c.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer, No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

SAVE YOUR EYES,

RESTORE your SIGHT,
THROW AWAY YOUR SPECTACLES,

By reading our Illustrated PHYSIOLOGY AND ANATOMY of the EYE-SIGHT. Tells how to Restore Impaired Vision and how to cure Weak, Watery, Inflamed, and Near-Sighted Overworked Eyes; Eyes, and all other Diseases of the Eyes.

WASTE NO MORE MONEY BY ADJUSTING HUGE GLASSES ON YOUR NOSE AND DISFIGURING YOUR FACE. Pamphlet of 100 pages Mailed Free. Send your address to

DR. J. BALL & CO., (P. O. Box 957.)
No. 91 Liberty Street, New York City, N. Y.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

Why not have a Beautiful Complexion?

WHY BE ANNOYED WITH

CHAPPED HANDS or ROUGH SKIN?

WHEN SUCH AN AGREEABLE AND EFFECTUAL

REMEDY CAN BE OBTAINED,

AT SO SMALL A COST,

BY USING WRIGHT'S

"ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET."

Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

HOLIDAYS

are drawing near! and those intending useful GIFTS for ANY of their FRIENDS, whether Men, Women, Boys or Girls, could not bestow one that would be BETTER appreciated than a

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESS

Send for a descriptive, illustrated Pamphlet, containing the various Agents' addresses, to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 349—351 Federal & 152 Kneeland-st's, Boston.

No suspension of Business on account of Fire!

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

YOUNG LADIES' EDUCATIONAL HOME will admit four new scholars Feb. 10, 1873. Preferences given to first applicants.
Mr. & Mrs. D. S. TROWBRIDGE, Greenwich, Conn.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

"CASHMERE BOUQUET."

COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

The New Novels

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

I.

THE WANDERING HEIR. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

II.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

III.

DR. WAINWRIGHT'S PATIENT. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Wrecked in Port," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IV.

A WOMAN'S VENGEANCE. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Cecil's Tryst," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

V.

FOR THE KING. An Historical Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "For Lack of Gold," "Robin Gray," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING"
"DOMESTIC"

presents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.

Agents wanted everywhere.

Address

"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER..No. 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Overskirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Overskirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING.

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

THE discovery of the heart dropsy cure, by Dr. N. S. Dodge, of Albany, N. Y., was accidental.—Ch'n Union.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

GRAND GOLD MEDAL AWARDED

NEW, USEFUL, VALUABLE!

Devoted to home enjoyment, instruction, improvement. Containing over 350 illustrations and naming 1160 scientific appliances; description and price of Tool Chests; Amateur Lathes, Tools and Machines; Model Steam Engines, Steamboats, Sailing Vessels; Mathematical Instruments; Microscopes; Chemical Cabinets, etc. Also series of 145 Chemical experiments and treatise on preparing objects for Microscope; instructions for making Fret or Scroll Work, with home talent, and illustrations of 110 useful parlor requisites, viz.: Bird Cages, Book Shelves, Brackets, Flower Stands, Writing Desks, Work Baskets, etc. Mailed on receipt of 25c., and with first order for $1.00 worth of Designs will send extra copies to refund price of Book free.

GEORGE PARR, BUFFALO, N. Y., Manf. Mechanics' Tools.

ESTABLISHED 1837 — HIGHEST PREMIUM

SIXTH EDITION FIFTIETH THOUSAND

$100,000 for only $10!

TEN THOUSAND CASH GIFTS aggregating $500,000 will be distributed by lot to patrons of the Third Grand Gift Concert in aid of the Public Library of Ky., at Louisville, Ky., Tuesday, April 8, 1873. Gifts range from $10 to $100,000, all cash. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. The first Concert, Dec. 16, 1871, and second, Dec. 7, 1872, went off with great success and received universal approval for the scrupulous integrity with which they were conducted and promptness with which gifts were paid. For tickets and full information, address Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'd'way, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Repository of Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"Nothing like it."—For ten years we have told you all about the people's favorite paper, the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." Our advertisements may be "an old story," but the paper grows fresher and brighter with every issue. Enlarged, improved, illustrated, it gives the best Stories, Sketches, Tales, Poems, Wit, Humor, &c., to be found in any paper any where. 48 long columns in each issue; 8 pages, Ledger size, ALL for $1 a year and a superb "PRANG CHROMO" free gratis to EACH and EVERY subscriber. It is one of Prang's best—a 16-tint chromo, "AUTUMN LEAVES," new, perfect, genuine, worth double the price of the paper alone. CHROMO and paper only $1. We refer to ANY respectable publisher, and to our 50,000 actual subscribers NOW taking our paper. We refer to L. Prang & Co., as to real value and genuineness of our chromo. We want Canvassers. Full "Outfit" FREE. Specimens 6 cts. We guarantee perfect satisfaction or will refund your money. Send one dollar to Star-Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

MEN, Women, Boys, and Girls Wanted, to act as agents for useful articles in their own localities—no capital required. Pays large profits. Inclose no stamp. Address P. O. VICKERY & CO., Augusta, Me.

BIG MONEY! AGENTS' outfit free. J. R. HOLCOMB, Mallet Creek, O.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A KIRK luminary recently asked his pet scholar why they took Stephen outside the walls of the city to stone him to death. The little fellow was silent for a moment, as though absorbed with the problem, when, brightening up suddenly, he replied, "So they could git a better crack at him."

When has a man a ghost of a chance of appeasing his appetite?—When he is a-goblin' up any thing.

"Let well alone," as the tippler said to the teetotaler.

The man who was hungry, and told to bolt his door, said he would much rather bar it.

The gardener who grafted a chestnut to a box-tree found it only produced large trunks.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—A little boy, on being threatened with a whipping, hung his head.

Some men who are reported "to live on their wits" must live on very limited premises.

"Is there any danger of the boa-constrictor biting?" asked a visitor of a zoological showman.

"Not the least," replied the showman; "he never bites; he swallows his wittles whole."

VERY NECESSARY.—We observe that the British Medical Journal speaks approvingly of "Nightingale's Respirator and Mouth-Protector." Considering the late hour at which that delightful bird sings in the open air, we only wonder it has not adopted some such precaution long since. At the same time, we should think the mouth-protector would interfere with the celebrated "jug, jug."

THOUGHTS DURING HAIR-CUTTING.

Will he cut it well, or shall I look an object for the next ten days?
Will he ask me how I would like it cut?
Will he talk to me?
Will he blow upon me?
Will he snip a bit off my ear?
Will he prick my lip when he trims my mustache?
Will he tell me that my hair is getting rather thin at the top?
Will he ask me whether I have tried, or would like to try, their marvelous Balsam, or their wonderful Wash, or their unrivaled Restorative?
Will he ask me whether I will be shampooed?
Will the brushing business bring tears into my eyes?
Will he part my hair on the wrong side?
Will uncomfortable hairs get between my collar and my neck?

THE MOST DIFFICULT GUN TO KEEP CLEAN—A fouling-piece.

A Chicago poet begins an apostrophe to the ocean with "Prodigious dampness!"

IT TAKES ALL SORTS TO MAKE A WORLD.—A writer has been amusing himself with picking out all sorts of odd characters. As some of these are perhaps unknown to many of our readers, it may be interesting to go over the catalogue, to which we have made additions from our own experience. There are people who lavish their money on the heathen abroad, and leave the heathen at home to take care of themselves. People who have no poor relations. People who like bagpipes, and who give money to organ-grinders. People who have more money than they know what to do with. People who like paying the income tax, and those who look forward hopefully to the time when there will be no income tax. People who like getting up early in the morning. People who have a hole broke in the ice to enable them to indulge in a cold bath before breakfast. People who delight in the sunrise, and who take long walks before breakfast. People who have no digestion, but who eat every thing. People who send conscience money to the Treasury. People who cross their letters. People who keep their old letters. People who have no nonsense about them. People who have no sense of humor. People who hold their tongues.

A witty boy, suffering from the application of the birch, said, "Forty rods are said to be a furlong. I know better. Let any body get such a plaguy licking as I've had, and he'll find out that one rod makes an acher!"

A plumber had a lad in his employ who thought himself about twice as sharp as new vinegar, and one day having occasion for a piece of zinc, ordered him to get one twelve inches square. "Yes, Sir," said Razor, "twelve inches square, but how long?"

WHAT NO DAIRY-MAN CAN ADULTERATE—The milk of human kindness.

A man of birth is commonly one whose remote ancestor did something, and his intermediate predecessors, for many centuries, nothing at all.

MALAPROPIANA.

Mrs. Malaprop has been very much interested in a description of the Honeycombs at Rome.

Mrs. Malaprop possesses a Shakspeare with Margery notes.

Mrs. Malaprop recommends the consecrated milk.

Mrs. Malaprop hates your chymical people.

A CONTENTED MIND.

"Oh, Mamma! we have had such Fun! Fancy, we've been doing Private Theatricals, and all of us took a Part!"
"Indeed! And what Part did all of you take?"
"Oh, the Part of those who look on and clap their Hands, you know."

THE FIRST BALL.

TED. "Do you have many hops in your country, Polly?"
POLLY (his simple rural cousin). "Why, of course, Ted; you know Pa has sixty acres."

"BAFFLED SCIENCE SLOW RETIRES."—SCENE: Conversazione of the Therebihangsatailogical Society.

DR. FOSSIL. "You observe, like the Os Calcis, there is a Projection here of the—"
LADY LISTENER (eager with demonstration). "That shows we can not have been Monkeys, Dr. Fossil; because in Real People that part is the Funny Bone."
MILITARY ESCORT (with evidently clear view of the theory). "Very true. I think it's absurd, you know, to imagine that that—aw—Fellah could ever have been a Man—arm is much too Long to hold a Gun properly; proves it beyond a Doubt—aw!" [Exit Dr. Fossil, a sadder if not a wiser man.

NATURAL HISTORY OF THE PAST YEAR.

Butterflies were broken on wheels.
Cats looked at kings.
Cricketers made ducks' eggs.
Little birds whispered in the ear.
A good many mares' nests were discovered.
People smelled a rat.
Others were still as a mouse.
Others plucked crows.
Others took "rooks."
Birds of a feather flocked together.
Puppies and dull dogs were as numerous as ever.
Cucumbers maintained their usual coolness.
Unsuccessful attempts were again made to put salt on birds' tails, to catch weasels asleep, and to introduce pigeon's milk.
The British lion had a strong dose of "Geneva" administered to him.

Poor Jones says he always gives Mrs. J. her own way, because it is the only thing he has to give her.

What is the difference between a mare and a mayor?—If you beat her, she will go; if you beat him, you will go—to prison.

If a justice were to give an unwise decision, would it be contempt of court to retort with a just hiss?

"If you do not take pains I will give you some," said a school-master to a careless pupil.

Brigham Young, it is stated, has now taken to dyeing his hair and whiskers. This will make him look Brigham Younger; but we doubt if there's any necessity for his thus blackening himself. It is quite possible, as it is, to produce the high lights in his character with charcoal.

FEASTS OF FOND MEMORY.

There is a sweet savor
Suggesting the flavor
Of what in mine youth was a great treat to me.
I nose it, while roaming,
Sometimes, in the gloaming:
Sally Lunn at the fire somewhere browning for tea.

O joy I can't utter!
Hot tea-cake with butter,
Or muffin, or crumpet, all gushing, galore,
When young lips were squeezing!
'Twere now full as pleasing
As it then was when these at their corners ran o'er.

Hot rolls, of a morning,
To shun I've had warning,
But now love as much as I ever did, quite.
The middle piece, crummy
And oozy and plummy,
Would still yield me all its remembered delight.

Toast, likewise, I dote on,
Hot, buttered, oft gloat on,
With eggs, in idea, for a morning's blow-out;
But that, for digestion,
Is out of the question;
So I breakfast on porridge for fear of the gout.

An old lady visited Barnum's show, was delighted with all she saw, and said, "He has every thing in his show that is on the bills but the hippodrome. I wonder where he keeps his hippodrome? Is it dead?"

ARRIVALS AND DEPARTURES.

INEBRIATED SPOUSE. "Well, m' dear! Meh Cris'm's! Cris'm's is come—"
STERN BETTER HALF. "Supposing Christmas is come, it's no reason why you should be gone—and so very far gone too!"

An Indian chief, in a telegraph office in Montana, being told that the operator was "talking with a white brother two thousand miles distant," gave it as his opinion that it was the "longest talk" he had ever witnessed.

There are goody goody books; there are also baddy baddy books, and rather too many of them.

An applicant for a pair of boots at one of our shoe stores was asked what number he wore, and replied, as soon as he could recover from his surprise, "Why, two, of course!"

"Six feet in his boots!" exclaimed Mrs. Beeswax. "What will the impudence of this world come to, I wonder? Why, they might as well tell me that the man had six heads in his hat."

An abbey in Ireland exhibits two skulls of Shakspeare—one of him when he was a little boy, and the other when he was a man.

Mrs. Partington wants to know why some of the sewing-machine advertisers do not call their machines the "Ceres." Her nephew, who is learning the heathen misogyny, tells her that Ceres first taught sowing.

A GENERAL DEPOSITORY—A child's mouth.

Though you may cut your hair for many years, in the end it is sure to cut you.

ABSENCE OF MIND.

FIRST GOSSIP. "What! lost a large shoulder of mutton, and didn't know it till she got home? I never heard of such a thing."
SECOND GOSSIP. "Lor' bless you, that's nothing! She let her baby fall from her arms the other day, and wouldn't never have known it neither, if it hadn't begun to cry.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 7.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S STREET SUITS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Fig. 1.—STREET SUIT. Fig. 2.—GIRL'S GABRIELLE DRESS. Fig. 3.—DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN).

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Dolman Vest-polonaise Street Suit, Fig. 3, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

Ladies' and Children's Street Suits, Figs. 1–3.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—STREET SUIT of Napoleon blue foulard-laine, trimmed with bias bands of white cashmere and gilt buttons. The skirt has a flounce with Watteau pleats separated by triangular revers. The over-skirt is of simple shape. The double-breasted basque is almost tight-fitting, and is worn over a pleated blouse of white linen. Black velvet bonnet, with blue and red China-asters. Black silk cravat. Undressed kid gloves.

Fig. 2.—GIRL'S GABRIELLE DRESS of pearl gray cashmere, trimmed with bands of Scotch plaid. Black velvet pelisse, trimmed with gray ostrich feathers. Gray straw hat, with a spray of rose-buds.

Fig. 3.—DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT. This stylish walking suit, a cut paper pattern of which is published with this number, will be one of the most popular spring styles, and may be made up to good advantage in any material, varying the trimming to suit the taste. In the original the Dolman polonaise with Louis Quinze vest front is of printemps gray cashmere, braided with soutache, and trimmed with yak lace of the same color. The vest fronts are of medium length, and are furnished with square pockets. The sides are turned back in graceful revers, and the front rounds back from the throat over the vest. A coat sleeve is set inside the flowing Dolman sleeve. The long walking skirt is of printemps gray faille, with three box-pleated flounces on the front breadths, and a deep kilted flounce on the back. Faille bows, without ends, conceal the joining of the flounces. Bonnet of blue royale velvet, trimmed with gray leaves and feather tips.

Cut paper patterns of the Dolman vest-polonaise street suit will be furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches bust measure. To take the size, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust, drawing it moderately tight. If the bust measure is an uneven number of inches, for instance, 35, send for 36 inches, and take the seams deeper than is allowed on the pattern. The average measure is from 34 to 36 inches, and one of these sizes is always sent when the measure does not accompany the order.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two articles—Dolman vest-polonaise and long walking skirt.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—two fronts, side form, back, pocket welt, a large, flowing Dolman sleeve, and a close-fitting coat sleeve. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together, and to show where to lay the folds on the front edges of the back breadth. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arm, to take up the darts and cross-basque seams, to lay the folds in the back of the skirt part, to turn back the revers on the side, to sew on the pocket welt, and to sew on the Dolman sleeve, and the size and shape of the under part of the coat sleeve. The Louis Quinze vest front is joined in with the polonaise at the shoulder and under-arm seams. It is quite deep, and nearly square across the bottom, and is fitted with two darts on each side of the middle and cross-basque seams. The front is closed the entire length with buttons and button-holes. A pocket welt is sewed on in the line of perforations near the bottom on each side. The polonaise front is fitted with one dart on each side of the front and cross-basque seams. The skirt part is turned back in the line of perforations, forming a revers, and is tacked at the top and middle on the outer edge under a bow, as seen in the illustration. The back is adjusted by side forms and a middle seam, which has an extra width cut on at the waist line and gathered on the under side of the garment. The skirt part of the back is laid on the fold of the goods to avoid making a seam, and is laid in four deep folds. A tape twelve inches long is tacked at the waist line. The four single holes are tacked on the tape three inches apart. The folds are laid, according to the notches, on each edge of the back breadth. Double the folds in the centre of the notches, and join edge of side gore to the back edge. The coat sleeve is sewed plain in the armhole. Place the longest seam to the notch in the back part of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The long Dolman sleeve is sewed on over it, in the line of perforations, from the front, over the shoulder, down the back, to the waist line. Place the notch in the front part of the sleeve to the first perforation in the front of the polonaise, near the lower part of the armhole. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom of the front of the vest show where to turn back for the hem.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8½ yards.
Lace for trimming, 7½ yards.

LONG WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and half of back breadth. Cut the front and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid making seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper. The front breadth and side front gores are trimmed with three box-pleated flounces of the material six inches wide, headed by two bias bands one inch wide. The remainder of the skirt is trimmed with a deep flounce fifteen inches wide, laid in side pleats.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.
Extra for ruffles and pleating, 6 yards.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1873.

☞ WITH the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for February 15 will be issued gratuitously an EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing the conclusion of GEORGE ELIOT'S

"MIDDLEMARCH,"

a large installment of

"LITTLE KATE KIRBY,"

and other interesting matter.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the new and stylish Dolman Vest-polonaise Street Suit, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 111.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' and Children's Walking Suits, Home and Evening Dresses; Jackets, Blouses, Bretelles, Fichu-Collars, Hoods, Sashes, Veils, etc.; Girls' Knitted and Crochet Muffs, Collars, and Cuffs; Bed Furniture, etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

VISITING.

By GAIL HAMILTON.

THERE are visits which remain in our memories as bright spots in life, and there are visits whose only pleasure is that they are over. But visiting ought always to be pleasant—pleasant to both giver and receiver.

One of the best things connected with keeping house is the freedom to receive one's friends. Many a newly married couple, many a small family without children, could board with far less care and expense than housekeeping costs them, and almost equal comfort. But the boarder is dependent upon the will and the convenience of others. He can not invite his friends to come and spend a week with him without consulting the capabilities, or depending for welcome upon the disposition, of some other host than himself. This puts him in an attitude not wholly dignified—not that which a mature person, man or woman, would naturally choose to maintain. But the householder is monarch of all he surveys, and invites at his own sweet will. If he meets an old friend suddenly in the street, if she learns by chance that a former school-mate is in the neighborhood, there are no outside authorities to consult, no whims or moods of a landlady to consider. Forth from the warm welcoming heart goes the invitation, and the fatted calf walks to the block at once, knowing that his hour is come.

This theoretically; yet practically it sometimes seems as if the hospitality of householders is as really hedged in as if they were but inmates of a stranger's house. People who are hospitable at heart, thoroughly friendly and well-disposed, do yet make such a burden of hospitality that one wonders how they can find any pleasure in it. This is a great pity, for the exchange of visits ought to be what it is capable of being, one of the great pleasures of life, a rest, a refreshment, an incentive, not a burden.

But to render it so we need not follow the rules laid down in the books, to divest receptions of their terror by being always ready to receive. Is it RUSKIN, or EASTLAKE, or Launcelot, or another, who condemns extension-tables on the ground that your table should be equally large at all times, to indicate that you are always ready for your friends? Go to, EASTLAKE and Launcelot! Sincerity is the watch-word of the new dispensation. We must have the supports of our brackets visible, and the chair-legs as palpably as they are really and as really as they are palpably firm; but if the table is to indicate that we are always ready for our friend, the table becomes at once a piece of household artfulness and not of household art, for we are not at all times equally ready. Honesty in life must precede honesty in furniture. We need not direct our efforts to being always ready to see friends, but we could do much in the way of trying not to be disturbed by their coming when we are not ready. If Serena could have her own way, she would prefer Celestia's call to be in the afternoon when the mid-day meal is over, the dishes are washed and removed, and Serena is calmly reposing in tidy dress and comparative leisure. But if Celestia must leave town by the noon train, and runs in by ten o'clock in the morning, when Serena is trimming the lamps, and there is much odor of petroleum in the air, and Serena's fingers are not wholesome to Celestia's gloves, shall Serena be dismayed and apologize and mentally regret that she is always "caught in the suds?" Not the least in the world, if she is a sensible and friendly woman. If it is the proper time for her to be cleaning lamps, and she is in a garb proper to a lamp-cleaner, she has no call to be disturbed though the Queen of England in crown and sceptre should pay her a morning visit. She should not consider herself as "caught in the suds," or as caught at all. She is in the suds of her own free-will and by the fore-ordination of Heaven, and if "Heaven itself should stoop to her," it ought to find her nowhere else at that hour. It would be very unbecoming that she should be trimming her lamps in a silk gown in the front parlor. Why not be entirely frank and at ease, and if her work be pressing, bid Celestia to a safe seat by the kitchen fire, or if she can conveniently go off duty for a while, take her pleasant chat to the pleasant parlor?

So far from its being necessary to be always ready for company, it is one of the pleasures of housekeeping to prepare for company. Sweeping and dusting are but dull drudgery when cleanliness is the only object; but how pleasant it is to tidy the rooms when a houseful of guests are coming at the end of it! There is an incentive worthy of toil—that transmutes toil into delight. But suppose you have been ill, or the children have had scarlet fever, or Norah is gone, and there is a chance for a visit from a friend. Must you send her away? Yes, if you absolutely can not undertake the slight addition to your work which her visit necessitates. But remember her visit does not necessitate that you should go through house-cleaning previous to her appearance. Suppose the doors are finger-marked, and the windows not faultlessly clean, and the guest-chamber has not been swept for a month, the doors will open, and the windows will let in fresh air, and you and your friend can get immense draughts of satisfaction out of the visit, though things are not as you would so gladly have them, if you will only not fret about them, but consign them to the insignificance they merit. We are afraid of each other, forgetting that our friends have the same kind of experiences that we have. The most thorough of housekeepers is sometimes forced to "let things go," unless she sacrifices something of more importance than "things." Serena is distressed because the afternoon sun reveals to her responsible eyes a little dust under the sofa. But Celestia is equally distressed because her student-lamp suddenly goes out during Serena's evening call. Why should not both comfort themselves with the reflection that nothing has happened unto them but such as is common unto women, and dismiss their apprehensions? I know a man who came near bleeding to death because there was not a cobweb to be found in house or barn to stanch the blood. Be advised, dear house-mother, and do not lose all the freshness and impulse to be found in your friend's visit because you have no time to go through the house with your broom upside down.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Honey-Dew.

MY DEAR FRED,—I saw the carriages and the bridal favors at the door of a church the other day, as I was passing in the horse-car, and straightway my mind was full of the loveliest pictures. Indeed, a marriage is like spring. It is the most familiar of facts. Yet how often a spring day is the most melancholy of disillusions! But it is not the chill, dull days that spring suggests. The word is full of sunshine and softness, the singing of birds and the sweetness of blossoms and the gurgling of brooks. To speak of a spring day is to think of happy hopes and eternal youth, of budding beauty and of love. And I say that this vision does not fade although the spring seems often to elude us, and to go from March to June almost without justification. May-day is a pretty name. But who would promise that on the next May-day he will dance garlanded around the pole and salute the queen? Consulting experience, we know the chances of the easterly storm. But while men often despair, yet in the heart of man experience never yet conquered hope. Spring still stands upon the horizon, jocund and tiptoe, a smiling Hebe.

In the same way, who permits the figure of old Blue-beard to spoil the vision of matrimony? Suppose that he did cut off those poor dear heads: suppose that at this very instant sister Fatima is standing upon a hundred towers in this very city, looking eagerly for the fast-hastening brothers, and spying only a flock of sheep as she sees us placidly promenading in the street: do we look with any less tender joy upon Lucy emerging from the church yonder in a white veil, and leaning upon the happy Harry's arm? That lovely pair, that shy hope and modest confidence—these, and not Blue-beard's disagreeable closet, make the vision of matrimony. As when we speak of spring we mean roses and honeysuckles and soft air, so when we speak of marriage we mean the union of youth and strength and beauty and devotion which I saw as the bridal party emerged from the church. Indeed, there is one word which seems to me to express it all—we think of the honey-dew which has fallen upon two lives.

What is honey-dew? It is a natural question, but it is useless to go beyond its own suggestion. What should you suppose honey-dew to be? Something infinitely pure and sweet. Well, it is a kind of saccharine deposit upon certain leaves. And when the reverend hands are raised over the heads of the kneeling young figures, and the traditional sacred benediction is spoken, do you not ask, What is love but a deposit of honey-dew upon life? I protest, as the old writers used to say, that when I see the newly married pair I think of a surfeit of richness, of those roses and honeysuckles of spring steeped in honey-dew. I know that there are withered leaves and thorns; but what then? Here, at least, are bloom and freshness and sweetness. If the sun presently rises and burns up the dew—very well, that belongs to a later hour.

That is to say, that it usually does. But I am sorry, in a short sermon upon so sweet a text, to be obliged to say that sometimes the sun exhales that dew at a very early hour. When I saw Lucy in her white veil coming from the church and moving toward her carriage, I pulled the string of the car and I jumped out, and ran to the sidewalk, and just as the door of the carriage closed I went to it, and removing my hat respectfully, I put my head in at the window and I said, "Mrs. Lucy, don't let the sun exhale the honey-dew of this moment!" And with that I bade her godspeed, and bowed and withdrew. She looked at me over her flowers and smiled, and I suppose she told Harry that it was only their harmless old friend Mr. Bachelor. And I can fancy Harry saying as the carriage drove away, "Just fancy, Lucy—fancy to-day, of all days, the misery of belonging to the Bachelor family!" But I will add for the information of those who are liable to be confused upon the subject, that he knew some of the family to be married.

When I see some of the tough survivors, so to speak, Fred—some of the matrimonial campaigners, as they would be called by you scoffing youth; some who have settled down into a kind of jog-trot life, a matrimony that creaks, as it were, and which must be in constant surprise at itself; when I see, for instance, old Darby and Joan, she scolding and painting her cheeks and wearing bonnets too youthful, he growling at his coffee and grumbling at his beef, and laying a handkerchief over his head to sleep under after dinner, and glaring at Joan when she wakes him from his nap by saying that she would thank him not to snore so loudly—when I see these things and think of all that they imply, as when we see wide patches of dry sand we are sure of a parched soil, or in seeing ice and frozen ground we know that there are no flowers, then I wonder if it be possible that there was once honey-dew upon the lives and hearts of Darby and Joan.

When she wakes him out of that nap do you suppose that he ever pictures to himself the snug fireside of the unmarried man, where, after dinner, that potentate of his own domain dozes undisturbed, and where the neat-handed Phillis respects his slumbers, and moves softly as if he were a king sleeping? Do you suppose that, as Darby glares at Joan, and hears her dry insinuation about snoring, he asks himself how it happened that he ever married her? how it chanced that he did not see her then as he sees her now? and what fond and foolish spell bewitched him to surrender freedom and deliberately submit himself to domestic gibing? If, in that waking moment, across his drowsy imagination flits the picture of the day when he was the happy Harry and Joan the hopeful Lucy, do you suppose that he recognizes himself? That was spring, and this is icy, cheerless winter. But, Darby, the mystery is clear, the explanation is not far to seek. The figures that you see are indeed Joan and you. But they are steeped in honey-dew, and you have suffered it to dry up and disappear.

How soon it may exhale! For it is not time only, it is not necessarily age, that consumes it. It was but a day or two after I had seen the wedding-party issuing from the church that I was comfortably seated in the drawing-room car, to roll somewhere out into the world. It was early in the morning, and a young man and woman entered, whom I recognized as another Harry and Lucy lately mated. But how shall I describe to you the conduct of that young bride? She was prettily dressed, and when I saw her coming I was glad to think that I should have all day so fair a fellow-traveler. But she stopped in the middle of the car, and looked around with a tossing head, and then with peevish impatience exclaimed, "I won't sit here. Why did you get into this car? The chairs are not half so comfortable as they are in the other car." And my lady flounced and bounced and pouted, and then added, "You are always so stupid! You always get into the wrong car!"

Hosted by Google

Poor Harry replied in a low tone, feeling, I fear, very foolish, because he knew that I heard, although I looked abstractedly out of the window, with an air of wondering whether Dr. Livingstone was still at Mjmbz or had advanced to Gnxji. Indeed, I assumed the most Central African air possible, in order to relieve Harry of the awkwardness of my presence. Harry, I say, mumbled something deprecatory of the wrath of Juno, and begged Lucy to be seated. But she held her hands in her muff, and tossed her head again, and performed the same flouncings and bouncings, until Harry suggested that he was very sorry indeed, but that the other car was not going through, and if she did not seat herself soon the chairs would all be taken. Then the bride Lucy flung herself sullenly into one of the chairs, and Harry seated himself in the one beside her. Suddenly she rose, and said, angrily, "I'm not going to ride backward!" and Harry, rising, begged her to take his chair, which was next to mine, while I continued to explore equatorial Africa out of the window.

After a long time Harry made some remark, which his life's partner snapped at like a vicious bird at a finger. But nothing could rival his patience. I thought at first that he would gladly join Dr. Livingstone, if he were only sure that the doctor would never come back; but I soon saw that he was simply refusing to believe what was not pleasant. He spoke very low, and I could catch the deprecating, soothing tone; but I pitied him profoundly. Presently I returned from Central Africa, and gazed around the car and looked carefully at Lucy. She was a well-dressed young woman, with the face of a spoiled beauty. But her cross, irritable temper was the hot sun that had so soon dried the honey-dew from her nuptial bower. Harry would evidently try to believe it still there. Patient, soothing, thoughtful, he would evidently insist to himself that these freaks were but vapors of the morning. I am much older than Harry, and I turned to that sulky little Lucy and said, "My dear, while the dew stays upon roses and honeysuckles they are fresh and fair. They do not wither until that dries. And the sweetest of all dew is honey-dew. Gentle lady, beware! Don't let it dry away."

She looked at me for a moment in amazement, and then said, in a half-hysterical tone, to Harry, "There! I told you I didn't wish to sit here. And here is a crazy man!"

Poor Harry! By-and-by he will lay a handkerchief over his head after dinner, and Lucy will awaken him to say that she wishes he would not snore. Will you like that, Lucy? Will you wish sometimes for the old lover of long ago? And before it comes to the hard, cold tone in which you disturb his snoring, will you perhaps sometimes passionately say, "Once it was different. Once you were devoted to me?" Then should this letter chance to be seen by you —for Fred is very apt to drop his correspondence!—will you not reflect upon the words of the crazy man who sat next you in the car going to Persepolis, and shield the honey-dew new-fallen upon your life from the withering glare of a peevish temper?

Your friend, Fred,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE SUIT.

THE Dolman vest-polonaise illustrated on our first page (and of which a cut paper pattern is published) is a new garment brought out in Paris when the season is advanced, with a view to deciding the over dresses of spring suits. This is a composite garment, having the principal feature of the Dolman—its winged sleeves—the favorite vest front, and the back drapery of the polonaise. We commend this design to ladies who are impatient to begin making the cashmere, alpaca, and woolen suits of their spring wardrobes. The front of this polonaise has a Louis Quinze vest long enough to have small square pockets (or else pocket flaps) just below the waist. The front slopes away gracefully from the vest, showing the trimming on the front breadth of the skirt. The waist is tight-fitting; the back has side bodies, and sufficient fullness is introduced below the waist to make the skirt hang in plain almost horizontal folds across the tournure. There are plain coat sleeves, and the flowing Dolman attachment is added. This costume is usually made with a cashmere, camel's-hair, or Sicilienne polonaise over a silk skirt. It may be also made entirely of cashmere or of foulard-laine with gros grain folds on the flounces. This is very handsome for the present season in dark Pompeian red cashmere, with gros grain vest, pockets, cuffs, and trimming. For the spring such costumes will be made of shades of vert-de-gris, olive, Norwegian gray, and Napoleon blue. Stout ladies are partial to this polonaise, as it dispenses with all clumsy fullness; they sometimes omit the Dolman wings. An elegant black costume worn by a large blonde has a striped Sicilienne polonaise over a plain black faille skirt trimmed with two flounces. The polonaise has the vest front and side revers, but not the Dolman sleeves of the pattern illustrated to-day. The vest is covered with rows of wide Valenciennes lace, and a frill of lace falls over the hands. A double pleated lace frill surrounds the neck; a pale blue bow with fringed ends turned upward is in the finger puffs of light hair; cameo brooch and ear-rings.

RUMORS ABOUT SPRING STYLES.

Modistes predict that there will be no decided changes in the present convenient and graceful costumes; novelties will be confined to the small details of the toilette. The polonaise will continue in favor, though various changes will be rung upon it. Double-breasted polonaises worn over muslin habit shirts will be seen, and revers will be a feature of these over dresses. Sashes in their present modified form will also be retained. Dress skirts for the street, rumor says, will again be comfortably short.

SPRING SUITS.

A spring suit to be sent South is worthy of description. It is made of Napoleon blue foulard, with white polka dots, trimmed with revers and narrow side pleating of solid blue silk. The skirt has a single deep flounce, laid in shallow box-pleats. The polonaise is double-breasted, fastened by two rows of buttons on the corsage. It has a revers collar, triangular revers on the flowing sleeves, and very wide revers on the skirt, formed by turning the lower edge of the skirt upward and backward in true Pompadour fashion. A large button holds back the revers, and a side pleating borders them. A white linen blouse with turned-over collar and cuffs and a black cravat complete the dress. The hat is English straw, trimmed with a fringed scarf of blue India silk. Gray undressed kid gloves. Dark blue silk parasol with Alpine stick.

SPRING GOODS.

The success of three things is insured for the next season, say experienced merchants, viz., plain grounds of quaint mongrel hues, in opposition to positive colors in silks and fine woolens; second, polka dots for foulards and the soft-finished wash goods; third, lace-like open-worked stripes in grenadine and batiste.

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR.

The finest fabric shown for spring polonaises is India camel's-hair, made so light and thin as to be of scarcely perceptible weight, and almost as cool as muslin. It is in all the stylish shades of blue-gray, écru, peacock, réséda, and berceline —a gray with rosy hues. The same fabric is also shown with the twill reversed to form stripes.

VIGOGNE, ETC.

Vigogne is fine wool in its natural gray shades, woven into a light soft fabric, now very popular for traveling dresses. It resembles an old-fashioned material called de bège, but is finer and more costly. Undressed cashmere is a roughly twilled fabric that forms soft, graceful drapery. It is only found in unbleached buff and gray tints.

LACE AND BROCADED STRIPES.

In the woolen goods just described, in pongees and kindred materials, a great many open lace stripes are introduced, partly to relieve the monotony of solid colors, but especially to make heavy fabrics light enough for warm weather. These striped fabrics are used for the over dress and flounces, while a similar stuff of solid color is chosen for the skirt. Brocaded stripes, with small figures wrought in a darker shade, are also used to enliven plain surfaces. Thin goods have been greatly improved, especially those light wool fabrics that are commended above muslin for our changeable climate.

BATISTE.

The écru batiste, so popular last summer, reappears, accompanied with ruffles embroidered with white for trimming skirts and polonaises. Batistes, to be sold by the yard and used for entire suits, are striped with white honey-comb figures imitating lace, or else there are thin stripes woven in. Again, there are over-skirt and polonaise patterns wrought all over in designs like guipure lace; these are to be worn over plain batiste. Broché linen is a name given to thick batiste on which are palm, oak, or fern leaves in white, embroidered by machinery. These were worn last year for over dresses.

TURKISH TOWELING.

A new rough linen resembling Turkish toweling is made far thinner than that worn hitherto, and is smooth on the wrong side. The best patterns are in inch-wide stripes of darker brown on écru grounds. These stripes look like sponge, and the material is called sponge-striped linen. It is predicted this linen will be a fashionable summer costume, as it was favorably received in Europe last year.

An elegant Oriental tissue is a novelty designed for the polonaises of watering-place costumes. It is entirely white, with rough creamy-white wool stripes, alternating with thinnest silk stripes beautifully brocaded.

PERCALES WITH FOULARD FINISH.

The new percales are antiquated-looking cotton stuffs with the soft finish and lustre of silk. We mentioned last week the prevailing design of white polka dots on a ground of deepest blue, brown, plum-color, gray, or black. These, it is said, will be made in the fashion described above for foulard, but the Bazar commends instead a jaunty sailor blouse, with two skirts very simply trimmed, as a better model for wash dresses. Two sizes of dots may be used in one suit: tiny spots for the blouse, and larger ones for the skirts. Striped percales are also shown. These are in two shades of a color—greenish-gray or Napoleon blue, or else in contrasting shades, such as gray and rose-color, blue and gray, lilac and green, etc. Borders are also imported for percales; and there are waved lines, linked rings, and many other fanciful designs.

STRIPED BLACK GRENADINES.

The newest black grenadines have lace-like stripes over an inch wide, with plain smooth grenadine stripes between. Various other stripes are shown, such as square-meshed canvas stripes with thick grenadine, or brocaded stripes, or, handsomer still, repped stripes like fine Sicilienne. Plain black is preferred, but sometimes a color is introduced in these goods. The cheap grenadines are in as stylish patterns as more expensive fabrics. White grenadines, partly cotton, are for inexpensive dresses for in-doors. These have brocaded stripes of bright color.

GLACÉ MOHAIRS.

For serviceable spring dresses there is nothing better than the pure glacé mohairs. They are pretty silvery gray, smooth lustrous surface, will endure hard wear, and do not shrink from dampness. Very fine plain grounds are preferred, but damask broché figures are also shown in the elaborate designs woven in heavy winter goods. The black beaver mohair retains its well-deserved popularity, and is almost as beautiful as silk. Plain mohairs and alpacas are now brought out in the stylish tints, and in stripes of two shades of greenish-gray, brown, olive, and other useful colors. The cheap Japanese poplins sold to the million for 25 cents a yard are displayed in the patterns just described for mohair.

VARIETIES.

Medici sleeves, with a great puff around the armhole, are much worn in Paris. They look especially appropriate with black velvet dresses. Dinner dresses of silk and satin have lengthwise puffed sleeves extending from the armhole to the elbow, and ruffled below.

The windows of gentlemen's furnishing stores are filled with Napoleon blue neck-ties spotted with white. Colored silk pocket-handkerchiefs are used by gentlemen who adhere closely to English fashions.

Silvered horseshoes, anchors, whips, or dog-heads in antique silver are the favorite scarf brooches among fancy jewelry.

Jewelry of cut steel combined with jet is worn by ladies in light mourning.

For information received thanks are due Misses SWITZER; and GEDNEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

IT was a pleasant story, but not exactly true, that Professor TYNDALL proposed to give all the money he made here for the foundation of something scientific. He has made a handsome sum, though not so much as is generally supposed. The agents and such have taken the lion's share. In Philadelphia he got at the rate of $500 out of $1500 profit; in Washington, $2000 out of $5000; in Boston he cleared $3000. But he made the most in this city and Brooklyn, where every thing after the bare expenses went to him. In these two cities he has "salted" about $13,000. After paying all expenses he will take home with him about $15,000, which, on the whole, is what printers call a "fat take" for three months' work. He expresses himself as delighted with every thing and every body in this broad Western expanse.

—Mr. COBDEN once said of the late LOUIS NAPOLEON that he thought him more worthy of an hour's talk than any monarch in Europe.

—One Captain HUGHES, of South Australia, having the intent to do something beneficent, recently gave $100,000 toward founding a university at Adelaide. The example has so far been contagious as to induce another pecunious captain to throw in his little mite of $50,000.

—Father JANDEL, the chief of the Order of Dominicans, just deceased, is the seventy-fifth of the members of the Œcumenical Council who have died since it opened on the 8th of December, 1869. Among the seventy-five were eight cardinals. There are forty-five cardinals living, of whom twenty-one are over seventy years old. BILLET, who is ninety, is the oldest. All the cardinals are now at Rome, excepting Cardinal HOHENLOHE. Twenty-five cardinals' hats are vacant.

—Mr. JOSEPH JEFFERSON, who has just concluded a professional engagement at Baltimore, says that he not only experiences now no traces of his former disease, but that he can read easily fine print with his operated eye, and does not suffer pain under any light. His recovery he regards as complete.

—Mr. JONES, the new United States Senator from Nevada, is a young man, not over forty, and has made a large fortune by his courage and enterprise. He makes a capital speech, and possesses the qualities necessary to make a useful, practical Senator.

—A few miles from Rome is the palace of Count GENATTI, where the countess, formerly Miss KINNEY, of New York, presides at the elegant entertainments given by her husband.

—London had its LOUIS BONARD. One THOMAS HOLME, a rag merchant, recently died there worth $500,000, leaving $50,000 to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and $25,000 to other charities. His relatives, receiving nothing, contested the will on the ground of insanity. It was one of his pleasantries that he called children "devil's cubs," and fat old women he especially hated. When a packet came into the harbor he would wish that it might sink with all on board; and he even was generous enough in his misanthropy to announce that it would give him ineffable satisfaction to see Ramsgate and every thing human it contained ingulfed by some great convulsion of nature. His London landlady gave confirmatory testimony. He used to throw good meat to his dog "Bluff" rather than give it to old and suffering women. Islington he wanted served as badly as Ramsgate, and considered himself ill used because there were not more railroad smash-ups and railroad disasters for his benefit. The last hostess considered herself so scandalized that she doubled his rent, but the old gent wouldn't budge, and kept on there until he died.

—It may interest our clerical readers in the country to know at what figure the Gospel is dispensed in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn: The salary of Mr. BEECHER is $20,000; Mr. HALLIDAY, $3000; Mr. WELD, first sexton, $3500; Mr. RAYNOR, second sexton, $1200; music, $8000; insurance, $500; current expenses, $7000; Plymouth Library, $700. Total, $43,900.

—Mrs. FROUDE is the daughter of Mr. DELANE, editor of the London Times.

—Miss SCHENCK, a daughter of our minister to England, is said to be engaged to a British nobleman.

—Mr. GEORGE BANCROFT, who is now traveling in the East, exhibits himself behind a flowing white beard, in which he recently called on the venerable Patriarch of the Greek Church, now ninety-two years of age. The next day the Patriarch, with beard whiter and longer than that of our great diplomatist, returned the call.

—A retired, or tired, clergyman, fifty years old, has just entered the Freshman class at Dartmouth College. His aspiration is "to finish up his mortal career with a college course."

—Mr. LOWE, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is thus complimented by the London Saturday Review on the flourishing condition of the treasury: "The revenue is thriving beyond precedent, for trade is and has been good, and good trade means much beer, and much beer means a large surplus." In other words, the more you tipple the richer you are. It is not the notion in Maine.

—The late Dr. JOSHUA LEAVITT has been made the subject of many laudatory notices by the press as having been the pioneer in many of our reforms. In the antislavery party he was a power. He was the first secretary of the Seamen's Friend Society, and was also secretary of the American Cheap Postage Society. The first hymn and tune book for churches published in this country was edited by him, and he was always at something for the good of his fellowmen.

—The aged GUIZOT is absolutely bringing out another work, Monarchy, Imperialism, and Republicanism. This veteran statesman and author was eighty-six years old last October. He has seen three monarchies, two empires, and three republics in France.

—Of the many notices of the late Lady BEACONSFIELD, we have read none that seems to describe her so exactly as that of Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY, one of the many clever contributors to the publications of HARPER & BROTHERS. "She was," he writes, "twenty years older than DISRAELI, and she was not beautiful; but those who knew the two intimately knew that she was in every way an extraordinary woman, and that the attraction between them was real. They who looked to find in the bride of the literary artist who had drawn for the public eye almost as many imposing female characters as WALTER SCOTT himself might be disappointed when they beheld in his actual bride an elderly and homely lady; but those who had the good fortune to meet her in society rarely failed to find delight in her varied intelligence, her simple manners, her humor, and a certain poetic temperament which was little short of fascinating. I have never seen any other woman at all like her. As she grew older her naturally strong features became more pronounced, but she had always an air of unassumed superiority and refinement, and her bright eyes gleamed with a singular light. Her hair never became gray, and was always beautiful. Her devotion to DISRAELI became the all-absorbing instinct of her life, and her care placed, as it were, a velvet mantle between him and all the sharp corners of life."

—The only musician in the world who is known to possess the rank of a field officer is GUATELLI, recently the leader of the Sultan's band, and director of the music of the Ottoman army. He has the rank of major-general, and he has just been deposed from his leadership.

—HORACE GREELEY'S estate, it is thought, will net about $75,000, and there is little doubt but that his last will will be held valid.

—Dr. TERRY, of Columbus, Georgia, is a thoughtful man, who sets a certain value upon his personal liberty. Recently, in what is technically called a court of justice in that State, he testified thus: "Saw deceased after he was shot; he was lying on the floor, in a pool of blood, in a dying condition. Don't know how long he lived afterward; did not make any minute examination, for the reason that I did not want you lawyers to prove I killed him with a probe."

—WILLIAM CASTLE, one of the sweetest of American tenors, has been received with special éclat in London.

—MITSI, a young Japanese student, who died recently at New Brunswick, New Jersey, was buried in Willow Grove Cemetery. The laws of Japan forbid the return of the bodies of subjects who have died abroad.

—It sounds oddly enough that the famed palace of the ORSINIS, at Florence, should be the home of our consul, Mr. JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, and that his last entertainment, given a few days since, was to that radical Republican, Minister SCHENCK.

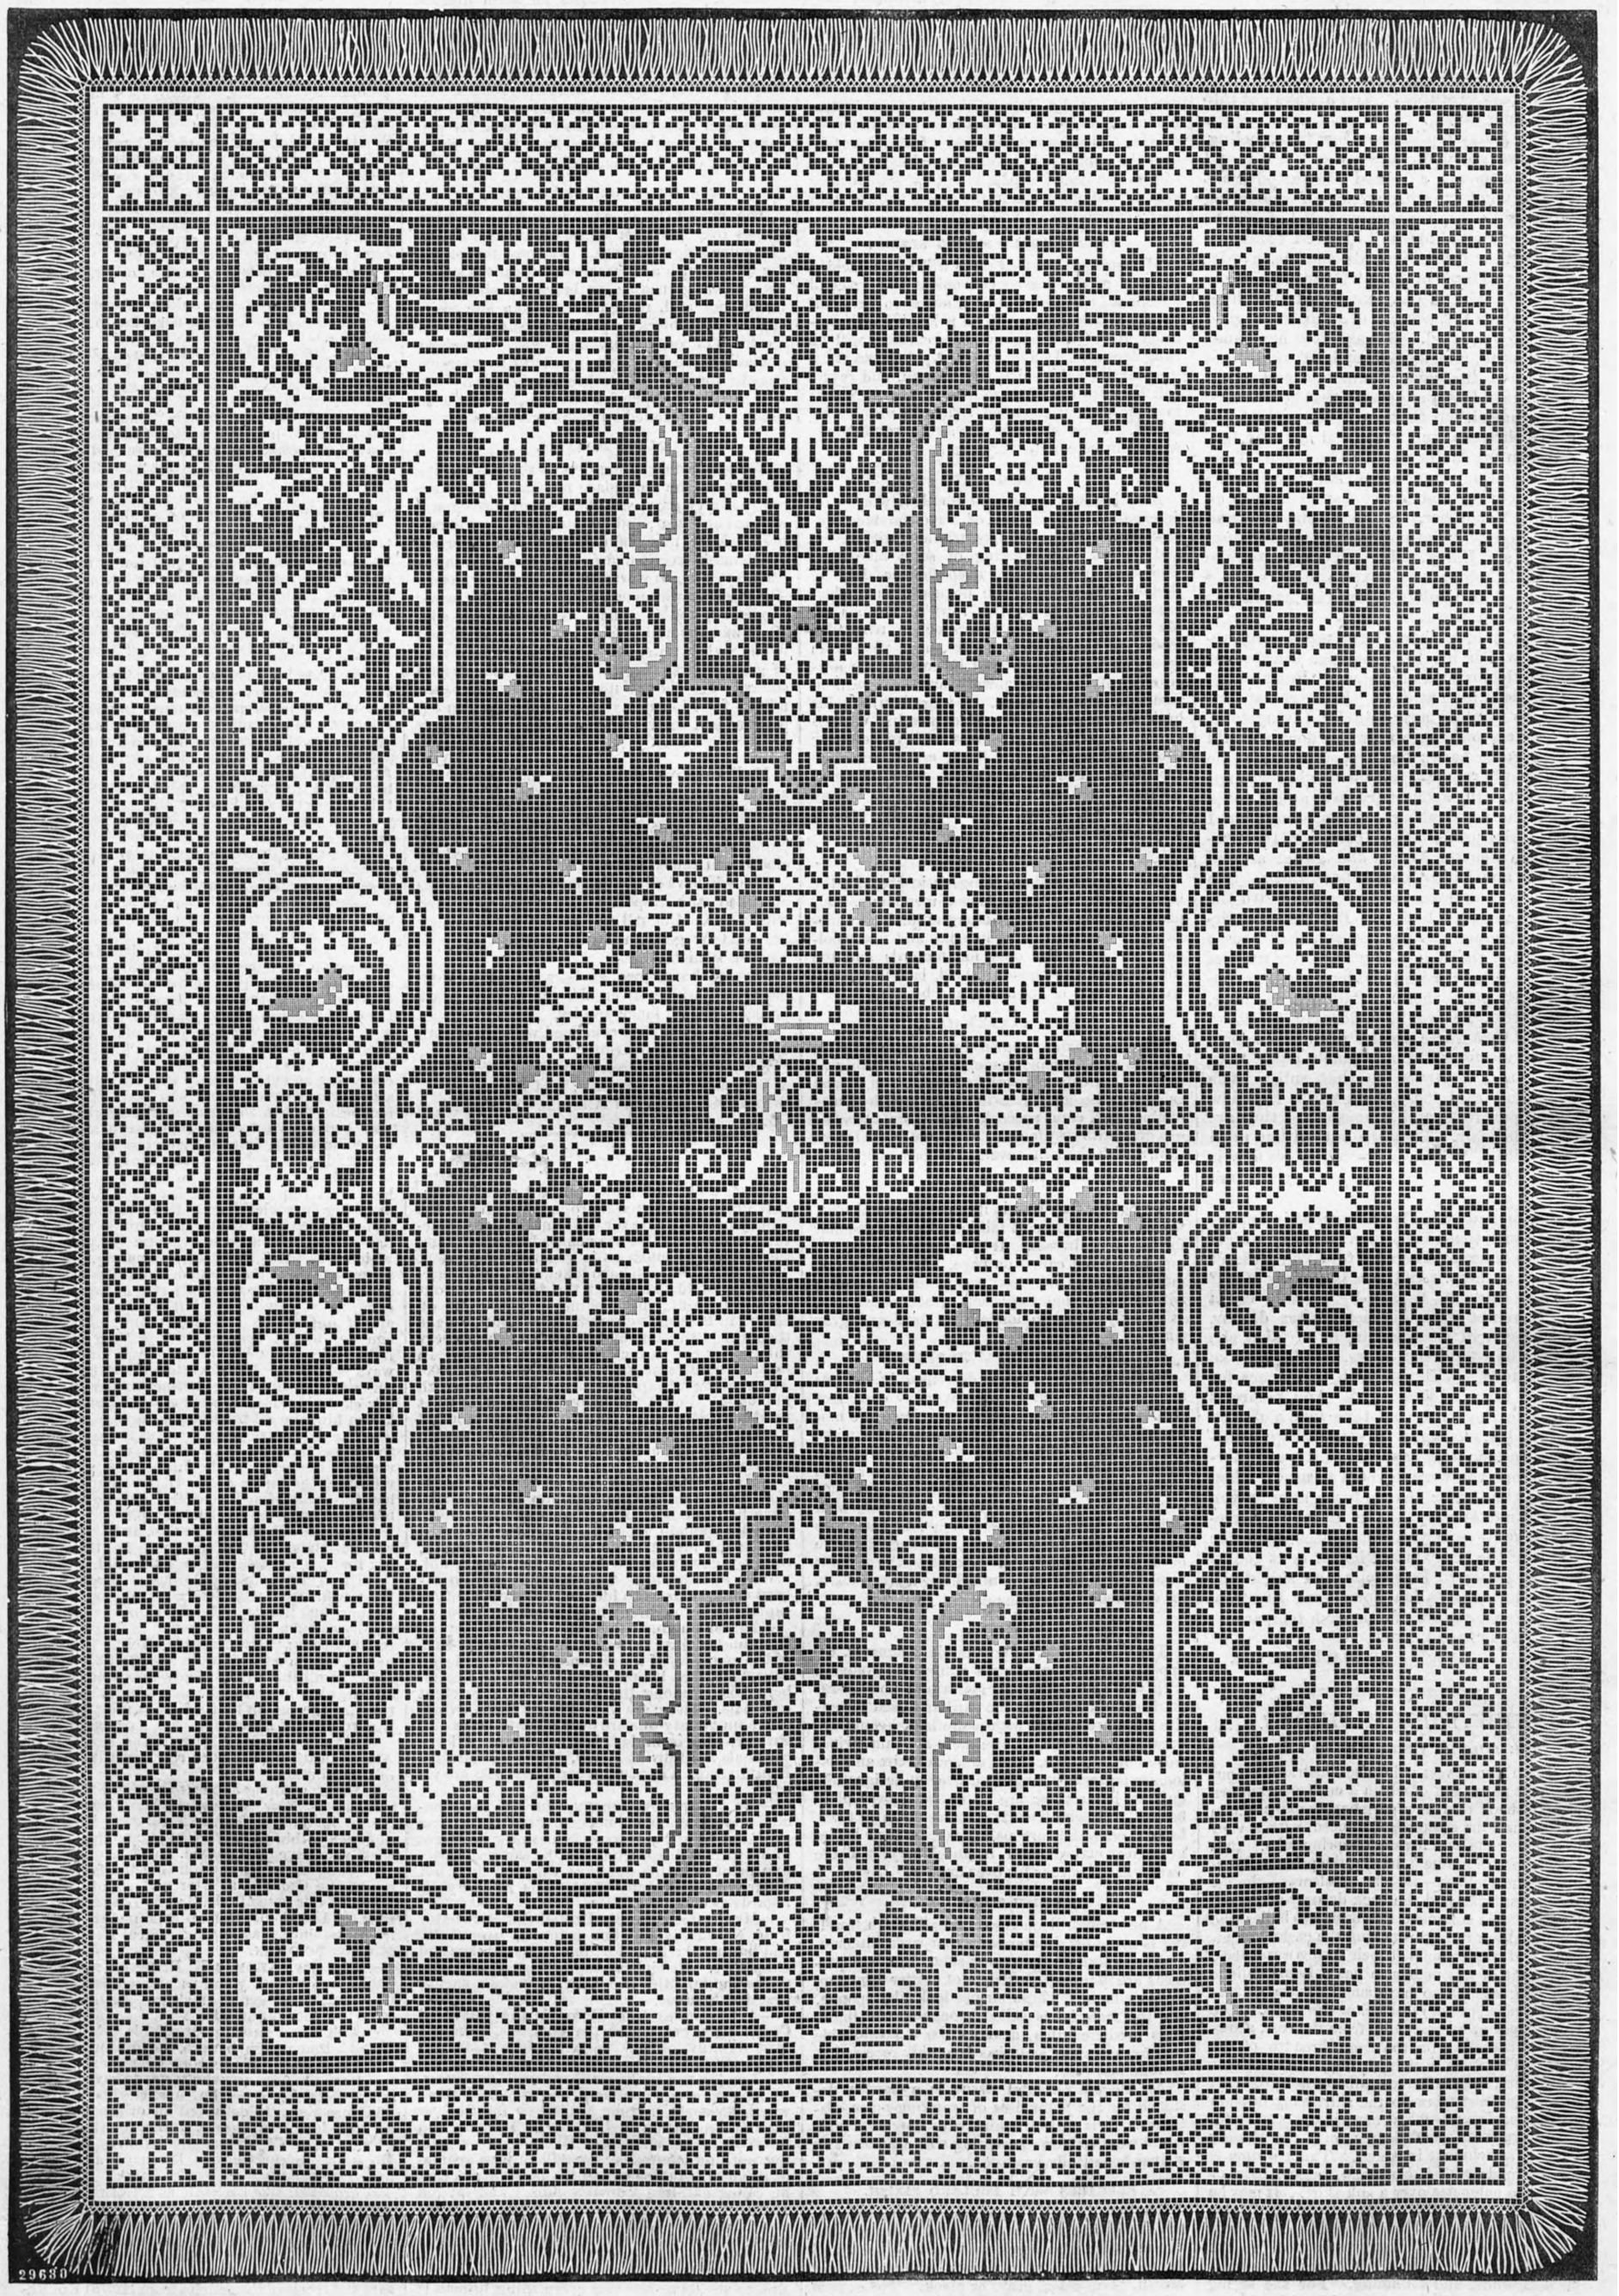
—The Rev. THOMAS K. BEECHER makes no doubt that "cleanly and vaccinated persons are in no more danger of small-pox than they are of virtue without an effort."

—M. THIERS has announced his intention to squelch that naughty place, the Jardin Mabille, and other places of the same character.

—BAYARD TAYLOR, who seems to have become partly German since he married his German wife, has recently delivered an original lecture on American literature at Gotha, for the benefit of the Ladies' Christian Association of that city. He spoke in the German language, and introduced translations of POE'S Raven. The hall was crowded, and his style as a Germanist was particularly commended.

—A Madame BANER has just been arrested in Genoa for having in her possession the silver plate which, during the Commune, was stolen from the Palace of the Legion of Honor. She says she received the articles from HENRI ROCHEFORT.

Hosted by Google



NETTED DESIGN FOR COVERS, CURTAINS, ETC.—[SEE PAGE 101.]

Hosted by Google

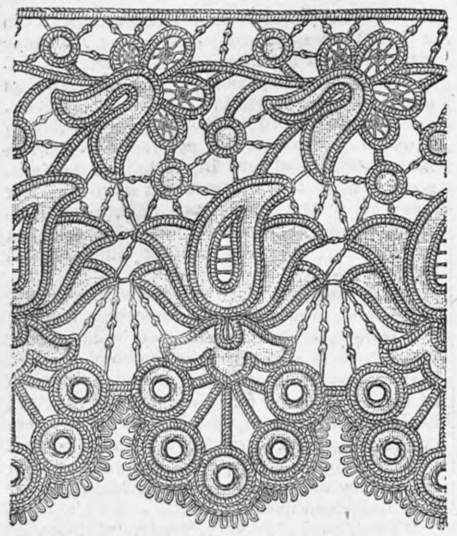


Fig. 1.—EDGING.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Netted Design for Covers, Curtains, etc.

See illustration on page 100.

THIS design is suitable for working table-covers, coverlets, window-curtains, etc. When designed for curtains, the monogram should, of course, be omitted. Work the design on the netted foundation with knitting cotton or glazed cotton; the parts which are white in the design are worked in point de toile, and the dotted parts in point d'esprit. The size of the squares of the foundation is determined by the size of the article to be worked.

Leather-work Photograph Frame, Figs. 1–5.

FOR this frame take a piece of soft sheep or calf skin, which has first been soaked in cold water for several hours and then taken out and wiped lightly by laying it between two cloths. Of this leather, while still damp, cut a number of different flowers and leaves from the full-sized illustrations shown by Figs. 2–5, with the help of Fig. 1, which is reduced in size, and mark the veins in these by means of cuts made with a sharp knife, but without cutting through the leather. Form each calyx of a circular piece from three-quarters of an inch to seven-eighths of an inch in diameter, which is cut a quarter of an inch deep at hair-breadth intervals on the outer edge, so that a kind of fringe is formed. For the filaments of the five-leaved larger flowers separate a leather strip a quarter of an inch wide and an inch and three-quarters long, divided at one end into three fine threads seven-eighths of an inch long by means of slits, tie the strip in a knot close underneath these, slip the under end through the calyx and flower, into which a hole has first been bored, and again tie a knot close underneath the flower. The end of the strip serves for a stem. The smaller flowers are furnished with calyxes and stems in a similar manner. The flowers and leaves thus formed are arranged on a card-board frame covered with linen or paper, and are pasted on with thick fluid gum-arabic. The photograph is then set in at the back.

Fig. 1.—LEATHER-WORK PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Fig. 2.—LEAF FOR PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Fig. 4.—FLOWER FOR PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Fig. 5.—FLOWER FOR PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Edgings in Venetian Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE edgings are suitable for trimming covers, curtains, borders of window-shades, etc. They may be worked on fine linen, batiste, Swiss muslin, or nansook with embroidery cotton or fine thread. Having transferred the design to foundation linen or to the material, run the outlines of the design figures. For the edging Fig. 1 first stretch the bars, which join the design figures, with fine guipure cord, then button-hole stitch all the outlines, and inside of these work the wheels and ladder stitches as shown by the illustration. For the edging Fig. 2 button-hole stitch the joining bars of the foundation, together with the picots thereon, overcast the outlines of the design figures, excepting that part which comes on the outer edge; this part is edged with button-hole stitching as shown by the illustration. In some of the design figures of this edging work wheels and ladder stitches also. Cut away the foundation material underneath the bars, and trim the edge of both edgings with woven picots.

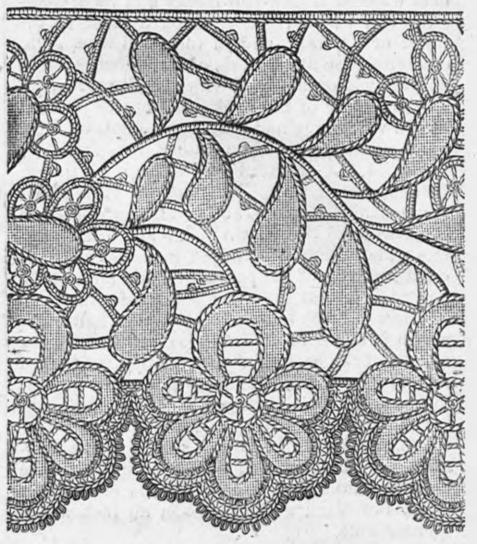

Fig. 2.—EDGING.—VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Ladies' Ball and Evening Coiffures, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE OF PINK RIBBON, WHITE BLONDE, AND FLOWERS. The front part of this coiffure is made of a roll and loops of pink gros grain ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, on a narrow pointed band of tulle and wire, from which are extended two ends of wire each five inches and three-quarters long, and wound together in the middle of the back. These ends form the foundation for a bow of the same ribbon, with one sloped end four inches long and another sixteen inches long, and a strip of figured silk tulle edged with blonde two inches wide and arranged in cross-wise curves. Above the longer end of ribbon set a barbe, consisting of two rows of blonde sewed together with the straight edges. A spray of white velvet flowers with bronzed leaves and a rose with brown foliage complete the coiffure.

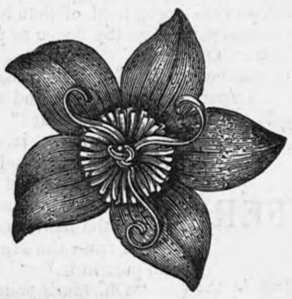

Fig. 3.—FLOWER FOR PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF BLACK WATERED RIBBON, BLACK LACE, AND ROSES. The pointed foundation of the coiffure is made of stiff lace and wire, and covered with black watered ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, which is continued five inches and a quarter long at each side. It is also covered with black tulle and lace, and with loops and ends of watered ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, as shown by the illustration. The knot of the bow in the middle is ornamented with a jet cameo. In the middle of the back of the foundation is an end of the narrower ribbon six inches and seven-eighths long, on which are fastened the ends of ribbon projecting from the foundation and a bow of wider ribbon with long ends, together with a barbe of black lace. On the right side of the coiffure is a spray of roses.

Fig. 3.—LOUIS QUINZE COIFFURE OF BLUE WATERED RIBBON, SHELLS, AND FEATHERS. This coiffure consists of a piece of

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE OF PINK RIBBON, WHITE BLONDE, AND FLOWERS.
Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF BLACK WATERED RIBBON, BLACK LACE, AND ROSES.
Fig. 3.—LOUIS QUINZE COIFFURE OF BLUE WATERED RIBBON, SHELLS, AND FLOWERS.
Fig. 4.—COIFFURE OF BLACK RIBBON, TULLE, AND LACE.
Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF REPS RIBBON, BEADS, LACE, AND FLOWERS.

FIGS. 1–5.—LADIES' BALL AND EVENING COIFFURES.

Hosted by Google

blue watered ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, which is fastened on a band in the shape of a wreath, and of tulle and wire, gathered crosswise at intervals of three inches and a quarter, and ornamented with a small pearl shell. In the middle of the back are loops of watered ribbon with short and long ends, a spray of forget-me-nots, and a white feather.

Fig. 4.—COIFFURE OF BLACK RIBBON, TULLE, AND LACE. This coiffure is designed for mourning toilettes, and consists of a piece of black watered ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, which is arranged in bows and ends on the middle of the pointed foundation of tulle and wire, and at the same time covers the seam of a row of black lace two inches and a half wide, which is sewed on in crosswise curves. On the middle of the back of the foundation is fastened an end of ribbon eight inches and seven-eighths long, on which is arranged a piece of tulle and lace in the shape of a veil; the front point of this part rests on the bow as shown by the illustration. The under edge of the ribbon in the back is trimmed with several ends of different lengths of black watered ribbon an inch and a quarter wide.

Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF REPS RIBBON, BEADS, LACE, AND FLOWERS. The foundation for this head-dress consists of a band of stiff lace and wire seven-eighths of an inch wide, in the shape of a wreath; this band is covered with plum-colored reps ribbon and black lace. The ribbon may be trimmed with a border of black cut beads. On the middle of the back of the band are several loops and two ends of plum-colored and réséda ribbon, each fifteen inches and a quarter long, and a barbe of black tulle and lace. On the left side of the coiffure is a spray of peacock blue velvet flowers and brown foliage. A similar spray fastens together the falling ends of ribbon in the back.

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER V.

TWO HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD.

IT was some minutes before Mr. Murphy returned, and when he did so, it was without the broad-sheet, for which he said the man had charged such an exorbitant sum that he refused to give it. At this Mrs. Mulvaney grumbled, observing, justly enough, that the extravagance would not have affected Mr. Murphy's purse, but her own, while the broad-sheet would have been a very entertaining piece of literature with which to beguile the evening. However, the very first thing in the morning she would buy the newspaper, where the authentic account of the transaction would be duly chronicled.

"That's if it ever occurred at all, Mrs. Mulvaney," said Murphy, with a short laugh, "which is more than doubtful;" and at the same time Robert felt a significant pressure on his foot, as though a broad-wheeled wagon was passing over his toe, which certainly did not emanate from the lady of the house. The conversation here took another turn, and settled upon a subject very frequently discussed under that roof, namely, emigration. Many an Irish lad who left London for the far West, or the still further antipodes, had taken his last meal (and that not seldom gratis) at Mulvaney's, and poured his hopes and fears into the ears of the friendly widow. Of only a very small minority of these she had ever heard again, but what she had heard had given her a favorable impression of "foreign parts," which was her somewhat indefinite geographical expression for all countries that were not England or Ireland. She had therefore been always an upholder of emigration; while Murphy, who held a strong opinion not only that Ireland was for the Irish, but for no one else, and especially the English, had always opposed it. On this occasion, however, to her great surprise, and, perhaps, not a little to her disappointment, for she rather enjoyed an assault of arms with Dick, since it always ended in an embracing of them, her arguments met with small opposition. He allowed that there might be cases—of convenience, he would not say of compulsion—when it would be beneficial to leave his native land, and allowed that it would be somewhat hard upon the outside world—the inhabitants of which he seemed to look upon, like the Chinese, as barbarians—if it should never have the advantage of being leavened by a few specimens of Irishmen. On the subject of the national excellences, as compared with the merits of inferior races, it was indeed impossible that there should be disagreement between them; but these were little matters of detail on which they differed just sufficiently to give piquancy to the conversation. Mrs. Mulvaney was of opinion that Irish folks should make their way in the world like other people, but this view Murphy strongly combated. There were certain chiefs of that noble race, such as the young master, who had a natural right to land and goods, independently of inheritance—this was not quite clearly explained, but somehow "the blood did it"—and again it was only natural that such as acknowledged the authority of the said chieftains should look to them for support. Robert Chesney, though a good scholar of the village-school pattern, knew nothing of political economy, and yet these opinions of Mr. Murphy sounded hollow, or, at least, as though there was but little in them; but it was astonishing with what fire and fervor they were advocated. Every glass of whisky that Mr. Murphy swallowed—and he swallowed a good many—seemed to strengthen his conviction, though by no means to assist him in expressing it with perspicuity. If any body had contradicted him, matters might have been very different, but as it was, he was affable and friendly. Every now and then he would wink at Robert with a sagacity that seemed the concentration of all the sense that remained in him, and which left him poor indeed.

"Come, Mr. Murphy, you have had enough," said the widow, presently. "Nay"—for he had made a snatch at the spirit bottle, but not being in a condition favorable for the calculation of distance, missed it—"I am mistress here; and though I can't send you to bed like a child, though you are no wiser than a child, and deserve to be whipped, you shall have no more to drink;" with which she tucked the bottle under her arm, and triumphantly marched off.

"She thinks I'm dhrunk," observed Mr. Murphy, confidentially, and winking more sagaciously than ever at his young friend.

"I confess I—" Robert was about to add that he himself had rather leaned to that opinion, when the other interrupted him impatiently:

"Tchut, lad; do you take Dick Murphy for a fool, that he should get dhrunk when he had a saycret to keep, and with a woman as he's sweet on in the room? No, no; it is not a few glasses of such poor stuff as that as could hurt me. I wanted to put her off the scent, that's all. She'll be thinking half the night, d'ye see, whether I've put my candle out or under the bed, and wonder whether the house is on fire, instead of concerning herself about our affairs. If she had got hold of that broad-sheet, there might have been the deuce to pay. Them patrols are dead, lad."

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated Robert, greatly shocked. "And was that what the man was hallooing about?"

"Of course it was; and he was calling it murder, too; mind that."

"It was a cruel and infamous act, any way," said the boy, excitedly, "that putting the tree across the road, just after you yourself had been saved from the same peril, and I am glad I had no part in it."

"Oh, that's your game, is it?" cried the other, grimly. "You think you are free of it, do you, while others have to pay the shot? Well, let me tell you, you're most infernally mistaken there. We're all in the same boat, we three. You're what they call an accessory after the fact. They've got your name in it all regular."

"My name!" ejaculated Robert, in horror, his thoughts instantly flying to the cottage in the forest, and picturing Lizzy's face when she should come to hear such tidings of her lover. "But no; that is impossible: you are lying to me."

"Don't you use such hard words, my young fighting-cock, or you will get hard blows in answer," said Murphy, menacingly. "If they haven't got your name, they've got your description as like as life. If the gallows bear fruit at all, it will bear three: two goodly Irish apples, that's me and the young masther (which the saints forbid!), and one little English crab, which is yourself. So, what I say is, be careful; lie snug as a mouse, and open your lips to nobody about what happened last night till you have put a thousand miles of salt sea between you and English land."

Murphy waited for a moment, as if expecting a reply, but receiving none, gave a surly nod of his head by way of "good-night," and marched, not very steadily, out of the room. Robert listened mechanically to his heavy footsteps as they staggered up stairs, and to the violent closing of his bedroom door. The news he had just heard had deprived him not only of speech, but of the power of rational reflection. Unlikely—impossible, indeed—as it was that he should be thus fatally associated, and above all so soon, with his companions of a few hours, he did not doubt it in the least; and the shock was overwhelming. Here seemed an end to all the bright prospects that he had so fondly pictured to himself, since he was to begin life, if not as a felon, still (what was as bad for the result) under the imputation of being one. If his name had really been mentioned—and here the ingenious Mr. Murphy (through ignorance of the fanciful value which some people put upon their reputations) had been within a very little of precipitating the very catastrophe he would have averted—Robert would perhaps have gone straight to the nearest police station and given himself up, the better to clear himself hereafter. But since it was only his description that was thus advertised, might it not be well to take this ruffian's advice, and leave the country as soon as opportunity offered? Ignorant of all the methods of criminal procedure as he was, it struck him that if he could once escape from the clutches of the law he would be safe; he was rapidly growing out of the boy, and in a few years recognition of his person—if only his name should not transpire—would be impossible. He was innocent, it is true; but it might be difficult to prove himself so, and especially without compromising his companions. To be sure, it was only Murphy that was really guilty of the crime in question; but he had passed his word to be silent concerning the night's doings, and, if possible, he would keep it. Any disclosure of them would, moreover, implicate Mr. Kavanagh in that former proceeding—he did not know what it was, but could not but conclude that it was some transgression of the law—which had led up to the present catastrophe, and his feelings toward that gentleman were very warm and grateful. Upon the whole, therefore, and after long pondering, he decided to take Murphy's advice, though perfectly well aware that it had been dictated by the most unblushing selfishness; and somewhat relieved by having come to this conclusion, he dragged his weary limbs to bed, and slept as only the young can sleep when trouble sits by the pillow.

With the first light of dawn, however, he awoke (not of himself, as it turned out, but probably at the opening of the street-door), and hearing a heavy footfall in the silent street, cautiously put aside the window-blind, and looked out. His first idea, rechauffèed from what his imagination had fed upon the previous night, was that it was a policeman, for even rural officers of justice, with whom, of course, he was alone familiar, affect that pompous and measured tread, which, however assuring to the household, is certainly premonitory to the thief; but it was not a policeman, and indeed might be said to be somebody very much the reverse, for it was Mr. Richard Murphy. This gentleman, to whom the vin ordinaire of his native country might not only be said to be meat, drink, and clothing (for while imbibing it he felt the lack of none of them), but also sleep, was standing in front of the house, with a smiling countenance, and wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. The morning was damp, and there was a slight drizzle falling, which perhaps was welcome to him, as reminding him of the weather in his native clime; at all events, it did not disturb him: he looked up the street and down the street with cheerful serenity, and was just about to add his contribution to the incense-breathing morn, by lighting a short black dudheen, when the on-looker saw his countenance fall, his tobacco pouch drop from his hands, and the whole aspect of the man alter as suddenly, and for the worse, as though he had been shot in the stomach. Following the direction of his staring eyes, Robert beheld an announcement on the dead-wall opposite, which in his turn made him shudder from head to foot: "Murder—Two Hundred Pounds Reward—Frank Kavanagh." These words were in large capitals; and before he could make out the rest of what was printed in smaller type, Murphy had rushed across the street, plucked the Notice from the wall, and was tearing it to fragments. So fierce and vehement was the action that Robert involuntarily compared it, in his own mind, with the rage and fury of some wild beast whose young is threatened; and as he did so he saw Murphy look quickly up at his window. It would have been easy to have dropped the corner of the blind, but some fascination forbade him to do so, and in an instant their eyes had met. Such a tigerish look came into Murphy's face, and so suddenly, as though bent upon some instant violence, did he rush indoors that the boy took up the only weapon that was at hand, the poker, convinced that within the next minute he would have to defend his life. This necessity, however, did not arrive. Murphy remained below, doubtless persuaded to do so by Mrs. Mulvaney, whose voice, raised in passionate expostulation, could be distinctly heard. It was she, indeed, who had pointed out the Notice to Dick's attention, or, unacquainted as he was with the art of reading, he would have remained in blissful ignorance of its existence, or concluded it to be a mere embellishment of the wall! And now it seemed she was impressing on him the futility, if not the wickedness, of endeavoring to make matters safe by proceeding to some fatal extremity. Robert discovered this by the simple method of opening his bedroom door and listening to the conversation, which, under the circumstances, he might well be excused for doing.

"He knows too much," urged Murphy, with a growl like that of a wild beast. ("And how like some wild beast," thought Robert, "such as the hunting-tiger, trained but not tamed by man, of which he had heard tell, this Murphy was!") "He knows enough to hang us."

"No, no," rejoined the widow; then added something the listener could not catch, but which seemed to carry weight with it. "Moreover," she continued, in tones still hushed, but not inaudible, "you are not in your own land, remember; and by adding a new crime to the other, you will only increase the danger to the young master. You are out of your mind, Dick—and it isn't far you have to go for that—or I would say, besides, that none but a villain would think of murdering a poor lad like that because of a groundless suspicion of his fidelity."

"Murthering! Mrs. Mulvaney; you're joking," returned Murphy, in tones of apparent good humor. "I was only going to put the innocent young fellow out of the risk of temptation. Two hundred pounds reward is a considerable attraction, and especially to one who wants to marry and set up housekeeping."

"You ought to be ashamed to say so," answered the widow, evidently resisting some personal attentions of her variable swain: "any one who is really in love with a young woman is the last person to entertain thoughts of treachery; though if he is only pretending to be so—Now be aisy, and keep off, Mr. Murphy."

It was clear all danger to himself, for the present at least, was over; and Robert discreetly closed his door, and left the loving pair to conclude their love passages without an eavesdropper. It was, indeed, with some little embarrassment that he presently descended into the sitting-room to meet the man who, he had every reason to believe, but half an hour before entertained the design of cutting his throat; but it was without fear. Boy as he was, he was far from being easily frightened. His nature was that of the typical Englishman, sound and wholesome; his intelligence was straightforward, without much imagination; and the out-door life he had lived in the forest, both by night and day, had strengthened what had originally been far from sensitive nerves; moreover, he felt within himself a certain superiority over this wild, untutored savage that almost amounted to contempt. The other, however, had the advantage over him in one point. Whether from native cunning, or from some extraordinary shallowness of feeling, which permitted the most violent ebullitions of passion to pass away in a few minutes and leave no trace, Mr. Murphy seemed now entirely at his ease, and bade his young friend "Good-morning!" in a tone that was almost genial. Mrs. Mulvaney was as kind in her manner as ever, but was evidently depressed. Instead of being talkative, as usual, she busied herself in preparing their breakfast without a word; and sometimes, as though wrapped in thought, did not reply even when Murphy addressed her. In speaking of their proposed visit to Herne Street that morning, Dick observed, "And unless you come with us—which, I suppose, can hardly be, misthress—you will scarce see the young masther yourself before he sails."

"I suppose not," answered the widow, coldly.

"Not but that he would come here himself, if it were safe, and bid you good-by in person, you may be sure," said Dick, soothingly.

It was evident that he had mistaken the cause of her indifference, for she added, sharply, "I don't wish to see him, Mr. Murphy, either here or elsewhere; but least of all in my own house."

"And you say that, who were born within the shadow of the ould masther's roof-tree, and have had bread from his hand!"

"Yes," cried the widow, firmly, "I do say it. I wash my hands of him; and I wish he could wash his of—"

"Silence, woman!" ejaculated Murphy, with a savage oath. "Stop that glib tongue of yours; unless, indeed," added he, bitterly, "you wish to get the blood-money. Perhaps it is that which has made such a change in Bridget Mulvaney. English air by itself could never have done it."

The widow's eyes flashed fire: it evidently cost her a great effort to stifle her feelings, and forbear from some cutting reply, but she succeeded. "I am not going to argue with you, Richard Murphy, or rather with the devil that is in you. I only warn you, for your own sake and for another's, not to be so free of speech to your foes as you have been this day to one who was onst your friend." With that she rose from her chair, not without some dignity, and keeping a calm, contemptuous face opposed to his scowling looks, walked slowly out of the room. At this Mr. Murphy's features became suddenly chop-fallen, and he fell to scratching his head.

"A woman is a curious creature, lad, as you will find out for yourself some day," observed he to his remaining companion. "Now one would almost think, if one did not know her, that Mrs. Mulvaney yonder was downright vexed."

Not having the advantage of a long acquaintance with the lady in question, Robert confessed that that impression had been produced upon his own mind.

"But she wasn't, though; or if she was, it's over by this time," explained the other. "I own it was wrong in me to use such hard words, but a squeeze of her hand, or at most a chuck under the chin, will make her all right."

Notwithstanding this confident speech, however, Mr. Murphy did not attempt either of these experiments, nor, indeed, had he the opportunity of doing so, for when, after some hesitation, he ventured very gently to ring the bell, it was answered, not, as usual, by the widow, but by the maid-of-all-work, who quietly proceeded to remove the breakfast things.

"Missis's compliments," said she, "and if you should plaze to want any thing, it is me as is to get it for you."

At this Mr. Murphy looked rather thoughtful for a minute or two, and then, with the air of a man who has made up his mind on an important subject, chucked her under the chin, and bade her fetch the whisky bottle. "When love is denied to us, lad," observed he, with pathos, "there is nothing for it but to take to what is better—liquor."

He took to it till about noon, and then informed his companion that the time had come to keep their appointment with the young master. Robert professed his readiness to accompany him; but when Murphy took his arm and would have passed it through his own, the lad drew back.

"I am no man's prisoner," said he, haughtily, "and I either walk in freedom or not at all."

Murphy gave him one of his ugly looks, but perhaps reflecting that there was no time to spare just then for having a quarrel out (a pleasure which can always be postponed), he permitted him to have his way as far as the nearest cab stand, when he called a vehicle, and ordered the man to drive to Herne Street.

CHAPTER VI.

MR. WILSON.

HERNE STREET is one of those short streets which run from the Strand to the river, and, like most of its fellows, has a disused and melancholy air. There is little or no traffic in it; there are no shops; it is composed wholly of lodging-houses and a few mouldy-looking hotels. At the river end of the street, the card "Apartments" no longer figures in the parlor windows; but on each side of the doors, which usually stand open, are painted the names of the different tenants, the houses being let in flats. At one of these doors the cab stopped, and Murphy and his companion alighted. As they passed in without knocking, Robert's eye was at once attracted to the names, among which it naturally looked for that of Kavanagh; he was surprised to find it absent. They went up a stone staircase—very dirty, as common staircases are apt to be—and only stopped where the stairs stopped—at the third floor, and opposite a door with "Mr. Wilson" painted on it. Murphy knocked, and a strange voice bade them come in.

Seated at a round table in a somewhat lofty room was a gray-haired old gentleman, pale, and with dark rings under his eyes, examining attentively a huge map spread out before him. So absorbed was he in this task that he did but give a single glance toward his visitors, and then motioning with his hand toward a couple of chairs, resumed his occupation. Robert was not sorry for this, because it enabled him to at once indulge his curiosity, which was greatly excited by the contents of the apartment, in which every thing was strange to him, with the trifling exception of the smell of spirits, with which the habits of his step-father—even before his stay at Mrs. Mulvaney's—had made him tolerably familiar. Considering that it was at the top of the house, the room was a lofty one, and hung from floor to ceiling with pictures; some of these were on canvas, though only one or two were framed, but the majority were on paper, pinned to the wall. The furniture consisted partly of pictures also, which, in various degrees of completion, lay about the chairs and tables, and even on the floor: a curious machine, which he rightly concluded to be a painter's easel, though he had never before seen one, occupied a prominent place; and in two of the corners were life-size figures in armor, standing sentry-like over all this disarray. There was no carpet, nor even, to Robert's eyes—which were not exacting in that respect—much sign of comfort in the place at all; but the pictures and the armor attracted him mightily, as also did the stirring scene that presented itself outside the windows. These looked down immediately on the river, on which the noonday sun was shining, and on whose dusky but sparkling bosom a score of steamers and other craft were making their way with more or less of speed. He knew it for the Thames, else it would have been hard indeed to have identified the river, with whose grassy banks and gleaming shallows he was so well acquainted, with this bustling and crowded stream. His own circumstances seemed to offer a parallel to it: for was it not difficult to recognize in himself, now launched on the great tide of life, and already in such strange company, the boy of four-and-twenty hours ago, who had had no knowledge of the world beyond the simple life of the forest and what he had read in books? As he mused thus, Murphy called to him, sharply, "Don't you hear Mr. Denton speak to you, or are you bent on making him say every thing twice over, and him so weak and ill, you omadhawn?"

Without bestowing a glance on Murphy, Robert respectfully apologized to the old gentleman for his inattention, and, in obedience to a sign from him, drew near his table.

"So you have quite made up your mind, I hear, young man," said the stranger, feebly, "to leave this country, and take your chance with your new employer?"

"With Mr. Kavanagh—yes, Sir."

"Be aisy, you fool," growled Murphy, "and leave gentlemen's names for themselves and their friends to use them."

"Hush, hush!" said the old gentleman, turning round upon Dick severely, "and don't you call people out of their names so freely. If I am not much mistaken in physiognomy, this lad is no more fool and omadhawn than yourself—and that is Mr. Frank's opinion.—The fact is, Robert Chesney, that just now Mr. Kavanagh has reason to conceal his name, and it's better not to mention it. Indeed, he is at present concealing himself, and that is why I am appointed his substitute to speak with you this morning. You see this map—here is England, look you, and there, on the other side of the world, is Australia. It takes months to go thither and months to return—if one ever does return—"

"I beg your pardon, Sir," interrupted Robert, "but I have thought of all that, and if so be as Mr.—"

"Let us say Mr. Frank only, or perhaps Mr. Wilson would be better still," suggested the old gentleman, with a smile.

"Very good, Sir. Then, if Mr. Wilson is still of the same mind toward me as before, I do assure you I shall not go back from my word. I am quite ready to go with him to Australia, or any where else, and make myself useful in the way that was agreed upon. But I should like to tell some one—I mean I should wish to write before I start to some one—"

"Be quiet, Murphy," cried Mr. Denton, in answer to a growl of remonstrance from that gentleman; "how can you make me raise my voice, when you know I am so unfitted to do so? The lad thoroughly understands he is to mention no names, and that is sufficient.—Yes, you may write of course, and tell her—for it is a 'her,' I suppose, eh?—that if she writes by return of post, under cover, to Mr. Denton, Lloyd Brothers, shipping agents, Liverpool, you will get her reply before you start. Mr. Wilson has instructed me to supply you with an outfit for the voyage, which will be accomplished in an emigrant vessel, and I am to tell you not to be astonished if he himself should not be on board of her. Murphy will be there, and myself, but—"

"What! is not Mr. Frank to go with us?" interrupted Robert. "Nay, Sir, then that alters all; for I took service with him, and with no one else. There is no love lost between this man"—here he pointed over his shoulder to Murphy—"and myself; and though I am sure you are most kind and fair-spoken, I feel no call to go with you to the end of the earth, as I do with Mr. Kavanagh."

"That is well and boldly said, Robert," said Mr. Denton, smiling, "though it is not complimentary to me and Murphy. If you had been a little less hasty to express your sentiments, I should have added that though Mr. Frank would not be on board the ship at starting, he would join it before it got to sea."

"That is quite another matter, Sir," answered Robert, simply; "and if it be so, I am at your service."

"Very good; then that is settled. I have just a few words to speak to Murphy; and meanwhile here is the newspaper—"

An exclamation in Irish here broke from Murphy's lips, but in unmistakable tones of alarm and horror.

"That man is afraid of my reading something in the paper about Mr. Frank," observed Robert, contemptuously, his cheeks growing scarlet with indignation. "He accused Mrs. Mulvaney this morning of wanting to sell his master to the police for the two hundred pounds reward that is offered, so that I suppose I ought not to feel aggrieved that he suspects me of the like baseness; but you may tell Mr. Frank that his secret is as safe with me as with yonder scowling Irishman. I did not approve of that deed which has brought his master into trouble; but I think there was some excuse for it, and, at all events, sooner than any harm should come to him through my means, I would cut my right hand off. Put the newspaper in your pocket, Sir, for if you were to offer it to me now, I would not read it, nor shall I do so, if the opportunity should occur again to-morrow. I have my own opinion, as I have said, about the mischance to the patrol, which, after all, was more Murphy's doing than his master's; but I don't want to hear the worst made out of it and of Mr. Frank, as is clear is done by their calling it Willful Murder!"

"This lad must have Irish blood in his veins," cried the old gentleman, regarding him with admiration. "I can scarcely believe that one professing such meritorious sentiments can likewise turn his hand to what is useful, and keep accounts. See, here is a long list of poor fellows who are going out with us to the antipodes, and who do not get their passage for nothing, and also a rough estimate of what their kits will come to. Sit down yonder, and add me up the total.—And in the mean time, Dick—for all this talking has knocked me up—do you get out the whisky, and let us drink success to the Star of Erin and her voyage. In three days' time—" Here there was a knock at the door. Murphy ran to it, and turned the key, then looked at Mr. Denton significantly.

"It's Polly's knock," whispered the latter, rising excitedly. "I had wished to have been spared this."

"No matter; it will be a good test," returned the other, encouragingly, in the same low tone. "Let her see you, if it be but for a minute or two, and then pass into the bedroom, and so out."

Here the knocking was repeated, and a female voice exclaimed through the key-hole, plaintively, "Let me in, Frank. I know you are there, for I hear your voice."

"You are mistaken there, Miss Mary," observed Murphy, unlocking the door and admitting the would-be visitor. "Mr. Wilson is out, and when he will return is very uncertain."

The new arrival was a young woman of considerable beauty, small but exquisitely shaped, and whose keen blue eyes and lavish wealth of rich brown hair seemed to recall to Robert some familiar face. If that were so, the recognition did not appear to be mutual. "Who is he?" inquired the young woman, pointing without a trace of shyness at Chesney; then carrying her finger on toward Mr. Denton, "and he?"

"They are two of my master's friends, whom I had no particular orders to introduce to you, Miss Mary," answered Murphy.

"They are here by appointment, then, and waiting for him. Well, I shall wait for him too."

With that she unfastened the seal-skin cloak she wore, and sitting down with her back turned toward Murphy, put up her pretty feet upon the fender.

"You may stop, or go away, Miss Mary, just as you please—"

"Thank you," interrupted she, with sharp contempt; "I shall take advantage of your gracious permission, and stop."

"Well, that can only end in disappointment, miss. Mr. Frank is away, miles away, and, as you have been already informed by his own hand, is not coming back again to-day, nor any day. So there."

"Is this true, gentlemen?" cried the girl, rising suddenly from her chair, and looking from one to the other appealingly. "I have no means of knowing whether this man is telling me truth or not, Heaven help me!"

As Mr. Denton did not even look toward her, but appeared more busily engaged with his map than ever, Robert thought himself called upon to reply. No man, with a heart in his bosom, looking on that pathetic, pleading face, could have refused to do so, and far less kind-hearted Robert Chesney, who, moreover, at once bethought him of one in the far-off forest glades who might one day be praying for some longed-for news of him—in vain.

"Indeed, miss," said he, tenderly, "I believe the man is telling you the truth. At least I came myself to-day to see Mr.—Mr. Wilson—and have failed in doing so. They told me he would not be here."

"And is it true—you are young and kind, and have an honest face; you would not tell me a lie, I feel—that Frank—that Mr. Wilson is going far away—abroad?"

"Indeed, miss, it is true."

At these words the little creature seemed to shrink within herself, and dropping into her seat again, covered her eyes with her hands to hide the tears that she could no longer restrain. Here Murphy touched Mr. Denton on the shoulder, and that gentleman rose at once, and passing softly but quickly across the floor, opened the bedroom door and closed it behind him. The next moment the outer door of the bed-chamber was heard to open, and a rapid step to descend the stairs.

"That's him—that is Frank's footstep!" exclaimed the girl, starting to her feet, and rushing to the door.

"It is not. It is only Mr. Denton," observed Murphy, coldly. She ran out, however, to satisfy herself of the fact by leaning over the balusters, and presently came back again, looking very tearful and excited.

"What have you done with him? Where is he?" asked she of Murphy. "If you will not tell me where he is, at least tell me how he is?"

"Oh, he's well enough, so far as that goes," answered Dick, carelessly.

"He was not well when I saw him last, not looking like himself at all. He had some trouble on his mind—was going down upon some unpleasant business, he said, into the country; and that made him take to what is so bad for him more than ever."

"Rubbish!" returned Murphy, contemptuously. "If you mean whisky, no Irishman was ever hurt by whisky yet. If you mean weakness of another sort—a foolish passion for your pretty face—that's over."

"You liar!" cried the girl, her moist eyes darting fire, her cheeks aflame; "you wicked, cruel liar!" Murphy laughed contemptuously. "You pretend to love him—you!" she went on, with bitterness. "It is you who are his worst enemy. You lead him on to drink. You flatter and encourage him whenever he is bent on what is wrong and dangerous. You—you will be his ruin!"

"Be quiet, vixen!" shouted Murphy. "Keep a civil tongue in your head. You won't! Then just you walk out of this room, and take my word for it that it is the last time you ever see the inside of it."

"I will not stir!" cried she, defiantly. Robert knew her now; her face—generally resolute and scornful, as at present, but sometimes soft and pleading—was on half the pictures on the wall.

"Then I will put you out," said Murphy, sternly. He advanced toward her, holding out his huge hand menacingly. The expression of his face was so grim and fierce that she quailed before it.

"Oh, Frank! oh, Frank!" exclaimed she, with a passionate cry, "why, why are you not here to strike him dead?"

The huge hand was almost on her wrist, and she, like some graceful animal fascinated by beast or reptile, standing motionless, save for the trembling of her limbs, before him, when Robert suddenly bounded between them, and whirling her light form toward one of the mailed sentinels of the apartment, snatched out his sword from its rusty scabbard, and brandished it in Murphy's face. "I am not Mr. Frank, miss," cried he, assuringly, "but I will strike him dead if he lays a finger on you; and let me tell him that if his master is the man I take him for, he will have an account to settle with him for threatening a young lady under his own roof—like you."

"A young lady!" echoed Murphy, contemptuously, the allusion to his master doubtless checking the impulse he had at first entertained to rush in upon the lad, at all risks, and take summary vengeance on him for his interference. "A pretty sort of a young lady, truly, though scarcely worth your fighting for, if you knew all. And if it comes to telling, suppose I were to tell the masther that the last time I saw Miss Mary she was cuddled up in your arms, like that. Come, there is no need for tale-bearing, nor for quarreling neither." It was evident that Mr. Murphy very much repented of what he had done, or had threatened to do, and that he feared the consequences of it. His tones, though gruff, were conciliatory; and his manner, like that of a bear asking for buns on the top of a pole, was embarrassed, but propitiatory.

"I am not more given to tale-bearing than yourself," said Robert, who had dropped his fair burden, not without a modest blush, at the other's innuendo; "nor do I seek a quarrel. But I won't stand by and see a woman ill-treated by any man; and she shall stay here as long as she likes, unless Mr. Frank gives orders to the contrary."

"She may stay, and you may stay, for all I care," replied Murphy, carelessly; "but I have business elsewhere." With that he left the room and passed down stairs as far as the front-door, but did not cross the threshold. His business was twofold—to see that Chesney did not leave the house without him, and that his master did not enter it while Miss Mary remained within.

In the mean time Robert began to feel a little awkward. When a knight-errant of the good old times had preserved an innocent damsel from a giant, he made no more ado about putting her behind him on his horse's crupper, as his own lawful prize, than if she were a sack of corn. But this chivalrous lad had no horse; and his affections, as we are aware, were already bespoken by another young person.

"I am very, very much obliged to you," said Miss Mary, forcing a smile, and holding out a pretty little hand. "I hope I may not be the cause of making that hateful man your enemy."

"Don't you trouble yourself about me," returned he, good-naturedly; "the only thing that gives me sorrow is to see you so cast down and sad. As for that fellow, Murphy, he was no friend of mine before."

"And yet you dared to anger him," said she, gratefully, "to save me from insult—me, whom he would have you believe was a worthless, wicked girl! But though I am no young lady, as you called me, I am not that, indeed, Sir."

Robert knew that he was getting very red indeed. He was burning to express his conviction that Miss Mary was every thing that she ought to be, but he couldn't get out a word.

"The fact is," continued his companion, frankly, "I'm a model."

"Indeed!" said Robert, simply, endeavoring not to appear surprised at this announcement, which, nevertheless, was a little unexpected. He had heard of a model of propriety, but he had never before seen one, and the reality fell short of his ideal.

"Oh yes; I'm there, and there, and there," she said, pointing to various pictures, in which her lively features had been reproduced with more or less of success. "There was a time when Mr. Frank was never tired of painting me; but all that's over now, it seems."

She sighed so pitifully that Robert would have given all he had to have been able to say a word of comfort; but he had none to give. Simple as he was, he guessed that the relation between his master and this fair young creature had been a tender one, and was now broken off forever. "Is Mr. Frank a painter, then?" inquired he.

"Yes; an amateur one, at least. What! did you not know that? You can not, then, have known him long."

"I met him for the first time"—he was about to say, "the night before last," but he stopped himself; that might be saying too much, perhaps. This girl could scarcely be in Mr. Kavanagh's confidence, when she did not even know him by his real name, but called him Wilson. "I met him for the first time quite lately."

"And yet you must be intimate with him, to be admitted here," said she.

"I have been taken into his service, miss, and am going ab—"

"Going abroad with him, you were about to say," said the girl, quickly. "His letter told me truth, then!" She was silent for a little; then sinking her voice to a tone of deep feeling, went on, as though unconscious of her companion's presence: "Well, well! I have no right to hinder him; no claim, alas! to accompany him. He would have said 'Good-by' with his own lips, I know, if he could have trusted himself to do so."

"He wished to spare you pain," suggested Robert, sympathizingly.

"Ah, I see; he has wound himself into your heart already," replied she, sadly. "Beware of him! Don't think I speak it in bitterness, and because he has deserted me; but take warning from one who knows him well, and loves him still, and whom it grieves to give it. Frank Wilson wears as kind a heart as yours; he has been kind to me—most kind—and treats me now as kindly as I deserve. But he is not himself at all times. Beware of him when his brow clouds, and his words flow free and fast; beware of him when the drink is in him, and Murphy is at his ear. He is mixed up with dangerous schemes; I know not what they are, but those who work them with him are low and villainous men, unlike himself—unlike, I trust, what you will ever be. I would go with him to-morrow to the end of the earth, if he would have me with him; but though I am blind upon my own account, I can see on yours. Again I say, beware of him. Good-by, boy; and a thousand thanks." She held her hand out for the second time, which he took and pressed. Then giving one last look around the familiar walls, as though to bid them farewell, she left the room, and ran down stairs.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

OUR dead are never dead to us until we have forgotten them: they can be injured by us, they can be wounded; they know all our penitence, all our aching sense that their place is empty, all the kisses we bestow on the smallest relic of their presence.

There is a strength of self-possession which is the sign that the last hope has departed. Despair no more leans on others than perfect contentment, and in despair pride ceases to be counteracted by the sense of dependence.

When our indignation is borne in submissive silence, we are apt to feel twinges of doubt afterward as to our own generosity, if not justice; how much more when the object of our anger has gone into everlasting silence, and we have seen his face for the last time in the meekness of death!

What we thought the oldest truth becomes the most startling to us in the week when we have looked on the dead face of one who has made a part of our own lives. For when men want to impress us with the effect of a new and wonderfully vivid light, do they not let it fall on the most familiar objects, that we may measure its intensity by remembering the former dimness?

There are faces which nature charges with a meaning and pathos not belonging to the single human soul that flutters beneath them, but speaking the joys and sorrows of foregone generations—eyes that tell of deep love which doubtless has been and is somewhere, but not paired with these eyes—perhaps paired with pale eyes that can say nothing; just as a national language may be instinct with poetry unfelt by the lips that use it.

Nature has her language, and she is not unveracious; but we don't know all the intricacies of her syntax just yet, and in a hasty reading we may happen to extract the very opposite of her real meaning.

If it be true that Nature at certain moments seems charged with a presentiment of one individual lot, must it not also be true that she seems unmindful, unconscious of another? For there is no hour that has not its births of gladness and despair, no morning brightness that does not bring new sickness to desolation as well as new forces to genius and love. There are so many of us, and our lots are so different: what wonder that Nature's mood is often in harsh contrast with the great crisis of our lives? We are children of a large family, and must learn, as such children do, not to expect that our hurts will be made much of—to be content with little nurture and caressing, and help each other the more.

Black Tulle and Lace Fichu.

THIS fichu is made of figured black tulle, and is trimmed with gathered lace two inches and seven-eighths wide. A bow of red gros grain ribbon two inches and a quarter wide is set on the front. The fichu is laid in pleats in front and in the middle of the back.

Collars in Tulle Embroidery.—Imitation of Lace.—Figs. 1–6.

THESE collars are worked on fine Brussels tulle with fine thread. The enlarged details, Figs. 2 and 5, show the manner of working. Run the outlines of the design figures several times, as shown by the illustration, and overcast them closely. Fill the inside of the flowers and leaves partly with button-hole stitches and partly with small knots, and fill the centre with bars and wheels, underneath which the tulle is cut away. After finishing the embroidery, border the corners and neck of the collars (Figs. 3 and 6) with narrow point lace braid and a woven picot border as shown by the illustration, and set them on a binding of Swiss muslin or batiste.

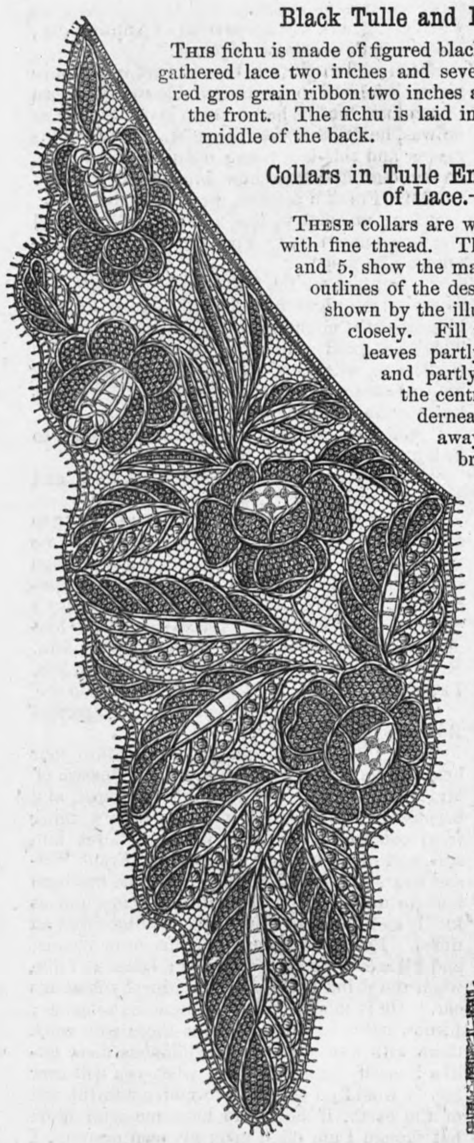

Fig. 1.—COLLAR IN TULLE EMBROIDERY. IMITATION OF LACE.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

BLACK TULLE AND LACE FICHU.

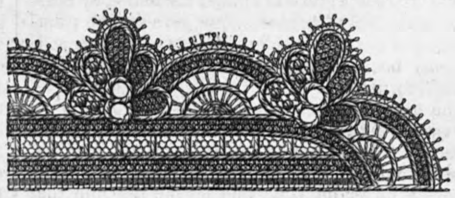

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF COLLAR, FIG. 1.

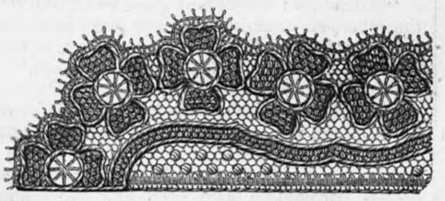

Fig. 6.—SECTION OF COLLAR, FIG. 4.

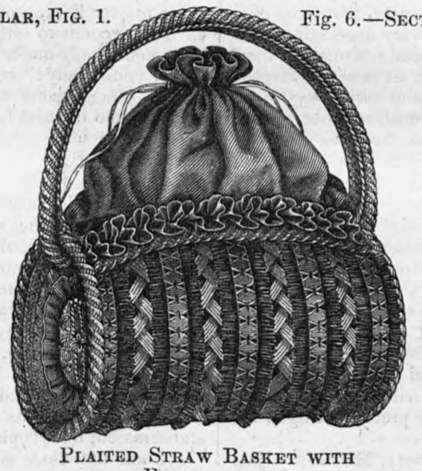
Fig. 4.—COLLAR IN TULLE EMBROIDERY. IMITATION OF LACE.—[See Figs. 5 and 6.]

Fig. 2.—DETAIL OF COLLAR, FIG. 1.

Plaited Straw Basket with Embroidery.

THIS basket is made of fine yellow plaited straw, and consists of open-work and close strips; the latter are covered each with an embroidery border. This border is made of a strip of cherry-colored silk three-quarters of an inch wide, arranged over an interlining of stiff linen half an inch wide, and ornamented in point Russe embroidery with maize and black silk. This strip is set on a strip of silk seven-eighths of an inch wide, which is fringed out on both sides a quarter of an inch wide in such a manner that the fringe projects. The ends of the basket are trimmed with silk rosettes ornamented in point Russe, as shown by the illustration. A ruche of red silk ribbon seven-eighths of an inch wide, set on the upper edge, a bag of silk of the same color, and a handle of straw plaiting, simulating cord, complete the basket.



PLAITED STRAW BASKET WITH EMBROIDERY.

Border in Chain Stitch Embroidery for Furniture, Covers, Curtains, etc.

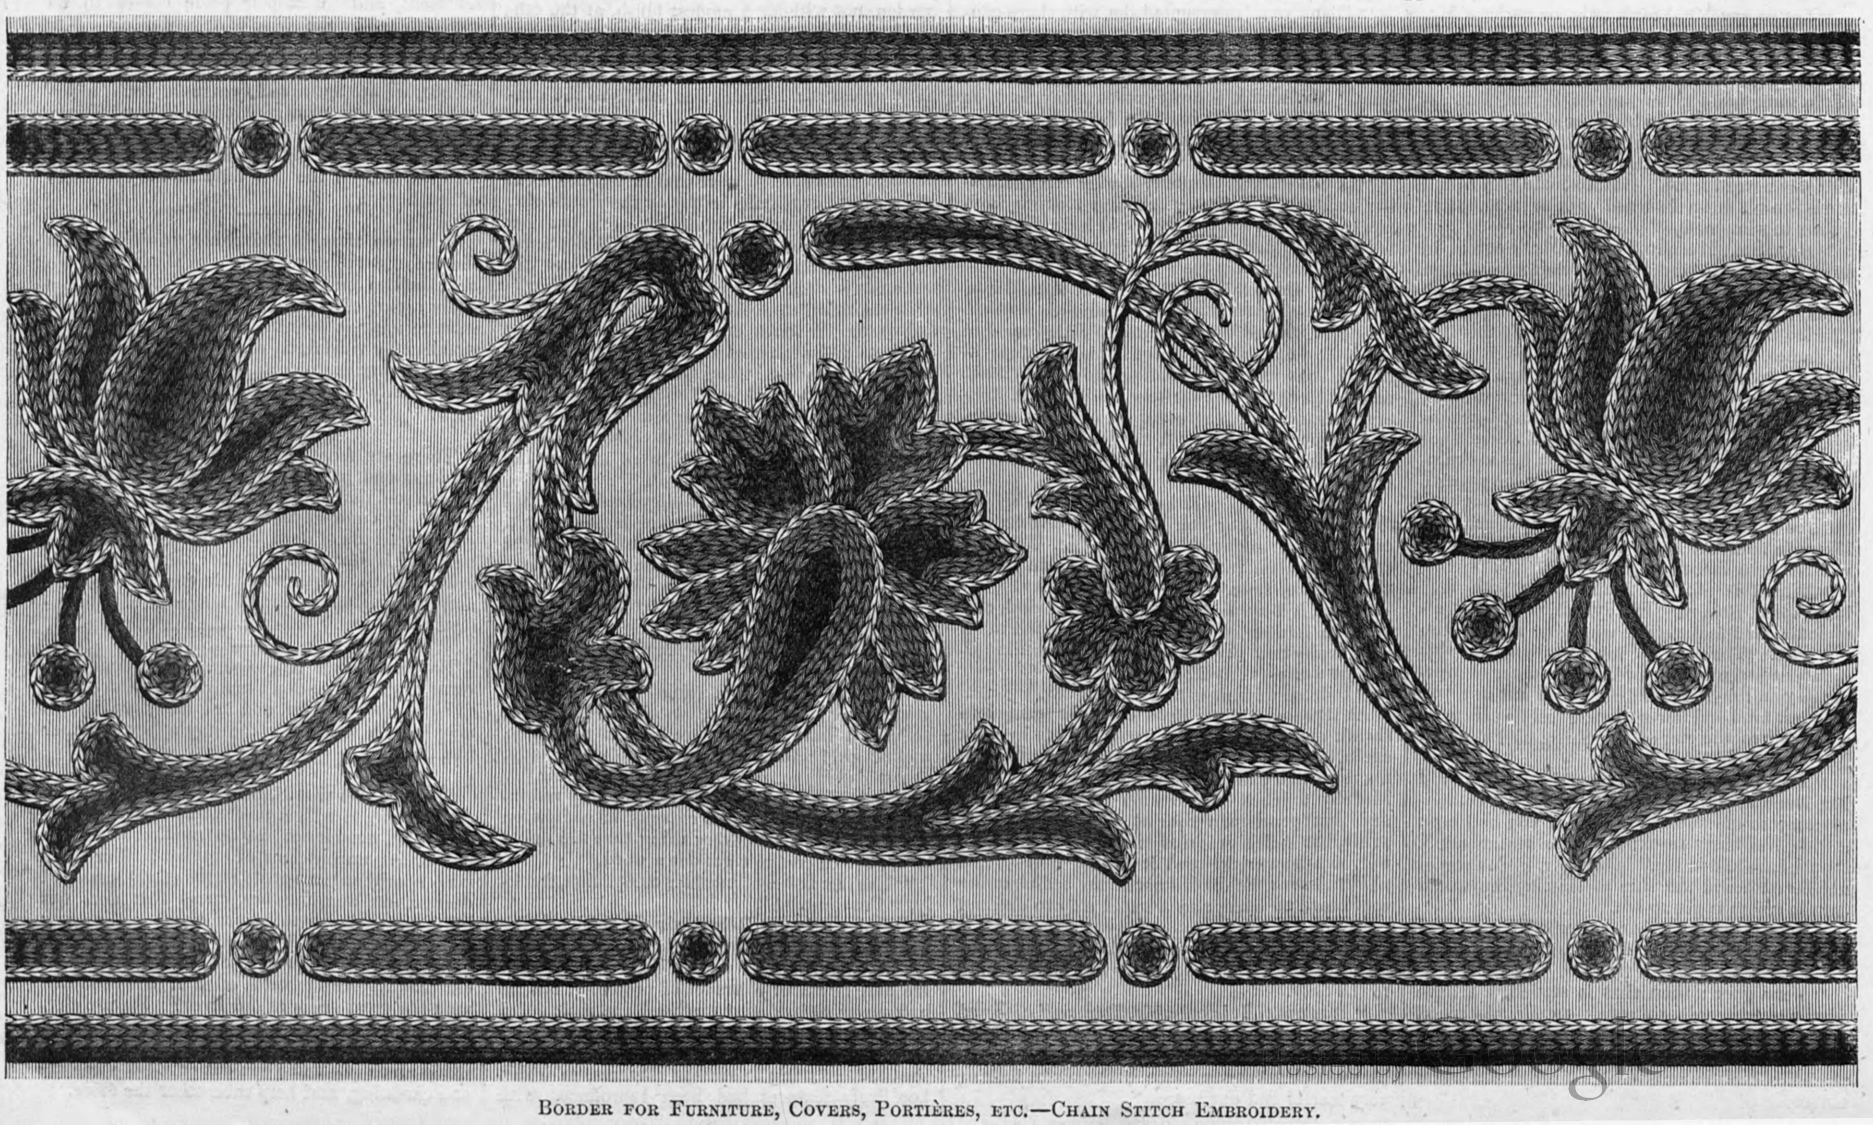
THIS border is worked on light gray cloth or woolen reps with split zephyr worsted or saddler's silk in different shades of one color, or else in various bright colors, entirely in chain stitch. The border may also be worked with the crochet-needle in tambour-work, or else with the sewing-machine in cord stitch.

Fan with Tulle and Lace Cover. Application Embroidery. Figs. 1–3.

See illustrations on page 105.

THE frame of this fan is of finely carved ivory. The upper part is covered with two bias strips of white satin seven-eighths of an inch and an inch and three-quarters wide, and with a strip of tulle two inches wide, as shown by the illustration; the strip of tulle overlaps the satin strips a quarter of an inch at each side, and is trimmed through the middle with an application lace border, a full-sized section of which is shown by Fig. 2. Work the border with fine Swiss muslin or nansook, woven picot braid, and a thread of coarse twisted cotton, according to the design drawn on linen or paper, letting the stitches show as little as possible. Fig. 3 shows another design for such a border. Instead of this, the design figures of lace insertion may be cut out of the foundation and used as an application border. Cover the upper and under edge of the satin strips with a row of white lace, each seven-eighths of an inch wide, as shown by Fig. 1. White silk cord and tassels complete the fan.

Fig. 5.—DETAIL OF COLLAR, FIG. 4.



BORDER FOR FURNITURE, COVERS, PORTIÈRES, ETC.—CHAIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

Ornamental Hair-Pins and Diadem, Figs. 1–3.

Figs. 1 and 2.—ORNAMENTAL HAIR-PINS. These hair-pins are of tortoise-shell. The heads, which simulate Marguerites, consist of twelve chased leaves, partly of gilt and partly of oxidized metal, in Fig. 1, and of eight leaves of gilt metal, chased in the middle of the leaves and smooth on the outer edges, in Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.—DIADEM FOR THE HAIR. This diadem consists of a curved band of tortoise-shell thirteen inches and a quarter long and three-quarters of an inch wide, on which is fastened a curved bar of gilt metal wound with a narrow strip simulating a ribbon, as shown by the illustration. The ribbon strip, which forms a bow in the middle of the diadem, is of gilt metal with fine chasing.

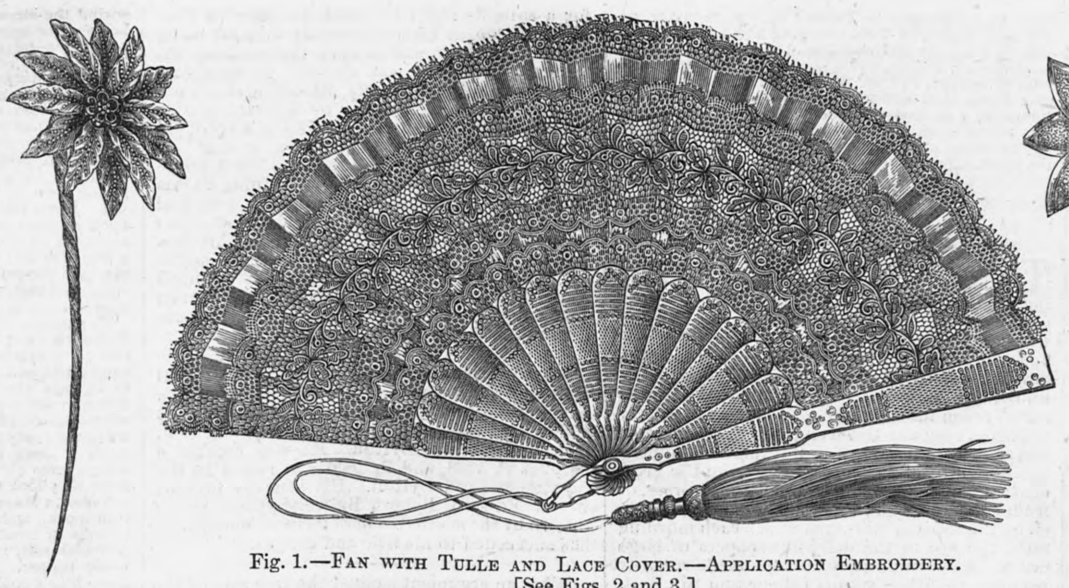

Fig. 1.—FAN WITH TULLE AND LACE COVER.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY. [See Figs. 2 and 3.]

Fig. 1.—ORNAMENTAL HAIR-PIN.

Fig. 2.—ORNAMENTAL HAIR-PIN.

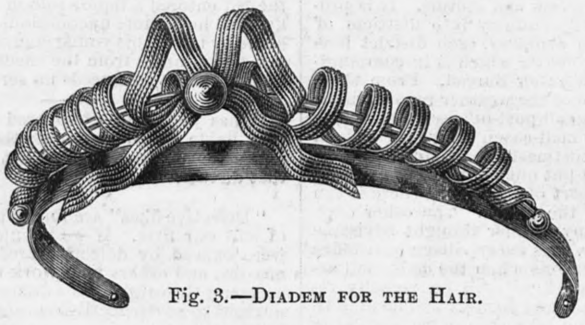

Fig. 3.—DIADEM FOR THE HAIR.

Swiss Muslin, Needle-work, and Lace Fichu, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fichu is made of plain white Swiss muslin, and is trimmed with a needle-work border an inch and a quarter wide, white lace an inch and three-eighths wide and an inch and seven-eighths wide, gray gros grain ribbon two inches and a quarter wide, and pale green gros grain ribbon of the same width.

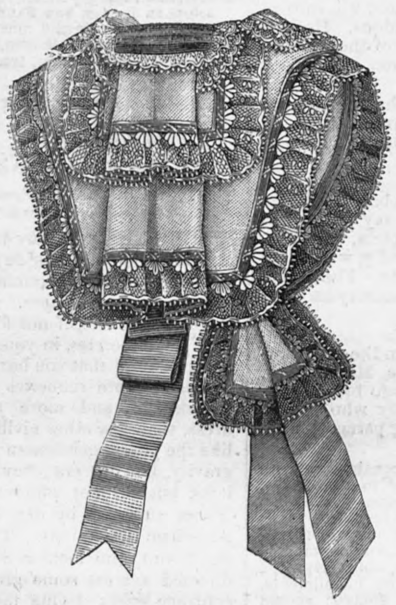

Fig. 2.—SWISS MUSLIN, NEEDLE-WORK, AND LACE FICHU.—BACK.

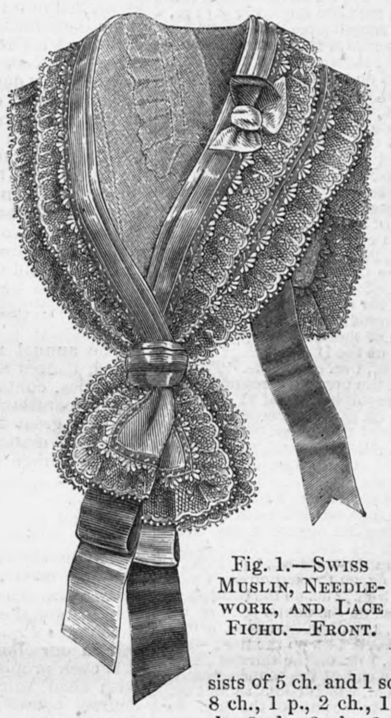

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN, NEEDLE-WORK, AND LACE FICHU.—FRONT.

Low-necked Swiss Muslin Pleated Waist.

THIS waist is made of pleated white Swiss muslin, and is trimmed with embroidery figures, lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and light blue gros grain ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide.

LOW-NECKED SWISS MUSLIN PLEATED WAIST.

Crochet Tidy.

THIS tidy may be worked with fine or coarse twisted crochet cotton, or else with fine knitting cotton, according to the size desired. The original is worked with crochet cotton, No. 120. In this size the tidy is suitable for trimming toilette cushions, for mats, etc. It is worked in six separate parts. Begin with the larger rosettes of each part, which are also worked separately, as follows: Make a foundation of 18 ch. (chain stitch), close the last 10 of these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and work 11 sc. (single crochet) on the ring; then work 1 sc. on the next, 1 sdc. (short double crochet) on the following of the 8 free ch., 2 dc. on the next, 2 stc. (short treble crochet) on each of the following 4 ch., and 1 stc. on the last of these ch., ∗ t. (turn the work), 5 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of these; five times alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 stc. (inserting the needle in the front veins), 1 p. (picot—that is, 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the last sc.; in doing this insert the needle in the horizontal and at the same time in the front vertical vein of the sc.), then 3 sc. on the following 3 st., and 1 sc. on the next sc. of the ring (passing the needle through both upper veins of the sc.). This completes the first of the 12 leaflets in the rosette. Then t., 1 sc. on the next sc., 1 sdc. on the following sdc. of the preceding leaflet (always passing the needle through the free veins back of the row of picots), 2 dc. on the next st., 2 stc. on each of the following 4 st., and 1 stc. on the next st.; repeat from ∗. After finishing the last leaflet crochet the corresponding veins of the stitches, together with the 8 foundation st. of the first leaflet, by means of sl. from the wrong side. Having worked six such rosettes, work six smaller rosettes, each of which counts only six leaflets, as follows: Make a foundation of 10 ch., close the last 5 of these in a ring with 1 sl., and work 5 sc. on the ring; then work 2 sc. on the next, 2 sdc. on the following of the 5 free ch., 2 dc. on each of the next 3 ch.; ∗ t., 5 ch. and 1 sl. on the first of these; three times alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 st. (always inserting the needle in the front veins), 1 p., then 4 sc. on the following 4 st., and 1 sc. on the next sc. of the ring (inserting the needle in both upper veins). This forms the first of the 6 leaflets. T., 2 sc. on the next st., 2 sdc. on the following st. of the finished leaflet (always inserting the needle in the free veins behind the row of picots), 2 dc. on each of the next 3 st., and repeat from ∗, always going forward. In working the last leaflet, instead of working the first 5 ch. at the point after turning, join the small rosette with one of the larger rosettes, working at the relative point one picot scallop as follows: 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., drop the st. from the needle, insert the needle in the 5 ch. at the point of a leaflet in the larger rosette, and draw through the dropped st., 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sl. on the first of the 2 ch. at the beginning of the p. scallop. Finally, crochet the sixth leaflet, together with the first, as in working the larger rosette. Now work the edge of always one large and one small rosette in connection with the surrounding p. scallops, in five rounds, as follows: Beginning at the point of the edge turned toward the centre crochet the 1st round.—9 ch., 1 p. (each p. hereafter consists of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 8 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 8 ch., 2 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth of the 5 ch. before the last (always work the sc. on the lower vein of the corresponding ch.), 4 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the point of a leaflet in the smaller rosette as shown by the illustration (to do this drop the st. from the needle, insert the needle in the corresponding st., and draw through the dropped st. from the under toward the upper side), 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 4 ch., 3 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the 3 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of those 5 ch. in the fourth of which 1 sc. has already been worked, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the first sc. of this round was worked, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sl. on the ch. before the last of the first 9 ch. in this round. Now work 8 ch., fasten to the next free p. scallop to the right, 11 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the nearest point of a leaflet of the smaller rosette (in doing this hold the work so that the rosettes are turned upward during the whole round), 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 11 ch., 15 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaflet of the rosette, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth of the 5 ch., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next free point of a leaf on the larger rosette, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the last 5 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 5 ch. before the last, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 15 ch., 11 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf of the rosette, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 11 ch., 13 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 13 ch., ∗ 12 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaflet, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 12 ch., and repeat five times from ∗; 13 ch., 1 p.,

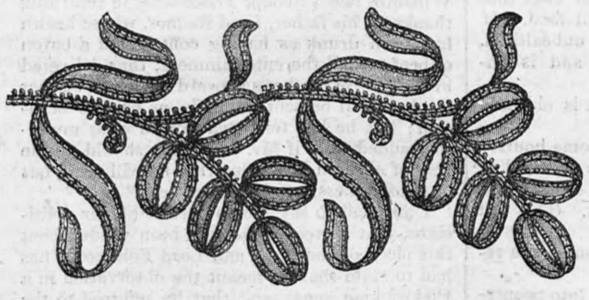

Fig. 3.—APPLICATION BORDER FOR FAN.

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION BORDER FOR FAN.

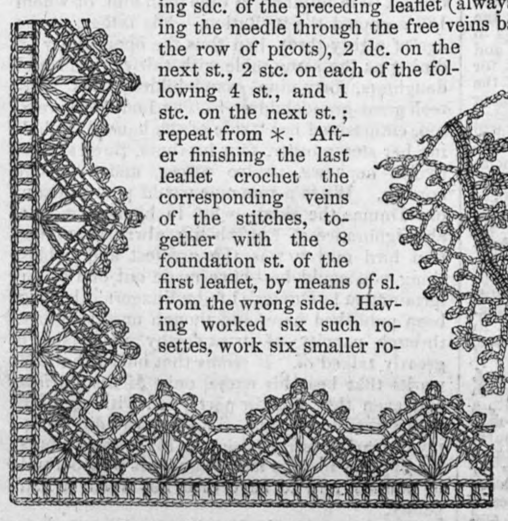

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET BORDER.

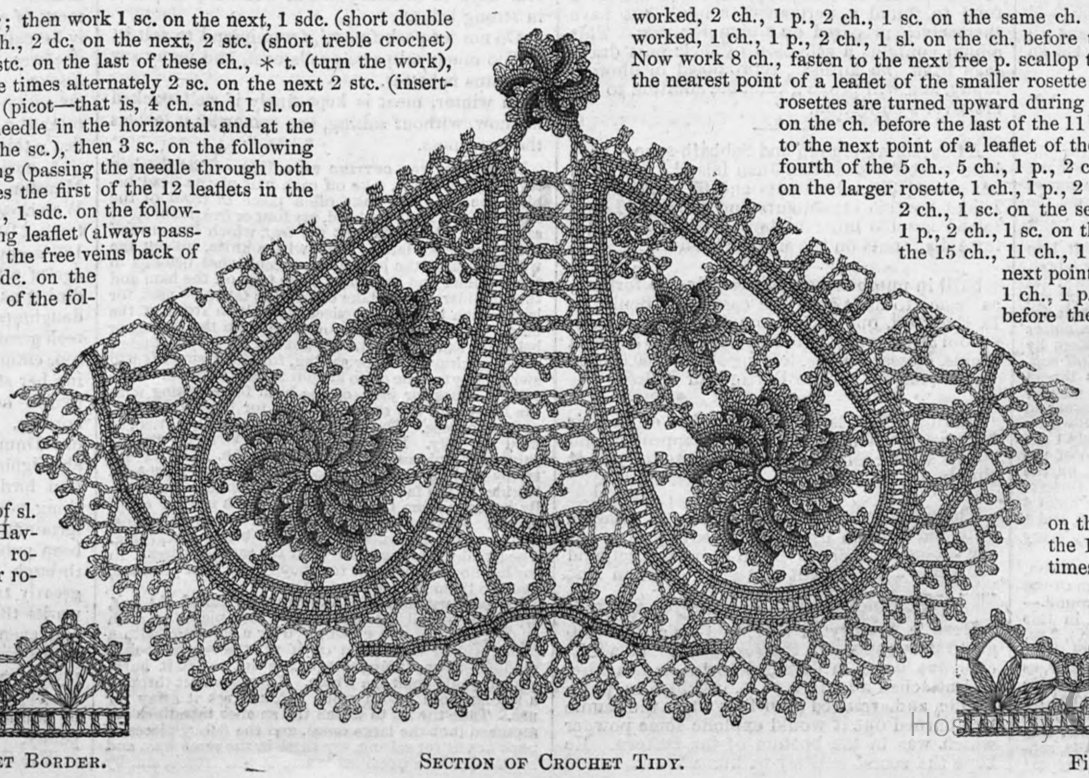

SECTION OF CROCHET TIDY.

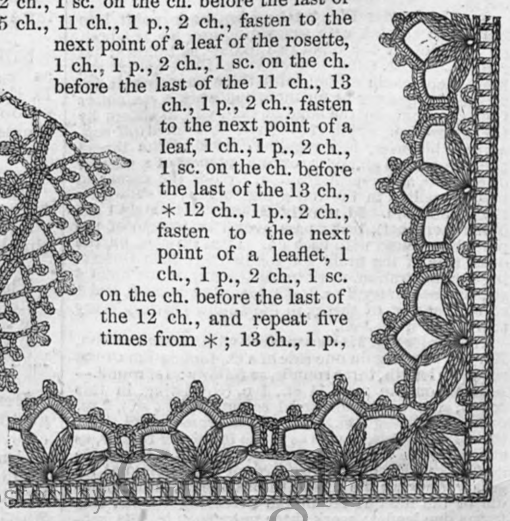

Fig. 2.—CROCHET BORDER.

2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 13 ch.; 11 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth of the 5 ch., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf in the smaller rosette, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the last 5 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 5 ch. before the last, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 11 ch.; 15 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., fasten to the next point of a leaf, 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. before the last of the 15 ch.; 10 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the next free p. scallop, 8 ch., fasten to the following p. scallop as shown by the illustration, 7 ch., fasten to the first ch. of this round. Now work in the opposite direction, so that the rosettes are turned downward. 2d round.—On the next ch. work 3 sc., and on each of the remaining ch. and sc. of the preceding round work 1 sc. 3d round.—4 ch., the first three of which count as first dc., then 1 dc., 3 stc., 1 dc. on the middle of the 3 sc. worked on one st. of the preceding round, after each of these st. work 1 ch., 1 dc. on the following st., then always alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st.; in the middle part of the round, which borders the larger rosette, widen twelve times; to do this pass over no st. of the preceding round with the ch. between every fourth and fifth following bars. This round consequently should contain 106 bars altogether, including the 3 ch. which count as first dc.; at the end of the round work 1 sl. on the last of the 3 ch. which count as first dc. 4th round.—5 sc. on the next 5 st., 3 sc. on the following stc., then 1 sc. on each of the remaining st. in the preceding round; finally, work 1 sc. on the ch. in the third round on which the sl. was worked at the end of the round. 5th round.—Work the cross picot bars in connection, by means of which the six parts of the tidy are joined, 1 sl. on the next st., 3 ch., which count as first dc., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth following st. (inserting the needle in both upper veins), 3 ch., 1 dc. on the middle of the 3 sc. at the point of the preceding round, 1 p. (work the sc. of the picot on the last dc.), 3 ch., 1 sc. on the second following st., + 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st., repeat three times from +; then work 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. Work one joining bar of 7 ch., 1 sc. on the third of these, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. Then 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. One joining bar of 7 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 7 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. Then 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. One joining bar of 11 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the seventh of the 11 ch., 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 11 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. Then 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. One joining bar of 16 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the eleventh of the 16 ch., 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the seventh of the 16 ch., 1 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 16 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. Then 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. One joining bar of 11 ch., 1 p., in working which fasten to the middle p. of the preceding bar, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the fifth of these, 2 ch., 1 p., 5 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fifth of the 11 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 11 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. Then 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st. One joining bar of 11 ch., t., 1 dc. on the middle of the 5 ch. of the preceding dc., 11 ch., pass over the last two of these, 1 sc. on the next ch., 1 sdc. and 1 dc. on the following 2 ch., three times 1 ch. and 1 dc. on the second following ch., 1 ch., 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the following 2 ch.; three times 1 ch. and 1 dc. on the second ch., 1 sdc. and 1 sc. on the next 2 ch., 1 ch.; t., 1 sc. on each st. of the preceding row, always inserting the needle in the back vein (the st. should number 21), then 1 ch.; t., 3 sl. on the next 3 sc., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third sc., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third sc., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the second sc., 1 p., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the second sc., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third sc., 1 p., 3 ch., pass over 2 st., 3 sl. on the next 3 sc., 1 sc. on the third of the first 11 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the dc. before the joining bar. Then 3 ch., * 1 sc. on the third st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., 1 p., 3 ch., repeat from * to the end of the round; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch., which count as first dc. This completes one of the six sections of the tidy. In working the joining bars in each of the following sections fasten to the preceding part as shown by the illustration; in working the fifth round of the edge of the sixth section fasten to the joining bars of the first part. For the centre of the tidy crochet a small rosette similar to that before described, in doing which fasten the six sections of the tidy together with the points, as shown by the illustration. Besides this, work on the outer edge of the tidy between every two sections one long joining bar in two rounds, as follows: Make a foundation of 65 ch., fasten to the fifth free p. scallop (counting from the last joining bar) at the right side of one section, then work on the lower veins of the foundation st. the 1st round, 4 sl. on the next 4 st., then 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., fasten to the next p. scallop of this section, 3 ch., pass over 2 st., 3 sl. on the next 3 st., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., 1 p., 3 ch., fasten to the following p. scallop of this section, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the 3 ch., 1 p., 1 sc. on the dc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st.; 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., 1 p., 6 ch., fasten to the next p. scallop of this section, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth of the 6 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the 6 ch., 1 p., 1 sc. on the dc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st.; 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., 1 p., 9 ch., fasten to the following p. scallop of this section, 5 ch., fasten to the next p. scallop of the joining bar, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the fourth of the 9 ch., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the 9 ch., 1 p., 1 sc. on the dc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st.; 3 ch., 1 dc. on the third st., 1 p., 3 ch., fasten to the following p. scallop of the joining bar, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the 3 ch., 1 p., 1 sc. on the dc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third st. This completes the middle figure of this joining bar and the first half of the round; crochet the second half like the first, but in reversed order; finally, work 1 ch. Then work on the other side of the foundation st., thus inserting the needle in the upper veins, the 2d round.—On each st. work 1 sc. Then fasten the thread. Now work all around the outer edge of the tidy two rounds of dc., ch., and p.; the manner of working these rounds is plainly shown by the illustration.

Point Lace and Crochet Borders, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 105.

THESE borders are suitable for trimming covers, pillow-cases, etc.; each border is completed by a second half worked in a similar manner, in which the corner is formed in the opposite direction, however, and the parts fastened together by the picots on the outer edges.

For the border Fig. 1 take open-work point lace braid, and crochet with twisted cotton, No. 100, first, on one side of the braid two rounds, as follows: 1st round.—* 3 sc. (single crochet) on the edge of the braid, 6 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over an interval of a quarter of an inch, and work 5 stc. (short treble crochet) on the edge of the braid, as shown by the illustration, which should not be worked off separately, however, but together, drawing the thread through once, 6 ch., pass over an interval of a quarter of an inch, and repeat from *. Work the corner in this, as well as in the following rounds, as shown by the illustration. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch., pass over 1 st. (stitch) of the preceding round with each ch. Then crochet on the other side of the braid the following round: Observing the illustration, work on each point of the braid 6 sc., between every 2 sc. 1 p. (picot, that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), in the hollow between every two points work 3 ch.

The border Fig. 2 is also worked with twisted cotton, No. 100, working on one side of a ch. foundation of the requisite length, three rounds, as follows: 1st round.—* 11 sc. on the next 11 st., 1 p. (consisting, in this round, always of 3 ch. and 1 sc. on the last sc.), 3 sc. on the following 3 st., 1 p.; repeat from , and work the corner in this, as well as in the following rounds, as shown by the illustration. 2d round.— 3 tc. (treble crochet), which are not worked off separately, but together, drawing the thread through once, on the middle of the next 11 sc. in the preceding round; this forms one leaflet; work three more such leaflets, separated each by 7 ch. on the same sc., 5 ch., and repeat from . 3d round.— Twice 4 sc., 1 p., then 4 sc. on the next scallop of 7 ch. (the p. of this round consist each of 3 ch.), three times 3 sc., 1 p., then 3 sc. on the following ch. scallop, twice 4 sc., 1 p., then 4 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 1 sc. on the middle of the following 5 ch.; repeat from *, but in working the first p. after the following 4 sc. fasten to the last p. After finishing this round work on the other side of the foundation st. one round of open-work double crochet, observing the illustration.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE history of the Signal Service shows that it may be relied upon to give timely warning of heavy storms of snow or rain, of the coming sweep of great tidal air waves, whether warm or cold, of violent winds, of nipping frosts, and of the numerous atmospheric changes which never cease to seem mysteriously sudden. A knowledge of the daily "probabilities" is a matter of much interest and convenience to all our citizens, especially those engaged in commercial and agricultural pursuits. But there are numerous agricultural districts remote from the great centres which, for want of a daily local press, or from some other cause, are not seasonably reached by the weather warnings which each morning meet the eye in the daily newspapers of large cities. An arrangement has been made recently between the Chief Signal Officer and the Postmaster-General whereby farmers and fruit-growers in inland sections of the country may be apprised of coming frosts and storms. It is proposed to divide the country into districts of about 200 miles in diameter, each district having a distributing centre which is in communication with the Weather Bureau. From these centres two copies of the weather report will be mailed every day to all post-offices which can be reached by rail or mail-coach before six o'clock at night. Each postmaster receiving these reports is desired to put one copy in a convenient and conspicuous part of the office, where it can be easily read by the public. The other copy may be used in any manner thought advisable by the postmaster. As every village post-office is a general rendezvous when the daily mail arrives, the "probabilities" will be verbally reported far and wide, and farmers will be able to plan their work and take care of their growing crops advantageously and intelligently.

The annual report of Professor Spencer F. Baird, United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, contains a most interesting account of his operations during the past year in restocking our great lakes and rivers with food fish. This is a matter to which Professor Baird has devoted much attention for several years; and when last summer an appropriation of $15,000 was made by Congress for replacing in our lakes and rivers the fish which had become extinct from lack of protection, the expenditure of the money was placed in his charge. The result has been most satisfactory to all who can realize the benefit which intelligent skill can confer upon the community. It is believed that shad and salmon will soon abound in many waters in our country suited to their habits; and it is even proposed to stock the Great Salt Lake with shad, salmon, oysters, etc. Time is, of course, necessary to prove the full value of these operations, but there is no doubt of great success.

One of the most marked characteristics of Lord Lytton, whose death occurred in London on January 18, was his reverence for his mother. He often remarked that he owed to her all his love for literature, and it was in the room long occupied by his mother in the ancient family seat in Hertfordshire that most of his literary work was done. He was the author of more than a score of novels, which have been read by millions with interest and profit. He contributed to poetical, political, and historic literature, and some of his dramatic writings, as The Lady of Lyons, Richelieu, and Money, have an established reputation. Lord Lytton also held a high position as an English statesman, and was considered one of the most finished orators of his day.

The splendid Shakspearean library of Edwin Forrest has fallen a victim to the insatiable "fire fiend."

Those who help themselves are deserving of all encouragement and commendation. The students in painting at the National Academy of Design, feeling their lack of needful facilities, and desiring the services of a teacher, have not only appealed to wealthy patrons of art for a fund to found a permanent school, but have themselves prepared an album for sale. This album contains a selection of their best drawings from the antique, reproduced in photography, and will prove a valuable addition to the art lover's collection.

A flourishing church and Sabbath-school have been established on San Juan Island. San Juan has nearly 350 inhabitants and 65 farms, Orcas Island has 165 inhabitants and 40 farms, Lopez Island has 135 inhabitants and 25 farms, and a few inhabitants on the smaller islands.

Skill in numbers sometimes brings a fortune, as seems to have been the case with Benjamin D. Emerson, one of the compilers of a series of school arithmetics. He recently died at Jamaica Plains, Massachusetts, leaving about $250,000, of which $100,000 goes to Dartmouth College.

"Prince Bill" is the popular title of an heir to the Hawaiian crown who has appeared, and stands a fair chance of being raised to the vacant throne.

The suspension railroad bridge at Niagara Falls has been in use about twenty years; but the cables are still perfect in every respect, and the wires are as bright and good as when first laid.

Here is a story of 1811, told by a New England newspaper. In the year mentioned a mischievous boy in a Vermont town made a kite, and attached a lantern to it, in which he put a candle, and arranged it so that when the candle had burned out it would explode some powder which was in the bottom of the lantern. He kept the secret entirely to himself, and waited for a suitable night in which to raise his kite. The boy got his kite into the air without being discovered, for it was so dark that nothing but the colored lantern was visible. It went dancing about in the air wildly, attracting much notice, and was looked upon by ignorant people as some supernatural omen. The evil spirit, as many supposed it, went bobbing around for about twenty minutes, and then exploded, blowing the lantern to pieces. Next morning all was wonder and excitement, and this lad, who had carefully taken in his kite and hidden it after the explosion, without being found out, had his own fun out of the matter. The bewildered villagers never had any explanation of the mystery until some sixty years afterward, when the boy, then an old gentleman, revealed the secret by publishing the story in a newspaper.

Lord Lytton was the youngest son of General William Earle Bulwer, of Heydon Hall. In 1844, having succeeded to the estate of his mother, he added her family surname (Lytton) to his own, making it Bulwer-Lytton. He was created a baronet in 1838, and in 1866 was raised to the peerage as Lord Lytton. His son, the present Baron Edward Robert Bulwer-Lytton, better known by the nom de plume of "Owen Meredith," has succeeded to his title and estates.

What an argument against the free sale of intoxicating liquors is the recent death in Brooklyn of a boy sixteen years old! One morning the lad entered a liquor saloon and drank whisky until he became unconscious, and was carried home by two of his young companions. He died in a few minutes from the effects of the whisky. Such a text as this needs no sermon.

It has just been discovered that whales are very liable to rheumatism: therefore it is inferred that hydropathy can not be efficacious in that disease.

"Defective flues" are forced to bear the blame of half our fires. If we should say these fires were caused by defective architects, builders, masons, and others who work badly, we should be nearer the origin of the difficulty. Flues have no right to be "defective" so commonly and persistently.

A curious story is reported from the neighborhood of Troy, New York. One Mr. Dunlop, who recently died, many years ago broke off a marriage engagement with a lady who is still living. In his will the following paragraph occurs:

"Many years since, before my acquaintance with the late Mrs. Dunlop, I was engaged to Miss A——, which engagement, for certain reasons, was broken off by me. I have not seen her for over thirty years, but know that she is still alive, and now, for partial reparation for the wrong committed, and should she still live at the time of my death and will receive it, I direct my executors to pay her in three installments, within twelve months, the sum of $10,000; should she refuse to receive it, the amount to revert to my daughter Jessie."

It is stated that the lady has accepted the money.

PRACTICAL HINTS TO HOUSE-KEEPERS.

BY CATHARINE E. BEECHER.

ON THE CARE OF MEATS.

BEEF and mutton are improved by keeping as long as they remain sweet. If meat begins to taint, wash it and rub it with powdered charcoal, and it often removes the taint. Sometimes rubbing with salt will cure it.

Corn-fed pork is best. Pork made by still-house slops is almost poisonous, and hogs that live on offal never furnish healthful food. If hogs are properly fed, the pork is not unhealthful.

Measly pork has kernels in it, and is unhealthful.

A thick skin shows that the pork is old, and that it requires more time to boil.

If your pork is very salt, soak it some hours.

Take all the kernels out that you will find in the round, and thick end of the flank of beef, and in the fat, and fill the holes with salt. This will preserve it longer.

Salt your meat, in summer, as soon as you receive it.

A pound and a half of salt rubbed into twenty-five pounds of beef will corn it so as to last several days in ordinary warm weather; or put it in strong brine.

Do not let pork freeze, if you intend to salt it.

Too much saltpetre spoils beef, and many say saleratus is better.

In winter, meat is kept finely if well packed in snow, without salting, but some say it lessens the sweetness.

DIRECTIONS FOR CUTTING UP A HOG.—Split the hog through the spine, take off each half of the head behind the ear, then take off a piece in front of the shoulder and next the head, say four or five pounds, for sausages. Then take out the leaf, which lies around the kidneys, for lard. Then, with a knife, cut out the whole mass of the lean meat, except what belongs to the shoulder and the ham. Then take off the ham and the shoulder. Then take out all the fat to be used for lard, which is the loose piece, directly in front of the ham. Next cut off a narrow strip from the spring, or belly, for sausage meat. Do not cut up the remainder, which is clear pork, for salting, for if cut small it will swim. Lay a stone on to keep it under the brine. Take off the cheek, or jowl, of the head for smoking with the ham; and use the upper part for boiling, baking, or head-cheese. The feet are boiled and then fried, or used for jelly. It is most economical to try up the thin, flabby pieces for lard to cook with. The leaf fat try by itself, for the nicest cooking. Clean all the intestines of the fat for lard. That which does not readily separate from the largest intestines use for soap-grease. Of the insides, the liver, heart, sweet-breads, and kidneys are sometimes used for broiling or frying. The smaller intestines are used for sausage cases. In salting down, leave out the bloody and lean portions, and use them for sausages.

TO TRY OUT LARD.—Take what is called the leaf, and take off all the skin, cut it into pieces an inch square, put it into a clean pot over a slow fire, with a tea-cupful of water, and try it till the scraps look a reddish-brown, taking great care not to let it burn, which would spoil the whole. Then strain it through a strong cloth into a stone pot, and set it away for use. Take the fat to which the smaller intestines are attached (not the large ones), and the flabby pieces of pork not fit for salting, try these in the same way, and set the fat thus obtained where it will freeze, and by spring the strong taste will be gone, and then it can be used for frying. The tea-cupful of water prevents burning while trying.

DIRECTIONS FOR SALTING DOWN PORK.—Allow a peck of salt for sixty pounds. Cover the bottom of the barrel with salt an inch deep. Put down one layer of pork, and cover that with salt half an inch thick. Continue thus till the barrel is full. Then pour in as much strong pickle as the barrel will receive. Keep coarse salt between all pieces, so that the brine can circulate. When a white scum or bloody-looking matter rises on the top, scald the brine and add more salt. Leave out bloody and lean pieces for sausages. Pack as tight as possible, the rind next the barrel; and let it be always kept under the brine. Some use a stone for this purpose. In salting down a new supply, take the old brine, boil it down and remove all the scum, and then use it to pour over the pork. The pork may be used in six weeks after salting.

TO PREPARE CASES FOR SAUSAGES.—Empty the cases, taking care not to tear them. Wash them thoroughly, and cut into lengths of two yards each. Then take a candle rod, and fastening one end of a case to the top of it, turn the case inside outward. When all are turned, wash very thoroughly, and scrape them with a scraper made for the purpose, keeping them in warm water till ready to scrape. Throw them into salt and water to soak till used. It is a very difficult job to scrape them clean without tearing them. When finished they look transparent and very thin.

SAUSAGE MEAT.—Take one-third fat and two-thirds lean pork, and chop it, and then to every twelve pounds of meat add twelve large even spoonfuls of pounded salt, nine of sifted sage, and six of sifted black pepper. Some like a little summer-savory. Keep it in a cool and dry place.

BOLOGNA SAUSAGES.—Take equal portions of veal, pork, and ham, chop them fine, season with sweet herbs and pepper, put them in cases, boil them till tender, and then dry them.

ANOTHER RECIPE FOR SAUSAGE MEAT.—To twenty-five pounds of chopped meat, which should be one-third fat and two-thirds lean, put twenty spoonfuls of sage, twenty-five of salt, ten of pepper, and four of summer-savory.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Prince in Danger.—Speculating for the Fall (in Dynasties).—From Arnold to Hayman.

PERHAPS you may like to know that your late Thanksgiving-day has been the cause of no less than three columns and a leading article in the Times newspaper. By these we learn that you are thankful, if not for nothing, at least for very small mercies, in your much-belauded "free institutions;" that you have more murders, more outrages, more robberies and swindles without punishment, and more accidents without redress, than any other civilized nation; and that, like the young gentleman who knew the laws of gravity, but did not obey them, you have good laws, but do not observe them. Finally, the Times sums up by denying the superiority of American institutions. This, to my mind, is also significant, and looks a little as though it were directed against some growing opinions to the contrary effect. One fact which, small as it seems, will, I doubt not, make such grow, is that the Prince of Wales has joined the Turf Club, and will, it is announced, in future keep a stud and run race-horses under his own name, which, it is whispered, he has long done under that of another. "Those whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad," is a sentence which in this case may be applied to our heir-apparent. It is absolutely certain that he will lose his money, and almost as certain that, knowing how he lost it, the nation will never pay his debts.

The Tory party in this country, from the days of the John Bull, in which Theodore Hook made ample use of the family histories he had become acquainted with as a diner-out, has been always inclined to personality, and the breed has not died out yet. At a conservative meeting in Wiltshire one Viscount Folkestone, in returning thanks for his father, Lord Radnor, whose health had been drunk as having contributed a baron of beef toward the entertainment, thus delivered himself: "My father's steward has told you that the beef will be sent annually, as on this occasion; but he has forgotten to add what my father added, that if Mr. Gladstone should go the way of all flesh in the interim, he will send, out of thankfulness, two barons of beef."

I am glad to say, for the credit of our politicians, that a great noise has been made about this piece of bad taste, and Lord Folkestone has had to state that he meant the observation in a Pickwickian sense, and that he referred to the government of Mr. Gladstone, and not to the man himself: which seems strange, since the government of even "the people's William" can scarcely be called one of flesh and blood. Finally, he declares the expression to have been a lapsus linguæ. This reminds one of the plea against an action for libel—first, the defendant did not utter the libel; second, if he did he was justified; third, he didn't mean it.

A curious family gathering was held in our Mansion House by the Lord Mayor, Sir Sydney Waterlow. He invited the whole of his relations, 210 in number, to dine with him, of whom 186 accepted the invitation. His father, at the age of eighty-three, had thus the opportunity of dining at the same table with thirteen sons and daughters, forty-nine grandchildren, and fourteen great-grandchildren! The Lady Mayoress, too, entertained her "side of the house," including her step-mother, four brothers, three sisters, twelve nephews, twelve nieces, and forty-one cousins. What a romance would poor Alexandre Dumas the elder—who, in his insurmountable ignorance of English life, always imagined that lord mayor was the greatest and noblest thing you could be—have made out of this entertainment! Dumas's life, by Fitzgerald, has just been published here, and though unsatisfactory, through paucity of trustworthy materials, is greatly talked of. It seems that out of the 1200 works that bear his name, only Monte Christo, and even that only in parts, can with certainty be ascribed to Dumas, so assiduously did he apply the co-operative system to his literary labors. He appears to have made hundreds of thousands of pounds, and to have died not worth a half-penny.

The Czarowitz, the hereditary prince of all the

Digitized by Google

Russias, is suffering from the same illness as befell our Prince of Wales. Let us hope it will have a like termination, without the same catastrophe in the mourning trade—with which, by-the-bye, you may be unacquainted. It is well known that Morrison, the great millionaire, laid the foundation of his fortune by buying up all the mourning materials in the provinces on the occasion of the death of Queen Charlotte, news of which, the instant it had occurred, he obtained, through a bribe of a hundred pounds, from one of her attendants. In the present day the telegraph renders this sort of special information impossible to obtain; but when poor "Wales" was at his worst one of our great mourning houses, following Morrison's example, effected an immense operation in black stuffs, speculating for the fall in the prince's case, and for the rise in that of the crape, to its own utter ruin.

Since I wrote to you of the revelations of Winchester, another of our great public schools, Rugby, has been coming in for a greater share of attention than it desired. It is the only one of our five great schools—Eton, Harrow, Rugby, Winchester, and Westminster—which professes liberal opinions, which it owes to Dr. Arnold and his successor, Dr. Temple. When the latter was made Bishop of Exeter the trustees of Rugby—who consisted mainly at that time (for the system has been moderately improved by the present government) of some neighboring county magnates of the usual "county" opinions—determined to root out the liberal leaven, and to that end appointed as head-master one Dr. Hayman, who, except that he was a Tory, seems to have had no other qualification for the place. His testimonials were indifferent as compared with those of other candidates, and what was worse, it was proved that they had been used before in application for other appointments. Without tact, without good manners, but possessed of an obstinacy that rises to the heroic, this unlucky pedagogue was placed in the chair that was once filled by Arnold. To put new cloth on old garments is, we are told on the best authority, to do a very foolish thing; but what is such an imprudence compared with the placing a man in chief authority over a place of education where every tradition, as well as every practice, breathes a spirit in direct opposition to his own? The assistant masters of the school at once remonstrated with the trustees against the appointment, and when it was confirmed, only accepted their position under protest. A few months' experience of Dr. Hayman has corroborated their worst fears, and now, after a protracted inquiry, that gentleman has been publicly reprimanded for his misconduct by the trustees of Rugby. These are not, however—and there is some significance in this—precisely the same body as elected him: half these consist of mere local magnates, but half are now composed of representatives from the universities and other intelligent sources. It is my own opinion that Dr. Hayman is a personage who will take a good deal of reprimanding before he can be induced to give up a head-mastership, but every body—even those who were his partisans—is looking with eagerness for his resignation. To you in America this fuss about a school-master will seem perhaps unintelligible, but here in London the subject is debated on all hands as though it were one of great political importance. The hold which classical education and our public-school system has got upon the upper classes of this country, however undeserved, is certainly most undeniable. Almost every body who is any body, or who can boast of an income over £1000 a year, sends his boy, as a matter of course, to one of the five schools I have mentioned, either to mix with his equals or to gain a connection with his superiors in later life, as the case may be. To see our Lords' Cricket Ground, in London, when a match is being played between any two of these schools, can alone give you an idea of the enthusiasm that exists among our governing classes (and especially their wives and daughters) with respect to these institutions; and now that one of them is in trouble, Paterfamilias is in despair. As a general rule he is opposed to liberal sentiments; "But then, you know, Arnold and Temple were certainly good masters, whereas this fellow, Hayman—don't you see?" Moreover, of all schools, Rugby is the most popular (though by no means the largest), by reason of the "puff direct" which it received from Tom Brown's School Days. I have said that this question was treated as though it was of political importance, and indeed it is so, indirectly; for if the only liberal training-place for the youth of the upper ten should lose its alumni, as, thanks to its present head, it bids fair to do, the position of the governing classes in the next generation with respect to the rest of the country—which, Heaven knows, stands in need enough of conciliatory interpretation—will be more antagonistic than ever. Short-sighted politicians of the extreme conservative stamp do not, of course, see this, and it is currently stated that the appointment of Dr. Hayman was made by the Bishop of Winchester and the Duke of Marlborough (both trustees of the school) with the deliberate intention of disseminating Tory opinions among the rising generation. This charge of "corrupting our youth" was once made against Socrates, and so far the duke may congratulate himself; but beyond that the parallel between himself and the sage, or any sage, can not be pushed. He is the same man who has made such a fool of himself and caused so much bad blood in the agricultural question. But as to the Bishop of Winchester, his lordship ought to know better. There was a time (when the primacy was a possibility for him) when he could himself be "liberal" enough, and earn, by his supple courtesy to those who had the loaves and fishes at their disposal, the title of "Windsor Soap;" but he has washed his hands of all that, now that he knows nothing more will be put in them—that he will not again be invited to "a sphere of increased usefulness," which was his rounded phrase for preferring the see of Winchester, with its ten thousand a year, to that of Oxford, with its seven.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

(Continued from No. 5, page 71.)

LONDON'S HEART.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "BLADE-O'-GRASS," "GRIF," AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

JIM HAS A DREAM, AND WAKES UP IN TIME.

JIM PODMORE, staggering into the one room which formed his Englishman's castle, found his wife and Pollypod fast asleep in bed. Before he went out to his work in the morning he had told his wife not to sit up for him that night. "You've had precious hard work of it, old woman," he had said, "this last week; so go to bed early and have a long night's rest. I'll find my way up stairs all right." The precious hard work which Jim Podmore referred to was one of those tasks which poor people—especially women—take upon themselves, when occasion requires, with a readiness and cheerfulness which it is beautiful to see. A neighbor's child had been ill, and required constant watching. The mother, worn out with her labor of love, had fallen ill herself, and Mrs. Podmore flew to her aid, and attended to her household duties, and nursed her and the child through their sickness. The cheerfulness with which Mrs. Podmore undertook this task and performed it, as if it were a duty incumbent upon her, can not be described. The best reward she could receive was hers: the mother and child recovered their health, and were strong enough to attend to themselves. Late in the previous night the doctor had released Mrs. Podmore, and had told her—with smiles and good words, and with a hand-shake which gratified the simple woman mightily—that now she had best go home and take care of herself; "for we can get about ourselves now," he said, "and sha'n't want you any more." This accounted for Jim Podmore having to find his way up stairs by himself, for Mrs. Podmore seldom went to bed before he returned home. He knew, on this night, that his wife was asleep, and in the midst of his drowsiness he took off his boots in the passage, so that he should not disturb her.

Entering the room in his stocking feet, he stepped softly to the bedside, and rested his hand lightly and tenderly on Pollypod's neck. The bed being against the wall, and Pollypod sleeping inside, he could not kiss her without disturbing his wife. The child slept peacefully, and Jim Podmore gazed lovingly at the pretty picture, and leaned forward to feel the sweet breath, pure as an angel's whisper, that came from her parted lips. His supper was laid for him on the table, and he sat down to it, Snap standing at his feet in patient eagerness, waiting for such scraps and morsels as he thought fit to give. Jim did not forget his dog; Snap fared well, and when supper was finished the dog stretched himself on the ground, and with half-closed eyes watched his master's face. Snap blinked and blinked, but although occasionally his eyes were so nearly closed that only the thinnest line of light could be seen, the dog never relaxed his watchful gaze. Jim sat in his chair, pipe in mouth, and smoked and dozed, and thought of Dick Hart and his wife and children, and of his own wife and Pollypod, till they all became mixed up together in the strangest way, and in the phantasmagoria of his fancy changed places, and merged one into the other in utter defiance of all probability. Thus, as he leaned forward to catch the sweet breath that came from Pollypod's lips, the child's face became blurred and indistinct, and in her place Dick Hart appeared, crouching upon the railway platform in an agony of despair. The platform itself appeared, with its throng of anxious faces, with its sound of hurried feet and cries of pain, with a light in the air that belonged to neither night nor day, sensitive with a tremor which was felt, but could not be seen or described, and which spoke of hopes forever crushed out, and of lives of fair promise blighted by the act that lay in one fatal moment's neglect or helplessness. "If I don't go to bed," murmured Jim, with a start, whereat all these figures vanished into nothingness, "I shall fall asleep." And still he sat, and murmured, "Poor Dick!"

It was really but the work of a moment. Jim Podmore being on duty, suddenly felt a shock—then heard a crash, followed by screams and shouts, and what seemed to be the muffled sound of a myriad voices. He knew that an accident had occurred, and he ran forward, and saw carriages overturned on the line, and huge splinters of wood lying about. "Who did it?" he cried. "Dick Hart!" a voice replied; and then he heard Dick's voice crying, "O my God!" The busy hands were at work clearing the wreck, and the few passengers—happily there were but few—were assisted out. Most of them had escaped with a bruise or a scratch, but one man, they said, looked in a bad state, and at his own entreaty they allowed him to lie still on the platform until doctors, who had been promptly sent for, had arrived; and one little child was taken into a room, and lay like dead. Jim Podmore was in the room, and he saw Dick Hart brought in between two men. Dick, when his eyes lighted on the piteous sight of the little girl lying like that, trembled as if ague had seized him, and began to sob and cry. "I did it! I did it!" he gasped. "Why don't some one strike me down dead!" As he uttered these words, and as he stood there, with a face whiter than the face of the child who lay before him, a woman rushed in and cried, in a wild tone, "Where's the man that killed my child?" Upon this, with a cry wilder than that to which the poor woman had given vent, Dick Hart wrested himself free from the men, whose hands (in their grief at what had occurred) were only lightly laid upon him, and rushed out of the room like a madman. The men followed him, but he was too quick for them, and before they could lay hands on him again, he had jumped from the platform on to the line, dashing aside the persons who tried to stop him. His mad idea was to run forward on the line until he saw a train coming, and then to throw himself before it and be crushed to pieces. But he was saved from the execution of this piteous design; the men reached him and seized him, and carried him back by main force. When he was in the room again, his passion being spent, he fell upon his knees, and looked round with a scared white face, waiting for what was to come. "Poor Dick!" murmured Jim Podmore. And then the men whispered to each other how that Dick Hart had been worked off his legs lately; how the accident was nothing more than was to be expected; and how Dick's wife was near her confinement with her second. "Poor Dick!" murmured Jim Podmore again, for the thought of Dick Hart's one little girl at home, and the other child that was soon expected, brought Pollypod to his mind.

It was quite true: Dick Hart's wife was very near her confinement, and on this very night, unconscious of the dreadful event that had taken place, she was busy getting together the little things she had made for her first-born, and recalling the feelings she had experienced before she became a mother—feelings in which joy and fear were so commingled as to be inseparable. The time was night, in the wane of summer, and many a smile came upon the woman's lips, and many a tender thought dwelt in her mind, as she laid out the little garments and examined them to see where they wanted a stitch. Mrs. Hart had been married five years; and while she was employed in the manner just described her first child, four years of age, was sitting in a low chair, playing with a doll, which not only had softening of the brain, but softening of every portion of its anatomy—for it was a rag doll.

But the doll, treasure as it was, notwithstanding its flat face (for rags do not admit of the formation of features of particular shape and beauty), was not the only object of the child's attention. She had that day been invested with a pair of new red socks, and Little Vanity was now holding out her little leg as straight as she could, and calling her mother's attention for the hundredth time to her flaming red treasures. Mrs. Hart knelt before the child, and admired the socks with the most outrageously exaggerated turns of speech, and pulled them up tight, to her child's infinite delight and contentment. Then the mother began to prattle upon the subject nearest to her heart, and began to speak, also for the hundredth time, about the little brother—for Mrs. Hart had settled that "her second," as Jim Podmore had expressed it, was to be a boy—whom Rosy presently would have to play with.

"And you'll love him very much, Rosy, won't you?" asked the mother.

"Yes, very, very much."

Indeed, Rosy used a great many more "verys" than two, and quite ingenuously, be it stated. But Rosy had a strong desire to be enlightened upon a certain point, and she seized the present favorable opportunity. She had heard a great deal about this little brother whom she was to love and play with, but she was puzzled to know where the little stranger was to come from. Now was the time to obtain the information.

"Mother," asked the inquisitive little girl, "when will Bunny come?"

"Bunny," it must be explained, was the fanciful title by which Rosy had already christened the expected stranger.

"Next week, Rosy," answered the happy mother; "almost sure next week. Ain't you glad?"

"Yes, I'm very, very glad." (Again a redundancy of "verys" which must be left to the imagination.) "But, mother, who'll bring Bunny here?"

"Who'll bring him, Rosy? Why, the doctor, to be sure."

Rosy nodded her head wisely, and employed a full minute in the silent enjoyment of her new red socks. Mrs. Hart was silent also, worshiping her little girl. If children only knew how their mothers worship them! Down went Rosy's leg again.

"Where will the doctor bring Bunny from, mother?"

"From the parsley bed," replied the mother, laughing.

"Is Bunny there now, mother?"

"Yes, dear."

"Did I come out of a parsley bed, mother?"

"Yes, my dear;" and Mrs. Hart smothered Rosy's face and neck with kisses. She was so occupied with her happiness that she did not hear the door open, and did not know that any one was in the room until she heard a voice calling her name. The voice belonged to a neighbor, Mrs. Thomson, and Mrs. Hart rose to her feet, and was beginning to tell merrily of the conversation which she had just had with Rosy, when something in Mrs. Thomson's face stopped her tongue.

"What's the matter, Mrs. Thomson? What is it? Tell me, quick!"

"Now, bear up, Mrs. Hart," said the neighbor; "remember how near your time is, and bear up, there's a good soul!"

"What's the matter?" cried Mrs. Hart, thoroughly frightened. "Tell me quick, for God's sake! Is it any thing about Dick? Has he had an accident? Is he hurt? Oh, why don't you speak!"

"Dick's not hurt, that's one comfort."

"Thank God! But on and off all this week I've been frightened about him. It's a shame and a sin to work a man as he's been worked. Who's outside?"

She flew to the door, and pulled into the room a man employed by the same company as her husband.

"There's something the matter," she gasped, and caught Rosy up and pressed the child close to her breast. The man judged wisely that it would be best to come to the point at once.

"Dick sent me to you, Mrs. Hart," he said; "he's had an accident, and one or two people have been hurt. He's all right himself, and he sent me to tell you so."

"Why didn't he come himself?" asked the wife, trembling and crying.

"Well, you see—" began the man; but Mrs. Hart did not allow him to proceed.

"They've put him in prison," she said, with quick, short breath; "my Dick, the best husband and the best father in the world! And they're going to punish him for what's not his fault! Do you know how many hours' sleep he's had this week?"

"Don't excite yourself, there's a good soul!" remonstrated Mrs. Thomson. "He'll come out of it all right. Think of your baby."

"He's not in prison, Mrs. Hart," said the man; "but he's going to remain at the station until after the inquiry."

"Mrs. Thomson, will you take care of Rosy till I come back?"

"Why, surely, my dear, you're not going out in your condition?"

"I'm going to my husband," said Mrs. Hart, "and I'm going to see them managers and directors, and ask them what they're going to do to Dick."

With that the distracted woman, putting on her hat and shawl, left Rosy in her neighbor's charge, and hurried down stairs, followed by the man, who said it was best to let her have her way, and that it was what he would like his wife to do if any thing happened to him.

Jim Podmore was with her during all this time, and witnessed the interview between husband and wife.

"I can't tell how it occurred," said Dick Hart, who, although dreadfully distressed, was now more calm, and inexpressibly comforted by the presence of his wife. "Every thing seemed to take place in a flash of light like. I suppose it was because I was tired out with too much work. I don't care for myself. I'm thinking of the future, and of what's going to become of you and Rosy—and—and the baby."

Dick broke down a dozen times during the interview, and sobbed and cried like a child.

"It 'll always be on my mind. I'm glad I didn't kill myself, for your sake. Perhaps it 'd ha' been better for you if I'd been killed, though. I don't know; I don't know what to think. You'd better take what money I've got about me. It ain't much; but I dare say they'll pay you for my work up to to-night."

Dick was fairly bewildered in this serious crisis, and completely helpless. If he had had money, he might have sent for a lawyer; but between eleven and twelve shillings was all his wealth.

An inquiry and inquest were held, at both of which Jim Podmore was present. Indeed, he was never absent from Dick Hart and his wife during all this time, although he took no active part in the history of their lives. And this is what he saw:

Dick Hart on his trial for manslaughter, with an array of lawyers against him sufficient to frighten a poor man out of his senses. The lawyers for the prosecution were against him, and strove, by all the ingenuity of long study and sharp experience, to prove him the guiltiest man that ever stood in a felon's dock. The lawyers of the Company were against him, and their aim was to prove the perfect innocence of the powerful directors they represented, and therefore the utter and inexcusable guilt of Dick Hart. Strong odds these against a poor man with an empty purse. A strange road to justice was this on which Dick Hart found himself, unarmed and with bare breast—and with something of a guilty conscience also, for he really did not know how far he was to blame—opposed to the keen intellects of those who were grandly paid to find him guilty. He quivered with helpless rage, he was racked with despair, as he listened to the manner in which the case was stated by his enemies: they were nothing less—they were there to destroy him. But there was a grain of salt for him in the midst of all this great trouble. A young lawyer, not overburdened with briefs, undertook his defense for the love of the thing, and pleaded so ably that he very nearly succeeded in proving Dick Hart innocent—as undoubtedly he was. Unfortunately, he could not prove that Dick Hart was not immediately responsible for the accident; but he did prove that the man, by excessive overwork, was so prostrate from fatigue that it would have been almost next to a miracle had an accident not occurred. "Perhaps," said this daring champion, to the admiration of Jim Podmore, who nodded his head in confirmation and approbation at every thrust the lawyer made—"perhaps you will say that the prisoner was wrong in allowing himself to be so overtasked; but he has a wife and child dependent upon him for support, and his wife is now at home, expecting every hour to saddle him with another responsibility. The prisoner is a hard-working man, and a poor man, and had he refused to perform the duties required of him, never mind at what sacrifice to himself, never mind at what peril to the public—as has been too often unhappily proved in other cases—he would have stood a fair chance of being dismissed from the service of the Company. If this case serves in any way to direct public attention to the manner in which too many servants of the railway companies are overworked, it will be fortunate that it is tried; but the prisoner must not be made the victim of a bad and abominable system. Not many days ago the coroner of Middlesex, at an inquest held upon the body of an engine-fitter who was crushed to death between two engines, stated that no fewer than thirty railway servants are killed in his district every year; and he very pertinently wished to know whether such wholesale slaughter was altogether necessary. This is not the question for you to answer now, but it may lead you to a merciful view of the prisoner's case; for the perils of the service are sufficiently great in themselves, and should not be made greater by unfairly tasking the powers of the men. There are in the full week of seven days one hundred and sixty-eight hours; and there are hundreds and thousands of railway servants who can show a time-bill of one hundred and twelve hours. Add to these hours the time employed in going to and coming from work, and you will have some idea of the manner in which these men are overworked. I read lately, in a leading article upon this subject in a paper whose facts may be relied upon, that some men have worked thirty, some forty hours right off, without any sleep but that which nature has exacted at the post of duty at the peril of those intrusted to their charge. It is the public who suffer, and when an accident occurs in consequence of a man being unfairly worked, he—being a man, and not a machine—can not in justice be held responsible. At a meeting lately held in Brighton one railway servant stated that he sometimes worked thirty-seven hours at a stretch." The lawyer cited many such facts as these, and even had the hardihood to assert that a director or a manager should be standing in the dock in Dick Hart's place. However, it seemed to be understood that it was impossible to let Dick Hart off scot-free, and being found guilty, and strongly recommended to mercy, he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment: a sentence which was virtually a parody upon justice; for if Dick Hart were guilty, he should have been hanged; and if he were innocent, he should have been compensated for the torture he had been made to suffer. An hour after the trial Jim Podmore was telling Dick Hart that his wife was confined.

"THE HOUSE WAS ON FIRE!"

It was a mystery to Jim how Dick's wife and children managed to live during that time, but manage they did somehow. Neighbors were kind to them—as kind as their own narrow means would allow; Rosy had many a good meal in one house and another; when Mrs. Hart grew strong she went out charring; sometimes when she could not get work she begged—and dodged the policeman. It is amazing to what shifts some honest unfortunate folk are compelled to resort in the necessity that nature lays upon them to eat or die: which last is not an easy thing to do. Dick came out of prison and tried to get work, and failed. He was compelled also to resort to such dishonest shifts as adopting a name that did not belong to him, as denying this and that unworthy thing, as putting a cheerful face upon an empty stomach. He obtained work on another line of railway, and was turned away at the end of the fourth day, having been found out—a crime which is invariably severely punished, and which the world never forgives. Dick Hart really found existence a very difficult thing; and yet he had muscles, and was willing to exercise them.

The struggle was too hard for him, and he fell sick, and could not go out of his room for weeks. His wife nursed him and worked for him, after a fashion. When she could not get charring to do she went a-begging. Rosy was sent to a school where the children occasionally enjoyed the blessing of penny dinners. On those occasions Rosy was always duly armed with a penny by her mother. One day a policeman arrested Mrs. Hart for begging, and she was brought before the magistrate. Money was found upon her—one shilling and sevenpence—and eight boxes of fusees. The policeman in his evidence fairly stated that he had made inquiry at the address Mrs. Hart gave, and found that she lived in a respectable house, that Dick Hart was sick and unable to move out of his room, that he had never been known to be drunk, and that neighbors sincerely pitied him and spoke well of him; also that the mistress of the school to which Rosy went gave the child and her mother an excellent character. Asked what she had to say for herself, Mrs. Hart told the truth: she went out to get bread for her husband and children; she asserted that she was compelled to beg. The magistrate said she should have gone to the parish. Then she told a piteous story. She had gone to the parish, and the relieving-officer (a mock title, surely!) refused to give her any out-door relief, but said she and her family might go into the work-house if she chose. She declined to do this, as in that case her husband would not be able to get work, and she did not wish to be a burden to the parish. She begged for a loaf of dry bread for her children, and, "dressed in his little brief authority," the relieving-officer refused. "We have not broken our fast," she pleaded, and asked what they were to do. "The best you can," was the merciful reply. She did the best she could: she went into the streets, hungry, and begged, and hurried home with the first penny she received, and sent Rosy to school armed for dinner. Then she continued her begging—with her next proceeds bought a dozen boxes of fusees—and when she was in a flourishing condition, with one shilling and sevenpence in her pocket, was arrested for her monstrous crime.

It is pleasant to record that the poor woman was acquitted, and that the magistrate spoke in proper terms of the conduct of the relieving-officer. It gave Jim Podmore pleasure; but this feeling soon gave place to pain as he witnessed the downward course of Dick Hart and his family, and the misery they endured. He was with them in their poorly furnished home, and was gazing sadly at their white, pinched faces, when suddenly Rosy's face changed to that of Pollypod, his own darling; in the place of Mrs. Hart he saw his own wife; and he himself stood where Dick Hart had stood a moment before. These figures, himself and his wife and child, vanished as suddenly and as strangely as they had appeared, and he found himself on the platform on which his duties were performed. A bewildering sound was in his ears. A thousand engines were screaming furiously, a thousand voices were shouting despairingly, a thousand terrible fears were making themselves heard. The air was filled with clamor and confusion, and starting forward with a wildly beating heart, he awoke.

He had been dreaming. But there was cause for these his later fancies. The faithful dog Snap was tearing at the door, through the crevices of which Jim saw smoke stealing. He looked toward the bed: Polly and her mother were fast asleep. He ran to the door and opened it, and a blaze of flame rushed on to him and almost blinded him. The house was on fire!

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

MARIE ANTOINETTE COSTUME.

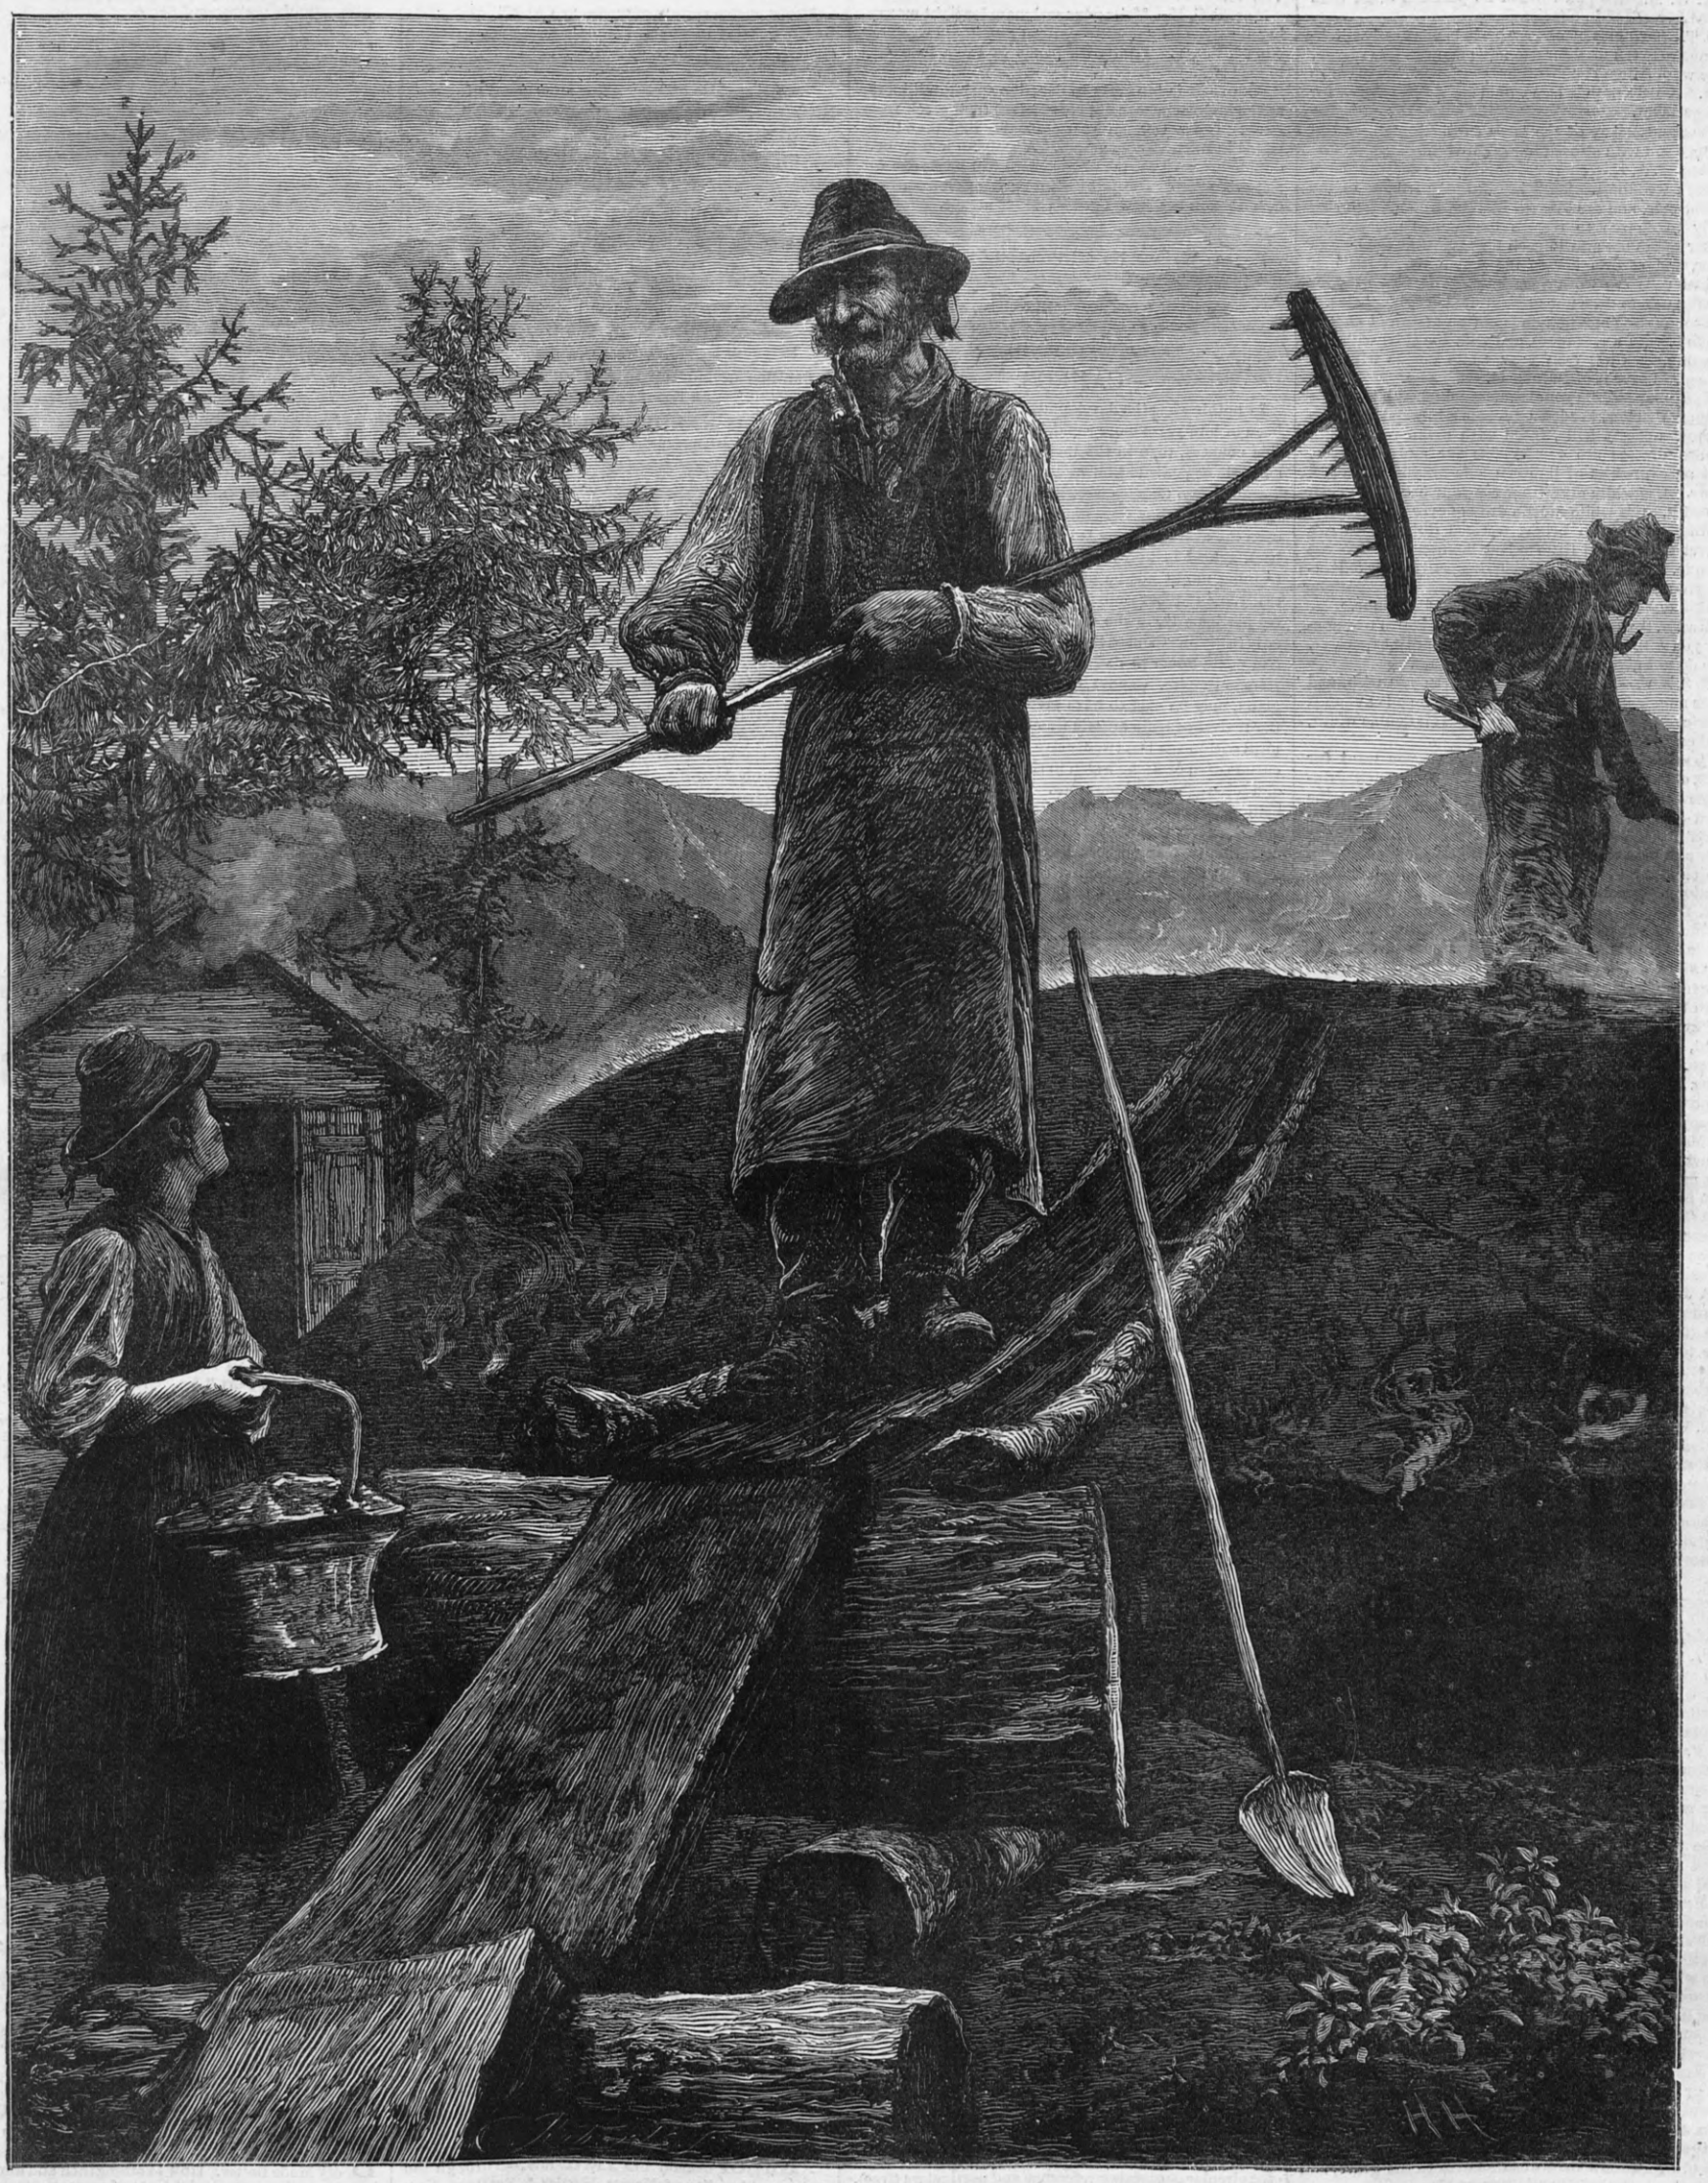
THIS costume is of Norwegian gray faille, trimmed with darker bands of the fabric and yak lace of the shade of the dress. A deep Spanish flounce, headed by two rows of Gothic points, trims the skirt. The Marie Antoinette polonaise has a rounded vest of white faille, imitating the antique chatelaine corsage. The skirt of the polonaise is very little draped, and hangs in square scarf-like tabs edged with lace. A sash makes the back sufficiently bouffant. Half-Dolman sleeves with a bow at the elbow. Marie Antoinette collar of lace. Lace frill in the neck and around the under-sleeves. Bonnet of Norwegian gray royale with blue plumes.

MARIE ANTOINETTE COSTUME.

Digitized by Google

CHARCOAL BURNERS IN THE ALPS.

TOURISTS and others who have crossed the passes between Switzerland and Italy will recognize the scene here depicted. After building up their pile of wood in the shape seen in the drawing, these men have to watch it for three weeks, and during that time add fresh fuel day and night. The aliment of the fire is fall in, the stick would catch on either side, and enable him to extricate himself. Food is brought him by one of his family, as he sleeps in a little hut purposely erected. It is interesting to see the opening of one of these piles. About a dozen people, chiefly women, do the work. Water is thrown over the wood to quench it, and then the coal is spread on the ground to dry. The illustration depicts the old man standing on the wooden bridge which surmounts the burning pile.



CHARCOAL BURNERS IN THE ALPS.

thrown down the centre of the heap, and many a poor fellow has fallen in and been burned to ashes before any body missed him, as charcoal-burning is generally carried on at some distance from the villages. As one can not see into the pile, it needs a great deal of experience to know when the wood has been burned long enough. The old man whose portrait is here given has been burning charcoal for more than forty years. He never goes to the top without a rake or long stick, holding it crosswise, so that, if he should

STAYS.

THE ridiculous lunatic who first brought in stays (some suppose her to have been Mademoiselle Pantine, a mistress of Marshal Saxe, others say an early Norman lady) is to blame for the first and greatest defect of modern gowns—the grotesque outline of the body.

We are not denying the necessity for some close-fitting garment as a support to the body and an improvement to the figure; but we must emphatically protest against a machine that, pretending to be a servant, is, in fact, a tyrant—that, aspiring to embrace, hugs like a bear—crushing in the ribs, and injuring the lungs and heart, the stomach, and, indeed, all internal organs. For what end? The end of looking like a wasp, and getting rid of the whole charm of graceful movement and easy carriage, the end of communicating an over-allish sensation of deformity to the spectator.

Why is a tightly laced figure a deformity?

A small waist is a beauty, because, when it is natural, it goes together with the peculiar litheness and activity of a slenderly built figure; but when it is artificially formed, unheard-of horrors are inseparable from it. The shoulders are palpably too broad for such a waist to support, the hips spread too suddenly from the ugly straight line (at an acute angle) between them and the armpit. And the face betrays the condition of the inside! Who can forgive the unhealthy cheek and red nose induced by such a cause? Who can forget the disease that has come or is coming? What sensible man or woman can pity the fool who faints, perhaps in the midst of a dance or conversation, from the unbearable pressure on the heart caused by her stays and girdle—or, if they pity, do not also blush for her?

The Roman dame made use of bands that afforded support without impairing the supple beauty of the body. If our women would employ such means, the bodice would express, rather than deform, the figure, and there would not be the triangular hollow between the waist and elbow which now gives so much hardness to the outline.

Tight lacing is far less general now than it was some years ago; let us hope that soon there may be no tight lacing at all, and that the cruel corset may at last disappear forever. Whatever may be said of the fashions of to-day, no one can deny that with their natural corsages, thick shoes, short dresses, and comfortable bonnets,

Hosted by Google

they are far more sensible and healthful than the much-vaunted modes of our grandmothers. Those who lace tight to-day can not throw the responsibility on the fashion, for that authorizes them to do precisely as they please.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

READER AND LOVER.—Slash your sacque in the back and side seams. Edge with fur.

K. W. M.—We can furnish no patterns other than those advertised in our list.

J. T.—Two bias black gros grain bands neatly stitched on are much used for trimming mantles this season. The wool fringe you mention is quite as expensive as silk. A narrow yak lace would be a pretty edge for the garment.

INQUIRER.—Any of the large furnishing stores can supply you with sleeved buckskin vests.

MISS W. A. K.—There are usually four ushers at large church weddings. They are intimate friends of the bridal pair, and are dressed like the groom. They go early to church to receive the invited guests. An usher offers his arm to each lady guest at the church door, and escorts her to the seat reserved for her. Bridal veils are worn very long. The fact of your having ushers does not prevent having bride-maids.

ECONOMY.—Your sample is cotton and wool poplin. Make it with a redingote, and trim the skirt with kilt pleating. Do not trim your white sacque with velveteen. Leave it plain instead.

ELEANORE.—Trim your cashmere skirt with two wide gathered ruffles, headed by a bias silk band and two narrow upright frills, faced with cashmere. Sailor blouse dresses are comfortable for morning wear. Get an over-skirt of lighter shade for your drab silk dress. Use white altogether for your baby if you can afford it. Use white muslin dresses over warm underclothes, worn with bright watered ribbon sashes, a velvet sacque, and little velvet bonnet to match the sacque. The ruches and sash over-skirt will modernize your black silk.

HOMER.—Do not alter your black cloth basque.

MRS. F. S. C.—The house-furnishing stores will supply you with raisin-seeders, etc. They are inexpensive. We do not give addresses in this column.

E. S. M'C.—We have not the pattern you wish, and your money has been returned. Sicilienne is a repped fabric of mixed silk and cashmere. It is double width, and costs from $5 to $10 a yard.

CARLOTTA.—The cut paper patterns you want for girls of seven and eleven years are, first, the Girls' Princesse Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 25, Vol. IV.; the Vest-basque Suit, in Bazar No. 21, Vol. V.; and the Girls' Polonaise Suit, in Bazar No. 44, Vol. V. When you purchase these patterns send also for the Bazar in which each is illustrated, and you will have ample directions for making.

A YOUNG MOTHER.—Your sample is very sleazy épingeline. As it will not wear well, you should have it made as simply and inexpensively as possible.

ANNE D.—The most stylish trimming for a velvet sleeveless basque is merely two thick cords covered with black silk put around the edge of the garment.

PET MACHONG.—Get an Irish poplin suit, for $1 50 a yard, of sage green, for your wedding and traveling dress. Cretonne is a good fabric for between seasons. A suit of plum or gray cretonne will be very appropriate. Get violet or pearl gray merino for a wrapper. Get a black cashmere Dolman for a wrap in March. Buy the cashmere and make the garment yourself. If you make your dresses yourself you can get many nice additions to your wardrobe for the sum you mention.

A GREENHORN.—Wear your dresses just long enough to escape the ground. Braid your long hair, and mass it on the top of your head. Wear a sort of frizzed fringe of hair above the forehead.

A SUBSCRIBER.—A breastpin and cuff-buttons of Etruscan gold, or else of coral, is the best way to spend $50 for jewelry. Get a brooch with a sort of loop at the top, so that you can sometimes wear it as a pendant from a chain or velvet ribbon.

PERPLEXED.—Make your drab Irish poplin by the Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., or the Dolman Vest-polonaise Street Suit, illustrated in this number.

EMMA.—Make your blue brocaded stuff up as a polonaise, and wear it over a flounced skirt of the same, or of plain blue material.

MOLLINE.—We have not the patterns you mention. A full list of our cut paper patterns is given in our advertising columns. Your former letter did not reach us.

N.—A cluster of finger puffs on top of your head, with a smooth tress of your hair placed around the puffs, is a style easily arranged with your long natural hair.

LADY OF THE LAKE.—Turning down the corners of cards has nothing to do with accepting or declining an invitation. You should write a regular note of acceptance or of regret when the invitations have R. S. V. P. upon them.

QUI VIVE.—Black alpaca is much used for every-day at-home and street dresses, but is scarcely heavy enough for winter, and cashmere, merino, or empress cloth is used instead. Alpaca, however, is far more serviceable than the twilled and repped fabrics that catch dust so easily. Make your alpaca with a redingote and a single skirt, trimmed with deep kilt pleating.

MINERVA.—Your sample is silk and linen moiré. To remodel the dress have a sleeveless basque of brown velvet (linen-backed velvet), with moiré sleeves and velvet-pointed cuffs. Catch the trained back widths up with a velvet sash, and put bands or else a flounce of velvet around the skirt. Moirés are gradually coming in vogue again. At present they are more used as trimmings of faille and velvet dresses than as entire dresses.

JANE.—Get a cashmere polonaise with silk skirt for your wedding and traveling dress. Make it by the Double-breasted Redingote pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V.—It is not the bride's place to send carriages for invited guests.—The gentlemen of the family always follow their dead relative to the grave, and in most cases the lady relatives go also.

J. G.—We do not give addresses in this column.

ELLEN STANTON.—We do not believe trained dresses will ever be worn on the street again, and think the demi-trains are fast losing favor. Make your gray silk with a simple jockey basque and apron-front overskirt.

ESTELLE.—The trained over-skirt with apron front is more fashionable than court trains. You can easily add a short apron to your blue silk court train; then round off the sides, and add a flounce of another shade of blue. The apron may also be of the shade of the flounce.

WIFE.—We can supply you with a cut paper pattern for your husband's dressing-gown.

MRS. J. L. C.—White Swiss muslin and China crape neck-ties are very much in vogue. Young girls of fifteen wear the quaint grave shades now worn by ladies. Bright cherry, blue, and grass green dresses look old-fashioned even on very small girls.

CONSTANT READER.—Hem-stitched and lace-edged collars are considered more stylish than embroidered ones. Pleated lace and muslin standing ruffles are again as profusely worn as during the summer months.

JANE EYRE.—The first hints about spring goods are to be found in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 6, Vol. VI.

MRS. T. G. M.—Make your cashmere for light mourning by the Louis Quinze pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. Trim with bands of thick lustreless repped silk.

MAUD.—It is too early to describe spring millinery, as the importers have not yet received their stock from Paris. Get a Dolman vest-polonaise like that illustrated in the present number. A Dolman mantle or a double-breasted sacque of cashmere will be stylish for a spring wrap. The fabrics for spring polonaises are described in the New York Fashions article.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, has just introduced a Concerto Parlor Organ, which is attracting much attention. It has a new concerto stop, produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, and the effect is charming.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

CAMEOS.

IN nothing has the development of a cultivated taste been of late years more rapid, both in England and in this country, than in the matter of those refined and æsthetic ornaments known as Cameos. A quarter of a century ago Cameos were indeed worn as ornaments by ladies, but they were Cameos at the sight of which even the average young lady of the period would start back aghast in horror, even though her own artistic training might not be of the highest. At that time really fine Cameos were only to be found, in this country particularly, in the cabinets of collectors; for the only really fine Cameos then extant were antiques which had come down to us from the better epochs of the Roman Empire. Canova, in Italy, and Flaxman, in England, may be said to have given the first impulse to the revival of truly artistic Cameo-cutting; nor was it until within the last twenty-five years that the Cameo-cutters even of Rome began to rival the grace, freedom, and force of the antique work. To this branch of their calling, MESSRS. STARR & MARCUS, of 22 John St. (up stairs), as it is well known, have devoted more time and attention than any other American house. They have their reward in a collection of works which may be said to constitute of themselves a small museum and academy of the art.—[Com.]

FACTS WORTH KNOWING.—The New Wilson Under-Feed Shuttle Sewing-Machine is to-day the simplest, most perfect, most easy operated, best made, most durable, and in every way most valuable sewing-machine in existence, and it is sold fifteen dollars less than all other first-class machines, on easy terms. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Bet. 4TH and GREAT JONES STS., over Dry-Goods Store.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods send C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

YOUNG LADIES' EDUCATIONAL HOME will admit four new scholars Feb. 10, 1873. Preferences given to first applicants. Mr. & Mrs. D. S. TROWBRIDGE, Greenwich, Conn.

NEW LACES JUST RECEIVED.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,
Have opened an elegant assortment of
REAL VALENCIENNES, MECHLIN, AND BLACK-THREAD TRIMMING LACES.
POINT, POINT APPLIQUE, and BLACK-THREAD BARBES, BLACK-THREAD LACE FICHU CAPES, POINT LACE COLLARETTES, CAPES, &c.
Also, a choice variety of made-up VALENCIENNES LACE GOODS in Capes, Fichus, Collarettes, Collars, Sleeves, Handkerchiefs, Jabots, &c., &c.

We are also offering a fine assortment of
NEW SPRING CAMBRICS, CALICOES,
STRIPED AND FIGURED PERCALES,
STRIPED & EMBROIDERED PIQUES,
PRINTED LINEN LAWNS, &c., &c.

EMBROIDERIES.

1000 dozen FRENCH NEEDLEWORK BANDS,
AT HALF THEIR ORIGINAL COST.
A large Job Lot of
HAMBURG EDGINGS and INSERTINGS, and DOUBLE LINEN CHEMISE BANDS, MUCH BELOW REGULAR PRICES.
A fine line of NIGHT DRESS SETS, YOKES, &c., on Percale and Linen.
SCOTCH NEEDLEWORK SKIRTING,
AN ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE.
Also, all the latest styles of
SWISS AND LAWN RUFFLINGS, PLAITINGS, FLUTINGS, &c., &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

ARE OFFERING

The richer quality of Colored POULT DE SOIE ANTIQUE SILKS, } $3 75 per yard, formerly $5 50.
Rich Colored GROS GRAIN AND FAILLE SILKS, } $3 00 per yard, formerly $4 00.
Colored GROS GRAIN, of heavy weight, very bright, } $2 00 per yard, formerly $3 00.
Colored TAFFETAS AND BRILLIANTES for Young Ladies, } $1 75 per yard, formerly $2 50.
Exquisite Shades of DRESS SATINS, All Boiled Silk, ¾ wide, } $3 00 per yard, formerly $6 00.

300 Pieces of the Celebrated
A. T. STEWART & CO.'S FAMILY BLACK SILKS,
At Lower Prices than ever before quoted.

THREE CASES
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,
The very choicest and most elegant received during five years past, at greatly reduced prices.

They request special attention to their large
DRESS-MAKING DEPARTMENT,
Under superior management, in which orders for Mourning, as well as every other description of Fashionable Costumes, are executed with promptness and in styles equal, if not superior to any foreign production. Charges moderate.

Mail Orders for Samples and Prices promptly filled.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "B"

FOR $200.

6 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 25	$13 50
6 Linen "	@	4 75	28 50
1 Bridal Set (3 pieces)			12 00
6 Pairs Muslin Drawers	@	2 00	12 00
6 " Linen "	@	2 75	16 50
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 25	6 75
3 Tucked " "	@	3 00	9 00
3 Plain Muslin Night Dresses	@	4 50	13 50
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	5 00	15 00
3 Embr'd " " "	@	9 00	27 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	5 00	10 00
2 Corset Covers	@	3 75	7 50
1 " "			6 75
2 Dressing Sacques	@	3 50	7 00
1 Delaine Robe de Chambre			15 00
			$200 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "A," for $150, and "C," for $250, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN
FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,
NEW YORK, { Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

THE NEW BOOKS
OF
THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.
RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.
Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

2.
THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.
This work embraces in one volume:
ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.
ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.
CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

3.
HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

4.
GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

5.
NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

6.
TALMAGE'S SERMONS. Sermons by the Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $4 00.

7.
SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.
FORCE. Being Vol. IV. of Science for the Young, by JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
HEAT. — LIGHT. — WATER AND LAND. — FORCE. 4 vols. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each.

8.
BOOKS FOR GIRLS. Written or Edited by the Author of "John Halifax." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each.
LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY.—THE COUSIN FROM INDIA.—TWENTY YEARS AGO.—IS IT TRUE?—AN ONLY SISTER.

The New Novels
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

I.
THE WANDERING HEIR. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

II.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

III.
DR. WAINWRIGHT'S PATIENT. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Wrecked in Port," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IV.
A WOMAN'S VENGEANCE. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Cecil's Tryst," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

V.
FOR THE KING. An Historical Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "For Lack of Gold," "Robin Gray," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.
A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

REAL LACES

Embroideries, Cloak Velvets, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C.O.D. package subject to examination before acceptance. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from
EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

BAD MEMORY Made Good and Good Memory Made Better. How to strengthen and improve; how to achieve wonderful feats of memory, such as to repeat any number of words with or without connection after one reading, or a hundred random figures, &c. Only 15 cts., of booksellers or by mail.
JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

Before buying send for our descriptive
SEED AND PLANT CATALOGUE.
AZELL BOWDITCH, 645 Warren St., Boston, Mass.

COPY of a large literary Hebdomadal and the Chromo for 25 cents. MAUCK'S HERALD, Cheshire, O.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)..... " 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)..... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt..... " 49
WATTEAU MANTLE, with 3-Pleat Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt.. " 50

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron Over-skirt with Watteau Postilion, and Walking Skirt..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HOW 'TIS DONE OR THE SECRET OUT

An Illustrated Book of 64 pages, that every one should have. Sent free post paid, by BOND, MARTIN & CO. Springfield, Mass.

RAPID RECKONING, system of the famous "Lightning Calculator," whose exhibitions seemed almost miraculous. Any one can learn; useful to all book-keepers, accountants, &c. 25 cts.
JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Will have ready in a few days:

HAZARD'S SANTO DOMINGO.

Santo Domingo, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

The following short summary of contents will give some idea of the nature and importance of this work:

CONTENTS.—St. Domingo—The Conquest—The Early Spaniards—The Decline of St. Domingo—The Buccaneers and Early French—The Joint Occupation of the French and Spaniards—The Revolutions of French St. Domingo—Toussaint's Rule—The Independence of Hayti—Toussaint's Capture—Rebellion—Dessalines's Discomfiture—His Cruelties—The whole Island united under One Empire—Civil War—Co-operation of the English—The Republic of Dominica—Land Ho!—Arrival in the Tropics—The Dominican Coast—A Night Visit—Samana and the South Coast—Voyage round—Present condition of the City—Trade and Prospects—Schools—San Carlos—The Harbor as a Port—Well of Columbus—Mahogany Trade—Vicinity of St. Domingo City—Natural Caves—Salt Mines—Sugar Plantations—History of the Dominican Republic—Journey Overland—Crossing the Ozama Tropical Forests—Lunching "al fresco"—First Night's Experiences—La Tosa—Natural Farm—Grand Scenery—Cotuy—The Yuna River—Swimming a River—The only Steam-Engine—A Paradise—Pretty Girls—From Mocha to Santiago—Description of Santiago and the Gold Regions—From Santiago to Monte Cristo—Fording the Yaqui—A Dangerous Insect—Tobacco Culture—A Long Ride—The Agave Species—Monte Cristo—Crocodiles and Iguanas—The North Coast from Monte Cristo to Puerto Plata—Lack of Water—Tobacco Preparation—Country Hospitality—Used-up Horses—Domestic Economy—A Long Ride—Journey to Hayti—"Cosa Dominica"—Dauphin Bay—Tropic Night at Sea—A Cuban Horror—Cape Haytian—The Paris of the West Indies—Ruins of French Civilization—Beautiful Views—Trip to Millot—Arrival at Sans Souci—Strange Treatment—Horrible Cruelties—Hayti from the Departure of Boyer, in 1843, to the Advent of Sagil, in 1870—Coasting the Island—Passengers and Tropical Mode of Travel—Lack of Hotels—Old French Places—Visit to the Interior—Sugar Plantations—A Storm in lieu of Dinner—A Long Ride in Bad Weather, &c.

A very useful and pleasantly written book. * * * A deep interest attaches to the island of St. Domingo—the classic ground of the discoveries of Columbus—the most lovely spot on the earth's surface, so trebly blest by nature, but so cruelly cursed by man. * * * Mr. Hazard is a most agreeable companion.—Athenæum, London.

Genuinely interesting. * * * His descriptions of that island at the present day are instinct with all the vitality of intelligent observation and buoyance of spirit. * * * The book is from first to last thoroughly fresh and enjoyable.—Daily Telegraph, London.

This gentleman has a facile pen, also a skillful pencil. Few works of travel have had as many or as good representations of the features of the country, and his skill is equally great in little things as in large. * * * We heartily recommend Mr. Hazard's volume.—Standard, London.

There can be no doubt of the great value of Mr. Hazard's work, or of the truthfulness of his bright and vivacious sketches of the people and scenery of St. Domingo. The illustrations are also abundant and excellent.—Nonconformist, London.

LIBERAL TERMS TO AGENTS.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING" "DOMESTIC"

Presents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.

Agents wanted everywhere.

Address
"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

$100,000 for only $10!

TEN THOUSAND CASH GIFTS aggregating $500,000 will be distributed by lot to patrons of the Third Grand Gift Concert in aid of the Public Library of Ky., at Louisville, Ky., Tuesday, April 8, 1873. Gifts range from $10 to $100,000, all cash. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. The first Concert, Dec. 16, 1871, and second, Dec. 7, 1872, went off with great success and received universal approval for the scrupulous integrity with which they were conducted and promptness with which gifts were paid. For tickets and full information, address Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESSES.

THE BEST YET INVENTED

For Amateur & Business Purposes,

And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers. OVER 8000 IN USE.

Benj. O. Woods, Manufacturer,

And Dealer in Every Description of PRINTING Material, 349–351 Federal & 152 Kneeland St's, Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Phila.; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

TO the WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with, sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt Street, New York.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS ARE PURE AND THEIR PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

Persons of either sex, who have the tact and energy requisite to make successful Book Agents, can secure an opportunity for lucrative employment by applying in person or by letter as below. The subscriber is selling through his agents some of the most desirable publications ever offered to the public. Such persons as mean business are requested to address

AVERY BILL,
Care Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

WOOD CARPETING,

942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

TAXIDERMIST'S Manual, a complete practical guide to collecting, preparing, preserving and mounting animals, birds, reptiles, insects, &c. New and revised American edition, with many fine engravings, only 50 cts., of booksellers or by mail.
JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the new and old one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"IT STILL WAVES!" The old, original, and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," THE FAMILY PAPER of America. It is a paper for THE MILLION. Old and young, rich and poor, saint or sinner, will find it JUST the paper for them. It is a large, illustrated, 40 column paper; 8 pages, Leader size, and filled to overflowing with charming Stories, Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor and Fun. It makes a specialty of "showing up" and exposing Rogues, Rascals, Swindlers, Quacks and Humbugs. IT EXPOSES RASCALITY, and saves money to its readers. Every subscriber, for only $1.00, will receive the BANNER a whole year; and also, FREE GRATIS, and prepaid, a superb PIANO CHROMO, a "BOUQUET OF AUTUMN LEAVES." Satisfaction guaranteed, or money refunded. $1.00 a year; 3 months, 15 Cents. Sample SENT FREE. NOW IS THE TIME. AGENTS WANTED. Now! NOW! NOW! don't put it off. Address, STAR SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

GUIDE to AUTHORSHIP, a complete practical instructor in all kinds of literary work, and all business connected therewith. Useful to all professionals, and invaluable to all inexperienced writers desirous of getting into print. Also includes editing, proof-reading, copyrights, value and disposal of MSS., &c. 50 cts., of booksellers or by mail.
JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N.Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

BIG MONEY! AGENTS' outfit free. J. R. HOLCOMB, Mallet Creek, O.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A MAN who says he hasn't attended church for twenty years boasts that he can remember perfectly the preacher's text on the last occasion of a visit to the sanctuary. And this is the way he remembered it, when asked what it was, "It is easier for a camel to enter a circus than for a man to eat a package of needles."

Somebody inquiring at the Springfield (Illinois) Post-office for a letter for Mike Howe, received the gruff answer that there was no letter there for any body's cow.

"Home is the place for boys," said Spinks to his eldest pride and joy.

"Yes," said the youngster, dutifully, "I'd like to stay at home all the time, but ma sends me to school."

A Chinaman was summoned as a witness in New York the other day, and, to ascertain his views on the nature of an oath, the judge asked him what would be his punishment if he should swear to lies. "I shall never return to China, but always remain in New York," was the reply, and he was at once sworn.

LAST SCENE OF ALL—Kerosene, which has ended one hundred and thirty-seven strange, eventful histories during the past year.

A CHIN THAT'S NEVER SHAVED—An ur-chin.

A girl in Indianapolis, who has $200,000, advertises for sealed proposals for marriage. The postmaster has decided to charge her double price for her box, as it keeps one clerk half his time filling it up with pink-tinted envelopes, and the whole office is scented with musk and bergamot like a perfumer's shop.

RECIPE TO MAKE A FASHIONABLE WOMAN.—Take ninety-nine pounds of flesh and bones—but chiefly bones; bore holes in the ears; cut off the small toes; bend the back to conform to the Grecian bend, as the taste inclines; then add three yards of linen, one hundred yards of ruffles, seventy-five yards of edging, eighteen yards of dimity; one pair of silk or cotton hose; six yards of flannel, embroidered; one pair of Balmoral boots, with heels three inches high; four pounds of whalebone, in strips; two hundred and sixty yards of steel wire; half a mile of tape; two pounds of cotton or wire hemispheres; fifty yards of silk or other dress goods; one hundred yards of point lace; four hundred yards of fringe and other trimmings; twelve gross of buttons; one box of pearl-powder; one saucer of carmine; one bushel of hair, frizzled and fretted; one quart of hair-pins; one pound of braid; one lace handkerchief, nine inches square, with patent holder, perfumed with attar of roses and musk; and let Pygmalion admire his handiwork.

"Now, Johnnie," says grandma, "I want you to sit just as still as a mouse."

"Mouses don't sit still, grandma." Sure enough!

GLASSES.—A man whose eyesight was not good was recommended to try glasses. He says he went and took four at the nearest public-house, and the result was that his sight was so much improved that he could see double.

A New York paper proposes to send Mr. Stanley to discover the north pole, cut his name on it, and the date of discovery, and bring it back with the banner of the Stars and Stripes floating from it.

The man who returned his neighbor's borrowed umbrella was seen, a day or two ago, walking in company with the young lady who passed a looking-glass without taking a peep. It is believed they are engaged.

Pawnbrokers prefer customers who are without any redeeming qualities.

"THE CAPTAIN'S A BOLD MAN."—Beggars' Opera.

MISS ADIPOSA. "The next Round Dance? Certainly, Captain Sparrow, with great Pleasure. But it is no slight Responsibility that you are taking on yourself."

[The gallant little officer silently agrees with her; but when did a soldier, etc. Let us hope they will get well through it.

A SEASONABLE PHILANTHROPIST.

What does he do when sidewalks glare,
And every brick seems but a snare
To catch the passer unaware?
He spreads his ashes.

And when down town we creeping go,
And trembling tread, a tottering row,
With honest features all aglow,
He spreads his ashes.

Long may he live, that man of soul!
Filled be his bin with red-ash coal,
'Till halos crown his saintly poll,
Who spreads his ashes!

And when he leaves this world of slides,
And with grim death serenely glides,
May this be heard, and naught besides—
"Peace to his ashes!"

"You may say what you please," said Muggins, speaking of a deceased comrade; "Jake was a good boy, he was, and a great hunter; but he was the meanest man that ever breathed in the State; and he played one of the sharpest tricks you ever heard of, and I'll tell you how it was. I was out shootin' with him one mornin'. I tell you the duck was plenty; and other game we despised so long as we could see duck. Jake he was too mean to blaze away unless he could put down two or three at a shot. Jake often was blowin' me up for wastin' shot and powder so; but I didn't care—I blazed away. Well, somehow or other, while fussin' around the boat, my powder-flask fell overboard in about sixteen feet of water, which was as clear as air, and I could see the flask lay on the bottom. Jake being a good swimmer, also diver, he said he'd fetch her up, and in a minut he was in. Well, I waited quite a considerable time for him to come up; then I looked over the side for old Jake. Good Jerusalem! there sot old Jake on a pile of oyster-shells, pourin' the powder out of my flask into his'n. Wasn't that mean?"

A St. Louis editor, in speaking of a brother inkslinger, says, "He is young yet, but he can sit at his desk and brush the cobwebs from the ceiling with his ears."

THE TEACHING OF GRAMMAR NOT ALLOWED.—"I have been sendin' my darter Nancy to skool, and last Friday I went over to the skool to see how she was gettin' along, and I seed things I didn't like by no means. The skool-master was larnin' her things entirely out of the line of eddycation, and, as I think, improper. I set a while in the skool-house, an' heered one class say their lesson. The lesson that Nancy sed was nuthin' but the foolishest kind of talk; the rediclist word she sed was 'I love.' I looked right at her for bein' so improper, but she went right on and sed, 'Thou lovest, and he loves.' And I reckon you never heered such rigmarole in your life—love, love, love, and nuthin' but love. She sed one time, 'I did love.' Sez I, 'Who did you love?' The skolars laffed, but I wasn't to be put off, and sed, 'Who did you love, Nancy?' The skool-master sed he would explain when Nancy had finished the lesson. This sorter pacyfied me, and Nancy went on with her awful love talk. It got wus and wus every word. She sed, 'I might, could, or would love.' I stopped her again, and sed I reckon I would see about that, and told her to walk out of that house. The skool-master tried to interfere, but I would not let him say a word. He sed I was a fool, and I nokt him down, and made him holler in short order. I talkt the strate thing to him. I told him I'd show how hede larn my darter grammar. I got the nabors together, and we sent him off in a hurry, and I reckon tharl be no more grammar teachin' in these parts soon."

He that blows the coals in quarrels he has nothing to do with has no right to complain if the sparks fly in his face.

The following eccentric advertisement appeared lately in the "personals" of an English paper: "Kangaroo revived by bones, though nearly choked by a piece of one after swallowing five hard biscuits. Troubled. Four cat two six camel five two one eight pig one boar in every way. Four nine leopard one four elephant three four seven boar. Faithful until death." It has the effect of a Chinese puzzle to the public at large.

QUERY.—Can a dark woman be considered one of the fair sex?

The young widow who was buried in grief is now alive and doing well. It is only another instance of premature interment.

No well-regulated California family is without a slop-bowl scooped out of a $250,000 ruby.

Mendelssohn, the philosopher, grandfather of the great musical composer, was, when a youth, clerk to a very rich but exceedingly commonplace—in fact, stupid—employer. One day an acquaintance commiserated the clever lad on his position, saying, "What a pity it is that you are not the master, and he your clerk!"

"Oh, my friend," returned Mendelssohn, "do not say that. If he were my clerk, what on earth could I do with him?"

A lady wrote of her lover, who had become insane, that "he had gone out of his mind, but had never gone out of hers."

A little girl wanting a fan, but not being able to remember the word, said she "wanted a thing to brush the warmth off with."

The little son of a prominent Baltimore minister said to his father,

"Pa, St. Paul was a Southerner."

"How do you know that, my son?"

"Why, Sir, in the eighteenth verse of the eighth chapter of Romans he says, 'For I reckon.' None but Southerners say reckon."

This is said to be the best pun ever made in America. Horace Greeley, during the Scott campaign, declared that he execrated and spit upon the Whig platform. A Western New York editor remarked that if Greeley spit upon the Whig platform he couldn't expect-to-rate as a Whig.

That was a noble youth who, on being urged to take wine at the table of a statesman in Washington, had the moral courage to refuse. He was a poor young man, just beginning the struggle of life. He brought letters to the statesman, who kindly invited him home to dinner.

"Not take a glass of wine?" said the statesman, in wonderment and surprise.

"Not one simple glass of wine?" echoed the statesman's beautiful and fascinating wife, as she arose, glass in hand, and with a grace that would have charmed an anchorite endeavored to press it upon him.

"No," said the heroic youth, resolutely, gently repelling the proffered glass.

What a picture of moral grandeur was that! A poor, friendless youth refusing wine at the table of a wealthy statesman, even though proffered by the fair hands of a beautiful lady!

"No," said the young man, and his voice trembled a little and his cheek flushed, "I never drink wine; but" (here he straightened himself up, and his voice grew firmer) "if you've got a little good rye whisky, I don't mind trying a snifter."

PHILOSOPHY OF THE FUTURE.

MORALIST. "Who knows what to-morrow will bring forth?"

POSITIVIST. "The day after."

The coolest man yet discovered is he who stopped a train on a Pennsylvania road the other night by swinging a lantern, and handing the fireman some currency, requested him to bring down a quarter of a pound of fine-cut tobacco.

Why is the fire a dissipated character?—Because it goes out every night.

Why does a retired confectioner resemble a faithless lover?—Because he leaves his sweet'art to the care of another.

A SALT-CELLAR—A grocer.

PROFESSIONAL ETIQUETTE.

ANXIOUS PARENT. "Come, Doctor, don't wait, but come in and see her. She is very ill indeed."

CONSULTING PHYSICIAN. "Must wait for your Family Physician, Sir. Could not presume to interfere till he arrives. The Patient must have Patience."

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

WIFE. "Well, what did Mr. Brown say? Will he let us have the money?"

HUSBAND. "He s-s-said you'd f-f-fi-find it wi-wiser in the end t-t-t-to p-p-p—"

WIFE. "To what? If you can't speak without stuttering, sing it."

HUSBAND (triumphantly). "To paddle your own canoe."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 8.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

MY SAINT.

Of all the saints e'er canonized,
Saint Valentine for me!
None other dares to hear my prayers,
And bear my love to thee.

I thought Saint Ursula, in plaint
For all her virgins slain,
Would bear thee word. Alack! she heard
Nor answered me again.

Saint Nicholas at Christmas-tide
Drew down his jolly face:
"Nay, nay!" said he, "a gift from me
Were sadly out of place."

And all the saints at Halloween,
That wondrous, mystic night,
Breathed in my ear, "Good heart, we fear
The maiden to affright."

But brave Saint Valentine doth scorn
Such poor excuse to make:
"Speak out!" quoth he, right gallantly;
"Your message will I take!"

"Tell her," said I, in faltering tones—
"Tell her I love her true."
Then did he laugh, "Why, that's but half:
What thinks the maid of you?"

"Alack!" sighed I, "what heart would dare
To rush for answer so?"
"Leave that to me; I'll ask," said he.
Trembling, I bade him go.

Therefore, of all the canonized,
Saint Valentine for me;
For on this day he speeds away
To bear my love to thee!

"CUPID."—[PHOTOGRAPHED FROM LIFE.]

Hosted by Google

IMPATIENCE.

OH, hasten, year, to bring us June,
Folded within your dreaming heart,
Like petals of a rose, that soon
The wooing winds will kiss apart.

Hasten, O sun, across the sky,
Nor make, I pray, a long delay;
Let the sweet bloom of daylight die,
And twilight stars forbid to stay;

Till wreathed in blossoms June appears,
Wasting her fragrance every where,
And echoes of the chiming spheres
Seem pulsing on the summer air.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1873.

☞ WITH the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be published the Tenth Part of DORÉ'S LONDON.

This magnificent Serial, which is published at a high price in England, is issued gratuitously in Eight-page Supplements to the subscribers to HARPER'S WEEKLY.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain numerous patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Masquerade Costumes for Children; Ball Dresses, Opera Cloaks, Fichus, Scarfs, Embroidered House Jackets, Leggings, etc., for Ladies; a rich variety of Children's Suits; Footstools, Toilette-Tables, Crochet Purses, Card-Receivers, Waste-Baskets, Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

THAT BEST ROOM.

By GAIL HAMILTON.

WHAT vials of sarcasm have been poured out upon it! Its closed shutters have cast a gloom over the pathways of literature. Its musty smells have penetrated the corners of remote novels. Its covered chairs have stiffened in smart essays. Men easily influenced by public opinion have sought to avert the shafts of satire by building themselves ceiled houses without any "spare room"—houses whose every apartment should be occupied. But women, with a stronger instinct of the fitness of things, cling to the "best room," the "spare room," the parlor, and have hitherto made a good fight.

And the women are right. The best room is often absurd, but a best room is not an absurdity. It is appalling to be shown into a square apartment, with heavy, chill air, with a horse-hair sofa, a horse-hair arm-chair, and six horse-hair plain chairs—only this and nothing more. But because a black silk gown is ill fitting you do not therefore discard black silk gowns. The spare room may have a straw matting, if you please, and cane chairs, and blinds open or closed, according to the light and heat, but every housekeeper knows that, after all the essays are written and all the arrows shot, a spare room is a great convenience, a great resource, a great peace of mind.

But it is inhospitable, says the visitor. You do not wish to be turned off by yourself into a room outside of the family life, destitute of associations, prim, orderly, decorous, but silent and inexpressive. You want to go in where the sewing and reading and talking are, and see your friend in her every-day garb. That may be; but suppose your friend prefers not to be thus seen? You will admit that the family is sacred. Not every one who is welcome in the parlor could be welcome in the family room. Nor is the welcome to the family room at all times one and the same. Absolute freedom to repel is the only guarantee of warmth in welcome. If a house have no room set off for visitors, there is no special gratification in being admitted to its family room. Nor is that home sentiment very desirable which does not instinctively make a distinction between its own and the outside world, however amiable and friendly may be its relations therewith. That family is, indeed, doing its work best—all other things corresponding—which jealously guards itself from an indiscriminate open communion.

There are scenes of leisure, chitchat, light reading, upon which the entrance of a friend would be no intrusion. But when you are in eager consultation over the gray cashmere—will it turn for Anne? will it dye without cockling? is there enough for a whole suit, or shall the brown go with it, and make a suit of two shades for Anne, and perhaps a polonaise for Ella?—and the ruffles are on one chair and the over-skirt on another, and there is a universal ripping and rippling, it is then a solid satisfaction to reflect that there is a room across the hall which tells no tales. It is not a false shame, a foolish pride in keeping up appearances, that makes you dislike having Mrs. A and Mrs. B and Mrs. C walk in upon your turnings and matchings and contrivings. It is a spontaneous modesty, a natural reticence, which prompts always to the suppression of processes and the exhibition only of results. When, afterward, Mrs. A praises Anne's new suit, you tell her, not only without shame, but with rejoicing, how ingeniously it was fashioned out of the several birds in last year's nest; but during the fashioning Mrs. A's presence would have disturbed and hindered you. A great deal of house-work is helped on by the knowledge that there is a room in the house where that work does not go, and to which the mistress may repair, leaving all her state secrets behind her. So far from the parlor being an incumbrance, an excrescence, it is a relief, a safety-valve. Let us bow down to EASTLAKE in sincerity and truth; but to arrange our houses on the pretense that our friends are at all times and in all parts of them equally welcome is, or ought to be, a greater sham than all the veneering we can put into the parlor. Because I treat my friend to-day to roast turkey and plum-pudding, do I mean to insinuate to him that this is my every-day fare, or blush to own that yesterday I dined off hash and hasty-pudding? Nay, rather, I exultantly propound to him that inexorable law of succession by which chopped beef is the inevitable and not unwelcome follower of roast. But none the less I rejoice to do him honor and my family a pleasance by ministering to him a feast of fatter things. It is trouble and expense, but we love trouble and expense when they express affection and friendship. It is not simply that my family feast in his cause—it is also that he graces and gilds my family feast. The turkey may be in his honor, but it is he that gives the turkey its chief charm for us.

In discussing household art we are too apt to forget the household artist. Many beautiful and desirable things the busy wife and mother must forego. She loves her translucent, vivid china, but better loves the dimpled fingers that do not know how to hold it; and rather than banish them from the table she exiles the china to its dark closet and condescends to plainer ware. But the knowledge that her closet holds that treasure is a joy not to be despised, and when she spreads it upon her table at a friend's coming, and the children gaze upon it with solemn admiration, will you rebuke her for display instead of honesty? To many a woman her parlor is her poem. The living-room must be plain and unadorned, both out of regard to her purse and to the careless fists and feet, the innumerable balls and tops and jackknives, that keep up a constant guerrilla warfare upon polish and fragility. But this parlor, of which the children do not have the run, is the hunting-ground of her fancies. Here her delight in color and form may take shape. Whatever of delicate, of beautiful, of harmonious, of antique, of grotesque, or fantastic pleases her taste she may gather or fashion here, safe from the incursions of her young barbarians, all at play elsewhere. Even if she only opens her grand room on high days, the sun and air can speedily identify it with the universe; and her children are not harmed by having one spot barred to their license. And while it is the outlet for her otherwise necessarily repressed inclinations, it is the arena of her friendships—a link whereby she keeps pleasant hold of the outside world. Why, O purblind man! will you insist on finding only ostentation and convention and Mrs. Grundy where a wiser and deeper gaze might reveal sympathies and aspirations and all gracious sensibilities?

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Reforming Fellow-Traveler.

MY DEAR MARK,—Mrs. Baalam sent for me the other day, and I hastened to her house, and found her very anxious to consult me upon a subject which she did me the honor to say she thought that I might understand. A hundred suppositions as to what she might wish passed through my mind. If I should tell you what they were, they would serve to test my modesty. Did I instinctively suppose that she wished to ask me about a course of reading for her daughters, or to advise with me upon the morality of the theatre and ballet, or to beg a subscription to a charity, or to consult with me upon—upon some soft and urgent suit that had been made to her; for I will not deny that I have sometimes thought that I have seen Mr. Bottom, intentique aures, looking at Mrs. Baalam, who is a most attractive widow, in a manner that suggested the momentous question whether N was likely to be willing to take M for her wedded husband.

After remarking, therefore, that I hoped she was well, and that it was a very pleasant day for the season, I said that I was very much flattered by her request, and that I had lost no time in responding. Mrs. Baalam, a frank and generous and sincere woman, and to me, I confess, one of the most agreeable of our fellow-travelers, replied that I was always very kind, and that, being in serious perplexity, she had thought of no one who was so likely to advise her properly as Mr. Bachelor. "Thank you, madame," I answered. "And what is it?" She then proceeded to tell me that none of her reforms succeeded. And she said it with so dejected an air that I, who had never regarded her as a reformer, was disposed to smile.

"Reforms, Mrs. Baalam—your reforms," I said. "Are you a reformer?"

She smiled ruefully, and answered that she was so in her small way. "I do not," she said, "appear in public upon a platform, but I have seriously tried to lighten the burdens of the world in the way that seemed open to me. But I have failed, and I wish you to tell me why."

Seeing that I was closely attentive, she proceeded to say that she had been often struck with the frivolity of fashion. It was the whim of the rich and the idle, and the bane of the poor and industrious.

"I have seen," she said, "that the life of a foreign queen or fine lady is a mere ceremony. She is what is called the ornament of society, and she must therefore be perpetually burnished. In every way the jewel must be kept shining. The fine lady must be always attractive in her circle of elegant loungers; and as nothing is more piquant than change, the fashion of her clothes must constantly alter to stimulate the admiration of the men and the emulation—to say no more—of the women around her. As such society has plenty of money, it becomes the business of certain persons to gratify its desires; so we have the dress-makers, whose aim it is to adopt every hint and suggest every change that can constantly renew the toilette of the fine lady: setting and resetting the gem continually for the delight of man and the brilliancy of society. The dress of such persons becomes the imperative law for their sex. The costume of women, therefore, changes forever, like the April sky; that of men, as you know, changes but imperceptibly. You, for instance, dear Mr. Bachelor, go to every ball and dinner in the season in precisely the same clothes; but if I should wear the same dress every night and at every feast, I should be the talk of the town."

Mrs. Baalam looked at me for a moment very earnestly, and then proceeded to say that she had observed the consequence of the facts she had mentioned to be that women every where were slaves to their dress, and especially if they were poor women, for then they were compelled to be forever changing, and their minds were necessarily most intently fixed upon the subject, and they were always studying each other's clothes. So she had early resolved to make a stand. When, therefore, dresses, which had been worn of a reasonable length when she was married, began to drop and drop and to become unreasonably long, Mrs. Baalam resisted. She ordered her dresses to be made as before, until at last it may be truly said that Mrs. Baalam's feet were the only feet of woman visible in fine society. But she said that although it was cruel martyrdom, she persevered. A sense of duty and high self-sacrifice sustained her. When she went into the street she saw every body looking at her short skirt. The gentlemen smiled gently; the ladies had an air of indignant offense. She was called La Cracovienne, and the Maid of the Mill, and the Dairyman's Daughter. Indeed, there was a universal derision which threatened to become pity that the death of her husband, which soon followed his marriage, had touched her brain and made her a little eccentric.

"But when my little girl came to me crying," said Mrs. Baalam, "and begged that I would not expose her to the gibes of her companions, and to the constant mortification of seeing her mother laughed at, I could not hold out. I lengthened my skirts, and despised my moral cowardice. And then every body said that Mrs. Baalam had evidently recovered from her grief, and would probably soon be engaged again. Meanwhile I had already been guilty of a contemptible weakness, which I am ashamed to mention. I resolved that what was right in the matter of the skirt could not be wrong in a bonnet; so I began by refusing to conform in that also, and continued to wear my bonnet in the old style, my object being to break up the concentration of women's minds upon their dress. But early in the second year of the struggle I succumbed. My bonnet was a practical joke; and when I came into church the service almost stopped, so eagerly did every body look at me, and with such infinite amusement. So," said my good friend, with a kind of sad depression, "I abandoned that effort at reform."

There was another, however, which enlisted all her zeal. She had observed, as I suppose we all have, the appalling lateness of the hours of society. Balls begin at eleven at night, and end at five in the morning. But those gay and graceful cavaliers who float all night upon the intoxicating current of the waltz, holding houris in their arms and living in a dream, are clerks. They are like the Arabian porter who was a drudge all day and a sultan all night. Those wisps of youth must be down town by nine o'clock every morning, clear-headed, ready for their work. Thackeray used to say that it was amazing to see in Edinburgh the even-paced old topers who would sit all night and drink hot mountain-dew until you thought they would lie like senseless logs for a week after, but who marched stiffly down town at nine o'clock next morning, smug and smooth and steady, as if they had slept the sleep of the righteous. But the young waltzing gentlemen are very hollow-eyed and miserable in the morning; and if they feel so "gone" that nature craves a little stimulant, say at eleven o'clock, is it surprising, although it is most pitiful?

So Mrs. Baalam resolved that she would slay this Python of late hours. Forthwith she gave a great ball, and the elaborate cards of invitation stated in golden script—"Music at nine; supper at half past ten; cotillon at eleven; carriages at one." Nobody came, except the music, until half past ten. The cotillon began at one; and the last guests departed at five A.M. The hostess was confounded. "Indeed," she said, "I did not know what to do, or how to help myself. Here was a great reform which I had projected, and for which I knew that every parent would be grateful. But it did not even begin. It would not start. And what was I to do? The short skirts I could manage; but what could I do with people who would not come until eleven, and who would not go until they were ready?"

Poor Mrs. Baalam looked utterly perplexed, and I gently asked her if this was the question that she wished to ask me. She smiled and said no, but that she did wish to know how society was to be reformed. There was a pretty text! I told her that it seemed to me that reform, like charity, begins at home. "I tried it at home," burst in Mrs. Baalam. "So you did," I answered, "in the short skirt effort. That was a home reform, because you alone were immediately concerned, but in the other case you tried to reform other people in spite of themselves." Then I told her the similar experience of some of my friends. There was Murillo, who wore a kind of tunic instead of a coat, and whose hair flowed upon his shoulders. There was Giorgione, who insisted that nature having made the leg to taper toward the ankle, meant that trowsers should taper also, and fit so snugly as to manifest the beauty of a noble form. So he sallied forth one bright morning in thick trowsers tightly buttoned at the ankle, and with shoes ingeniously shaped to his feet. He had a hilarious escort of interested street-boys, who cheered him and audibly criticised his clothes. The young ladies escaped into shops. The old ladies sternly peered at him through gold-rimmed glasses. The old gentlemen scowled at him, and said, indignantly, "Go home and put on your trowsers!" "Put on my trowsers!" retorted Giorgione, with disdainful vehemence. "You poor blinded votaries of tyrannical custom, don't you see that these are the only trowsers that nature authorizes? I've as much trowsers as you, but mine are normal, and yours are mere traditions." The whole town was in a tumult. He was accused of insulting every body. "Insulting! What do you mean?" he asked, hotly; and it was with great difficulty that he was brought to see that while he was proudly walking in good, solid, snug clothes, which he delighted to believe were nature's normal trowsers, every body else thought that he had come abroad half dressed.

I told Mrs. Baalam that there were many and many stories of the same kind.

"Yes, but how, then, are we ever to get the world reformed?" she asked, ruefully.

"Madame, our efforts must be reasonable. Grace and taste and the sense of beauty are also elements of human nature, and help to compose the charm of human life. The remedy for the evils of fashion lies deeper than in the shortening or lengthening of a skirt. While women are ornaments, they must be constantly set in fresher gilding and enamel. So also in our society the hours of great routs and balls will be much as they are. The cavaliers do not come home from business before five or six. They must dine and dress and sleep before beginning the labors of the night. The difficulty is the ball itself. While society is a series of balls, the night will, of course, be consecrated to them. Dear Mrs. Baalam, the best reform is temperance—the abstinence from excess. Don't sweep the streets with your skirts, but neither shorten them so that you are ridiculous. Don't go to a ball at seven, to which nobody comes until eleven; but if eleven is too late for you, don't go. In non-essentials unity. It is not a large or a small bonnet, nor a fringe nor a ribbon, which is important. It is truth, liberty, intelligence, charity, good temper, good sense, which are essential. The costume is nothing. Samuel Adams served liberty as truly in a wig and a long waistcoat as Garibaldi in a cap and blouse; Fénelon preached in a surplice, George Fox in leather breeches."

Hosted by Google

Mrs. Baalam said, Thank you, but looked a little doubting. Perhaps she will send for me again, so that I may explain more fully.

Yours, dear Mark,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MASQUERADE COSTUMES.

MASQUERADE parties follow each other in rapid succession during the weeks that precede Lent. Gloomy black dominoes are confined to gentlemen at these entertainments. If a lady prefers a domino, she wears a cloak of blue, pink, or white satin that entirely conceals the evening dress she wears beneath, and does not mar the brilliant appearance of the gayly dressed throng. In making dominoes of handsome materials the modistes cut the breadths precisely like those of a trained dress skirt, and attach them to a yoke over which a hood is worn. Afterward the yoke may be removed, and the skirt made to serve as a dress skirt. The silk mask should match the color of the domino. Fancy dresses are, however, far more popular than dominoes. The preference this winter is for national costumes, or else for the picturesque dresses of certain periods in history. Some of these costumes are easily represented by slight additions to the costume of the present day. For instance, the dress prescribed for a Spanish lady is as follows: A black silk dress with trained skirt and heart-shaped bodice; the neck and sleeves are heavily trimmed with black lace. A long black veil is fastened to the head over a high comb. Red and yellow roses are in the coiffure and on the bosom. A very large painted fan is kept constantly in motion. A large cross of jet or gold is attached to a velvet necklace. Black slippers, with black or scarlet silk stockings. The Medici dress is merely a black velvet made in the present fashion, with the addition of great puffs at the top of the sleeves, and a chatelaine bodice finished by a flounce of lace around the waist. The hair is a high pointed tower of puffs. The Marie Stuart dress is similar to this, with a high ruff around the neck, and a pointed coif above the forehead. The Marquise dress, or costume of a lady of the French court in the time of Louis XIV. and Louis XV., requires the short skirt and brocaded over dress, the high heels, powdered hair, and patches that are now in vogue.

The simple dress of an Alsacian peasant is pretty for blondes. This is a skirt and low peasant waist of scarlet or blue woolen stuff. The skirt reaches to the ankles, showing white stockings and black slippers with colored heels and buckles. A white muslin blouse with turned-down frills around the neck and wrists is worn under the peasant waist, and a long straight white apron is added. The hair is braided in thick plaits, and is surmounted by the characteristic head-dress, a large, erect bow of black ribbon placed directly on top of the head. Tricolored ribbons, red, white, and blue, are in the hair, and a three-cornered kerchief may be folded around the neck. The Italian, Turkish, and other Eastern costumes are becoming to brunettes; also the Gypsy dress, which has merely a short quilted petticoat, a flowered chintz overskirt, and a scarlet cap or head-dress; a tambourine, and cards for fortune-telling, are added.

The costumes that aim to represent an idea are also in favor, and are very effectual when well carried out. Thus Peace is arrayed in a white dress with a tunic covered with garlands of fruits and flowers, emblematic of the produce of the ground; olive branches are on the bodice and train; a diadem of wheat ears in the hair indicates Plenty; and the star of Hope glitters above the forehead. Harvest, a brunette's costume, is a maize-colored tarlatan dress, trimmed with wheat ears, poppies, and corn-flowers. A Water-Nymph dress for blondes is of white frosted tulle, trimmed with sea grasses, coral, and tiny shells. Sunrise is represented by a gray woolen dress with rows of ribbon of all the colors of the prism passing around it; Sunset by a black dress with red and yellow ribbons, and gilt suns at intervals. Spring should have a white tulle dress with bright green over-skirt, trimmed with crocuses, daisies, and other early flowers.

INDIA SHAWLS.

There are some new features in the India shawls prepared for the spring. The new designs are arranged to display two different corners, one light and the other dark; the first is suitable for bright days, the last for wintry weather. These designs are intricate arabesques wrought in subdued quaint colors, such as olive, moss green, and the dull Pompeian red, instead of the gay Magenta and grass green shades formerly used. The ugly "lightning" stripes and rivers of white once so conspicuous have disappeared, and the white lines now used have a black edge to shade and soften them, and are merely introduced to fill out the curious involved figures, the palms and arabesques of color, of which the shawl is composed. The borders represent vines and running figures, and have a narrow "harlequin" edge made up of bits of cashmere of various contrasting colors. From $600 to $700 seems to be a standard price for fine, well-wrought shawls, square, and almost covered with embroidery, leaving only a very small plain space for a centre. Two years ago such shawls cost from $800 to $1000. Black centres are preferred to all others, then scarlet, and the least favored is white. Those shawls that are pervaded by dusky olive hues, soft and sombre, are the first choice this season.

Very handsome shawls with wide borders of exquisite India embroidery are made with doubled centres of camel's-hair, showing scarlet on one side and black or white on the other. These are very warm and fine, and cost about $300.

The Decca shawl is made of pure camel's-hair, and its embroidery is genuine hand-work done in the new designs and colors; but it differs from more expensive India shawls in being made of a single piece of cashmere, a plain foundation on which the embroidery is done, instead of being made up of tiny pieces separately wrought and intricately put together. It is a heavy, soft, warm, and handsome shawl, and costs $100.

Breakfast and house shawls of scarlet or black camel's-hair, with India-wrought harlequin borders, are sold as low as from $35 to $50. These are good-sized squares. The scarlet centres are sold by the yard for $20 a yard. India long-shawls, in gay stripes, are excellent for extra carriage wraps and for traveling: they cost from $30 to $100. The imitation India shawls copy the colors and patterns of real Cashmeres admirably: they cost $60, and after all are only imitations.

HIMALAYAN SHAWLS.

Some new warm traveling shawls, made in the north of England, are called Himalayas. They are of soft fine wool with long pile, like plush, and come in gray shaded stripes, or else with plain centres and a plaid border. They cling closely and warm to the shoulders, and are also used as heavy lap-robes.

SPRING DOLMANS.

The Dolmans that knowing ones predict are to be the fashionable wraps for the spring will have extremely long side pieces, or sleeves, reaching to the knee, and in some cases almost to the edge of the dress skirt. Soft twilled summer cloth of the olive tints, gray and brown camel's-hair, and black cashmeres, are the fabrics of which they will be composed. Worsted and silk laces in guipure designs, and of the color of the garment, will be the trimming. Lace-like passementeries will also be largely imported.

GIRLS' SAILOR SUITS.

The furnishing houses are now preparing for early spring and sea-side wear pretty sailor suits of twilled washing flannel, either pink, creamy white, or else navy blue. They are made with the sailor blouse, sailor collar, pockets, sash, and plain skirt introduced in the Bazar last summer, and are trimmed with wide white braid or else with bias bands of cashmere. These little dresses, with white Normandy caps, were the most tasteful costumes worn last season by girls, and will be the popular fancy for the spring and summer. Drawers to match the dress are sometimes ordered by mothers who take their children to the sea-side.

PANIER PUFFS.

Some of the most expensive dresses lately imported are draped by cords to form the huge round panier puff which was so much satirized when introduced four years ago. This puff is barely tolerable on trained skirts, when caught up by a sash, as they now are, but is out of all proportion and symmetry on the short skirts of street suits. Nevertheless, the rumor is that short skirts, so pretty, convenient, and jaunty, are to reappear in the spring accompanied by the objectionable puffs.

SPANISH COMBS, ETC.

The high-backed Spanish combs are much worn with full-dress coiffures. They are exceedingly becoming to round, full, youthful countenances, but should be avoided by ladies with slender oval faces. The comb is not always worn at the back of the head, but is often placed on one side, as if put there by accident. The Josephine coiffure, with its pouf of tresses and short curls, is worn higher than ever. The fashion of dressing the hair very high is admirable for house toilettes, but is not becoming when surmounted by a bonnet. The towering appearance thus given is sometimes very ludicrous; besides, the absence of all back hair looks especially bare under a high bonnet, consequently ladies are twisting their plaits and tresses much lower about the head for street toilettes. To make the hair look thickly set and abundant, it is well to braid at night those tresses just above the ears, and also the hair which is turned up from the nape of the neck. These plaits should be very loosely braided in three thick tresses; if plaited tightly they will give the appearance of crimps. Many ladies with dark brown and black hair have abandoned crimps altogether, and use soft finger puffs or smooth tresses above the forehead. Very light hair is worn in as many fluffy crimps as formerly. A slight fringe of hair, so tightly crimped that when combed each hair seems to stand out separately, is placed above the forehead, and falls from beneath a wide thick plait of three tresses that is laid flatly around the head. This Skye-terrier ornament is only adopted by blondes. Dark brown and black hair would kink too much if arranged in this way, consequently the fringe above the forehead is left almost straight, or is arranged in fanciful half-curved locks. Parting the hair on the side is also occasionally seen, and is very becoming to piquant faces. Elaborate coiffures arranged by hair-dressers are made different on each side of the head; for instance, the Récamier bow of hair is placed high on the left side, with a cluster of finger puffs on the right, and a plaited tress behind. This style is only becoming to small faces with regular features. The back hair is caught up from the nape of the neck by "side combs" that are concealed beneath the braids on the top of the head. Sometimes two short, thick, natural-looking curls are made from the hair that grows low on the back of the neck; again, a fringe like that worn on the forehead sometimes falls across the back, extending from one ear to the other; this is done of one's own hair, however, and ladies naturally enough object to cutting their hair to suit a fashion that will probably be transient. In placing a thick plait of hair around the top of the head, ladies should take pains to make it lie flatly and close to the head, instead of standing it erect like a crown, as that makes the head look larger, and to be stylish now it must be as small as possible. For the same reason all appearance of a coil at the back must be avoided, and only a little jaunty pouf on top be arranged. Pomades, oils, and bandoline are no longer used. The hair is worn in its natural color, with only the beautiful gloss that nature gives, but which requires care and much brushing to develop and preserve.

DUST CAPS.

A dust cap that entirely covers the hair should be worn by ladies while sweeping and attending to the rougher domestic duties that fall to the lot of many housewives. This is a circular turban of white striped muslin, or else of more fanciful pink or blue cambric. It is merely a round piece, measuring about half a yard across the centre. Finish the edge with a narrow hem, and stitch a tape casing an inch from the edge all around on the wrong side. Put an elastic cord in the casing, let it draw up to form a ruffle around the edge, add a hemmed muslin bow above the forehead, and you have a useful and not unbecoming cap that will protect the hair from dust. Rose-colored cambric caps with pinked edges, or else notched like saw-teeth, are pretty and salable objects found at fancy fairs.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

WHEN EMILY FAITHFULL returns to England, and is asked what most struck her with wonder and pleasure in the United States, she can reply, promptly and truthfully, "The superb reception given to me at Steinway Hall." No such demonstration has hitherto been witnessed on this continent. The genius, the culture, the cleverness, and the highest and best of each known to New York, were there to contribute, by their presence and sympathy, their tribute to Miss FAITHFULL. It was in no sense a "sensational" meeting. People came there neither to laugh at nor lampoon the "strong-minded," nor to pat on the head, in a mild, patronizing way, the good creature who had come hither to tell us what she had done at home. A few might have strolled in from curiosity to see the woman who is known to have the friendship of Lady BURDETT-COUTTS and other noble ladies of England, and who has the esteem and hearty co-operation of her Majesty the Queen, but the great mass came to testify their thorough sympathy with her work, and it was an audience such as is rarely seen. The journalists were there, and the poets; the doctors were there, those who practice and those who preach; the lawyers came, and the judges; banker and merchant were there; and even the society man graciously beamed in upon it. Of course the toilers were present—the lady toilers, those who are becoming famous in literature, medicine, engraving, telegraphy, journalism, teaching, drama, music, typography, and the many other pursuits which are opening themselves to women. The entertainment itself was in all respects brilliant—the interesting and sensible address of welcome by Mrs. HENRY M. FIELD, the eloquent response of Miss FAITHFULL, and the exquisite instrumental and vocal performances of MATILDA TOEDT, Madame VAN ZANDT, and Miss NETTIE STERLING. All was bright and nice; and none will forget the rich, mellifluous voice of Miss FAITHFULL as she remarked: "It has been said that the English are a dumb people. They can do great acts, but not describe them. I don't wish to lay claim to the latter attribute, but I would fain shelter myself at the present moment behind a convenient nationality. But, in spite of our characteristic dumbness, I am bound to remember that words have been spoken in our little island home awakening echoes throughout the civilized world, which, thank Heaven! unites England and America with a chain which the vast Atlantic Ocean is powerless to sever. In many ways America is in advance of England. I am glad to see that the most earnest minds are giving attention to the important subject of the work and training of women, and that, in spite of the disadvantages in such training, many are employed by the government in positions of trust and responsibility. The recognition of women in important positions is of very great significance, for, of all the battle-fields of confused opinion, I think the one which should carry off the palm is that in which all the world is now joining as to the comparative faults and virtues of men and women. The whole subject has been surrounded with such misapprehension and unmerited abuse that many intelligent people are afraid to give it sober consideration, quite forgetting that to nothing save error can truth be dangerous. Others charge those who were taking an active part in it with setting themselves against men, whereas it arose from no false rivalry with men, but from the deepest sympathy with their noblest aims and aspirations."

—Mrs. HARRISON GRAY OTIS, who died in Boston on the 23d ult., was one of the remarkable women of the country. She was the daughter of WILLIAM BOARDMAN, a Boston merchant, and sister of WILLIAM H. BOARDMAN, who died recently, leaving her the bulk of his large fortune. She married in early life HARRISON GRAY OTIS, Jun., a son of the eminent orator and statesman, who died before the brilliant promise of his early manhood was realized. Her marriage was distasteful to OTIS, père, and they held little intercourse with each other. At his death she received as a sole legacy a massive silver punch-bowl, which she presented to the Tremont House proprietary. She was a frequent contributor to the magazines and newspapers, and her last contribution was a notice in the Transcript of the death of her friend Miss NABBY JOY, who left considerable legacies to benevolent institutions. She was a woman of indomitable energy, and to her efforts more than those of any body else credit is due for making WASHINGTON'S birthday a holiday in Massachusetts. She leaves an estate valued at about $1,000,000, which she has disposed of by will.

—Attorney-General WILLIAMS compares Southern Republicans to "children who plunge headlong into scrapes, and then come to Washington, as to their parents, to get them out of them."

—Among the many clever people who have lately come from abroad to delight the meek and unwilling pleasure-seekers of New York our German friends have had one of the best, Mrs. CLARA NEYMANN, whose lecture on Germans and their Task in America was lately delivered at Liederkranz Hall, East Fourth Street, to a large audience of the most cultivated Germans of New York. The kind things she said of the United States were couched in language so graceful, and came from a face so attractive, that no wonder our Teutonic friends are especially demonstrative in their applause.

—The monument to ALICE and PHŒBE CARY and their sister ELMINA has just been completed and placed at the head of their graves in Greenwood Cemetery—a spot the beauty and calm of which were always sources of delight to ALICE CARY. It will be remembered that soon after the death of ALICE CARY several of her friends made arrangements to erect a monument to her memory, Mr. GREELEY heading the subscription with $100. When her sister PHŒBE died it was determined that the memorial should serve for the three, and a design appropriate was made by CASONI & ISOLA. This monument is of Quincy granite, simple in form, consisting merely of a solid base, die, and caps, with polished shields. Upon the base in raised letters is the name "CARY." The shield in front bears the inscription, "ALICE CARY, born April 26, 1820; died February 12, 1871." On the right-hand shield are the words, "PHŒBE CARY, born September 14, 1824; died July 31, 1871." On the left-hand shield the inscription reads, "ELMINA CARY, wife of ALEXANDER SWIFT, born November 7, 1831; died December 11, 1862." The cost of the monument was $1100, all but $150 of which was subscribed before the work was finished. This balance has since been assumed by the Sorosis Club, of which ALICE CARY was the first president.

—The Hon. and Rev. BAPTIST NOEL, who died in England a few days since, was perhaps as widely known for his "crotchets" as for any extraordinary talent he displayed. He had the prestige that attaches to old families, and gained much notoriety while young by stepping out from fashionable life and becoming a zealous minister of the Gospel. After having filled a few honorable places in the Episcopal Church, he withdrew and became an Anabaptist. His writings were exclusively controversial, and aimed principally at the Church of Rome and Church of England. As a Dissenter he occupied a position he could not have attained as a Churchman; but he was a good man, and had the welfare of his fellow-creatures deeply at heart.

—General BELKNAP having notified the corps of cadets at West Point to hold themselves in readiness to make a reconnaissance in force at Washington at the Inauguration, the ladies of Washington are sailing down under full canvas on Secretary ROBESON to issue a similar order to the middies at Annapolis. The drill of the latter is said to be quite equal to that of the sanguinary young men of the Point.

—The son of LOUIS NAPOLEON is said to be attentive to his studies in the Military Academy at Woolwich. He goes up to class and drills with other youths of the same standing in college, and he joins with them in their amusements. He is a good athlete, and particularly expert at fencing. As he not only reads English but speaks it well, he is enabled to pursue his studies in our language to the same extent as the other students. Special privileges are allowed to him. Instead of residing at the college he has a house of his own outside the walk, young CONNEAU living with him. Then a special bell has been put up in front of his house to give him notice of drill hours, etc. He is particularly boy-like in all his habits and manner. The discipline at the military college is very strict. The young fellows are only allowed to visit such persons as have had their names sent in to the authorities by the parents and guardians, and before a pupil is allowed to visit even one of those persons, a written invitation must have been sent to him. Except during vacation-time, the occasions are very rare on which a pupil is allowed to spend a night out of the college, for the circumstances under which this privilege is granted must be quite out of the ordinary.

—On the first Sunday of the year Père HYACINTHE made his first public appearance in Paris since his change of religious base, delivering an address to a large audience in M. PRESSENSÉ'S chapel. He defined his position as a faithful Catholic, though not accepting certain dogmas.

—The eldest of General SCHENCK'S daughters—who are so pretty, well-educated, and tasteful—is about to be married to the son of a member of Parliament.

—The Duke of Medinaceli, surnamed "The First Gentleman of Spain," died recently in Paris at the age of sixty. He never tried to obtain any political position, although his independent influence was great under every régime. He was a kind of Providence impersonated to Spaniards and others in need, and fully realized the Castilian adage attributed to his race, "The MEDINACELI will give even to kings."

—Mrs. Senator STEWART, who has been spending several years with her daughters in Europe, has passed most of her time in the schools where they were placed, sharing their studies.

—Miss HOSMER'S monument to Miss FALCONER, a young English lady who died in Rome, has been placed in the Church of St. Andrea delle Fratte, in that city, and is the only sculpture by an American artist to be found in any of the Italian churches.

Digitized by Google

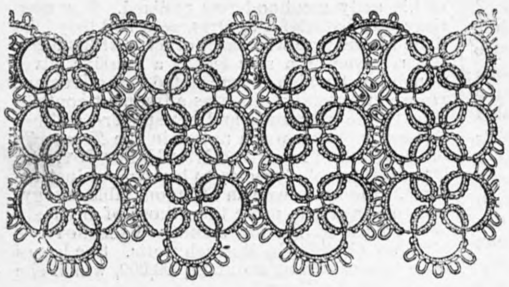

Fig. 1.—TATTED EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

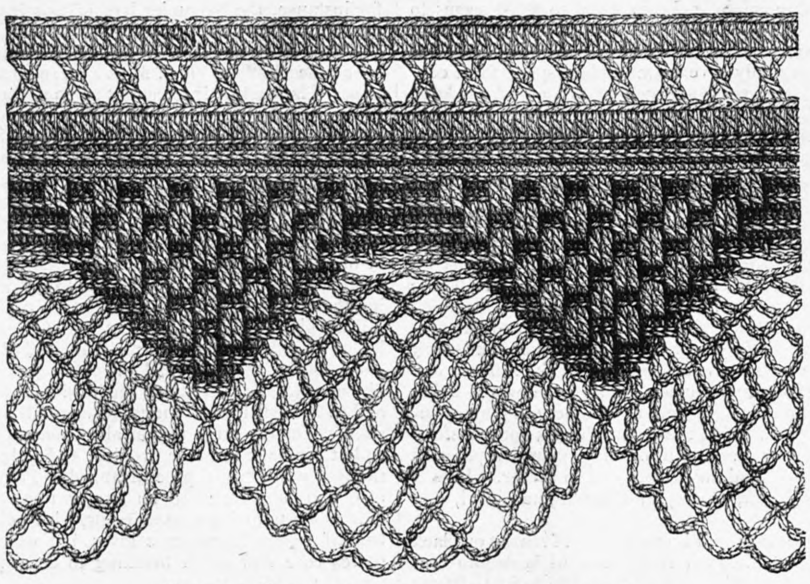
Tatted Edgings for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE edgings are suitable for trimming lingerie, articles of linen, etc., and may be worked with fine or coarse tatting cotton, according to the purpose for which they are designed. In the original, No. 100 cotton is used.

The edging Fig. 1 is worked crosswise in one round with two threads (shuttles); the small rings are worked with one thread, and the scallops with two threads, using one for a foundation thread and the other for a working thread, to form the stitches. The rings are always worked with the foundation thread. Work as follows: * 1 ring of 5 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 5 ds.; t. (turn the work), 1 scallop of 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds.; t., 2 rings like the preceding; instead of forming the middle p. in the first of these rings, fasten to the p. of the ring already finished; t., 1 scallop like the preceding, t., 2 rings and 1 scallop like the preceding, t., 1 ring of 5 ds., fasten to the p. of the preceding ring, 5 ds., t., twice alternately 1 scallop and 1 ring like the preceding, fasten the rings to the same p. to which the preceding ring was fastened, so that a figure of four connected rings is formed. Now complete the next two figures, as yet only half finished, in a similar manner, observing the illustration. After turning the work, work for the upper edge of the edging 1 scallop of 2 ds., 3 p. separated by 2 ds., 2 ds., turn again, and repeat from *, but fasten the next three scallops, instead of forming the middle p., to the corresponding p. of the three scallops last worked, as shown by the illustration.

The edging Fig. 2 is also worked like the preceding, alternately with one and with two threads, but lengthwise in five rounds. For the 1st round work the figures of the outer edge, consisting each of six leaflets or rings, separately as follows: 1 ring of 6 ds., 3 p. separated each by 4 ds., 6 ds.; close to this work 1 ring of 6 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, twice 4 ds., 1 p., then 6 ds.; 4 rings more like the preceding, but the last 2 rings, however, which come on the outer edge of the edging should count 2 p. more, as shown by the illustration, and the last ring is fastened to the first ring; in a similar manner fasten every following figure of this round to the preceding figure, as shown by the illustration. 2d round.—* 1 ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t., 1 scallop of 4 ds., fasten to the next ring in the preceding round as shown by the illustration, 4 ds., t., repeat from *. 3d round.—1 ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t., * 1 scallop of 4 ds., fasten to the next ring of the preceding round, 4 ds., t., 2 rings like the preceding, fasten the first ring to the ring worked previously, t., repeat from *. 4th round.—*1 ring of 4 ds., fasten to the joining p. of the next 2 rings in the preceding round, 4 ds., t., 1 scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., t., 1 ring like the preceding, fasten to the same p., t., repeat from *. 5th round.—Always alternately 1 ring of 4 ds., fasten to the next scallop of the preceding round, 4 ds., and 1 scallop of 3 ds., 2 p. separated by 2 ds., 3 ds.; always turn the work before and after the scallop.



CROCHET EDGING FOR COVERLETS, CURTAINS, ETC.

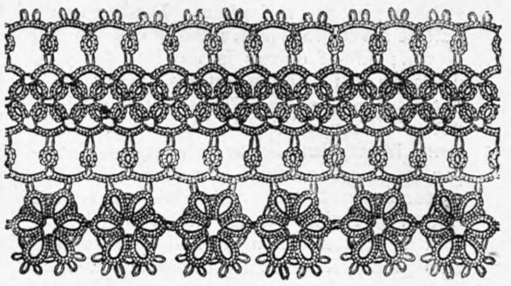


Fig. 2.—TATTED EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Crochet Edging for Coverlets, Curtains, etc.

THIS edging may be worked, according to the purpose for which it is designed, with twisted crochet cotton, or else with knitting cotton. The original is worked with twisted cotton, No. 30. Make a ch. (chain stitch) foundation of the requisite length (the stitches should be divisible by 31), and going back and forth on this, thus turning the work at the end of each round, crochet 5 rounds in sc. (single crochet); in the course of the work always crochet the sc. on the front vein of the sc. in the preceding round, so that the latter project as a rib. 6th round.—* 2 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next 2 st. (stitch) of the third round (always work the stc. on the free upper veins of the corresponding st., so that they are raised on the fourth and fifth rounds); three times alternately 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 st. of the third round, then 5 sc. on the next 5 st. of the preceding round; three times alternately 2 stc. on the next 2 st. of the third round, 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from . 7th round.—On each st. of the preceding round work 1 sc. 8th round.— Three times alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the following 2 st. in the fifth round (the stc. should thus come between the 2 and 2 stc. of the sixth round); 9 sc. on the next 9 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 free st. of the fifth round; twice alternately 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next 2 free st. of the fifth round; repeat from . 9th round.— 14 sc. on the next 14 st. of the preceding round, 7 ch., with these pass over the middle 5 of the 9 sc. of the preceding round, 12 sc. on the following 12 sc., and repeat from . 10th round.— Three times alternately 2 stc. on the next 2 free st. of the 7th round, 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the 7 ch., 5 ch., with these pass over 5 st., 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round; twice alternately 2 stc. on the next 2 st. of the 7th round, 2 sc. on the following 2 st. of the preceding round; repeat from . 11th round.— 11 sc. on the next 11 st. of the preceding round; twice alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, 5 ch., with these pass over 3 st., 9 sc. on the following 9 st. of the preceding round; repeat from *. In a similar manner work 9 rounds more, observing the illustration. For the upper edge crochet on the other side of the foundation 3 rounds as follows: 1st round.—On each st. work 1 dc. (double crochet). 2d round.—*1 stc. on the next st., but only half finish this stc., so that 1 loop, 1 thread thrown over, and 1 loop remain on the needle, 1 dc. on the second following st., and work off this dc. together with the next loop on the needle, then finish the stc., 1 ch., and 1 dc. on the middle of the cross double crochet thus

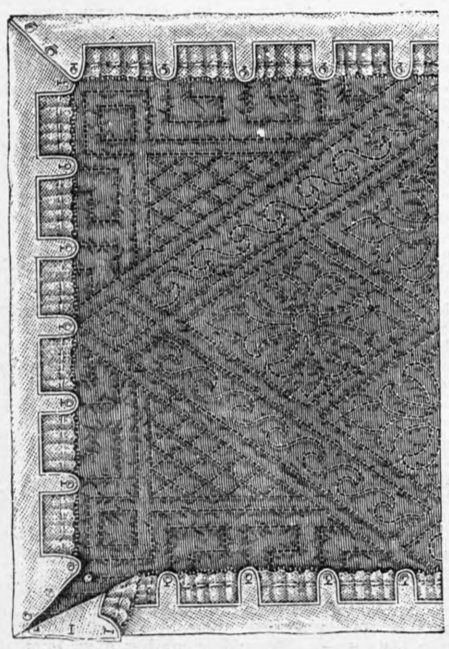

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF QUILT WITH LINEN AND LACE COVER.

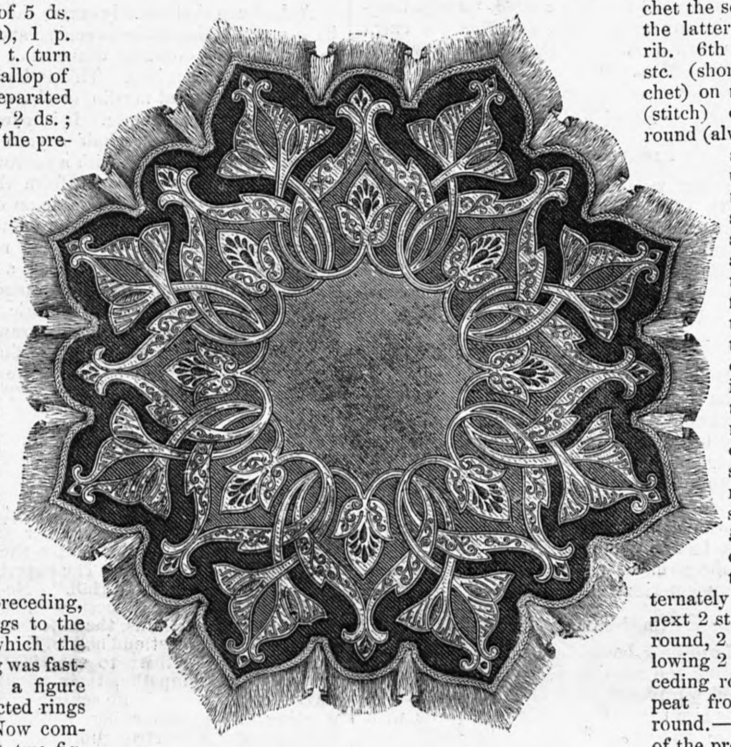

Fig. 1.—LAMP-MAT IN APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
[See Fig. 2, Page 117.]

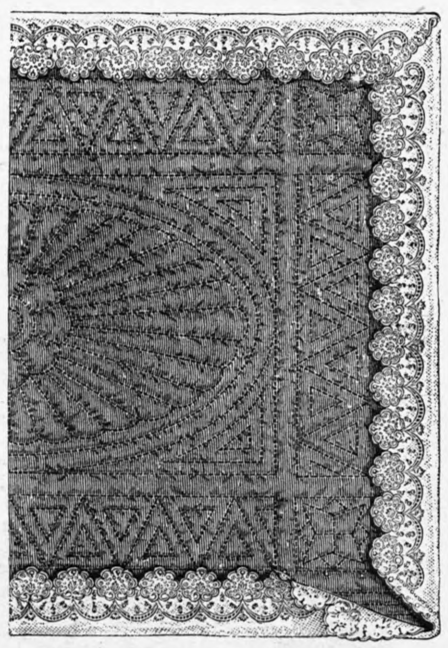

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF QUILT WITH EMBROIDERED LINEN COVER.
For design see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 45.

Fig. 1.—BEDSTEAD WITH BEDDING.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]
For design see Supplement, Nos. XVI. and XVII., Figs. 45 and 46.

Fig. 1.—NEEDLE-WORK BORDER FOR PILLOW-CASES, ETC.

Fig. 2.—NEEDLE-WORK BORDER FOR PILLOW-CASES, ETC.

Hosted by Google

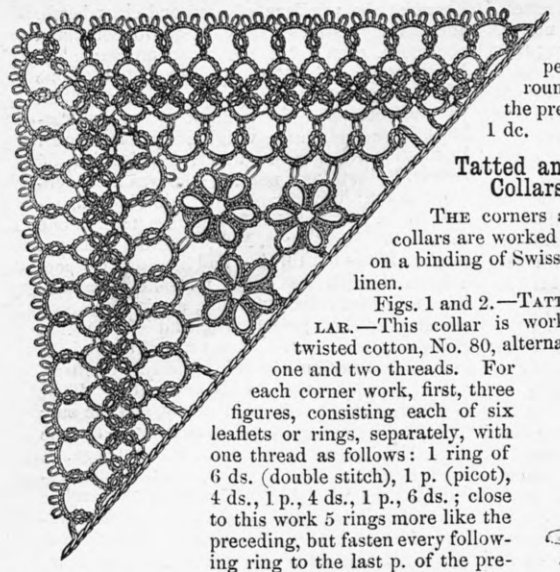

Fig. 1.—TATTED COLLAR. [See Fig. 2.]

formed. Then work 1 ch., pass over 1 st., and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—On each st. of the preceding round work 1 dc.

Tatted and Needle-work Collars, Figs. 1–4.

THE corners and neck of these collars are worked separately, and set on a binding of Swiss muslin, batiste, or linen.

Figs. 1 and 2.—TATTED COLLAR.—This collar is worked with twisted cotton, No. 80, alternately with one and two threads. For each corner work, first, three figures, consisting each of six leaflets or rings, separately, with one thread as follows: 1 ring of 6 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; close to this work 5 rings more like the preceding, but fasten every following ring to the last p. of the preceding ring instead of forming the first p., and instead of forming the last p. in the last ring, fasten to the first p. of the first ring, then tie the ends of the working thread together and cut them off. This completes one figure. The other two rings, worked in a similar manner, are fastened to the first figure and to each other, as shown by Fig. 1. Border the figures with four rounds consisting of scallops and rings, which are worked similar to the first four rounds of the tatted edging, Fig. 2, illustrated on page 116, observing Fig. 1. The neck of the collar, of which Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section, is worked in a similar manner.

Figs. 3 and 4.—NEEDLE-WORK COLLAR. This collar is worked on fine Swiss muslin and tulle with embroidery cotton. The outlines of all the design figures are overcast. The outlines on the outer edge may be button-hole stitched closely. The bars and wheels inside of the design figures are worked with fine thread. The outer edge of the collar is edged with woven picot braid.

Crochet and Tatted Rosette for Cravats, etc.

THIS rosette is worked with tatting cotton, No. 100. Begin in the centre with 1 ring of 1 ds. (double stitch), 10 p. (picot) separated each by 2 ds., 1 ds. On this ring crochet two rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on every second following p., after each sc. 7 ch. (chain stitch). 2d round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 6 dc. (double crochet), 1 sdc., 1 sc. Surround the middle figure thus formed with three tatted rounds, each of which is worked with two threads (shuttles): 1st round.—∗ Fasten the threads to the third st. (stitch) of the next scallop, on the foundation thread work 2 ds., 7 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the fifth following st. of the same scallop, then 2 ds., 3 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds.; repeat from ∗. 2d round.—∗ With the foundation thread only work 1 ring of 2 ds., 4 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next larger scallop of the preceding round, 2 ds., 4 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., t. (turn the work), on the foundation thread work one scallop of 2 ds., 13 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., t., with the foundation thread only work 1 ring of 4 ds., 9 p. separated each by 2 ds., 4 ds., 1 ring of 4 ds., fasten to the last p., 2 ds., 4 p. separated each by 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next small scallop in the preceding round, 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 4 ds., 1 ring like the one before the last, instead of forming the first p., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, t., on the foundation thread work 1 scallop like the preceding; repeat from ∗. 3d round.—∗ With the foundation thread only work 1 ring of 2 ds., 3 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next scallop in the preceding round, 2 ds., 3 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., 1 ring of 2 ds., 7 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., t., on the foundation thread work 1 scallop of 2 ds., 7 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the fourth following p., 1 scallop of 2 ds., 3 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to the third p. of the next scallop in the preceding round, 1 scallop of 2 ds., 7 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., t., and repeat from ∗.

SWISS MUSLIN, INSERTION, AND LACE FICHU-COLLAR.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Fig. 10.

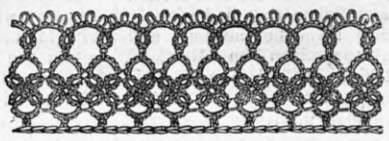

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF TATTED COLLAR, FIG. 1.

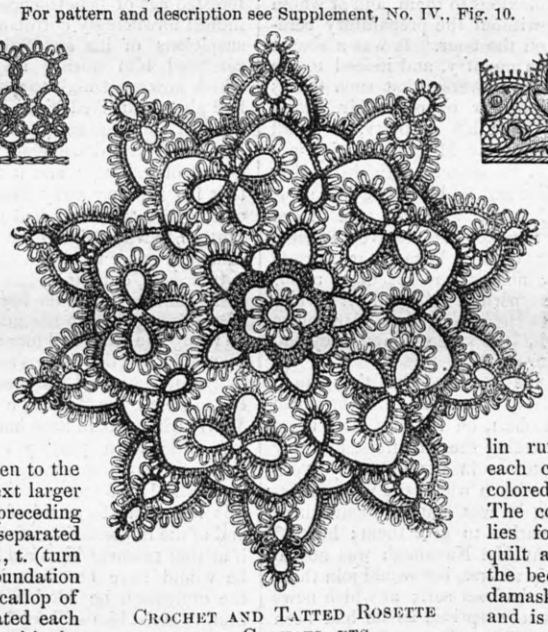

CROCHET AND TATTED ROSETTE FOR CRAVATS, ETC.

Fig. 4.—SECTION OF NEEDLE-WORK COLLAR, FIG. 3.

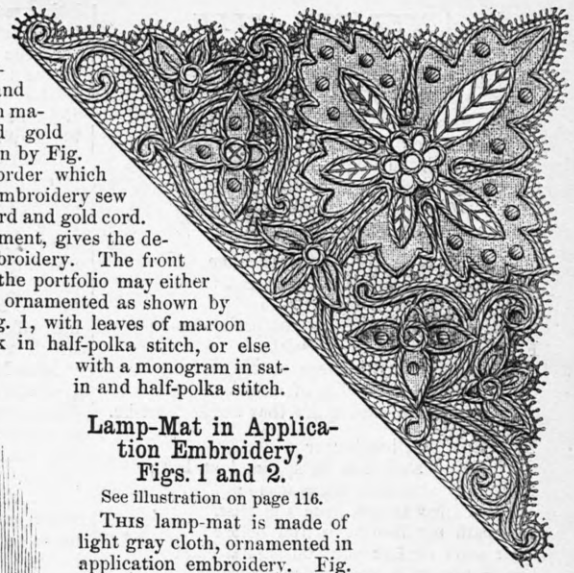

Fig. 3.—NEEDLE-WORK COLLAR. [See Fig. 4.]

Lamp-Mat in Application Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 116.

THIS lamp-mat is made of light gray cloth, ornamented in application embroidery. Fig. 1, page 116, shows the full mat reduced in size, and Fig. 2 shows a full-sized section of the mat. For those parts of the outer edge which appear darkest in the illustrations apply red cloth, for the medium shades blue cloth, and for the lightest parts white cloth. The satin stitch embroidery on several white design figures is worked with blue saddler's silk; the lines and arabesque drawings are worked in half-polka stitch with yellow silk. All the design figures are edged with fine yellow silk cord. Instead of this, the outlines of the design figures may be worked in half-polka or chain stitch with yellow saddler's silk. The outer edge of the mat is bordered with coarse yellow silk braid and with silk fringe of the same color; the fringe may be gray instead of yellow. A lining of gray woolen reps with an interlining of card-board completes the lamp-mat.

Bedstead with Bedding, Figs. 1–3.

See illustrations on page 116.

THIS bedstead is of walnut, with inlaid and raised ornaments of ebony and bronze. The bedding consists of a green silk quilt with fine linen cover, embroidered on the outer edge, which is buttoned on the quilt. Figs. 2 and 3 give two patterns for quilts. The cover of the quilt Fig. 2 is of linen, ornamented in English embroidery, for which Fig. 45, Supplement, gives the design (including the crosswise side of one corner). The cover of the quilt Fig. 3 is cut in tabs on the outer edge and button-hole stitched; a piece of pleated lace is set between every two tabs. The pillow-case is also of fine linen, ornamented on the edge with netted guipure insertion and with an embroidery figure in each corner. The next Supplement number will contain a full-sized illustration of the pillow-case. The pillow is trimmed on the edge with two Swiss muslin ruffles, and on each corner with a colored ribbon bow. The coverlet, which lies folded on the quilt at the foot of the bed, may be of damask, percale, etc., and is edged on the outer edge with lace or ruffles. The curtains are of Swiss muslin, trimmed with a wide embroidered border; Fig. 46, Supplement, gives the design for the border. The embroidery is worked in satin and half-polka stitch; tulle is underlaid for the parts of the design marked with small ×'s. The upper open-work edge of the border is worked in English embroidery.

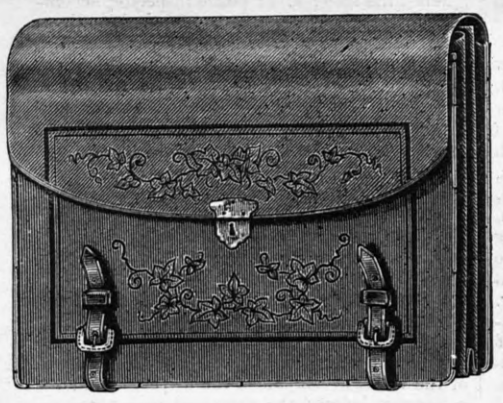

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED PORTFOLIO.—FRONT.
For design see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 26.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED PORTFOLIO.—BACK.
For design see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 26.

Embroidered Portfolio, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS portfolio is designed for holding valuable papers, etc. It is of inlaid maroon Russia leather, brass bound on the edges, and furnished with leather straps and buckles and a metal clasp with lock. The back of the portfolio is ornamented in embroidery simulating the emblems of commerce, in half-polka stitch and point Russe with maroon silk and gold thread, as shown by Fig. 2. For the border which surrounds the embroidery sew on silk round cord and gold cord. Fig. 26, Supplement, gives the design for the embroidery. The front of the portfolio may either be ornamented as shown by Fig. 1, with leaves of maroon silk in half-polka stitch, or else with a monogram in satin and half-polka stitch.

Needle-work Borders for Pillow-Cases, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 116.

THESE borders are worked on linen, batiste, or Swiss muslin with embroidery cotton in satin and half-polka stitch. The dotted parts of the designs may be filled in with backstitching. For the open-work edge of the border Fig. 2 work a row of hem-stitching, or else crochet an open-work round of double crochet.

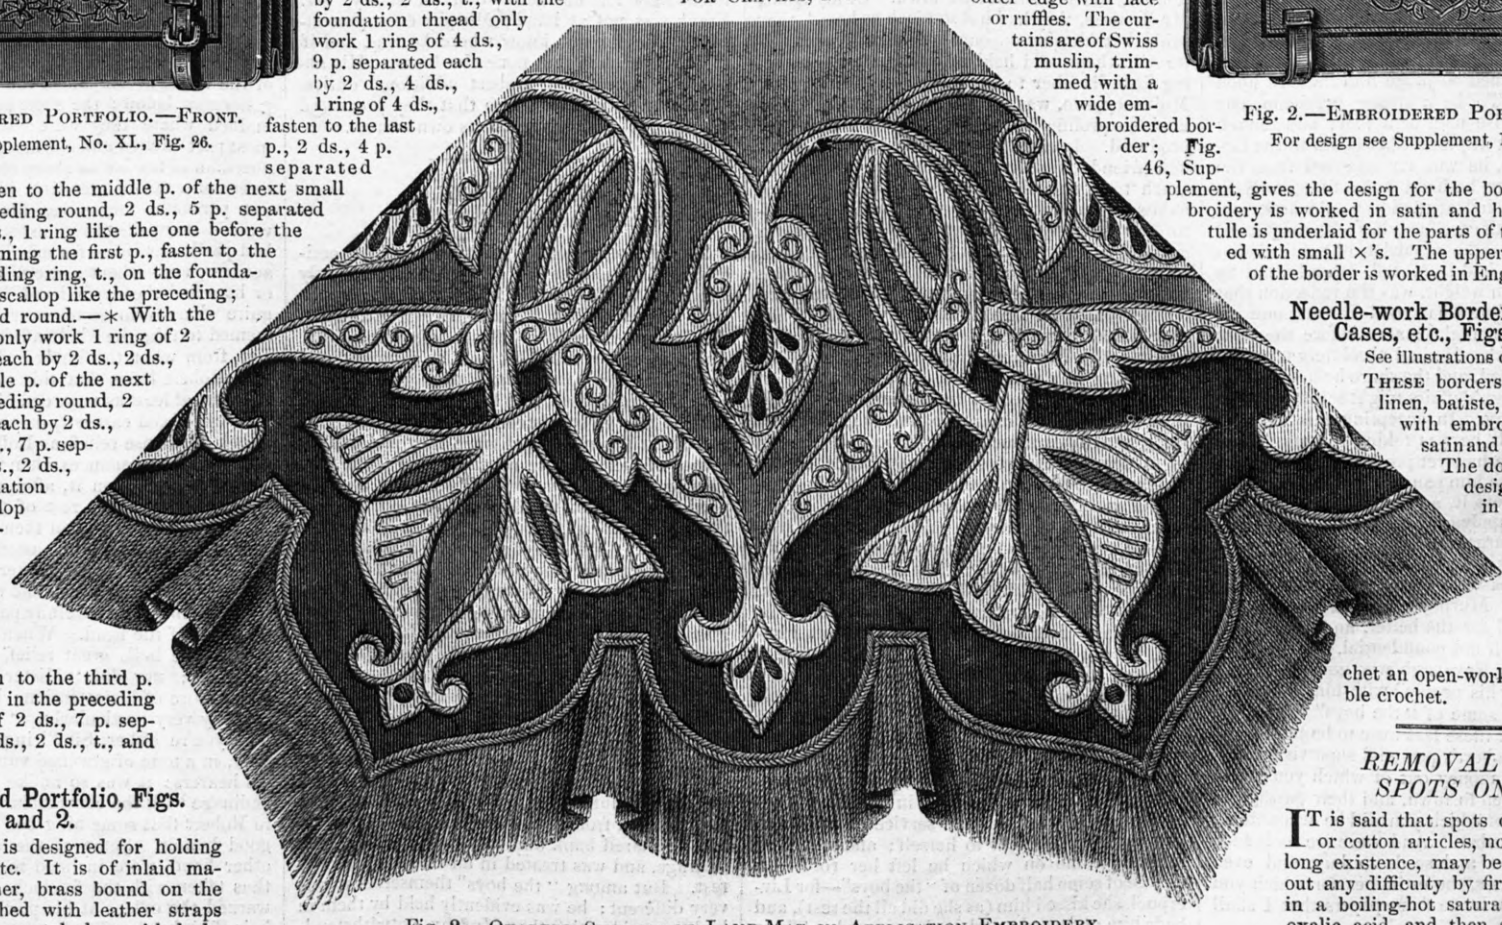

Fig. 2.—QUARTER SECTION OF LAMP-MAT IN APPLICATION EMBROIDERY. FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 1, Page 116.]

REMOVAL OF RUST SPOTS ON LINEN.

IT is said that spots of rust on linen or cotton articles, no matter of how long existence, may be removed without any difficulty by first dipping them in a boiling-hot saturated solution of oxalic acid, and then sprinkling them with very fine tin filings.

Hosted by Google

AFTER THE APPLE.

By KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

Behind me clang the golden doors
No strength of mine may ope again;
Before me stretch the wild, waste shores
These hands to harvest fields must train.
My last look, turning to the skies
Of Eden that I lose to-day,
Sees but the lightnings of your eyes,
Like flaming swords to bar the way.

You stand there, in your innocence,
Amazed, indignant at such end:
Judging a passion too intense
For unformed souls to comprehend.
From you within to me without
A distance as from sea to sea
Outbroadens—the abyss of doubt
'Twixt dream and wake that needs must be.

Yet think not, howsoever wide,
That gulf shall not be spanned at last;
Nor fancy shoreless deeps divide
The exiled future from the past.
The path my feet have trod before
Or soon or late you too shall tread:
I may not walk your Eden more,
But you will come to me instead.

For, various of taste, I trow
That, since our common mother's fall,
Some fruit upon that self-same bough
Hath ripened for the lips of all;
And hang it low or hang it high,
And be the flavor sour or sweet,
For you in turn the time draws nigh
To pluck the apple and to eat.

Till then perchance 'tis well your eyes
Should scathe me with their ignorant scorns;
Go shelter in your Paradise,
And leave me here among the thorns.
But when you too, without the gates,
Look, shuddering, o'er the desert bare,
Then turn—and pardon one who waits
To make a pathway for you there.

MURPHY'S MASTER.

By JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

IN CHARGE.

While Robert was still hesitating whether to remain where he was, alone, or to return to Mulvaney's, Murphy reappeared, and bade him accompany him into the town to procure his outfit, for which Mr. Denton had provided the means. The warning which he had just received respecting the danger of the connection he was thus about to form was still ringing in his ears, and had not been without its effect; it had manifestly been given out of gratitude to himself, and not at all with any desire to prejudice him against his would-be benefactor; and, moreover, the very fact of Kavanagh's having concealed his own name (as he had manifestly done) from one on such intimate relations with him as "Miss Mary" was no small corroboration of her words. If he was "Mr. Wilson" to her, it was pretty certain that he had very valid reasons for adopting an alias as respected others; and an alias, as even Robert was aware, is not ordinarily used except by persons who are at odds with the law of the land. On the other hand, from certain obscure hints and more openly expressed sentiments which he had heard both from Murphy and Mrs. Mulvaney, he had reason to believe that the offenses, if any, which Mr. Kavanagh had committed were of a political character, connected with some discontented faction in Ireland, and he was not inclined to judge him harshly upon that account. To be a strong politician, one needs to be a wise man or a fool; and though Robert could not at present lay claim to the former designation, he was far removed from the latter. Moreover, he had taken a liking to Kavanagh, and personal attraction would have had force enough in his case (as it has with most men) to have overcome the repulsion of political disagreement, even had it existed. Lastly, but by no means least in weight, was the reflection that if he should decline what good Fortune now offered to him, he might starve before the next turn of her wheel. He had absolutely no other means of livelihood, and the share he had already taken in Kavanagh's affairs might seriously affect his procuring any. In accepting this outfit at his hands, he felt he was taking the most decisive step that life had yet presented to him, and it might well give him pause. In the end, however, he did accept it, and what seemed to him a most ample supply of clothes and other necessaries into the bargain.

The sense of his having thus thrown in his lot with his new master seemed also to extend to his companion. Murphy's manner toward him at once changed for the better, and he became communicative, if not confidential. He informed him that Mr. Kavanagh was going to take a good many of "his people" with him to foreign parts, including some of "the boys" from Mulvaney's, and that these last were to be put for the present under Robert's personal supervision.

"Here is the money out of which you are to pay for their keep in town, and their passage to Liverpool, and for which you will be accountable to the young masther. And there are tools such as emigrants use and seeds to buy, and even ready-made houses, the estimates for which you will make out at home from papers that I shall give you."

If Murphy's master had been the most calculating man alive, instead of the most impulsive, he could never have hit upon a better plan to insure the zeal and fidelity of his new adherent. To be trusted with money and the conduct of affairs was a compliment that a young man of Robert's character thoroughly appreciated, while his simplicity did not permit him to perceive that the work thus provided for him at Mrs. Mulvaney's would have the effect of keeping him well employed and close within-doors. Indeed, when Murphy added a hint—very different from his former imperative injunctions—as to the inexpediency of appearing in public, his young companion took it in excellent part, and assured him that he considered his previous promise to keep himself concealed was still binding. From all which we may gather that while Robert and "Miss Mary" were having their private interview above stairs Mr. Murphy had once more met Mr. Denton below, and had received from him instructions which had the same force as though they had come from the "young masther" in person.

For the remainder of his stay at Mulvaney's, which extended for several days, Robert could no more complain of finding time heavy on his hands. The accounts which he had to deal with were really upon an extensive scale, and demanded his best attention, and when he was not engaged with them the specimens of humanity placed under his control afforded him occupation of another sort. From the observations that he had formerly taken of these through the parlor window he had set them down as being at once both shy and suspicious; but as soon as they understood from Murphy the powers that had been delegated to his young companion, they at once threw off that character, and toward himself at least became all artlessness and candor. From them, indeed, he learned far more of their own affairs and of those of his employer than perhaps the latter had bargained for. Mr. Frank Kavanagh was, it seemed, the proprietor of a large estate in Tipperary, and had been mixed up with certain illegal proceedings which these gentlemen euphoniously termed "the Troubles." He was beloved by his tenants, or, at all events, by the poorer portion of them; and having failed in some experiment he had attempted, or caused others to attempt, for their benefit—which Robert could not but suspect was no less than a revolution—was now assisting them to emigrate. He had, on the other hand, a younger brother, Louis, who was obnoxious to them, and of whom they never spoke without the preparatory ceremony of spitting on the floor. It was a shame and disgrace to the country, and indeed to the administration of the universe, that such things should be, but somehow or other Mr. Frank had been ousted from his property, or at all events a portion of it, by Mr. Louis, who was little better than a Sassenach, notwithstanding the good blood that ran in his veins, but so it was; and now, disgusted with this side of the world, the young masther had resolved to push his fortune in the other. What that fortune might be they did not care to speculate upon, so long as they were permitted to share it; while of the voyage before them, as well as of the place—Australia—to which they were bound, they had the most inaccurate notions.

To begin with, they believed that they would only be at sea for a day or two, and that the world was quite flat. Robert, on his part, told them what he knew respecting these matters, but they took very little interest in them. They were chiefly solicitous to learn where the young masther was, and what he was doing; about which he had no information to give them: he told them, however, that Mr. Kavanagh was not to be on board the ship at first, but would join them somewhere, after it had set sail; at which news they seemed to be as surprised as he had been himself, and somewhat cast down. Of his agent, Mr. Denton, they had not so much as heard, they said; but Murphy appeared to be a great favorite with them, and held in much respect, as being foster-brother to the young masther. Mrs. Mulvaney, too, was as good a soul as Ould Ireland, so prolific in excellent persons, had ever produced. It could not be denied that Robert's new friends were grossly ignorant, devoted as much to liquor as to patriotism, dirty in their habits, dependent in their ideas, and so far affording as strong a contrast to his own character as could be imagined; but they had, nevertheless, some admirable qualities of their own, which made themselves at least equally apparent, and on the whole he liked them very well. They were faithful, grateful, trustful, and, as is only possible with Irishmen, contrived somehow, without having any thing to bestow, to exhibit an extraordinary generosity to one another. They were full of good humor, too, and fun, the latter being sometimes of such an uproarious description as to demand the personal interference of the widow, who, on such occasions, did not hesitate to put it down, very literally, with the strong hand. To this domestic police they were submissive enough; and perhaps Mrs. Mulvaney's method of dealing with "these children of a larger growth" might have been, in some respects, imitated with advantage by some very superior authorities. Her behavior toward Robert himself, though uniformly kind and pleasant, was not what it had been; nor was she on the same familiar footing with Murphy as before their quarrel. To the latter, indeed, her manner had become quite stiff and formal, while to Robert it was only reticent, and not unmingled, as it struck him, with a sort of silent pity.

Whatever she may have had in her mind, however, respecting him or the service on which he had entered, she kept to herself; and when the morning came on which he left her roof—in charge of some half dozen of "the boys"—for Liverpool, she kissed him (as she did all the rest), and bade him godspeed; and so they parted. There was, nevertheless, a certain doubtful trembling in her honest voice as she spoke that farewell, which did not escape Robert Chesney's notice, and somehow recalled to him the warning that he had received in Herne Street from lips more fair, but not more friendly. It was much too late, however, even if he had wished to do so, to recede from what he had undertaken now, and though the circumstance recurred to him afterward, he forgot it in the incidents of the journey; while, on his arrival at Liverpool, where he reported himself at Lloyd Brothers', according to instructions, he found a letter awaiting him from Lizzy, the contents of which, together with the duties that devolved upon him with respect to the emigrants, gave him plenty of other occupation for his thoughts. Mrs. Alston, always in delicate health, had fallen ill, dangerously so, as he could read through poor Lizzy's transparent expressions of hope—and there was bad news, in another way, of James. The latter was a somewhat morose-tempered lad, easily led where dissipation was in view, and of idle habits. Brought up to assist his father in his duties as gamekeeper, he had contracted a taste for sport, which he was not now in a position to gratify without the most serious risks, though placed amidst the greatest temptations to do so. Disappointed in the hope of succeeding to his father's post, and doing only occasional work for a neighboring farmer, he lived on at the old place, where the hares started under his feet, and the pheasants whirred about his ears, with more spare time on his hands than was good for him, and not without acquaintances to point out how profitably he might spend it. In a word, he had taken to poaching—a pursuit which in his case could not long escape detection. Nay, by one person at least it had already been detected; and herein lay for Robert Chesney the bitterest news of all. The man who had discovered the crime was John Rowland, his own step-father, and the use he was making of his knowledge was to endeavor to win Lizzy for himself. Robert could see that, though Lizzy at present could not. She only spoke of Mr. Rowland's forbearance in having spared her brother for her sake, and of his unlooked-for forethought in not having revealed the delinquency to her mother, upon whom such a discovery might just now have had fatal effects.

To be poor, alas! is often to be powerless, and Robert could do no more than warn the innocent girl against the wiles of one whom he himself knew far too well to believe capable of a disinterested act of benevolence. Lizzy's letter had indeed unwittingly corroborated for him certain suspicions of his step-father that had already rendered him uneasy upon her account, and which now went nigh to madden him. Rowland had always disliked him; but of late months his conduct had been so systematically cruel that he had found it hard to explain it, save on one ground—that of jealousy; and it now occurred to him that his running away from home was the very object that this man had desired, and that his brutal behavior might even have been in part assumed in order to obtain that end.

Outraged, outwitted, but also a penniless outcast, what could he do beyond putting the unsuspecting girl upon her guard? When he went on board the ship, and found it crowded not with men only, but their wives and daughters, how he longed to have had the means at his disposal to have offered the Alstons a passage to the New World: if he could have had his Lizzy with him, safe alike from poverty and persecution, how light of heart, how strong of hope, would he not have been! So enraptured, indeed, was he with this idea that, forgetful of her mother's illness, and of the impossibility of the ship being delayed, if at that moment he could have seen his patron, he would have besought him, notwithstanding the obligation he felt himself already under to him, to assist him still further in this strait. But fortunately for his reputation for sanity, Mr. Frank was not at hand; Murphy even protested that he did not know where he was, and if so, it was certain that none else knew. His absence entailed upon Robert additional duties, which were so far welcome that they prevented his mind from dwelling on its own sorrow.

CHAPTER VIII.

OUTWARD BOUND.

There were more than two hundred emigrants of both sexes and all ages, though mostly adults, on board the ship, and out of these about sixty came from Mr. Kavanagh's estate, and had their expenses wholly or in part defrayed by him. These were for the most part as ignorant and helpless as the contingent Robert had brought with him from town, and he had the supervision of them all; to supplement their too scanty outfits, or, in the rare cases when they had a little money of their own, to restrain them from purchasing unnecessary articles, was only a small portion of his task, which extended from keeping their accounts to locating them in their respective berths. Mr. Denton was ill, much worse, to all appearance, than when Robert had met him in town, and was recommended by the doctors not to go on board until the last moment; and Murphy, from his ignorance, and bad example as respected indulgence in drink, was worse than useless as a coadjutor. One man only was of help to Robert—a weather-beaten, wiry old fellow of sixty years of age or so, whom "the boys" called Mister Maguire. The "Maguire" was open to little question, but the reason of the "Mister" was by no means self-evident. Except that he had a more intelligent air, his appearance in no way differed from that of his fellow-emigrants; and he shared bunk and board with them in the steerage, and was treated in all respects like the rest. But among "the boys" themselves it was very different; he was evidently held by them in higher consideration than Murphy, notwithstanding that that gentleman enjoyed (as did Robert likewise) the privilege of a second-class berth, and his suggestions rarely failed to command obedience, even from the most unreasonable. His assistance, therefore, was invaluable to one whose delegated authority—in the absence of him who had bestowed it—would not otherwise, perhaps, have had much weight; and, moreover, in matters relating to shipboard—of which, of course, Robert knew nothing—he was thoroughly at home: it was pretty certain, indeed, although he did not parade the fact, that at one time in his life, at least, Mr. Maguire had been a sailor. It was not till they had been at Liverpool a week that all was ready for sailing (for the ship, being for emigrants only, awaited the convenience of her passengers), and Mr. Denton came on board. He looked very white and ill, and was carried up the side on a sort of litter, and at once conveyed to his own cabin. That of Mr. Kavanagh still stood empty, and the only tidings of him were as vague as before—that he "would join them somewhere on the voyage."

On a certain Saturday morning, the tide serving and the wind being favorable, the anchor was weighed, and the ship set sail. A few minutes after she began to move a large black boat shot out from one of the docks ahead of them, and pulled straight for the vessel.

"What is that?" asked Robert, who was standing on the forecastle, of Maguire, who stood beside him.

"That's the police galley," returned he, with a crooked smile, which might, however, have been caused by his having his pipe in his mouth. "I only wish I was the steersman."

"Why?" inquired Robert, simply.

"Because, with this free wind and some unskillful handling of the wheel, there might be a lucky accident."

It was impossible, from his sarcastic tone, as well as from the truculent expression of his eyes, to doubt that what Mr. Maguire intended to express was that he would run her down. Robert had seen enough of his new companions to feel small surprise at any enmity they might exhibit toward the police authorities, whether on land or sea; still, his companion's views in that quarter did seem a little "advanced," considering the smallness of the provocation for them.

"Is it unusual, then," asked he, "for the police to board vessels at the last moment? They don't mean any particular harm to us, I suppose?"

"I never heard of their meaning any particular good," returned the other, grimly.

Robert himself began to feel uncomfortable: occupied with his own sorrows, and still more with his multifarious duties, he had almost forgotten the apprehensions under which he had labored while at Mulvaney's, but at this moment all the incidents of that night in which he had first made acquaintance with his present patron recurred to him. Kavanagh, indeed, was not on board, but he himself and Murphy were, and it was more than possible that it was on their account that this unwelcome visit was about to be paid. Without absolutely wishing that Mister Maguire was at the wheel, he regarded the approach of the galley with considerable anxiety as it drew nearer and nearer. Presently it reached the ship; and a police inspector, accompanied by two men armed with pistol and cutlass, came on board. The captain was summoned, a written parchment handed to him, and then orders were given to slacken sail, and for all hands, except the women and children, to come on deck. The inspector, with the list of the passengers in his hand, first compared the numbers.

"There are two cabin passengers on the list," observed he, curtly.

"There are so," replied the captain: "one is Mr. Denton, whom you will find below, ill in his cot; the other is Mr. Kavanagh, not come on board."

"That remains to be seen," said the inspector, significantly. "I must search the ship, and then examine all here. See that no one leaves the deck. Where is this Mr. Denton?" An officer of the vessel accompanied the inspector and one policeman below; the crew and passengers remained where they were; the latter, for the most part excited and alarmed, and watching the guardian of the law as sheep regard a dog, whose intentions, notwithstanding his office, they can not persuade themselves are friendly. Some wore a more dismayed aspect, as though they had particular cause for misgivings on their own account, and others a more menacing, as fear or hate had the upper hand. Murphy and Maguire alone, who stood apart by the bulwarks, seemed to take the whole affair as one of course. Yet, from what the latter had just observed to him, Robert knew that this was far from being the case, at least as regarded Maguire; both had their eyes fixed earnestly on the after-deck; and a look of intense relief, as Robert fancied, came over their countenances when presently the three men appeared upon it, after their examination of the cabins. The rest of the ship was next thoroughly searched, and then commenced a personal examination of the astonished passengers. This was proceeded with after a very extraordinary fashion: every man had to take off his cap, while the inspector carefully passed his hand over the front of the head. When he came to Chesney, to the lad's great relief, he did not delay a second; nor did "Mister Maguire" occupy much more of his attention; but he scrutinized Murphy very particularly. "Is it a lock of my hair you're afther, Sir?" inquired that gentleman, in a tone of gratified vanity that convulsed his hearers: it was so unlike him to indulge in badinage with the constabulary, that it was clear to Robert that something had put him into high good humor. Some of the emigrants, on the other hand, were inclined to resent this liberty thus taken with the forelocks, and one of them warned the officer at his peril not to touch one hair of his head. But here, again, Murphy turned the matter into mirth, by observing: "Sure,

Hosted by Google

Mike, and do you suppose the officer would do it if so be he hadn't got his gloves on?" Finally, the captain himself contributed his quota to the general amusement by taking off his cap and exhibiting a head almost entirely bald, which he begged to offer to the consideration of the examiner. The search having thus proved fruitless, the inspector and his myrmidons took their leave, and the vessel, which had slackened sail in obedience to his orders, resumed her course.

Though cold, the weather was clear and bright, and the sea-air and sunshine rapidly restored Robert Chesney's spirits. He had the utmost confidence in Lizzy's fidelity to himself; and since all had been done in putting her on her guard that could be done, what use was there in dwelling on what might after all be an imaginary trouble? So Youth, with its practical good sense, can reason, while Age, bowed by sad experience, carries the burden in anticipation. He had an exemption, too, from another sort of trouble, from which youth has by no means a universal immunity: he never felt seasick, except when his duties called him to visit his charges in the steerage, which offered a scene that is, very literally, better imagined than described. Irishmen make good soldiers, but they are not good sailors—at least to begin with. Their wit died out of them, their sentimental regrets vanished; their pigs, their potatoes, their potheen, nay, patriotism itself, were all forgotten in the wretched excitement of that game of pitch-and-toss, in which their all, or what seemed their all, was lost twenty times a day. Even the absence of the young masther was for the time no longer commented upon by his unhappy adherents. On the other hand, it began to disturb Robert very much. To them the assurance that Mr. Kavanagh would join them on the voyage had been perfectly satisfactory: there were doubtless a dozen ports between Liverpool and Australia, at any one of which they might touch, and behold him on the quay. But to one whose geographical knowledge was more accurate, matters began to look very suspicious. If the recent visit of the officers of justice had been foreseen, it was easy to understand why Mr. Kavanagh had not put in an appearance; and Robert had judged it probable that he had embarked on board some fishing smack, or other vessel, for the purpose of being picked up when the Star of Erin (as their own ship was named) had got some few miles down the Channel. But as time went on, and they began to near the open sea, this expectation grew less and less, till it faded altogether. He would have insisted upon an explanation from Mr. Denton but that that gentleman was reported to be mortally ill, and none but Murphy (out of whom he could get nothing but evasive replies) was admitted to his cabin. There was nothing for it, therefore, but to await as patiently as he could the course of events. He would certainly not have embarked on board the Star of Erin had he not believed that Mr. Kavanagh was to have accompanied him; but, after all, he had had his passage paid to the New World, and was even in receipt of a small salary as general manager for his patron's clients. In this capacity, indeed, he enjoyed a considerable consideration, not only with the emigrants, but even with the captain himself. They had been at sea nearly a week, and were out of sight of land, when that gentleman, being engaged on deck one evening, happened to request Robert to fetch for him some article out of his cabin. To obey this request it was necessary to pass the door of Mr. Denton's berth, and as he did so he was surprised to hear from within it the sound of uproarious laughter. It was Murphy's laugh, to be sure, but it seemed strange that even Murphy should indulge in such hilarity at the bedside of one supposed to be dangerously ill. On his return, not only was the sound renewed, but the cabin door opened just as he was about to pass it, and out came both Murphy and Maguire, the former evidently in the highest spirits, the latter cold and quiet-looking as usual.

"I am glad Mr. Denton is better," observed Robert, significantly. "I hope there is now no reason why I should be denied admittance to him?"

"He's ill—he's very ill still," began Murphy, becoming suddenly sedate and sad.

"Stuff and nonsense!" said Maguire, contemptuously. "Why keep up this farce, Dick, before Mr. Chesney, who, after all, is one of ourselves?—Mr. Denton can hardly be seen to-night, Sir, being, in point of fact—"

"Under the influence of a sleeping-draught," interrupted Murphy, gravely.

"Just so," continued Maguire; "but if you require a plain answer to a plain question or two, I shall be happy to tell you all you want to know over a pipe on the foksale."

Robert thought it strange enough that he should be thus referred to "Mister Maguire" for an explanation of such importance, but he was too desirous of obtaining it to do aught than close with the offer. In a few minutes the two were seated under shelter from the freshening breeze, each with a pipe in his mouth; they were quite alone, except for the watch—the emigrants being all in their bunks even at that comparatively early hour: a thousand stars were shining overhead; the breeze rang in the shrouds, but there was no other sound, save when a wave larger than common struck the vessel on her quarter, and made her shiver from stem to stern.

"Now what is it you want to know, young man?" inquired Maguire.

"I want to know several things," replied Robert, piqued by his companion's tone, and also, perhaps, by the reflection that a confidence had been reposed in him which had been denied to himself. "Firstly, why have I been told by Mr. Denton that Mr. Kavanagh, my employer, was to join us on our voyage, when that was not the case?"

"Let us confine ourselves to facts," replied the other, puffing slowly at his pipe. "Leave out 'when that was not the case,' and the answer is easy: Mr. Kavanagh is on board the ship at this present moment."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

HARDY PLANTS AND SHRUBS OF CURIOUS FOLIAGE.

ONE of our lady readers requests some information on this subject, but before proceeding to give it, it is necessary to have a distinct understanding as to the meaning of the term "hardy." Among horticulturists it is used in a strict sense to designate plants, shrubs, or trees that can resist the effects of the cold in the latitude in which they are planted, so that the term becomes relative, for a plant may be hardy at New York city and not hardy at Albany or Boston. Half-hardy plants are those that require protection in winter by being strawed up or cased in by boards, or by being kept in a cold frame or pit not artificially heated; tender plants are those that require protection in winter in structures artificially heated, such as a greenhouse or a warm pit. There is another class of plants, however, that by some persons are called "hardy," which thrive well during the summer, become dormant during the autumn, and can be kept in a cellar free of frost during the winter, and be replanted in the garden again the ensuing summer; of this class are the cannas, some caladiums, gladiolas, dahlias, tuberoses, and others; it is to such plants, we presume, our lady reader alludes. These we will notice after giving the information sought in regard to the really hardy shrubs and plants of the class designated, premising that, unless otherwise noted, they are all hardy as far north as the southern parts of New Hampshire and Vermont.

SHRUBS WITH COLORED AND VARIEGATED FOLIAGE.

Variegated-leaved Althea.—Of this there are two sorts; the best is the one originated by Mr. Buist, of Philadelphia; it is constant in its variegation, which the other sort is not.

Purple-leaved Barberry.—Has reddish-purple leaves.

Variegated-leaved Corchorus.—A dwarf-growing variety of the well-known corchorus of recent introduction.

Cornus, or Dogwood.—Of this there is a variegated-leaved variety of the red-twigged species; a variety of the Cornelian cherry, with the foliage variegated with white, very fine; and a variety of the Siberian dogwood, in which the foliage is dark green with a yellow stripe down the centre of the leaf. There is also a very beautiful variegated-leaved dogwood from Japan, but it is not yet in the nursery catalogues.

Deutzia gracilis.—There is a variegated-leaved variety of this lovely little shrub.

Elder-berry.—Of this common shrub there are a silver-leaved, a golden-leaved, and a margined-leaved variety, and of another species (Sambucus racemosus) there is also a variety with beautifully variegated leaves.

Hazel-nut.—A variety of this shrub with large dark purple leaves is very distinct and showy.

Hydrangea.—Of this there are two varieties with variegated leaves, one having yellow and the other white markings; they require a moist, shady situation, and to be strawed up in winter.

Privet, or Prim.—There is a variety of this shrub that has yellow and yellow-blotched and green leaves on the same plant.

Snow-berry.—Of this there is a variety with finely variegated foliage.

Spirea opulifolia.—There is a variety of this species with conspicuous yellow-tinted foliage.

Viburnum plicatum.—A beautiful variety of this elegant shrub, with finely variegated leaves, has been recently introduced from Japan, but it is not yet placed in the nursery catalogues.

Weigela amabilis.—Of this there are two variegated-leaved varieties, one being much dwarfer than the other. We think the taller one the finest of the two; it is a beautiful shrub.

Daphne cneorum.—Of this lovely little shrub there is a golden variegated-leaved variety; it requires a covering of leaves in winter. It is evergreen.

Euonymus radicans.—A variety of this has glaucous green leaves edged with white; it trails on the ground like running myrtle. E. japonica.—Of this species there are several varieties with variegated foliage of different markings and various shaped leaves. They are evergreen, and require strawing up in winter or being protected with cedar branches. E. europæus, or Spindle-tree.—Of this there are a purple-leaved and a variegated-leaved variety, both pretty.

Viburnum opulus, the Snow-ball, or Guelder Rose.—Of this there is a variegated-leaved variety, and also a similar variety of another species, V. lantana.

Syringa, or Mock-orange.—There is a variegated-leaved variety of this well-known plant, and also a similar variety of another species known as Philadelphus nepalensis.

Salix caprea.—Of this species of shrubby willow there are two variegated-leaved varieties; one in which the foliage is green and white, and another known as S. caprea tricolor, in which the edges of the leaves are tinted with red. The first is a strong-growing shrub, and the latter of dwarfer growth.

Tree Box.—There are two varieties of this shrub with variegated foliage—one with gold stripes, the other with yellow stripes. North of New York they will require protection with cedar boughs.

Cissus quinquefolia.—This is a very pretty climber, of which there is a variety with mottled foliage.

Lonicera brachypoda.—The golden variegated-leaved variety of this honeysuckle is one of, if not the finest of all the hardy variegated-leaved shrubs. If we could only grow one climber it should be this.

SHRUBS WITH PECULIAR FOLIAGE.

Elder-berry.—There is a laciniated or cut-leaved variety of our common elder; and also another variety called Sambucus heterophylla, in which the leaves are of various shapes.

Persian Lilac.—There is a cut-leaved variety of this shrub which is very desirable on account of its graceful growth as well as its flowers.

Mahonia aquifolia.—Is a beautiful evergreen plant with bright deep green prickly foliage and showy yellow flowers. M. japonica has similar colored large pinnate prickly foliage; and M. nepalensis has similar pinnate foliage of a yellowish-green color. All three are of a striking character.

Aralia japonica.—Is a tall shrub, or small tree, with striking doubly pinnated foliage and large clusters of white flowers in August or September. This shrub has a decided Oriental aspect.

Catalpa bungeana.—Is a Chinese species of the catalpa; it grows about five or six feet high, branching up densely from the roots, having large heart-shaped leaves, and is of a very striking appearance.

The Cut-leaved Filbert has laciniated or cut-leaved foliage, and is very curious.

Aristolochia sipho, or Dutchman's Pipe.—Is a climbing plant of strong growth, with very large heart-shaped foliage, producing a very bold effect.

The Kilmarnock Weeping-willow is very unique in appearance, with brown branches and large, glossy leaves; the branches are altogether pendulous, growing stiffly downward. The Rosemary-leaved Willow is an elegant glaucous-leaved species, forming a round head; the branches are quite plumy in their growth. The American Weeping-willow is a light, airy growing species with slender branches and glaucous foliage. These three sorts are generally grafted on a stronger-growing species from three to six feet high. They should not be mixed with other shrubs, but should be planted as single specimens on the lawn or in courtyards.

There have been introduced into the nurseries lately some remarkable varieties of maples from Japan, the foliage of some being purple of various shades, some are beautifully variegated, and others have the foliage laciniated in the most curious and extraordinary manner. We have some fourteen or fifteen varieties of them.

Having in this article noted the hardy shrubs having variegated or curious foliage, we will in a succeeding article give notes of hardy herbaceous plants of similar character.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHAT shall we do with it?—the snow, of course, we mean—is the constantly recurring question, as each fresh snow-storm falls into the overcrowded streets of our city. We have experienced unusual annoyances and inconveniences, and try to believe that the winter is so exceptional that we shall not soon again suffer to such an extent. But present evils always assume huge proportions; and judging by the complaints uttered at the time, our winters, and summers too, are exceptionally bad every year. It may help us to endure our own inconveniences with less irritation of spirit to bear in mind the greater sufferings of others.

From the Western States, particularly from Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin, there have come terrible accounts of the fatal effects of recent storms. A few detached incidents will be read with painful interest. At Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, when the blinding, drifting storm came on, a school-teacher dismissed her scholars with an injunction to go home speedily. But seven little ones lost their way, and were found frozen to death, some of them in each other's arms. A more prudent teacher kept forty scholars in the school-house three days, risking his own life every day in going through drifts four or five feet deep to get food for them. A stage-coach with eight passengers and a driver left Madelia for St. James. Not arriving in season, search was made, and the horses, driver, and all the passengers were found frozen to death. Many others were frozen to death, or lost in the drifts and perished. Some singular experiences are mentioned. One man went to his stable to attend to his cattle, and so rapidly were the huge drifts formed that he was completely blockaded, and kept a prisoner in the stable, with neither fire nor food, for forty-eight hours. In the mean time his house, a few yards off—a rude construction in the side of a hill—was buried under a bank of snow ten feet in height, with his family in it. After gaining an exit from the stable he with much difficulty effected an entrance into the house, where he happily found his wife and little ones safe. The roof of the house, however, had settled three feet. Another man dug a trench in the snow, in which he passed sixty-nine hours, with no food except some roots he dug up with his knife and some leather he cut from his boots. A teamster, overtaken by the storm, was forced to leave his horses, as they refused to go further. He succeeded in finding a hay-stack, into which he dug his way and found shelter. Such are some of the perils of Western snow-storms.

Too much care in the use of matches can not be taken. If they are thoughtlessly or heedlessly dropped upon the floor they may be the cause of great calamities. A few days ago, while a young lady of this city was dressing for a party, she suddenly discovered that her underskirts were on fire, and the flames rapidly creeping up her silk evening dress. Her mother, who was near her, was so terrified that she could only scream for help. Fortunately her father was at home, and rushing into the room, succeeded in extinguishing the flames, but not until both his daughter and himself were severely burned. It should always be borne in mind that when a person's clothes take fire, the surest and safest way to extinguish it is to lay the person on the floor, and crush out the flames—with some woolen article if possible. If one's garments are on fire, the flames naturally shoot upward, and become immediately dangerous to life. A horizontal position is the safest that can be assumed.

It is a matter of great regret that the Shakspearean library of Edwin Forrest, which had been assiduously collected during many years, should have been entirely destroyed, with the exception of a single volume. A fine copy of the first folio edition of 1623, worth from $1500 to $2000, was among the volumes consumed. Only thirty-nine copies of this folio are in existence, so far as is known. The finest one is owned by Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and is valued at $10,000.

Report says that a chest containing $30,000 in coin, and marked with Captain Kidd's name, has been dug up near Cape May. The pirate's name settles the whole matter.

Secretary Robeson is noted for quick-witted replies and good sayings. The other evening at the President's levee, while talking with one lady the Secretary stepped on the train of another standing behind him. The wearer of the train, feeling herself fastened to the spot, turned, but noticing that the gentleman was immovable, said, "I beg pardon, Mr. Secretary, you are standing on my train."

Secretary Robeson turned instantly, and replied, "Though I may not have the power to draw a mortal from the skies, I have pinned an angel to the earth."

"Oh, Mr. Secretary," exclaimed the lady, "please step on my train again. I want to be an angel, and I'd rather not move."

Skillful surgery accomplishes wonders. In November, 1871, an Austrian lieutenant while in barracks had his nose cut off by a sabre. The piece cut off was taken up from the ground where it lay, cleaned with cold water, and reapplied, being secured in its place by means of sutures. A week after the injury a dry scab began to form, and extended in the course of three days over nearly the whole nose. Healing went on steadily, and on February 1, 1872, careful examination was required to detect any trace of the injury.

As the country has been pretty thoroughly stirred up by the "Crédit Mobilier" scandal, our readers may be interested in a brief explanatory paragraph given in the Evening Post.

"The definition of the term is, strictly, personal credit, and when applied to a company means one which invests capital in personal property as distinguished from a crédit foncier, where the investment is in land. The great French Crédit Mobilier Company is about twenty years old, and was created, under government sanction, for the purpose of investing capital in banking, in contracts for works of public improvements, in stocks, and other personal property. It is a joint-stock company with a large capital, and for years did a large and profitable business, which of late has fallen off. The name and object of the American Crédit Mobilier had this origin, though its business, so far as we know, has been confined to contracts with the Union Pacific Railroad Company."

Rumor says that twenty-five Freshmen of Amherst College have formed a boarding club on the principle of abstinence from cake, pastry, and all "goodies" of a similar nature.

Not long ago a boat containing two men capsized in Huntington Bay, Long Island. One of the men, who could swim a little, succeeded in reaching the boat, which was floating bottom upward, and got upon the keel; the other could not swim at all, but clung to a mass of ice scarcely buoyant enough to sustain his weight. The accident occurred directly opposite a house in which there were three women and a little boy. They all rushed to the beach, though not knowing how to aid the man, who evidently was rapidly becoming exhausted. Then one of them, a Miss Conklin, determined to make an effort to save him, and waded out into the bay. She cleared the ice from her path with her hands, but when within a few feet of the man only her head was above water. With great heroism she plunged into the deep water, and with a few strokes reached the benumbed and almost drowning man. He was still sensible, and faithfully obeyed the instruction given him by the brave woman. She had warned him against seizing hold of her in such a manner as to impede her motions; so when she reached him he placed his hands on her shoulders, and in a few seconds, thanks to her good swimming, both stood neck deep in the ice-cold water, and began wading shoreward. When Miss Conklin reached the shore she fainted away, and was carried to the house by her relatives. She did not recover from the effects of her exertions for two or three days. The companion of the rescued man, who had clung to the keel of the boat, was safely brought ashore after other help was summoned.

Jack Frost has nipped many tender house-plants, entering unawares during the silent hours of the cold night. It is a great mistake to remove plants into a warm room when they are frozen. Let them remain where they were frozen, darken the room by closing the shutters and window-blinds, then sprinkle the plants with fresh cold water. Permit them to remain in this situation for twenty-four hours, not allowing the temperature to become much warmer, and the result will prove that in nearly every case the most delicate flowers may be saved.

A new and curious revelation has been made in a French journal, whereby we are informed that all the calamities of the year 1872 are in consequence of the unfortunate number 13, which has played an important rôle in the year. This is the calculation: "12 times 12 make 144, which being multipled by 13, gives the total 1872." This accounts for every thing! And there is nothing like understanding the reason of things!

Biblical knowledge has made a long stride in some sections of New England. A New Hampshire minister, while portraying the history of Jonah, is reported to have uttered the following eloquent passage:

"I seem to see Jonah passing along the road to Nineveh; I seem to see him entering the ticket-office, buy his ticket and pay for it; I seem to see him walk upon the vessel; I seem to see them lift their anchor, and the stately ship move grandly out upon the broad Atlantic."

The popular French writer, M. De Sainte-Beuve, once fought a duel. When the combatants took their places it was raining hard, and Sainte-Beuve, who had his pistol in one hand, held up his umbrella with the other. The seconds objected to this novel proceeding. "I have no objection to being killed," said Sainte-Beuve; "but as to being wet—no."

A young woman, scarcely thirty years of age, named Wilhelmina Woltmann, was beheaded on December 2, 1872, at Stade, in Germany. She had been convicted of murdering six of her relatives. Among her victims were her first husband, the parents of her second husband, and two young children of her third husband. All died by poison.

Six years ago there was a society formed in London called the "Destitute Children's Dinner Society." Its purpose was to contribute to the health and comfort of the poorest school-children by providing for them once a week a good fresh-meat dinner at a cost of not more than one penny. This society has given 598,740 dinners of this kind.

The "Jubilee Singers," who have attracted considerable attention during the past year, are a company of ten colored students of Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee. Seven of them have been slaves, the others were born free, but have always lived at the South. They became members of Fisk University in order to secure a good education, and their musical training has only been incidental to their other studies, with the exception of the brief drill given preparatory to their present mission. They are endeavoring to raise $70,000 for the purpose of purchasing a new site for the university, and erecting upon it permanent and commodious buildings. Though they are not before the public as professional singers, the music they give is peculiar, striking, and full of pathos, which can not fail to touch a responsive chord in the hearts of all listeners.

Hosted by Google

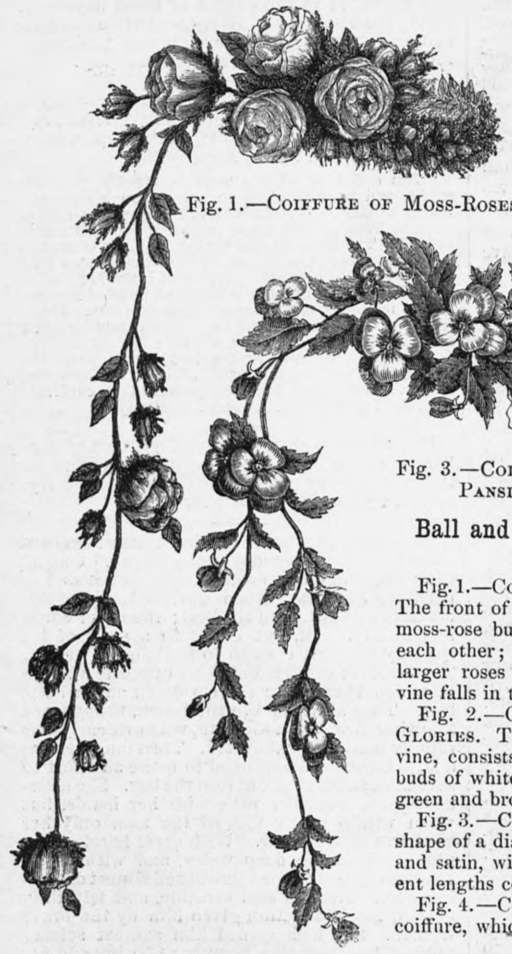

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE OF MOSS-ROSES.

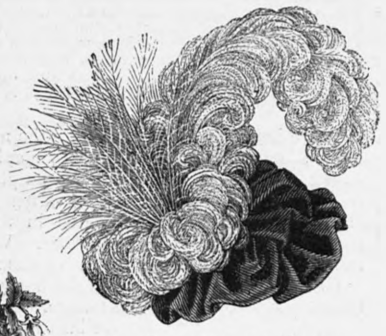

Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF VELVET AND FEATHERS.

Fig. 6.—COIFFURE OF LACE AND FEATHERS.

Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF MORNING-GLORIES.

Fig. 3.—COIFFURE OF PANSIES.

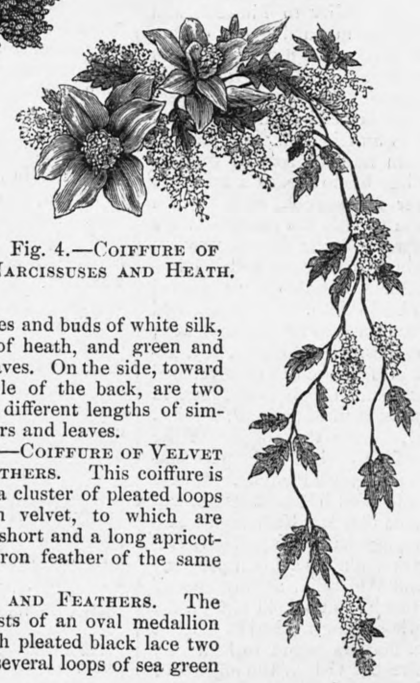

Fig. 4.—COIFFURE OF NARCISSUSES AND HEATH.

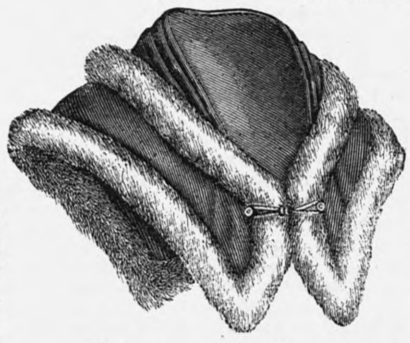
Ball and Evening Coiffures, Figs. 1-6.

Fig. 1.—COIFFURE OF MOSS-ROSES. The front of this wreath is formed of moss-rose buds arranged close above each other; on the sides are added larger roses and leaves, and a long vine falls in the back.

Fig. 2.—COIFFURE OF MORNING-GLORIES. This coiffure, with a trailing vine, consists of morning-glories and buds of white and purple silk, and of green and brown leaves with red veins.

Fig. 3.—COIFFURE OF PANSIES. This coiffure is in the shape of a diadem, and is made of violet velvet and satin, with pale green leaves. Two sprays of different lengths complete the coiffure.

Fig. 4.—COIFFURE OF NARCISSUSES AND HEATH. This coiffure, which is in the shape of a diadem, is made of narcissuses and buds of white silk, clusters of heath, and green and brown leaves. On the side, toward the middle of the back, are two sprays of different lengths of similar flowers and leaves.



CRÊPE DE CHINE CAPE.

Fig. 5.—COIFFURE OF VELVET AND FEATHERS. This coiffure is made of a cluster of pleated loops of brown velvet, to which are joined a short and a long apricot-colored ostrich feather and a heron feather of the same color.

Fig. 6.—COIFFURE OF LACE AND FEATHERS. The foundation for this coiffure consists of an oval medallion of stiff lace and wire, covered with pleated black lace two inches and a half wide, and with several loops of sea green

Fig. 1.—BLACK GROS GRAIN SUIT. FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 31-37.

Fig. 2.—BLACK GROS GRAIN SUIT. BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 31-37.

Fig. 3.—VELVET AND VIGOGNE WALKING SUIT.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—VELVET AND VIGOGNE WALKING SUIT.—BACK.—[See Fig. 3.]
For description see Supplement.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—LOW-NECKED BLOUSE-WAIST OF SILK TULLE, BLONDE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 38-40.

Fig. 2.—LOW-NECKED BLOUSE-WAIST OF SILK TULLE, BLONDE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 38-40.

gros grain ribbon. An aigrette of sea green ostrich and heron feathers is fastened among the loops. A changeable butterfly trims the coiffure as shown by the illustration.

Crêpe de Chine Cape.

See illustration on page 120.

THIS cape, which may also be worn as a hood, consists of a piece of pink crêpe de Chine twenty-four inches and a half square, one corner of which is rounded off si inches and a half long, and folded over on the outside twelve inc es and a half wide. Underneath the fold arrange the materia n two pleats turned upward as shown by the illustration. The outer edge is trimmed with swan's-down, and is furnished with buttons and a cord loop for closing, four inches and seven-eighths from the under corners.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

IN spite of those who insist on noisy pleasures, and those who are indignant at any assemblage of over a score of persons as insulting to the national mourning, and would gladly condemn the Parisians to solitude, Paris resolutely takes her place between these two extremes. No noisy pleasures, and very few balls, but thousands of hospitable drawing-rooms where groups of charming conversationalists are to be found, many official receptions, and an immense number of dinners. Such is, and such will be, the aspect of our city this winter. To judge from the numbers of strangers that throng the streets, it would seem that this programme is far from uninteresting.

Events justify the predictions of those who had faith in the longevity of short suits, and it is now a fixed fact that they will last through another summer; indeed, it is hard to foretell when they will have an end. When this calamity takes place it will be at the beginning of winter, the season when ladies go out less on foot, ride less, and travel less than in summer. But in warm weather, when they walk so much, and have occasion so often to climb into carriages and cars, they are not likely to exchange the convenient short skirts for trailing dresses, looped with buttons that come unfastened, and cords that break so easily.

The most essential change, it is said, will be in wrappings. It appears that ladies are tired of sleeved garments, and our dress-makers are racking their brains to invent mantelets that differ from the old-fashioned mantillas, and capes that bear no resemblance to the capes of old. These mantelets will generally be adjusted in the back, and have very short tabs in front, and will often be furnished with a hood. Fichus will be much worn, crossed in front, and frequently with ends long enough to tie behind; these are already well known, and will not be new, like the mantelets.

At this moment there is a rage for long scarfs of light crêpe de Chine with long fringe, arranged on the waist something in the fashion of a Scotch tartan. The end of the scarf is thrown over the left shoulder, the scarf is passed in front across the breast, and then over the back so that the other end comes also over the left shoulder, whence it falls its whole length. When the folds are gracefully laid, and the scarf is worn by a tall, slender person, nothing can be more picturesque than this drapery, which will undoubtedly be worn during the coming spring. It is a most convenient fashion withal, by which a simple dress can be instantaneously transformed into a toilette suitable for the opera or theatre. A plain black silk suit, with the addition of this drapery, pink, blue, cherry, maize, mauve, or green, becomes a costume fit for an opera-box or concert-room.

What are styled head-dresses are nothing more than clusters of flowers or feathers, or huge knots of ribbon, that are set above the forehead, over the left ear, or on the right side of the head, according to the cast of countenance. To speak less vaguely, let me add that regular features are never suited to irregular ornaments, or those placed on one side. Caps are seen only in miniature; they are no longer put on, but are perched on the top of the head in such a manner as to cover neither the front hair, the back hair, the temples, nor the forehead. Bonnets follow the same fashion, and, unhappily, are destined to little modification from their present form; they are tending more and more toward cylinders adorned with feathers, flowers, lace, and bows, all very imperfectly disguising their ugliness. But this does not prevent them from being persistently worn. What is fashion, indeed, but perpetually playing anew the same jugglery of imposing on women for year after year the ugliest, most ungraceful, and even most unbecoming things, and persuading them that nothing is prettier or better suited to set off their charms?

The waists of evening dresses are not invariably low, as in England (though this usage is strictly followed among the old French aristocracy), but always open en fichu, or else square, and filled in either with a simple ruche of white lace edging the opening, a fichu or high chemisette of pleated tulle, or a large fluted Medici fraise, reaching high up in the nape of the neck, almost to the ears, but half open at the throat. With these corsages a gold cross or medallion, suspended from a ribbon or fine chain, is always worn.

Waists are also worn open. These are usually high-necked waists, with the two or three buttons nearest the throat left unfastened and turned in underneath, so as to show the chemisette. Vests are in vogue, worn not under but over the waist, of whatever material. These vests are ranked as lingerie, although silk or crêpe de Chine forms the chief element thereof. They are made of satin of a light shade (pale pink, pale blue, or mauve), very often with simulated pockets, and always half open at the top, and are invariably trimmed with white lace. It is with these vests as with the crêpe de Chine scarfs I have mentioned above: they suffice to impart a degree of elegance to the plainest dress, and permit it to be worn to a dinner-party or

Fig. 1.—SWISS MUSLIN, INSERTION, AND LACE BRETELLES.—FRONT.

For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—SWISS MUSLIN, INSERTION, AND LACE BRETELLES.—BACK.

For description see Supplement.

Hosted by Google

soirée. This fashion will also continue to prevail in the spring, for which vests of fine white piqué and similar materials are in preparation.

A word concerning gentlemen. They continue to wear décolletée vests, over bosoms, of course, of fine linen, without embroidery or tucks of any kind, but quite plain. Their evening coats are likewise décolletée. They are lined with satin, and have a single button-hole on the top at the left side, in which to wear a bouquet or the ribbon of an order.

Little girls universally wear woolen suits of some dark color, brown, dark blue, or dark green, with white soutache trimmings, and bound with white cashmere. Their hats are of the same material as the suits—cloth or merino. Until fifteen the dress of misses is precisely the same—hats of the same stuff as the suits, and the latter dark, with white trimmings. Little boys are dressed in brown or black cloth or velveteen, Highland trowsers and jacket, with pointed basques at the side and bosom, and Spanish hat, with rim turned up all around, and large cockades of black or bright-colored silk.

Receptions (this is the word consecrated to evening assemblies for the last two winters, when balls have been few and dancing forbidden)—receptions, I say, will continue until next summer. For a few years past Paris has somewhat followed the London custom, and its most brilliant season has been in the spring. For these receptions dresses of two colors are much worn. I will describe a striking one which I have just seen. Pink satin trained skirt, trimmed with five bias folds of very pale crêpe de Chine, with pale blue silk lace set under the upper and lower fold; polonaise (with waist open en carré) of very pale blue crêpe de Chine, trimmed with five bias folds of pink satin, narrower than those of the skirt, with pink silk lace set under the upper and lower fold. The polonaise was draped in a pouf behind and open in front, and the front breadth of the skirt was trimmed with graduated folds, en tablier, to the waist. Broad sash of pale blue satin, lined with pink faille, and arranged in loops, which draped the polonaise and extended to the pouf, and were arranged so as to show the outside and lining by turns.

Breton and Alsacian fichus, both of tulle and crêpe de Chine, in bright colors, are much worn over high or half-open dresses. When of crêpe de Chine these fichus are trimmed with deep fringes, and cut square. They are worn at home, at small parties, the opera, etc. When the waist is high these fichus are simply tied in front; when it is open en fichu the crêpe de Chine fichu follows the opening of the waist, and is crossed below with the aid of a brooch or a bunch of flowers.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

THE COUNTERFEIT VALENTINE.

"SO St. Valentine's Day is come at last! How does your heart feel, Mary? Is it pining for a letter from Tommy dear?"

The speaker, Catherine Donnelly, sat with the other servants around a well-spread breakfast-table. She herself held the exalted position of "chamber-maid and waitress," and was a good-looking, sallow-cheeked young woman of twenty-three or four. Opposite her sat Mary, lower nurse-maid, as blooming a rose as Erin's isle ever boasted. A fresh, pure complexion, wavy brown hair plaited in soft braids round her head, large eyes, light blue, but full of life and sparkle—no wonder the lovely picture sent a chill through Catherine's envious heart!

"Faith, girls"—seeing Mary deigned no reply to her taunt—"I think we'll be having a wedding soon. But isn't it rather provoking that this little greenhorn should steal away such a prize from us all?"

"How do you know she has?" said Ellen, the sewing girl, tartly.

"I heard him say something about St. Valentine's Day," said Catherine, slyly. "Will he ask you in verse, think, Molly dear?"

"It's a pity his brain runs to varses," quoth the cook. She was a morose little woman, dark-skinned, black-eyed, with a nose difficult to describe — short, retroussé, and terminating in what "Master Charles" facetiously described as "a clearly defined triangle." It spoiled the effect of an otherwise comely face. Cleanliness, honesty, and a decided genius for cooking had enabled her to keep her place in Mrs. Ellsworth's family for over seven years. The young men of this family were the only species of their kind she allowed herself to view with favorable eyes. The remainder of their sex were, to use her own expressive phrase, "sp'iled in the bakin'."

"He's very well for a man," she went on—"lazy an' shiftless, like the most on 'em, poor divils—but he might be worse. Thim varses are his worst p'int; I doubt they'll be his ruination."

"Oh, bother!" said Susan, the head nurse, scornfully. "How can writin' varses hurt a man?"

"As for laziness," chimed in Ellen, "you know yoursilf he's a smart lad; his imployer thinks a dale of him. Then the readin' an' cipherin' an' beautiful hand he larnt to write in the night-schools!"

Catherine laughed. "It's easy to see Ellen's and Susan's opinion of him. Mary isn't so outspoken. Come, mavourneen, we're dying to hear your sweet voice."

"I'm sure I'm sick o' the sound o' yours," said Mary, brusquely. "Your tongue runs on one tune—Tom O'Conor, Tom O'Conor—from mornin' till night!"

"Faith, girls," said Catherine, as Mary marched out of the room, "that little thing's getting awful proud. Well, pride may have a fall. I must go clear off the breakfast-table."

"What a pile of 'em, to be sure! Six for me, five for Ellen, two for Susan, and—let's see—seven, nine, ten for Mary: little artful hussy!"

Slipping into the drawing-room, Catherine sat down to examine the valentines more minutely.

"This is from Tom, I know," catching one up directed to Mary. Her eyes devoured the handwriting. She would have given her soul almost to know what was inside. Leaning back in her chair, she reflected a moment. The sight of the little bronze tea-kettle suggested an idea. She struck a match and relighted the spirit-lamp. The water was soon boiling furiously, and Catherine, with many a fearful glance around her, held the letter over the steam.

"They're clever folks as outwits Katy Donnelly," she muttered, finding she could now open it with ease.

Gathering the letters in her apron, she crept up stairs to the room occupied by herself and two of the other girls. Sitting down on the bed, she drew from its envelope poor Mary's valentine.

Her head was swimming, her heart sick. The very sight of the letter had been a terrible though not unexpected blow. Yet even as she trembled she unfolded the sheet.

How beautiful! alas, how beautiful! A paradise of roses and forget-me-nots and Cupids and hearts, and in the centre, in Tom's bold, irregular handwriting, she read:

"Swate rose of bonny Erin's isle,
To end Love's faver hasten:
Will you on Tom O'Conor smile,
A poor but honest mason?

"Oh, lovely May, without delay,
Say I may have the honor
To call you wife, and all my life
I'm your attached O'Conor."

Catherine stared stupidly at these words for a moment. Something in her throat oppressed her. She put up her hand to undo the top button of her dress, and with the action came a rush of salt tears down her cheeks.

"Poor Kate! poor Kate!" she said, softly; "it's all over with you now, poor girl!"

Feeling degraded even by her own self-pity, she sprang up and walked to and fro. Grief was fast giving way to a desire for revenge.

"God! must I give this to her?" picking up the letter. She loathed even its delicate perfume, its soft satin touch.

Catherine had gone out to service at an early age. Naturally imitative, she gradually acquired a certain refinement of speech and manners, that placed her, in her own conceit at least, far above her position. As she grew up her good looks, liveliness, and taste in dress attracted a crowd of "followers," among whom she numbered with pride Tom O'Conor. Industrious, well-educated for his station, he was a great favorite with all the young women of his acquaintance. His "poetical" talents, and a certain pensiveness of expression, due rather to natural diffidence than to any latent melancholy of disposition, rendered him yet more interesting in their eyes. Catherine, who had long ceased to hope that a "gentleman" would seek her hand, saw here a chance not to be despised. But Tom's infatuation was a brief one, and ere his "attentions" became so pointed as to excite remark Mary appeared on the scene, and carried his susceptible heart completely captive. It was a terrible blow to Catherine, for she felt her affections more strongly engaged than she cared to own.

These thoughts rankle in her mind as she stands pondering, with knit brows and lips tightly compressed. Suddenly an evil smile crosses her pale face. She takes a step forward—wavers—hesitates. A laugh sounds from below—Mary's little giggling laugh. Catherine's face flushes as if it insulted her: her decision is made. Stealing to a drawer, she took out some comic valentines. One particularly odious she had selected for Mary. This she inclosed in Tom's envelope, and resealed it, with a triumphant smile. "I'll humble you, little hussy, before the day is out. You'll make her your wife, eh, Tommy? There go two words to that bargain, my lad!"

"See, girls, what a lot of them!" said Catherine, seating herself at the dinner-table. "Five for Ellen—you're in luck, Nelly—two for Susan, one for Margaret. Who's proposin' for Maggy, I'd like to know?—the old ragman, maybe; he was mighty sweet on her last Friday."

"Hould your sassy tongue!" said Margaret. "You've more letthers under your apron, miss; they're not all for you, I'll bet."

"Oh no; we mustn't forget little Mary," said Catherine, with a mocking smile. "There's seven, eight, nine letters for you, my love," tossing them into her lap. "How disappointed she looks!"—with a sudden laugh. "Mary, you're a very greedy little pig, not to be content with what you've got! What 'll you give me now for this, eh?"

She held the letter high above her head. Mary looked, and a smile lighted up her blue eyes.

"What 'll you give me, eh?" repeated Catherine.

"I'll give you nothing at all," said Mary, coldly. "I've a right to me own letthers, I suppose."

"Sakes alive! how cross she is! Well, take it. It's from Tommy, sure enough." She unfolded her own valentines, and while pretending to read them, watched Mary as pussy does an unsuspecting mouse.

Mary sat holding her letter a moment. She longed to run away and read it alone. But it would look as if she expected something, and from very shyness she tore it open at length, amidst the jokes and innuendoes of the other girls, and with trembling fingers drew out the paper.

"Holy Vargin!" said Susan, springing up, "she's upset her coffee-cup clane on to my dress!" Seizing a cloth with angry haste, she began a vigorous rubbing of the soiled breadth.

"And she's pale as a cloth!" cried Catherine, staring at Mary. "What has Tommy said, child, to give you such a start?"

"Nothing," murmured Mary, still looking down. She fought bravely for composure, but her lips' piteous quivering could not be controlled.

Catherine snatched the valentine from her hand. "Saints and sinners! girls, what's this? A thing with goggle eyes, and mouth wide open like an idiot's! That's surely never meant for Mary. And what's this written below?"

"Let me have it!" cried Mary, furiously.

"Fair and softly, my love. We all showed you ours; it's but fair we should see yours too."

"You sha'n't!" cried Mary, springing up. But Ellen and Susan each laughingly seized an arm, and, holding her down in her chair, bade Catherine proceed.

"Go on, then," said Mary, sullenly; "you'll enjoy it, an' I'm sure I don't care."

Catherine proceeded without further ado:

"'It's little Biddy Greenhorn,
Just fresh from Erin's isle;
She thought she'd surely hooked me
With her bewitchin' smile.
No, no, angelic creetur,
You'll be no bride of mine.
Go ax some chimney-sweeper
To be your valentine!'"

"I think," said Margaret, very flushed and cross over her own valentine, "the perlice should take up thim as sinds such letthers to rispictable folks! The idea of sindin' me the pictur' of an ould dhragon drissed up in petticuts, an' stirrin' away at a kittle of broth!"

"I must say," said Ellen, who, though triumphant at Mary's defeat, felt some womanly sympathy for her, "I think 'twas an onhandsome thing in Tom, sendin' that letter to Mary!"

"So unexpected too," said Catherine. "Poor little thing!"

"You may spare your pity," said Mary. Two lurid spots were burning in her cheeks now, but she spoke in a calm, steady voice. "I don't want your pity," she repeated. "But this I will say: it was no part of a gintleman to write me that letther! Not that I care a cint for Tom O'Conor, or ever did!"

With which truly feminine assertion Mary rose and walked with dry eyes and a steady step out of the room. But once up stairs and the door locked, she threw herself face downward on the bed, and let grief have its way. The room resounded with her sobs.

Scorned, insulted, deceived! Mary set her teeth, and beat the floor with her little feet, as she thought how Tom's pretended tenderness had melted her heart toward him last night. This was his revenge for her little flirtations and follies—a cruel, cruel punishment!

Pride came to her aid as she thought how those girls' eyes would watch her, how Catherine would sneer at any indications of grief or disappointment.

"I'll not be pitied by no one!"—starting up from the bed. "No, nor have Tom O'Conor boasting that I wear the willow for him!"

Catherine, meantime, had put the finishing touch to her work. Inclosing the genuine valentine with one of those she had purchased, she dispatched it to Tom by her little brother Jim, an arrant imp as ever breathed.

"Mind, Jim, not a word of me! Give it with Mary's compliments. Say she hired you to bring it to him. You understand?"

"I'm alive, sister," said young Hopeful, trotting off, the richer for twenty-five cents from Catherine's purse.

That evening Tom O'Conor called and asked for Kate. Before he left it was understood she was to be his wife. "As soon as possible, plaze," pleaded Tom, in an excited, reckless way, unusual with him; and Kate, who dreaded lest her evil doings should be discovered, readily complied. Two weeks from that time was fixed upon for the wedding-day.

"Is Kate in?"

Tom O'Conor had come on his regular "courtin' visit," accompanied by a friend, Barney Cummings. Ellen, who "kept company" of late with the last-named young gentleman, giggled consciously as she opened the door.

"She's in the kitchen, I believe, Sir. Walk in. Susan's up stairs, and Maggy's abed with the toothache. You'll have the field quite to yoursilves." Nodding gayly, she vanished with her lover, who had come to escort her to a ball.

Tom walked slowly toward the kitchen. The prospect of an uninterrupted tête-à-tête did not seem to afford him much joy.

"God help me!" muttered he. "I'm always wonderin' whether she's around! I despise mysilf for it too. Little jiltin' hussy! to trate an honest lad that way! Kate's a nice, pretty girl, an' I don't see—"

He opened the door and went in. Somebody sobbing by the table started up and faced him wildly—somebody with a white, tear-stained face and disordered hair. It was Mary herself.

Tom had seen her but once before since his engagement. Then her light, frivolous manner disgusted as well as wounded him, and he found it easy to treat her with the grave coldness he thought she merited. But Mary in tears was a different matter. Tom felt his heart soften all at once to an alarming extent—not that he imagined for a moment her tears were for him.

"I beg your pardon"—his very embarrassment making him stiff and awkward. "I should have knocked, I know. I thought it was Kate."

Poor Mary! After a day of severe self-control she had found herself alone, and her overburdened heart gave way for a moment. That he should come in just then!

"Take a seat, Sir"—trying to recover herself. "Katy 'll soon be in. She went to buy white ribbons for the happy occasion." (A little giggle here, too hysterical to deceive even the easily blinded Tom.) "She said she'd be back directly"—moving toward the door.

"Stop a moment, plaze," said Tom. "I'd like a word with you."

"Dear me! I don't know what we can have to talk about," said Mary, primly. "Besides, I'm in a hurry."

"Just a moment," pleaded Tom.

"Oh, very well, Sir"—desirous to show how careless and indifferent she could be. "Only make haste; I may be wanted up stairs."

Seating herself on a corner of the table, she twisted a stray curl around her fingers, humming a careless tune. Her face was flushed now, and wore a half-defiant look. Poor Tom was bewildered by the change, yet he could not forget those recent tears—why, they were glistening on her lashes still! He stood looking down with a yearning heart on this little woman, the only one he had ever loved.

"Mary," said he, in a gentle, almost faltering voice, "I can't say with truth that you've treated me quite right. But you're very young, scarce siventeen. I dare say 'twas a good dale thoughtlissniss. Howiver that may be, I've loved you too well—God help me!—to see you in trouble an' not fale it in me own heart. So—an' it's not wrongin' Katy to say it—if you'll till me what's vexin' you, I'll hilp you as your own brother would. For you seem quite frindless, and—"

"Stop!" cried Mary, springing from the table. "Stop right there, Sir! I'm not so frindless as you think; an' if I was I wouldn't ask hilp from a man that insulted me as no gintleman would! I'm not quite the granehorn you thought me, Sir. Good-avening to you. Plaze carry your advice to another market; it's not craved by me."

"Stop!" cried Tom, sternly. "Stop!"

He seized her arm almost roughly.

"How dare you hould me, Sir!" cried Mary, struggling. "Lave go!"

"By God, I won't!" said Tom, with a face of white determination. "Not till you tell me what you mane! Mary Dean, what have I iver said insultin' to you? God knows I couldn't do it, not aven when you sint me that cruel letter St. Valentine's Day!"

"Oh, it's too much!" said Mary, sobbing with grief and terror. "Tom O'Conor, you're ather drunk or mad, I verily belave! Lave go, Sir, or I'll call for hilp!"

"Not till you take back what you said, Mary," cried Tom, resolutely, but relaxing his grasp a little. "That's my right, an' I'll have it! An offer of marriage from an honest lad is no disgrace to a girl, if she was the President's daughter, an' that's all you have to complain of from me."

"An offer of marriage! What offer of marriage is it to call a girl a granehorn, and"—here the sobs redoubled—"bid her go marry a chimney-swaper? Och hone, that I should live to see the day!"

"Call you a granehorn! Bid you marry a chimney-swaper!" Tom rejoined, in a tone of utter amazement. He dropped her arm, and stood leanin,' against the door, pale and motionless. Struck by his appearance, she too stood speechless.

"Mary," said Tom, taking both her hands, "I niver sint you such a letter, so hilp me God!"

A thrill of joy ran through her frame; still she hesitated.

"The direction was in your handwriting."

"I don't understand it," with a perplexed look. "I did send some varses of my own, telling how I loved you, and asking you to be my wife. For answer, I got it back inclosed with one of thim penny valentines, and a hateful thing it was! Tell you, it gave me a sore heart!"

"Tom! Tom!" said Mary, coming up to him, "I'm that bewildered I don't know whether I'm awake or dreamin'. I niver sint you an answer! I don't know what it all manes, but I ax your pardon for aven suspectin' that letther came from you."

She was crying again, but this ime her head was on Tom's breast. There was silence for a moment.

"Darlint!" said Tom, stroking the soft hair, "I'm more to blame than you. I'm older by five year, an' should have had more sinse. An' now I must tell you: Katy's little—"

"Oh!" said Mary, starting away as if stung. "I forgot Kate! An' to-morrow's your weddin'-day. Good-night, Tom; I'm glad we're frinds again. They'll be wantin' me up stairs."

"You spake very cold all of a sudden, Mary," said Tom, sorrowfully, "but I dare say I desarve it. I was half mad, an' that's me sole excuse. But Kate must clear matters up before I marry her. Her little brother brought the letter from you—the letter you didn't sind, I mane. He brought it with your compliments. I was a fool not to go right up an' get the truth from your own lips."

"Kate's little brother! Oh, Tom, an' she gave me that valentine! I wouldn't misjudge her, God knows, but—"

"Good-evening!" said Catherine, opening the door. "How's this, Mr. Tom? Flirting with Maggy while I'm away?"

She entered, all radiant, for the slipshod girl of the morning was at evening wonderfully transformed. A pink and white complexion, "most cunningly laid on," if not by Nature's hand, crimped locks peeping out under her hat, she looked wonderfully pretty as she stood smiling in the bright gas-light. But the smile faded as her glance fell on Mary Dean.

"Why—is it you?" she faltered.

"Catherine," said Tom, stepping forward, "Mary an' I find out to-night we've been cruelly desaved."

"Deceived!" stammered Catherine. "How, pray?"

Tom fixed a stern eye on her. "How came

Hosted by Google

you by the letter you gave Mary St. Valentine's Day?"

"I got it from the postman, of course," said Catherine, her bosom heaving painfully. "What do you mean, questioning me this way?"

"To find out the truth," replied Tom, still more severely. "How did Jim come by the letter I really sint?"

"O my God! how do I know?" she answered, hiding her face in her hands. "How can you speak such cruel words?"

"Because I want the truth. There's been some divil's work here. Mary niver saw the valentine I sint her at all."

"So you believe her before me!" with a burst of passion. "A little serpent like that!"

"Oh, Katy, for shame! for shame!" Mary burst forth. "Remimber how you laughed as you gave that cruel letther—before all the other girls! I see it all now!" Her voice broke; she hid her face in her hands.

Tom's arm stole softly round her. "Don't cry, my heart's darlint! she can't harm you no more."

Catherine watched them with baleful, envious eyes. "Take her, then," she cried, suddenly; "take her for your wife—a little common thing every body laughs at! There's plenty of lads will be thankful to get my hand."

With the air of a tragedy queen she swept from the room. But once up stairs she shed bitter tears, poor creature, over the gay silk dress she had expected to wear as Tom O'Conor's bride.

"Mary dear," said Tom, as, the first rapturous moments over, they sat quietly side by side, "one thing puzzles me sorely."

"What's that, Tom?"

"How the divil"—scratching his head reflectively—"Katy got her letter into my envelope, saled as it was, unless ould Nick himsilf hilped her, I can't make out!"

Both sat silent for a time, taxing their brilliant brains for an answer to this problem. It would not come, and they passed to more pleasant subjects.

Early in April Tom and Mary were married. The day was so mild the little bride felt justified in wearing the pretty white suit Tom had presented her. And when she threw aside her shawl, and stood, all pure white from the little straw bonnet crowned with daisies to the hem of her lawn dress, a brighter, lovelier bride could not be seen.

"Tom dear!" whispered Mary, as they knelt to receive the Communion from the hands of the priest.

"Well, darlint?"

"Do say you forgive poor Katy. I'm sure she repints bitterly. Don't take the holy Communion with hatred and revinge in your heart! I'm sure we've no call to hate any one."

"I forgive her with all my heart, darlint," said Tom, with a tender, beaming smile. "I can't cherish resintment against any livin' soul to-day!"

WINTER WORK.

CAN it be there are women in civilized life who actually are inquiring for something to do, not for want of what it might bring, but for the work itself? What a luxury it would be to professional women and overtasked housekeepers if for one hour of their whole year they could feel that they were at a loss what to do, and not what could be safely left undone of the duties which crowd upon them! Yet there are happy women in pleasant homes who lift idle fingers and beseech the ladies' papers for some sort of work to chase their shining hours. Mothers, too, want something to keep busy boys and girls out of mischief. There are not a few who prefer handicraft to more ambitious art and literary effort, and they are worthy all honor for the choice of work at which they may become skillful, instead of professions where they could at best reach success only by long struggle and painful effort.

The first secret we mean to teach is that of keeping children still in the house. To do this see that they romp daily out-of-doors. Rain or shine, snow or sun, turn them out to run and fling, shout and scream, to their hearts' content. Children have just so much nervous activity, which must be worked off or they suffer the tortures of hysteria in trying to control their restlessness. Let them play out three hours a day, in water-proof and rubber boots, paddling in the water, if it rains; in blue navy flannel suits and snow-stockings in winter; with a wet handkerchief inside their broad-leafed hats under the hot sun of May; and my word for it you will have as healthy a race of young Americans as ever shouted, and capable of keeping quiet in-doors as an audience at a lecture. They are glad to keep still if they are tired a little, and then is the time to bring on employments which they can be busy at sitting in the house. Nor need boys feel themselves degraded by learning feminine work. I have book-marks in perforated card and decalcomanie boxes done by a tall boy who is one of the manliest fellows, regular at his gymnasium, capital shot, sailsman, and skater; and I have seen more than one specimen of worsted-work kept with motherly pride as the work of a favorite son. French and Prussian boys are taught to embroider and sew, as well as to fence and break horses, and they lose no force of muscle or mind in doing such things. It refines their manners to be brought in company with their mothers and sisters in domestic arts, and more than once in later life their gifts acquired in this way are found beyond price.

The easiest work for young children is raveling entirely all scraps of linen and silk that are fit for nothing else. Old English ladies used to busy themselves with this work when their eyes were tired; and these ravelings, hoarded for a year or two, were valuable material for filling quilts and petticoats instead of eider-down. The ravelings must be kept in a clean bag, separate from every thing else, till enough is collected for use. Woolen scraps, raveled or cut fine, every body knows are the best stuff to fill pincushions with; but every body does not know they are nearly as good to fill pillows for sick people and babies, and will not heat the head like feathers.

The royal ladies of England and Prussia busied themselves during the war in making compresses of old linen, with every third thread drawn out both ways of the cloth. These open-work compresses allow wounds to suppurate through them instead of clogging the linen. Each household should have these bandages prepared in case of accident.

Scrap-books are always welcome gifts for hospitals and children's asylums, and give happier people entertainment in getting them up. The books which come on purpose are nice, but people think more of things which are their own manufacture as far as possible. So the scrap-book is to grow page by page from a quire of printing-paper, both white and tinted, of quality costing not over fifty cents a quire at any printer's. The sheets may be folded in four or not, but they are to be used only a page at a time, as the pictures are ready to go in. Wide margins set off pictures, and so a larger book may be made, and more pleasure really given, with a smaller number of prints well dispersed than with a crowd of them. Space gives the eye leisure to appreciate each, and as children hurry through the first sight of what pleases them, they get more entertainment out of a hundred pages with one picture apiece than from fifty filled to the edge. Prints over four inches either way should have a whole page; smaller ones, of course, go together, but each should have three inches of margin to itself, and more between it and the next. Fill up sheet by sheet, using rye paste or gum-tragacanth, and iron each picture while damp, with a thin cloth over it, to make it smooth. Nothing that is pictorial or bright-colored comes amiss for a scrap-book. Wood engravings are so good nowadays that a grown person may take much pleasure in looking over the pretty figures and marvelous heads of hair from English magazines. Publishers' catalogues for holidays always have some very good specimens of the sort, from the designs of first-class artists. A collection of caricatures is a great aid to sociability in a drawing-room. These and other scrap-books may be bound like the Japanese picture-books, in flexible pasteboard, covered with dark red pongee, held together by ribbons drawn through eyelets at the back, and tied in bows. This mode of binding has advantages over all others. It is movable, and allows additional leaves to any extent; the pictures can be taken out when there is a large circle to be entertained; pages are not defaced by handling till they receive the pictures; and, besides, it has a foreign ornamental air which is very graceful in parlor manufactures. Lines or borders drawn about the pictures with India ink greatly enhance the effect if tastefully done.

Screen-work is popular now, and very useful. Round screens of peacock feathers to hold between the face and the fire are pretty, and only cost the feathers, which are sewed on a foundation of stiff net thirteen inches across. The handle is best made of large quills joined by rolls of white paper slid inside two at a joint, and well covered with strong gum. This makes a light handle; but rattan covered with ribbon is sometimes more available. It is convenient often to divide large rooms where two ladies are sleeping together, or where there are draughts, as in old country houses. A large screen comes into use then, shutting out the cold from the doors and giving the circle round the fire a delicious feeling of snugness and privacy. In bedrooms how much more delicacy is preserved by shutting off the wash-stand and bath-tub from sight of chance comers! Indeed, one hardly wants the sight of one's own paraphernalia all the time. Two uprights of wood two by two inches, five feet high, set in long feet that will not tip over, form the frame, or gas-pipe the same height, set in solid feet, will answer even better to support the screen. The curtain or tapestry may be hung from a cord fastened to these uprights—a better plan than to have it framed all round, as the posts can be brought together and set away in small space; or the screen may be fastened at both sides firmly to the uprights and rolled round one of them to set away. Coarse glazed linen, such as comes at forty cents a yard, is convenient material for cheap screens. Gray or black is best for scrap screens, which are made of bright figures from chintz and silk pasted in groups on the dark ground. The linen is stretched tightly in a frame, or may be tacked to an old table or wall, and sized with melted gelatine or white glue two or three times, letting it dry between each sizing. Cutting out the figures will be great fun for children old enough to handle scissors skillfully, and will occupy an invalid pleasantly at times. A clear mucilage is made of one ounce of gum arabic or tragacanth, half an ounce of white sugar, and as much starch, rolled fine, moistened, and stirred into a quart of boiling water, adding a few drops of carbolic acid to keep it from spoiling if left. Brush the back of the figures and lay them in groups on the screen, finishing with a coat of spirit varnish.

A window border in stained glass is a very pretty memento of a week's work, and the side lights in a bay-window may be colored with good effect thus: Draw the design on paper the size required, cut it out and color it, gum it on the outside of the window, and paint the inside with colors mixed in varnish. A lozenge pattern in lake, ultramarine, and gold is the easiest and most effective, considering the work in it.

China ornaments, such as door handles, finger plates, card-baskets, etc., may be painted beautifully, and will last a great many years without loss of color, even if washed. The colors must be mixed in clear varnish, or oil colors used, thinned with turpentine till they flow freely. A border of bright color, with a dash of gold-leaf here and there, will make a plain dinner-set even elegant, and no vases are likely to be so prized as those the owner has decorated with her own hands.

Modeling becomes a passion wherever practiced, and a surprising amount of skill is developed in form which never showed itself in outline. Casts of living subjects are taken in this way: The subject is laid on his back, the head raised even with the shoulders by a pillow of bran or sand; the face and neck are oiled with almond or olive oil, put on with a feather or bit of cotton; the ears are closed with cotton, and a quill put in each nostril to breathe through, and the space between carefully filled with cotton. When all is ready mix the plaster of Paris in powder with warm water till it is thick as cream. It sets, or hardens, in a moment, and must not be mixed till it is to be applied. The subject should close the eyes firmly, but not squeeze them, as that would spoil the likeness. Cover the face with plaster from the forehead down to the lower edge of the face. Then cover the neck with plaster to join the first work. Let the subject gently roll on his side, and remove the cast carefully. Season for casting by brushing with linseed-oil in which litharge is boiled. The mould is sometimes taken in half a dozen pieces. To cast the back of the head, oil the hair and skin well, and lower the head into a vessel partly filled with liquid plaster. To model the face, oil the hollow casts which result from this operation, and tie the back and front together firmly, pouring in the plaster, which must be quite fluid. When the outside is nearly set, scoop out the soft centre with a spoon to reduce the weight of the bust, and let the whole dry. Untie the strings and take off the mould, smoothing the edges of the joints with a sharp penknife, and carve out the eyes, or they will appear shut. Wax models may be made from the plaster mould in the same way, leaving the wax to set about a quarter of an inch and pouring out the rest. Fill the cavity with cotton, remove the mould and trim the seams, and color with powdered paints. A skillful person may turn a little knowledge of this sort to account at a fancy fair by having an atelier provided with the necessaries of a dressing-room, and modeling those who wish it. The operation is short and inexpensive.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XIII.

FOR those who would hardly come under the title above—for any woman, maid or matron, past youth, who hears the leaves begin to drop, and sees the roses curl in the warm summer of her life—this chapter is written. It is natural and well that with the decay of bloom and outward charm there should be a lessening of quick feeling, an amiable indifference to the homage that youth covets eagerly. The woman of—who dares fill in the age?—the woman who finds the faint lines on her cheek and the pallor creeping to her lip should have learned and tasted many things in her life—so many that she can appraise the value of all, and finding none of lasting worth, resign them contentedly, with a little sigh not for what they were, but for what they were not. She should have loved, and, if possible, have been loved, though that is of less matter. The experience, the wisdom, the self-renunciation, come through loving, not through any reward of love. It is well for her, too, if she can accept the complement of her affection, and find out of what mutable elements it is made: its fervor and forgetfulness; its devotion, often eclipsed and as often surprising with its fresh strength—weak where we trust it most, and standing proof where we disdainfully expect its fall. Such is the love of man. It is a riddle, learning which has cost gray hairs on tender temples, the roses from many cheeks. It is our tradition that love makes or mars a woman's life; but I have yet to learn that it does not exert an equal though silent power over the lot of men. Be that as it may, a woman in love is far more beautiful than one out of it, and this is true if the love lasts to threescore. Let women, if they would remain charming, keep by all means their hold on love, their faith in romance. The power of feeling gives vitality and interest to faces long after their first flush has passed. Speaking as a matter of fact, this is the case, for emotion has a livelier power over the blood than even the sun has, and the miracle of love in making many a plain girl pretty is to be referred to the stimulating effects of happiness on the circulation. If you would preserve any inspiration in your looks, beware how you repress emotion. Cultivate not the signs of it, but emotion itself, for the two things are very distinct. Suffer yourself to be touched and swayed by noble music and passion. To do this, place yourself often under the best influences. There may be pathos enough in the rendering of a poor little girl's song at the piano to stir tenderly chords of feeling that were growing dull for want of use. The rose of morning, the perfume of spring, have rapt many a middle-aged woman away to divine regions of fancy, from which she came back with some of the dewy freshness and smell lingering about her. Youth has its day-long reveries while its hands are at work. We older ones need to reserve with jealous care our hours of solitude, in which the springs fill up. The faces of old beauties have no charm beyond that of feeling. I have seen women who were reputed the beauties of our large cities twenty years ago, and they were well preserved; but in most cases they were mere masks in discolored wax. The pearly teeth, the small Grecian features, the soft, fine hair and regular eyes, were left, but the brow had learned neither to weep nor smile, the lips were composed, and might have been mute for all the expression that replaced their lost crimson. One might adore the wasted beauty of the Duchess of Devonshire, "worn by the agitations of a brilliant and romantic life," for the fire and kindness that lit even its death-pillow; and the Josephine of Malmaison, with eyes always eloquent of tears, wins no less devotion than the empress at Saint Cloud, confessed the loveliest woman of France. Let no woman fall into the mistaken notion of preserving her beauty by refraining from emotion, for all she can keep by such costly pains will be the coffin-like shapeliness of flowers preserved in sand. Laugh, weep, rejoice, or suffer as life provides—only feel something natural and worthy, and deep enough not to leave your faces a blank. There is a time between twenty-five and thirty-five when the struggle of life, mean or lofty as it may be, oppresses women sorely. Fret and care write crossing script on their faces, which grow yellow and pinched till they despair of comeliness again. This is when they are learning to live. Ten years or so make the lesson easy, and it is one of the thankfulest things in the world to see such faces going back to the almond blossom and sunny sweetness of their spring. Many a woman is handsomer far at thirty-nine than she was at thirty. Nature responds wonderfully to the reliefs afforded her. The only counsel to be given is to let Nature go. Don't think, because trial has bent spirit and frame together, that they need stay so an hour after the heavy hand is off. If you feel like singing, sing, not humming low, but joyful and clear as the larks, that would carol just as gayly at ninety, if larks lived so long, as the first summer they left their nests. The worst of American or English systems of manners is the constant repression they demand. This impairs even the physical powers, so that in making a good singer the first thing great artists do is to teach her to feel, in order, as they say, to "warm up" the voice and give it fullness. Women need to cultivate pleasure and amusement far more after they are thirty than before it. I mean romantic pleasures, such as come from exquisite colors and draperies in nature or their homes, from poetry and the loveliest music. They are twice as impressible then as they were in youth, if they know how to get hold of the right notes. They leave themselves to rust.

Yet, as a woman does not love to carry her thinned tresses and crow's-feet into the glare of the opera, or to talk poetry when her rheumatism twinges her middle finger, the craft of the toilette comes in most gratefully just here. The tepid bath in which bran is stirred is to be a daily essential, followed by long friction till the flesh fairly shines. This keeps the blood at the surface, and has its effect in warding off wrinkles. Bohemian countesses over thirty may go to arsenic springs, as they were wont to do, for the benefit of their complexions; but the home bath-room is more efficacious even than the minute doses of quicksilver with which the ladies of King George I.'s court used to poison themselves—a primitive way of getting at the virtues of blue-pill. The celebrated Madame Vestris slept with her face covered by a paste which gave firmness to a loose skin and prevented wrinkles. It was very like a recipe which the Spanish ladies are fond of using, and is made from the whites of four eggs boiled in rose-water, to which was added half an ounce of alum and the same amount of the oil of sweet almonds, the whole beaten to a paste. A favorite cosmetic of the time of Charles II. was the milk of roses, said to give a fair and youthful appearance to faded cheeks. It was made by boiling gum-benzoin in the spirits of wine till it formed a rich tincture, fifteen drops of which in a glass of water made a fragrant milk, in which the face and arms were bathed, and the mixture left to dry on. It obliterates wrinkles as far as any thing besides enamel can do it.

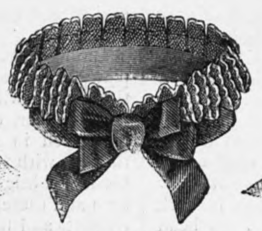
To restore suppleness to the joints nothing is so good as the Oriental practice of anointing the body with oil. The best sweet-oil or oil of almonds is to be used, slightly perfumed with attar of roses. The joints of the knee, shoulders, and fingers are to be oiled daily, and the ointment well rubbed into the skin, till it does not leave any gloss. The muscles of the back feel a sensible relief from this soothing, especially when strained with work or carrying children. The oiling should follow the bath, when the two are taken together. It is a pity this custom has ever fallen into disuse among our working people, who need it quite as much as the sensuous Orientals. The opera-dancers in Europe used an ointment which is thus given by Lola Montez: The fat of deer or stag, eight ounces; olive-oil, six ounces; virgin wax, three ounces; white brandy, half a pint; musk, one grain; rose-water, four ounces. The fat, oil, and wax were melted together, and the rose-water stirred into the brandy, after which all were beaten together. This ointment was used to give suppleness to the limbs in dancing, and would be sure to give relief to the stiffness ensuing on violent exercise. Ambergris would suit modern taste better than musk in preparing this.

The same authority gives a hair dye which is said to be instantaneous, and as harmless as any mineral dye used. It is made from gallic acid, ten grains; acetic acid, one ounce; tincture of sesquichloride of iron, one ounce. Dissolve the gallic acid in the sesquichloride, and add the acetic acid. Wash the hair with soap and water, and apply the dye by dipping a fine comb in it and drawing through the hair so as to color the roots thoroughly. Let it dry; oil and brush.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—Swiss Muslin, Needle-work, and Lace Fichu-Collar.—Back.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 11.

Fig. 1.—Linen Collar.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 21 and 22.



Tulle, Lace, and Velvet Frill.

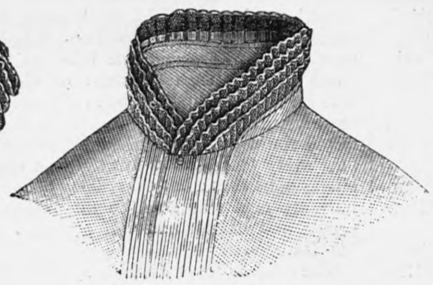


Fig. 1.—Batiste Collar.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 13–15.

Fig. 2.—Swiss Muslin, Needle-work, and Lace Fichu-Collar. Front.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 11.

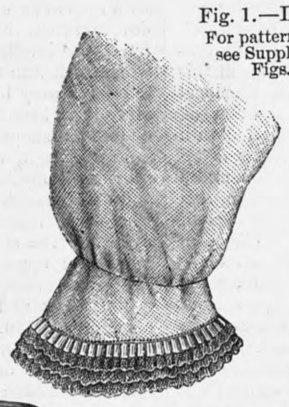

Fig. 2.—Sleeve for Batiste Collar.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 16 and 17.

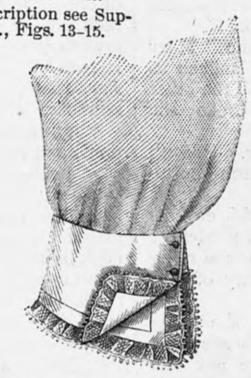

Fig. 2.—Sleeve for Linen Collar.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 23 and 24.

Fig. 1.—Embroidered Cloth Jacket.—Front.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 41–44.

Fig. 2.—Embroidered Cloth Jacket.—Back.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 41–44.

Knitted and Crochet Collar, Cuffs, and Muff for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

Knitted and Crochet Collar, Cuffs, and Muff.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 12.

The collar, cuffs, and muff are knitted in loop stitch (imitation of fur) with white zephyr worsted, edged with crochet bar scallops, and lined with blue silk. Fig. 12, Supplement, gives one-half of the pattern for the collar. The loop stitch is alternately worked with a single and a double thread of zephyr worsted, each wound up in a ball, and with very coarse steel or fine wooden needles; the latter should be pointed at both ends. Having completed Fig. 12, Supplement, as a whole, begin the collar from the back under edge, making a foundation of the requisite length with the single thread, 24 st. (stitch) in the original. Then work with the same thread one round all purled. Pay no attention to the single thread, lay on the double thread, and with the latter work 1 loop round as follows: 1 p. (purled), lay on a netting mesh seven-eighths of an inch wide before the needle, form a loop, winding the double thread once about the mesh from the under to the upper side, 1 p., again form a loop, and continue in this manner to the end of the round. Push the st. on the needle leaving the mesh in the loops for the present) to the opposite end of the needle, and with the single thread previously left unnoticed knit one round all plain. Turn the work, draw the netting mesh out of the loops, lay it on behind the needle, and with the double thread knit one loop round all plain. Again push the st. to the opposite end of the needle, and with the single thread work one round purled.—These four rounds are constantly repeated. Widen or narrow on the outer edge according to the pattern. Having reached the neck, cast off several st. of the back in the middle, and finish the fronts with the remaining st. at both sides; the rounds on the under edge of the fronts should be in a slanting direction. Border the finished knitted part all

Fig. 1.—Dress with Louis Quinze Corsage.—Back.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 27–30.

Fig. 2.—Dress with Louis Quinze Corsage.—Front.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 27–30.

Hosted by Google

around with crochet edging of four rounds as follows: 1st round.—On each edge st. work 1 sc. (single crochet). 2d round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on every second following st. of the preceding round, after every dc. 1 ch. (chain stitch). 3d round.—On each dc. 1 sc., then always 3 ch. 4th round.—∗ 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 ch., 1 ch., 3 dc. on the middle of the following 3 ch., 1 ch., and repeat from ∗. Through the second round of the edging run narrow blue silk ribbon. Furnish the collar with lining, and on the front of the neck set two pieces of wider blue silk ribbon for closing. Begin each cuff on the upper edge with a foundation of 40 st.; on these work ten loop rounds, narrowing at the ends of the work so that the last round counts only 28 st. Edge each cuff on the under edge with edging similar to that on the collar, run blue silk ribbon through the edging, sew up the ends, leaving a short slit, set the lining on the inside, fasten a button and button-loop on the corners, and a ribbon bow in the middle at the top. To make the muff begin on one end with a foundation of 68 st., and on these work 30 loop rounds, then border the knitted part on the ends with the crochet edging, sew up the sides, and furnish the muff with wadding, lining, and ribbon bows.

Fig. 1.—SASH OF WATERED RIBBON AND LACE.

Tulle, Lace, and Velvet Frill.

See illustration on page 124.

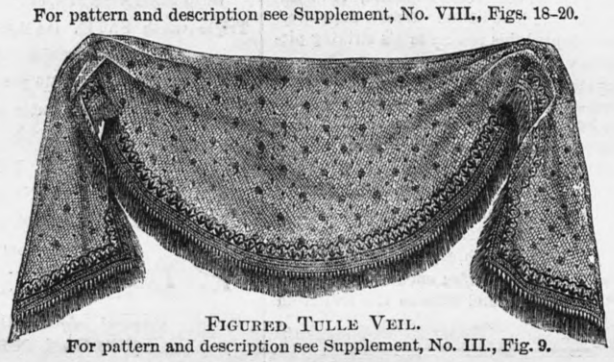
THIS frill is made of a strip of tulle an inch and three-quarters wide, trimmed with lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and arranged in double box-pleats. It is edged on the bottom with red velvet ribbon an inch wide, and finished in the front with a bow of similar ribbon.

Embroidered Sashes of Watered and Gros Grain Ribbon and Lace, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—SASH OF WATERED RIBBON AND LACE. This sash consists of a piece of black watered ribbon twenty-nine inches and three-quarters long and seven inches and a quarter wide, and of a similar piece of ribbon of the same width and fifty inches long. These ribbons are looped together as shown by the illustration. They are rounded off on the under end, pleated at the top, and fastened on a foundation of stiff lace, the seam made by doing this being covered by loops and ends of black watered ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide. The sash is trimmed, besides, with black woolen guipure lace three inches and a half wide and fringe, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—SASH OF EMBROIDERED GROS GRAIN RIBBON. This sash is made of loops and ends of black gros grain ribbon nine inches and a quarter wide. The ends are ornamented, as shown by the illustration, in satin stitch embroidery, back stitch, half-polka stitch, and knotted stitch, with silk of various colors, and are edged across the bottom with fringe four inches and a half wide. This sash is set on a pleated belt, which is closed in front and finished with a bow of narrower gros grain ribbon. Fig. 25, Supplement, gives the design for the sash.

CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 18–20.



FIGURED TULLE VEIL.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Fig. 9.

Fig. 2.—SASH OF EMBROIDERED GROS GRAIN RIBBON.
For design see Suppl., No. X., Fig. 25.

SAGACIOUS PUSSIES.

CATS have a plentiful store of cunning, and know how to obtain by artifice what they can not by stealth. A lady, having a favorite cat that happened to hurt its leg, felt constrained, while it was lame, to give it its daily milk. The cat after a time got well, but she evidently imagined lameness was an advantage that was useful to her, consequently she shammed whenever she saw her mistress, holding up her paw as though it caused her pain to put it to the ground. Cats

VIOLET POPLIN SUIT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1ª, 1ᵇ–6.

GROS GRAIN EVENING DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7 and 8.

Hosted by Google

sometimes behave like dogs. The writer possessed an animal that used to come to his whistle just as a terrier would, and in the night-time, when dogs and pedestrians were not about, it used to accompany him on his walks through the streets. This cat was not formed like others of its species. It was a tabby, with rather longish hair, and with a thick tail, that was not more than six inches in length. How the remainder was lost was a question, but from its extreme irritability when its tip was touched, a butcher-boy's chopper was suspected. The cat was odd in all her ways; when her master was at his desk writing she would always select a small piece of writing-paper on which to sit down, no doubt putting herself on a literary footing with him. Her diet was also extraordinary—she would eat pickles and drink brandy-and-water. One day she rose suddenly and sprang up the chimney, a fire burning in the grate at the time. A couple of hundred years ago, the writer would without doubt have been burned as a wizard for keeping a familiar. The cat, when she found the top of the register too hot for her feet, came down, a little blacker than she went up. One day, however, poor puss suddenly rushed round the room in a circle for a few seconds and then fell down dead. This finale explained many of her peculiarities when alive. She suffered from epileptic fits, and these always affect the brain in a singular manner, and no doubt accounted for the depraved nature of her appetite.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LENA.—Patterns for an infant's entire wardrobe will be sent you from this office on receipt of twenty-five cents and your address. You should also send for the Bazar (price 10 cents) in which those patterns are illustrated and described.

M. R. H.—Invitations to your party given at your mother's house should, of course, be sent out in her name. Tinted paper with illuminated monograms is still used. Very thin paper is best for letters that go to any foreign country.

OLD FRIEND.—Directions for taking the bath you mention will be given in the next number of the "Ugly Girl" papers. They are too long to give here.

FLOY.—Washing the hands with camphor just before going out will prevent perspiration, and save your gloves. Bathe hands and feet daily in water hot as they can bear it, and consult a physician as to your general health. Intense perspiration is always a sign of disease.

A. C. R.—Mineral-white is powdered talc, which is not injurious to the skin. Prepared chalk may be used in the cosmetic you refer to; but flake-white is a form of lead, and very poisonous.

GERTRUDE M. L.—Various recipes for making the skin firm and smooth have been given in the "Ugly Girl" papers, any of which will answer your purpose. The white of egg beaten up with alum and rose-water is often used. Glycerine lotion is harmless. You should walk and sit in the sun as much as possible.

MRS. F. R. M.—Addresses are not given in the Bazar, but if you will send your full name and address you can receive the information through letter.

QUIDAM.—You will find the subject of depilatories fully treated in the "Ugly Girl" papers that have been published in the Bazar. We can not repeat the information for the benefit of a single reader.

W. H. M.—Cousins' children are second cousins to each other.

LUCILLE.—Make your tarlatan with a low round Josephine corsage, and wear a white watered ribbon sash. Flounce the skirt very high, edging and heading each flounce with a ruche; then add an apron over-skirt. Make your blue silk with a basque and demi-train, trimmed with darker blue. For the black silk use the Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., and for the traveling suit use the redingote pattern of the same number. Wear a black velvet bonnet.

STUPID.—Your idea of the way of making the melon puffs is correct, provided you begin them lower down on the front breadth, and put a ruche at the top for a heading.

CARRIE L.—The Dolman will be the best pattern for your cloth cloak. Trim it with a band of bias gros grain and fringe.

MRS. O. F. T.—Dolman sacques and polonaises are the most fashionable velvet garments. Fur or lace is the trimming.

CARRIE.—The covers we recommend for the Bazar are self-binders, to hold a file of the Bazar during the year of its publication. At the end of the year this file should be regularly bound by the book-binder.

MISS M. F.—We are not willing to furnish the address of private individuals.

MRS. J. C. G.—We do not make purchases for our readers.

TRANQUILLA.—Plain braids and tresses wound around the head are prettiest for young girls. Plainly made merino, empress cloth, and black alpaca dresses are prettiest for school-girls. Purple kilt pleating will finish out your wrapper nicely.

J. L. B.—Black, gray, plum, and olive colors for dresses, with blue and rose ribbons, are worn by ladies of forty years. Their coiffures are braids and tresses worn high for back hair, with frizzes and a braided coronet in front. Double-breasted jackets are not considered especially dressy, but are seen at church, and used for visiting. The best water-proof cloak is that illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV. Dark blue English water-proof is much used this season.

MRS. L. G.—We are not in the habit of selecting samples and making purchases for our readers.

CHAMPION.—Tea-rose, dark or pale blue, pearl gray, and pale pink can be well worn with garnet-color.

J. R. S.—We have no cut paper patterns other than those named in our catalogue.

M. C. A.—You can find out about the various fancy-work materials at any well-supplied fancy store. The names used in the Bazar for such goods are those commonly used by dealers.

J. M. R.—The Louis Quinze Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V., is an excellent model for a mourning suit. Make the vest and trimmings of crape.

V. H.—You will find the sort of work you mention described in previous numbers, as "Fern Impression Work," "Spray or Spatter Work," etc.—Your cosmetic of one-fourth glycerine and three-fourths rose-water, to be rubbed on the skin before going to bed, is simple, and we take pleasure in laying it before our readers, with your assurance that it is unfailing.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Your first note was not received. We do not republish poems in answer to individual requests. You can obtain back numbers of any of our periodicals.

MISS M. B.—White corduroy or else a white piqué sacque as long as the child's dress is what you want for your babe. Add a round cape, and trim with an embroidered ruffle. The Bazar will furnish you a cut paper pattern for a kilt suit for your boy of four years. Piqué, buff and gray linen, and white duck are the materials to be used.

MRS. J. F. B.—Make a simple apron-front over-skirt of your court train, and use the remainder for flounces on the skirt. Make coat sleeves of the flowing ones in your basque. A little borax in water will freshen your black silk. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 8, Vol. VI., for hints about the coiffure.

ALICE L.—A. T. Stewart sold the goods quoted at the prices mentioned during the holidays. Only a few shades, such as garnet and crimson, are still reduced in price. Choice shades are $2.

M. A. T.—Make a belt with a basque or panier attached to wear with your round alpaca waist.

MRS. MARION.—Wear natural carnations in your hair and flesh-colored gloves. If you would drape your black grenadine with a maroon silk sash lined with carnation silk, it would make a very suitable evening dress.

SAPPHIRES.

WHEN an American speaks of a Sapphire, he uses, without probably knowing it, a word common to all the tongues which men of his branch of the human family have spoken from the land and the times of Moses and of Job down to our own days. The Sapphire is identical in composition with the Ruby, differing from it only in color. The Ruby is as red as blood. The Sapphire is as blue as the sky. Of course we speak of the perfect Ruby and of the perfect Sapphire. A really fine Sapphire is much more easily found than a really fine Ruby, and fine Sapphires of a very large size are not uncommon, while a fine Ruby of a very large size is almost unknown out of the East. Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John Street (up stairs), among not a few beautiful Sapphires, have just now one which is simply delicious in color, in lustre, and, what is very rare, in brilliancy. The perfect Sapphire should have, by artificial light as well as by day, the pure and positive blue color of the richest clear blue velvet. If it be mixed with black or with purple, it may be a fine stone otherwise, but it fails of the perfection and price of the ideal Sapphire—that which the ungallant Hebrews who held that the Tables delivered at Sinai were of Sapphire, described as the "male Sapphire," to distinguish it from the pale blue of the "female Sapphire." Browning has adopted this phrase in his striking picture of the tiara of King Saul,

> "The jewels that woke in his turban,
> At once—with a start
> All the lordly male Sapphires—and Rubies
> Courageous at heart."

No gem is more poetic, or has more picturesque and romantic associations than the Sapphire. The Greeks held it sacred to Apollo, and esteemed it a remedy against fevers. Even Christian St. Jerome, commenting upon its mention by Isaiah, says of it that "it procures favor with princes, pacifies enemies, frees from enchantment and malice, and obtains freedom from captivity."—[Com.]

OUR FAVORITE SEWING-MACHINE.—The cheapest and best sewing-machine now manufactured for family use is probably the New Wilson. We certainly would use no other. It works with equal facility on muslin, woolen, cloth, cambric, tarletan, flannel, and leather. It does not paralyze the spine, or wear out the operator in any way; neither does it demand an incessant stoppage to find out where the difficulty is. There is no difficulty. It runs smoothly and evenly, hems, fells, tucks, gathers, and binds. It does the finest and most beautiful work on cambric and linen. It also has the merit of being cheaper than any other first-class machine, as it can be purchased for $50. The feeding device is an improvement on all other machines, and a special patent of the Wilson. It does not get out of order, nor break needles, nor slip, nor pucker the cloth. So complete has the Wilson Sewing-Machine been made, by a skillful combination of brain and muscle, that it has left nothing to be desired. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. Shaw, 352 Bowery,

Bet. 4TH and GREAT JONES STS., over Dry-Goods Store.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

Import and manufacture their own Goods, and RETAIL THEM AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 363 6th AVENUE, Bet. 22d and 23d Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods send C. O. D. by express, charges prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

OUR NEEDLE-CASE is the best, sells fastest, pays best. Send 50 cts. for sample. Agents wanted. H. N. McKINNEY & CO., Philadelphia.

YOUNG LADIES' EDUCATIONAL HOME will admit four new scholars Feb. 10, 1873. Preferences given to first applicants. Mr. & Mrs. D. S. TROWBRIDGE, Greenwich, Conn.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "C"

FOR $125.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 62½	$1 25
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 50	5 00
3 Flannel Skirts, Embroidered	@	5 00	15 00
2 Cambric "	@	2 00	4 00
2 " "	@	3 00	6 00
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 00	6 00
6 Night Dresses	@	2 25	13 50
2 Day Dresses	@	5 50	11 00
6 Slips	@	3 00	18 00
1 Calico Wrapper			1 50
1 Robe			9 00
1 Basket, completely Furnished			10 00
6 Pairs Knitted Shoes	@	0 75	4 50
1 Embroidered Merino Shawl			6 50
1 Val. Lace Cap			7 50
1 Eureka Diaper			1 00
Set of Linen Diapers			2 50
1 Rubber Bib			0 50
3 Quilted Bibs	@	0 75	2 25
			$125 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "A," for $150, and "C," for $250, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, (Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering Extraordinary Bargains in

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

Viz.:

First Quality BROCATELLES, 64 inches wide, only $7 00 per Yard.

Ditto PLAIN SATIN, 64 inches wide, only $9 00.

Triple width SATIN DAMASK, all Silk, the best quality made, only $14 00.

Ditto in THREE COLORS, $10 per yard, former price $18.

STRIPED TERRY'S, double width, very handsome, $1 25.

FRENCH TAPESTRY, EXTRA QUALITIES,

BROCHÉ PATTERNS, $12, recently $18.

PLUSHES, SATINS, MOQUETTES, CATALINES,

At equally low prices.

A splendid stock of

EMBROIDERED LACE, GUIPURE, AND NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS,

WINDOW-SHADES, CORNICES, MIRRORS,

And almost every other article in the Upholstery line,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

The Latest Novelties received by each and every steamer.

The above offers unusual inducements to housekeepers to supply their wants.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

SPRING GOODS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,

Have opened a select line of

FIGURED CAMBRICS,

FIGURED BAPTISTE PERCALES,

BORDERED CRETONS, FOR SUITS,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PRINTS.

WHITE STRIPE SATTEENS,

PLAIN AND EMBROIDERED PIQUES, &c., &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

FALL and WINTER SAMPLES now READY.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 335 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

MRS. D. A. INWOOD'S CELEBRATED DIAGRAM FOR DRESS CUTTING, with Illustrated Book of Instructions, $1 50. Also, STAR FLOUNCE, FOLD, POINT, AND SCOOLOP CUTTER, $1 00. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Agents wanted. Send stamp for circular. East Somerville, Mass. Box 93.

VERBENA SEEDS! We have another fine stock of seeds of this beautiful flower, saved from our large collection of more than 100 varieties; 25 cts per pkt., 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.
RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.
Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

2.
GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

3.
HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

4.
THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

5.
THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.
This work embraces in one volume:
ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.
ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.
CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

6.
THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

7.
A PASSION IN TATTERS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Maud Mohan," "Denis Donne," "False Colors," "Played Out," "The Dower House," "Theo Leigh," "Only Herself," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

8.
NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

9.
BREAD-AND-CHEESE AND KISSES. A Christmas Story. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "London's Heart," "Joshua Marvel," "Grif," "Blade-o'-Grass," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

10.
DR. WAINWRIGHT'S PATIENT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Wrecked in Port," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.
TALMAGE'S SERMONS. Sermons by the Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $4 00.

12.
A WOMAN'S VENGEANCE. A Novel. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Cecil's Tryst," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.
FOR THE KING. An Historical Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "For Lack of Gold," "Robin Gray," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

14.
SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.
FORCE. Being Vol. IV. of Science for the Young, by JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
HEAT. — LIGHT. — WATER AND LAND. — FORCE. 4 vols. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each.

15.
BOOKS FOR GIRLS. Written or Edited by the Author of "John Halifax." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each.
LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY.—THE COUSIN FROM INDIA.—TWENTY YEARS AGO.—IS IT TRUE?—AN ONLY SISTER.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

MADAME FOY'S CORSET SKIRT SUPPORTER,

For Health, Comfort, and Style,

Is acknowledged THE BEST ARTICLE of the kind ever made. Numerous Testimonials in its favor are being received from all parts of the United States.

LADY AGENTS WANTED.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY, Sole Manufacturers, New Haven, Conn.

ARNOLD & BANNING, New York; D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago, Agents.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer, No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.
SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.
RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.
Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,
Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only	$3 00
24 " " " " "	3 50
26 " " " " "	4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.
Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

LADIES' FURS
IN EVERY VARIETY;
SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES.
All at the Lowest Prices.
IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

BEAUTIFY YOUR HOMES
With Flowers.
A GREENHOUSE AT YOUR DOOR.

8 BASKET PLANTS, $1.
8 Fuchsias for $1.
For $1 you may select Seeds in packets or Plants at Catalogue prices amounting to $1 20; for $2 amounting to $2 50; for $5 amounting to $6 50. The entire 6 collections, numbering 50 plants, sent free by mail or express for $5.
8 Geraniums for $1.

13 VERBENAS FOR $1.
6 Roses for $1.
My Illustrated Catalogue, containing 112 pages, of new Plants, Flower and Vegetable Seeds, and a packet of choice Pansy Seed, sent to any address on receipt of ten cents.
CHAS. A. REESER,
Pleasantville,
Venango Co., Pa.

7 FOLIAGE PLANTS, $1.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country; and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

NOVELTY PRINTING PRESSES.
THE BEST YET INVENTED
For Amateur & Business Purposes,
And Unsurpassed for General Job Printers. OVER 8000 IN USE.
Benj. O. Woods, Manufacturer,
And Dealer in Every Description of
PRINTING Material,
349-351 Federal & 152 Kneeland St's, Boston; Branch Store, 543 Broadway & 88 Mercer St., N. Y. Agents, Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, Phila.; J. F. Edwards, St. Louis, Mo.; A. C. Kellogg, Chicago, Ill. Send for Pamphlet.

A GREAT OFFER FOR FEBRUARY.
Horace Waters & Son, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS of first-class makers, including Waters's, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave PIANOS, modern improvements, for $250 and $275, cash. The WATERS CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS, are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices at bargains, for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

COLGATE & COMPANY'S
EXTRACT CASHMERE BOUQUET,
FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
"CASHMERE BOUQUET."
COLGATE & CO'S
CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP,
FOR THE TOILET.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
MISS'S POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 7 to 15 years old)..... " 23
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)..... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48
LOW-NECKED EVENING DRESS, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt..... " 49
WATTEAU MANTLE, with 3-Pleat Blouse, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt.. " 50

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 8
SLEEVELESS SACQUE AND CAPE, with French Blouse, Apron Over-skirt with Watteau Postilion, and Walking Skirt..... " 13
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 23
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt..... " 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 27
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 29
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 37
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt..... " 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT..... " 51

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE "LIGHT RUNNING"
"DOMESTIC"

...resents a record of success unparalleled in the history of Sewing Machines. Send for Illustrated Price List.
Agents wanted everywhere.
Address
"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

Before buying send for our descriptive
SEED AND PLANT CATALOGUE.
AZELL BOWDITCH, 645 Warren St., Boston, Mass.

Largest Organ Establishment in the World.
7 Extensive Factories.
J. ESTEY & COMPANY,
Brattleboro, Vt., U. S. A.
THE CELEBRATED
ESTEY COTTAGE ORGANS.
The latest and best improvements. Every thing that is new and novel. The leading improvements in Organs were introduced first in this establishment.
Established 1846.
SEND FOR OUR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS
ARE PURE AND THEIR
PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.
ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

PARQUET FLOORS.
The National Wood M'f'g Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
WOOD CARPETING,
942 BROADWAY.
Send Stamp for Designs.

$100,000 for only $10!
TEN THOUSAND CASH GIFTS aggregating $500,000 will be distributed by lot to patrons of the Third Grand Gift Concert in aid of the Public Library of Ky., at Louisville, Ky., Tuesday, April 8, 1873. Gifts range from $10 to $100,000, all cash. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. The first Concert, Dec. 16, 1871, and second, Dec. 7, 1872, went off with great success and received universal approval for the scrupulous integrity with which they were conducted and promptness with which gifts were paid. For tickets and full information, address Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.
U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

"YET THERE IS ROOM."
Although working night and day to send Chromos to the thousands who are renewing their subscriptions, there STILL IS ROOM for 100,000 new subscribers. Elegant Prang Chromo and splendid story-paper a whole year for only $1. Send AT ONCE and secure ALL the papers and Chromo, which is sent by FIRST mail. No humbug or swindle. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED, or we give back your money. Try it NOW. Agents wanted. Specimens 6 cts. Only $1 for a whole year. Send now. Refer to N. Y. Tribune, Wood's Magazine, all the great News Co.'s. Now is the time to invest $1. Address Star-Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

HAVE YOU SEEN the New and Wonderful Method of Showing Ghosts in every Man's House without the aid of a medium? Innocent Amusement for the Home Circle. The great demand for this development of Optical Science shows it to be ONE OF THE WONDERS OF THE AGE! Sent post-paid for 50 cts., with directions.
M. W. TYLER & CO., Providence, R. I.

HOW 'TIS DONE OR THE SECRET OUT
An Illustrated Book of 64 pages, that every one should have. Sent free post paid, by BOND, MARTIN & CO. Springfield, Mass.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.
DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

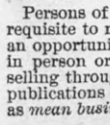
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

GRAND GOLD MEDAL AWARDED
ESTABLISHED 1837
PARR'S TECHNICAL GUIDE.
HIGHEST PREMIUM.
NEW, USEFUL, VALUABLE!
Devoted to home enjoyment, instruction, improvement. Containing over 350 illustrations and naming 1160 scientific appliances; description and price of Tool Chests; Amateur Lathes, Tools and Machines; Model Steam Engines, Steamboats, Sailing Vessels; Mathematical Instruments; Microscopes; Chemical Cabinets, etc. Also series of 145 Chemical experiments and treatise on preparing objects for Microscope; instructions for making Fret or Scroll Work, with home talent, and illustrations of 110 useful parlor requisites, viz.: Bird Cages, Book Shelves, Brackets, Flower Stands, Writing Desks, Work Baskets, etc. Mailed on receipt of 25c., and with first order for $1.00 worth of Designs will send extra copies to refund price of Book free.
GEORGE PARR, BUFFALO, N. Y., Manf. Mechanics' Tools.
SIXTH EDITION. FIFTIETH THOUSAND.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.
Persons of either sex, who have the tact and energy requisite to make successful Book Agents, can secure an opportunity for lucrative employment by applying in person or by letter as below. The subscriber is selling through his agents some of the most desirable publications ever offered to the public. Such persons as mean business are requested to address
AVERY BILL,
Care Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.



Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 832 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. O. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

TO the WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with, sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt Street, New York.

10 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS sent by mail, postpaid, for 40 cents. Address
C. S. RILEY, HOLLAND, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A SURGICAL journal mentions the fact of a man living five years with a ball in his head. A sarcastic friend remarked that he saw nothing very remarkable in that, as he knew ladies to live twice as long "with nothing but balls in their heads."

In what case is it absolutely impossible to be slow and sure?—In the case of a watch.

"We're in a pickle now," said a man in a crowd. "A regular jam," said another. "Heaven preserve us!" moaned an old lady.

Man may be a worm; but a glance at the dandy proves that he is not the worm that never dyes.

A contemporary, speaking of a professor of cookery, says he was chief of the caterers, and was called the cater-pillar for that reason, and because he made the butter fly.

King Alfred is said to have used candles to measure time with. Was this the origin of the candle's tick?

Hardup says the report of a début always reminds him of his account with the bank, because it is generally overdrawn.

Why is the road of transgressors so hard?—Because it is so much traveled.

The devotion of Mary's little lamb, which "followed her to school one day," is equaled by that of a duck at Athol, which is so much attached to a young lady who feeds it that it attends her to church or wherever she goes. At a recent entertainment at Music Hall the duck waited below until the young lady came down stairs, and then escorted her home with many a complaisant quack.

A cheerful giver put the following note in a pair of pantaloons sent to the Michigan sufferers: "There, take 'em. Last pair I've got. Don't get burned out again."

The following undesignedly whimsical conclusion of an oration in Paris over the grave of a republican was made by a brother "red." "Citizen X—— was a true republican, which character he never falsified one instant in his life. He died as he lived: he succumbed from indigestion."

PARSEE FABLES.

"Nature has been very kind to her creatures," said a giraffe to an elephant. "For example, your neck being so very short, she has given you a proboscis wherewith to reach your food; and I having no proboscis, she has bestowed upon me a long neck."

"I think, my good friend, you have been among the theologians," said the elephant. "I doubt if I am clever enough to argue with you. I can only say it does not strike me that way."

"But really," persisted the giraffe, "you must confess your trunk is a great convenience, in that it enables you to reach the high branches of which you are so fond, even as my long neck enables me."

"Perhaps," mused the ungrateful pachyderm, "if we could not reach the higher branches we should develop a taste for the lower ones."

"In any case," was the rejoinder, "we can never be sufficiently thankful that we are unlike the lowly hippopotamus, who can reach neither the one nor the other."

"Ah! yes," the elephant assented; "there does not seem to have been enough of Nature's kindness to go round."

"But the hippopotamus has his roots and his rushes."

"It is not easy to see how, with his present appliances, he could obtain any thing else."

This fable teaches nothing; for those who perceive the meaning of it either knew it before or will not be taught.

A monkey finding a heap of cocoa-nuts, gnawed into one, then dropped it, gagging hideously.

"Now this is what I call perfectly disgusting!" said he. "I can never leave any thing lying about but some one comes along and puts a quantity of nasty milk in it!"

A cat just then happening to pass that way began rolling the cocoa-nuts about with her paw.

"Yeow!" she exclaimed; "it is enough to vex the soul of a cast-iron dog! Whenever I set out any milk to cool, somebody comes and seals it up tight as a drum!"

Then perceiving one another, and each thinking the other the offender, these enraged animals collided, and wrought a mutual extermination: whereby two worthy consumers were lost to society, and a quantity of excellent food had to be given to the poor.

A fox seeing a swan afloat called out:

"What ship is that? I wish to take passage by your line."

"Got a ticket?" inquired the fowl.

"No; I'll make it all right with the company, though."

So the swan moored alongside, and he embarked—deck passage. When they were well off shore the fox intimated that dinner would be agreeable.

"I would advise you not to try the ship's provisions," said the bird; "we have only salt meat on board. Beware the scurvy!"

"You are quite right," replied the passenger. "I'll see if I can stay my stomach with the foremast."

So saying he bit off her neck, and she immediately capsizing, he was drowned.

Moral—highly so, but not instructive.

Some close observer, commenting on the alacrity with which workmen left their labors at the stroke of twelve, remarked, "I have seen a man who had his pick in the air knock off work and leave it there, rather than waste time to put it down after twelve struck."

SMALL BOY (at play with pop-gun, to sensitive elderly gentleman). "Does this noise annoy you, uncle?"

ELDERLY GENTLEMAN. "No, my boy. It sounds like the pop of a cork."

"ANSWERED."

'Oh, look here, Mr. Crispin! I bought these Boots here only a week ago, and they're beginning to Crack already!"
'Ah, Miss, perhaps you've been Walking in them! Our Boots are intended for Carriage People, you know!"

There is an interesting maiden in Martha's Vineyard named Nancy Luce, whose religious faith consists mainly in a belief that her chickens will be to her a joy forever. One of them has, however, left these earthly scenes, and Nancy has celebrated her virtues in a book of poetry, and placed on her tombstone an epitaph which it would puzzle gods and men to pronounce to be either poetry or prose. It runs thus:

"Poor Tweedle Dedel Bebbee Pinky. Died June 17, 1871, at a quarter past seven o'clock in the evening, aged four years.

"Poor dear little heart,
Sore broke in her.
I am left broken-hearted.
She was my own heart within me.
She had more than common wit.
She is taken from the evil to come."

HIGH WORDS—Those spoken in a balloon.

A farmer recklessly publishes the following challenge: "I will bet $42 25 that my hired man can take longer to go to the harvest field, get back to dinner quicker, eat more, do less, and bear down harder on a panel of the fence, than any other hired man within fifteen miles of the flag-staff in our town."

A parent who has fifteen daughters has poisoned his dog, taken the locks off the doors, and hung rope-ladders over his door-yard fence by the dozen, and still his provision bill is as large as ever.

As a drunken man was staggering along the Bowery the other night he saw street cars passing him with different-colored lights, and gazing at the red, yellow, blue, and green lamps, was heard soliloquizing, "I mus' get out o' this place. It's too sickly. They're running the drug stores around on wheels."

Some "blarsted" foreigner says: "Give an American a newspaper and a pie, and he will make himself comfortable any where?"

Which is the most warlike nation?—Vaccination. Why?—Because it is always in arms.

If there is one thing more pleasant than another, it is for a husband, weary and hungry, to arrive home to find his door locked and his wife off visiting the neighbors. Now if all women would do as that Scranton woman did, the husband could get in the house comfortably. After a deal of annoyance he managed to climb through a back window, and upon a table in the parlor he found this note: "I have gone out. You will find the door-key on one side of the door-step."

An old farmer said to his sons: "Boys, don't you ever spekerlate or wait for something to turn up. You might just as well go an' sit down on a stone in the middle of a medder, with a pail atwixt your legs, an' wait for a cow to back to you to be milked."

A paper heads an article with the momentous question, "Is disease preventable?" Our contributor says, "Go slow—and then you'll never catch any thing."

Affected young lady, seated in a rocking-chair reading the Bible, exclaims, "Mother, here is a grammatical error in the Bible!" Mother, lowering her spectacles, and approaching the reader in a very scrutinizing attitude, says, "Kill it, kill it! It is the very thing that has been eating the book-marks!"

"HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY."

HOST (really in agony about his polished inlaid floor). "Hadn't you better come on the Carpet, old Fellow? I'm so afraid you might Slip, you know."

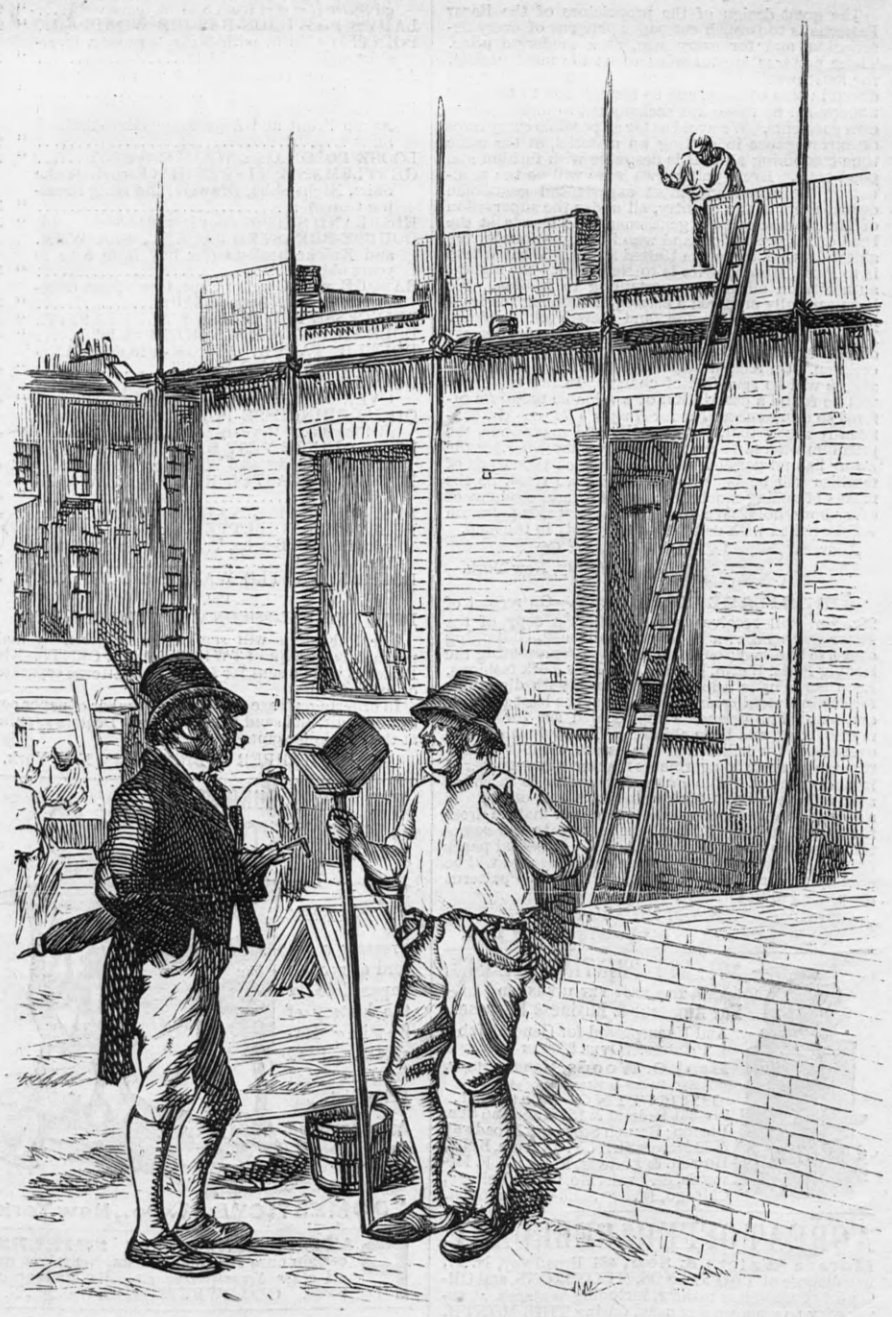
GUEST. "Oh, it's all right, old Fellow—Thanks! There's a Nail at the end, you know!"



"A CONTINTED MIND."

TIRENCE (Bricklayer's Laborer, acclimatized, to Paddy [just] from Cork). "Sell yer Pig an' Fournichure, an' come over wid Biddy to this blissed Country. I get a dollar and siventy-five cints a Day for carr'in' Bricks up a Ladder, an', be Jabers, there's a poor Divil up at the top doin' all the Work for me!"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 9.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Bonnets and Coiffure, Figs. 1–6.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET BONNET WITH REVERS. The trimming for this bonnet consists of loops and ends of black velvet ribbon and a spray of light blue morning-glories with long trailing spray. Three-cornered veil of figured black silk tulle and lace.

Fig. 2.—PLUM-COLORED SILK REPS BONNET WITH REVERS. The trimming consists of plum-colored gros grain ribbon. In front is an aigrette of sage green feathers of different lengths. Three-cornered veil, with ends of figured silk tulle and lace.

Fig. 3.—RÉSÉDA SILK BONNET WITH CURVED FRONT. Feathers of the same color, gros grain ribbon of a darker shade, and a spray of roses constitute the trimming. Gauze veil with long scarf ends, trimmed with knotted fringe.

Fig. 4.—LIGHT BLUE FAILLE BONNET WITH SOFT CROWN. The front is side-pleated. The trimming consists of light blue gros grain ribbon, black lace, and a tuft of roses. Three-cornered veil of figured black silk tulle and lace.

Fig. 5.—OPERA COIFFURE OF BLACK CRÊPE-LISSE AND LACE. The scarf ends are trimmed with silk tassels.

Fig. 6.—VIOLET VELVET BONNET WITH REVERS. Bows and strings of violet gros grain ribbon. The trimming consists of lace coquilles, ostrich feathers, and a bird's wing of changeable feathers of different lengths. Veil with scarf ends of silk tulle, interwoven with flowers.

POISONOUS RED AND OTHER COLORS.

MR. WALLACE YOUNG, in commenting upon an important article by Dr. Draper, published in the journal of the Massachusetts Board of Health, in regard to the evil effects of the use of arsenic in certain green colors, brings forward the results of a critical examination of pigments other than green, also containing arsenic. These were all of French manufacture, and intended for use in calico printing, but were rejected, first, on account of the large quantity of arsenious oxide present; and second, because colors equally good for calico could be obtained by other less expensive and less dangerous methods. The colors in question were named Light Scarlet Pigment, Scarlet Ponceau, Dark Green and Steam Chocolate, and Catechu Pigment, all containing arsenious oxide, which is supposed to have been added for the purpose of giving body to the pigment, not being essentially necessary to the color. It is thought very probable that these are used extensively in the manufacture of paper-hangings.

LANDSCAPE COLORING WITHOUT PAINT.

I REMEMBER to have seen years ago an account of a curious ancient method of forming landscapes in imitation of painting, yet without so much as a touch of either paint or brushes. The process was simply this: Take tissue-paper of various shades and tints, such as would be required for sky, trees, rocks, etc., and cut out the several objects, beginning with the clouds. The clear portion of the sky should be covered with blue, and having gummed this neatly and smoothly down around the edges, but not in the centre, lay the clouds on over this, arranging them according to the picture that is to be copied. The lightest shades will be required for the edges of the clouds that come against the blue, with darker and duskier shades as they recede from the light, as in painting. It will be well to have a simple subject—a chromo or water-color sketch—as a model, and from that it will be easy to arrange in graduated shades; but in putting on the layers for clouds, one over another, it is best only to gum them at the extremities which will be afterward covered with the next piece. Having finished the sky entirely, put in the objects next the horizon with tints closely resembling the sky colors, but deepening as they approach the foreground; a double or treble thickness of paper may be used to deepen the shade. Then for trees and other prominent objects use deep and decided colors, and let them stand out distinctly

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET BONNET WITH REVERS.
Fig. 2.—PLUM-COLORED SILK REPS BONNET WITH REVERS.
Fig. 3.—RÉSÉDA SILK BONNET WITH CURVED FRONT.
Fig. 4.—LIGHT BLUE FAILLE BONNET WITH SOFT CROWN.
Fig. 5.—OPERA COIFFURE OF BLACK CRÊPE-LISSE AND LACE.
Fig. 6.—VIOLET VELVET BONNET WITH REVERS.

FIGS. 1–6.—LADIES' BONNETS AND COIFFURE.

Hosted by Google

against the paler ones of the background. When all are arranged in place, put it into a frame, with glass over it, and the effect will be very much like that of a picture in water-colors.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1873.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain numerous patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Masquerade Costumes for Children; Ball Dresses, Opera Cloaks, Fichus, Scarfs, Embroidered House Jackets, Leggings, etc., for Ladies; a rich variety of Children's Suits; Footstools, Toilette-Tables, Crochet Purses, Card-Receivers, Waste-Baskets, Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; together with choice literary and artistic attractions.

SITUATION OF THE DWELLING.

THERE is nothing people talk so much and care so little about as the situation of the houses they dwell in. To have a good or a fine view, as it is termed, might be supposed, to hear the universal expression of sentiment on the subject, the chief end of living. An extended prospect of the beauties of nature, the sight of so many distant mountains, so much water, such an expanse of land surface, with its varieties of hill, dale, grove, and field, would seem to be indispensable to the happiness of the great majority of mankind. It is a fact, however, that most persons in their daily life are quite indifferent to all the beauties of natural scenery. Those before whom they are always spread, and need not turn to look upon them, having eyes see them not; and those who are shut out from their view by a dead-wall care not, however easily it may be passed, to go beyond in search of a glance at them. A Swiss peasant would not raise his eyes for a moment from the root at which he is grubbing to look upon the Jungfrau transfigured with all the glories of the setting sun. A New York merchant will grope on day after day along brick walls without ever taking a step to enjoy the freedom of beauty so generously proffered by nature outside of his self-imposed prison. There are said to be men and women in our city to whom neither want of time nor money has ever been an obstacle who have yet to spend the few minutes and coppers required to cross the noblest river in the world, and have, of course, never looked upon one of the finest views of natural scenery the eye of man can behold.

With all the real indifference to the beauties of nature, there is an affected admiration of them. That this admiration is not a genuine and spontaneous feeling is apparent from the forced attention given to the supposed attractions of natural scenery when the occasion seems to require it, and the general want of appreciation of all ideal representations of them by art. There is nothing to which the ordinary ear and eye are so shut as to descriptive poetry and landscape painting.

We do not wish it to be understood that because the beauties of nature are so little appreciated people should studiously avoid them. They may exercise their beneficent influences unconsciously to the beholder, and we therefore would encourage even the most insensible to surround themselves, if they possess the power, with all the charms of natural scenery. At the same time it is hardly worth the while to sacrifice more substantial advantages to any sentimental fancy for the beautiful. Our purpose in directing the choice of a situation for a dwelling is to point out what may be rather conducive to health and comfort than to the gratification of taste and the enjoyment of nature.

Pure air, an abundance of it, and dryness are necessary to the wholesomeness of the dwelling of man. If in the country, one has more or less liberty of choice of situation, and should, if possible, select high grounds for the site of his house. It had better be placed on the slope rather than the summit of a hill, for the latter will be too exposed to wind and storm, while the former will be more or less protected, and at the same time offer the proper facilities for that great essential to the healthfulness of a dwelling, thorough drainage. With a house thus situated, moreover, below the extreme height, there will be space of ground behind left for the planting of trees to serve as a shelter from the heat of summer and the blasts of winter. It is a mistake, however, whatever may be the picturesque effect, to have trees very near the residence. They are reservoirs of moisture, and though they may secure the coolness of shade, they, by intercepting the air and hindering ventilation, render a house unwholesome. Certain trees, as the sycamore, elm, beech, and horse-chestnut, are especially interdicted by the experienced, while others are deemed allowable, as the cedar and various pines and firs, which, being of smaller growth and more meagre foliage, harbor less moisture, and do not interfere so much with the circulation of the air.

No dwelling can be healthful which does not receive on its surface, or at least on some part of it, the direct rays of the sun. The house may be so placed or constructed that the glare of light can be subdued or diverted in such a manner as not to be excessive or too intrusive for comfort. The plan followed by some architects of placing the residence diagonally to the four points of the compass is a good one, as by this means the rays of the sun will fall aslant upon every side of the house, and thus the whole structure will have the full benefit of the wholesomeness of their light, while their glow will be less direct upon the windows, and their intrusiveness more readily guarded against.

Where there is good artificial drainage it matters little what may be the nature of the soil upon which the dwelling is situated. In the absence, however, of any contrivance by art for draining, it becomes a matter of the greatest importance to secure the best natural substitutes. Gravelly and sandy soils are the best, for water passes rapidly through them; and clayey and rocky the worst, for they hold fast the moisture, and allow it with all its impurities to evaporate and diffuse its poison throughout and around the whole dwelling. There is, in reality, no natural substitute for a good artificial drainage, which is, indeed, essential to the wholesomeness of every house. The exposure in our comparatively unsettled country to miasm is almost unavoidable at times. The best temporary expedients for protection against its dangers that we know of are open windows and blazing fires even during the warmest days of spring and autumn. Complete drainage, however, is here again the only sure remedy to rely upon.

The inhabitants of large towns are, as regards the healthfulness of the situation of their dwellings, very much at the mercy of the municipalities which govern them. If the drainage should be imperfect, the cleansing of the streets neglected, the water supply scanty or unwholesome, and nuisances such as soap-boiling, cattle-slaughtering, and overcrowded tenement-houses be permitted, the whole area of the town will be but a plague-spot to the infection of which every inhabitant will be fatally exposed. If, rich and luxurious, he builds a palace in the Fifth Avenue, all the perfume of gentility and the exclusiveness of fashion will not save him from the poison of the foul breath engendered in the crowded pens and reeking gutters of the slums of the city.

In the large town there is little opportunity for the gratification of a taste for natural beauty. As for prospect, what more can be said for the best situated city houses than that "they command an uninterrupted view of—of over the way, and they are within one minute's walk of—of the corner of the street?" Dick Swiveller with all his flourish of rhetoric could not heighten the description.

The recognized evils of the ever-increasing large town are only to be mitigated by diffusing as much as possible the inhabitants, and at the same time perfecting the hygienic conditions of their daily life. The railroads are doing something toward withdrawing the surplus population from the festering centres, but the only effectual reliance is upon a large expansion of the area of the populous city by a system of suburban residences, not for the few rich, but the many poor. The price of the land, swollen by speculation to an exorbitant degree, is unfortunately a practical difficulty for the present. This may not, however, continue to be in the future, with a juster appreciation of the rights of the people at large to the enjoyment of the benefits of a value the increase of which is essentially due to their progress as a community, and not to the few separate individuals who are sanguine enough to anticipate and have the means to take advantage of it. In the mean time much can be done to prevent the unhealthy crowding of a city by excluding from its limits all public institutions the interests of which can be as well or better served without than within. Hospitals for chronic diseases of all kinds, boarding-schools, asylums for the blind, the deaf and dumb, orphans, widows, and all incapables, should, not only for the sake of their own but of the good of the community at large, be thrust far beyond the boundaries of all populous towns.

Where the crowded city admits of a free space in front or behind the house it is desirable to have it, since it secures a proper circulation about the structure. It is not well, however, to attempt to turn these small inclosures into miniature fields or gardens. They are better paved with flags or tiles, and if flowers and shrubs are desired, they can be kept in pots and boxes. Grass and exposed earth, large shrubs and trees, however pleasing they may be to the senses, can only be so in summer, and at all seasons they are reservoirs of moisture from which the best constructed houses may suffer.

It is evident that all the inhabitants of a city can not have a free choice in regard to the situation of their houses, but most, without doubt, could have control of the internal economy of them. This, however, they generally, with submissive folly, yield up to fashion. Thus they shut up the best rooms in their houses and keep the worst for daily use. In appropriating the various apartments to their several services they should be guided by those laws of health and comfort laid down in the course of these papers. Let them not, for example, deprive themselves of the little sunlight vouchsafed to city prisoners because its scant rays shine only upon the front-rooms which Fashion in one of her caprices has closed, with her seal affixed, and refuses to open except on the rare occasion of her formal visits.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of some Fellow-Travelers.

MY DEAR WALTER,—Do you remember the story of the traveler who awoke in the night at the inn and heard his roommate remarking that he was very sorry to say that his snakes had escaped from the box in which he was carrying them, and if his neighbor should happen to feel any of them, he would be much obliged if he would return them? The pleasure of expecting to feel them entirely destroyed the desire to sleep; for as Solon in his youth used to say that almost every body has a forehead, so we may perhaps venture to say that almost every body would prefer not to find snakes in his bed. In fact, there is no reptile, there is perhaps no living thing, which is so generally regarded with repulsion as a snake. I confess that when I am staying at Mrs. Margery's in the summer, and stroll off into the fields and woods, if I come upon a snake writhing and gliding away, the wood is no longer attractive, and I am very likely to turn homeward. My feeling is so strong that I sometimes think if Satan did not actually appear to Eve and offer her an apple, yet that the universal repugnance of the race to the snake has accepted him as the figure of the arch enemy who worked our ruin. 'Tis the most hateful thing in nature; therefore Satan, who hated us, took its form.

I do not insist upon this view, for my theology is very apt to get confused. Evidently the snake was very fascinating to our lovely mother Eve, and I am very sure that he is so to many of the loveliest of her descendants. I constantly stroll into the garden and see the old drama. There is Eve, young, blooming, beautiful, and her eyes are fixed tenderly upon that wretched snake, and she evidently thinks him a very graceful and a very brilliant being; and if I exclaim, "My dear Eve, beware of that old serpent!" she looks at me with offense in her eyes and dignity in her manner, and says that she is surprised by my prejudices, and asks me if I think that it is kind to fling epithets. Do you suppose, Walter, that some women have a natural fondness for snakes?

An old friend of mine used to carry a black-snake in his waistcoat, and I have seen him twirl it around his neck like a fur boa, and twine it around his wrist like a bracelet. And once the gentleman who sat next to me in the car said that he had several very beautiful snakes of rare varieties in a bandbox by his side, and he asked me if I would like to see them. I hastened to thank him and decline, and I presently withdrew into the next car, saying to myself that it was very remarkable that railway companies allowed snakes to be carried as passengers. Probably I said so aloud also, for a gentleman with a patch over one eye remarked, as I seated myself, that if I objected to snakes as fellow-passengers I should move on. And when I thanked him, and said that I saw none near me, and no boxes or baskets in which they were likely to be concealed, he replied that I was probably not used to seeing them, or I should recognize them more readily.

The truth is that he must have concentrated all his powers of vision in one eye, for he said to me, sententiously, "There's a snake!" As I followed the indication of his unpatched eye I saw nobody but Mr. Anguis, whom you know very well, and who is a very agreeable and accomplished gentleman. He is, moreover, very clever, and one of the smoothest, sweetest, unangular men of my acquaintance. When he saw us he came and sat next to us, and we fell into conversation. I wonder if the cloud really did look like a weasel and a whale, or if the good old Polonius only thought so because the capricious prince insisted so positively upon the resemblance! And as Anguis and I talked I wondered whether I had always been deceived in him, or whether my present feeling arose from the hint of my neighbor with the patch over his eye.

We were speaking of Una, the daughter of Mrs. Lyoness, who has come out this winter; and although his words were of satin, they were so smooth, and while he made no distinct assertion, it seemed to me that his conversation was squeezing her to death. There were little hints and insinuations and implications, and he all the while smiling and soft and low in his tones, until I thought of that fair girl as suffocated; and at the same moment my neighbor with the patch said to me, "Mr. Bachelor, did you ever see an anaconda fed? They give 'em doves and rabbits." "For Heaven's sake open a window!" I exclaimed; "'tis frightfully close here." Mr. Anguis remarked, quietly, "Don't you admire snakes? There is a foolish antipathy toward them in weak minds." "By George!" I again exclaimed, and with energy, "my mind is so weak that I believe it is breaking up. I left the other car because of snakes, and I am afraid that they are in this car too." Mr. Anguis looked at me curiously and suddenly. Then, leaning over, he said something in a whisper to my patched neighbor, but I only heard the words, "Possible? Delirium tremens?" The neighbor did not pretend to conceal his reply. "Far from it. Probably never so clear-headed as at this moment."

You see there were snakes in that car. I wanted to get out of it, as when I was in the woods at Mrs. Margery's and met one of the reptiles. This courtly, well-dressed, smooth-tongued young gentleman covering a young girl's fair fame with the slime of suggestion, crushing her as the boa crushes the fawn, what was he but the old foe? I was sure that if Circe had been there he would have slunk out of his human form and have dropped writhing upon the floor. A few evenings afterward I was at the Tilburys' great ball; and as I moved about, listening to the exquisite music, and watching the lovely ladies gliding and floating in the dance, while I in fancy stepped the same measures with invisible partners in vanished scenes, I happened to be near the conservatory, and went in. It was dim, but very beautiful. The air was rich with mingled fragrance and the scent of earth, and my foolish old heart began to beat with emotions and vague hopes and aspirations wholly unbecoming my years, when I saw under a palm-tree the old, old picture once more—the serpent tempting Eve. Mr. Anguis was whispering to Una.

I have already said that my theology is very apt to get confused, and therefore it is, I suppose, that I fancy Eve could not help eating the apple. If Adam had cried to her that it was the very Old Nick that she was talking with, my theology is in such a condition that it does not assure me that she would have recoiled. And when I saw Una listening with that indefinable drooping abandonment of utter delight to the whisper of Mr. Anguis, I felt with inexpressible pain that if I had shouted, "Una, you are listening to Satan," she would have replied precisely as I have told you they always do reply, and have reproached me for using vehement epithets. I remembered what he had said to me of that lovely girl, and I saw him wooing her with every art he could command. Yet I knew from what he had said in the car that if I should cry "serpent," or insist to Mrs. Tilbury that there were snakes in the conservatory, Anguis would only have to smile, say "bottle," and touch his head to ruin my reputation among the Martha Washingtonians forever.

Have you remarked that when your mind is especially drawn to phenomena, they seem constantly to recur? There are, for instance, white horses or black cats: if you once begin to count all that you see, the number becomes fabulous instantly. So when the mind is once fixed upon snakes, they are frightfully many. I met a person of very eminent station, and he politely asked me to call upon him. I went without thinking that he could have any purpose, except to show me courtesy; but when I knocked at his door he stood cringing, like a snake on end, and, ducking and bowing and swaying, he introduced me to a group of unclean friends. His object was to represent me also as his friend. He was slippery and treacherous, very silent and very deadly. But he is only one of a class, and the whole class is composed of most familiar snakes.

I have decided, therefore, that it is not worth while to hope to escape snakes as fellow-travelers upon our journey. As Dickens says in one of his very last delightful little essays that the moral and improving Mr. Barlow of Sandford and Merton constantly appears to him in the most unexpected places and the most unsuspected forms, so may I say of snakes. I open my morning newspaper—and I am, as you know, very friendly to the power and influence of the press, etc., etc., and remarkably so whenever there is a reporter in the company—and as I am proceeding to read the paper I drop it in terror and disgust, for there is a snake in it. I saw something which I thought was a fair and candid article; I looked along to the end, and suddenly I was struck by its poisonous fang. It was treacherously coiled like an innocent ribbon. Suddenly I heard the rattle, and with all its force, and to its whole length, it darted its poison. Or, again, stealthily, unsuspectedly, it embraced its prey and, gradually infolding, suffocated it. I seat myself in my room with the newest romance, and there is an adder in it, hiding in beauty as it hides among mossy stones, and it poisons my faith in men or women. Or I sit and listen enchanted to a tale told me with a frank face and a clear eye, and it is all false. It is a snake who whispers to me.

Hosted by Google

Do not mistake me, Walter, nor think that because there are snakes in the wood there are not endless and depthless charms and glories also. Not even the old original serpent has yet subdued the woman, although he has been hanging to the tree and tempting and tempting from the beginning. In one of the old Roman galleries I remember the picture of Saint Catherine—is it?—a fair, calm saint with tranquil eyes and holy brow, who stands placidly upon the serpent. Una there under the palm-tree may listen, fascinated, and be deceived. There are women every where who are sweetly won to their own undoing. But woman stands with heaven-raised eyes, and her feet upon the snake. Amen, and amen!

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING MILLINERY.

THE first importations of spring millinery indicate what milliners call a "straw season." Aside from the straw bonnets that always appear with April and May, there are quantities of straw trimmings to be used in many instances in lieu of ribbons and laces. The newest features among these are mixtures of straw and jet in ornaments and leaves to be placed in flower clusters. There are also straw laces, curled straw braids, cords and tassels of straw, thick ruches, buttons, anchors, and garniture of various designs made of very white and of pale buff straw.

BONNET SHAPES.

Spring bonnets are larger than those of the winter. The crown is well defined, square, and high enough to hold a towering coiffure. Flat and rolled brims are both imported; it is probable that flat brims will be fashionable, as rolled coronets have been worn for several seasons. There are also many half-and-half brims that have rolled fronts and recede in the back. The Rabagas of straw is again imported; Parisian ladies of any age from fifty years down now wear this jaunty sailor bonnet perched far back on the head. Most of the new shapes may be used either as a round hat or bonnet; a pair of strings tied under the chin are all that is necessary for the change.

Soft, pliable, smooth straws are the handsomest bonnets shown, but there are also some fanciful lace-like braids, and the serviceable rough-and-ready straw. First choice among smooth braids is the fine English Dunstable; less expensive than this is écru chip, fine, soft, and the natural color of the straw, which is far prettier than the chalk white of bleached chip. There are also ornamental straws embroidered with black. Among colored straws are sage green and stylish olive tints; also serviceable shades of nut brown for traveling hats.

THE LYNETTE.

A pretty round hat that will take the place of the Dolly Varden hat of last summer is called the Lynette, after Tennyson's latest heroine. The brim is "tip-tilted" like Lynette's nose; the crown is half-high and square; the trimming is a thick ruche of straw around the crown, with a tassel on one side, a rose and leaves in front, and a lace border of straw on the edge. Rustic straws of rough surface and the soft écru chips are used for these summer garden hats. Ladies will wear the Lynette as a bonnet by placing it far back on the head and tying down the sides; little children and schoolgirls will use it as a hat to shade the forehead. Large Leghorn flats will be worn again.

A stylish round hat for city wear is the Castilian. This has a tall sloping crown like the brigand hats, and a narrow brim that is turned up high on one side. This shape has been very popular during the winter, and is becoming to slender oval faces. It is shown in Tuscan braids, in Swiss linen braids, and in écru chip.

MATERIALS FOR TRIMMING.

A new material for trimming is a soft, heavily repped silk, called gros de Suez. It is shown in very light bronze tints, serpent-color, the blue-gray smoke shades, and large quantities of turquoise blue and peacock colors are imported. This will be used for scarfs, folds, and soft pleatings in a very effective way. There are also indications of a revival of thin light fabrics for trimming, such as stamped crapes and embossed gauzes. Among these is a pretty frosted crape, transparent, pliable, and with a crinkle like China crape; the gauzes are in various designs of stripes, reps, and armure figures; the embossed gauzes are sprinkled with tiny patterns imitating embroidery.

FLOWERS.

Leaves and flowers of straw in clusters, with long fern leaves of finely cut jet, are the newest ornaments for spring bonnets. These straw and jet leaves also appear with flowers of natural colors. The Watteau cluster has a large pink rose, blue forget-me-nots, slender jet leaves, and straw ferns. Another new feature is oxidized leaves, giving a silvery, metallic appearance to all foliage. This is a "reform against nature" that will scarcely be as popular as the beautiful autumn leaves and the highly colored tropical foliage that are now so admirably represented in artificial flowers. The unusual quantities of blue flowers imported add weight to the rumor that blue is again to be a leading color. These are in the most delicate shades, such as turquoise, bleu-clair, and ciel; among them are sweet-pea clusters, sprays of blue convolvuli tipped with faintest rose, and double hyacinths. A new parure is a bandeau of oxidized berries and leaves, with a single full-blown rose and many closed buds for the top of the bonnet, with a trailing spray of buds and silvered leaves. Tea-roses are mounted in the same way; those pale salmon-tinted roses will be fashionably used on straw bonnets that are trimmed with black net, dotted all over with tiny straw buttons. Another bandeau is a luxurious growth of ivy leaves with fine white flowers; bunches of white daisies, yellow primroses, and field flowers are shown; there are mammoth roses in profusion, and bouquets of roses of varied hues—crimson, pink, yellow, and white.

Ornaments of oxidized silver are popularly worn in Paris, and will be offered for favor here. Veil pins of this metal are fashionable in the shape of blocks, darts, and arrows.

SPRING SUITS.

The first suits imported for spring are moss green, vert-de-gris, écru, and violet shades, and the fabrics are poplins, pongees, and soft woolen stuffs. They consist of a postilion basque, with revers behind instead of pleats, and large Dolman sleeves. The upper skirts have very short aprons, or else are plain breadths attached to the back breadths of the lower skirt, and rounded off to the belt in front, displaying the elaborately trimmed front breadths of the lower skirt. The latter arrangement has the effect of a polonaise, and similar suits are made with real polonaises. Two shades appear in these costumes, and the novelty is to use a very light and very dark shade instead of tints that differ slightly, as was formerly the fashion. The foundation of spring suits is of the lightest shade, while the darkest shade of the same color appears in the conspicuous revers, the vest, pockets, and the bias bands, many folds, and pipings that compose the trimming. For instance, pale vert-de-gris is trimmed with deepest olive, écru with chestnut brown, and pearl-color with darkest violet. Insertions of écru or else white yak lace are laid flatly on the dark bands of trimming, and a similar edging of lace finishes the dark bindings of the flounces. Polonaises with basque backs are largely imported on the model suits. Vests will continue in fashion both on basques and polonaises. New dresses have the aprons of over-skirts arranged in lengthwise puffs, and there will be another attempt to make puffs popular for trimming. Hitherto they have found little favor, except as a garniture for the thin fabrics of evening dresses. Redingotes, it is said, will become very large garments, worthy to be named after the riding-coats and great-coats of our forefathers. They have immense revers turned up from the lowest corner of their skirt fronts, and attached on each side to a belt that crosses the back from side seam to side seam, but does not appear in the front of the garment. These revers disclose facings of a different shade from the body of the redingote; when the garment is made of striped or dotted materials the revers is of solid color.

A model suit is an écru pongee, trimmed with chestnut silk and white yak lace. The elaborately trimmed front breadths have a wide flatly pleated flounce and many semicircular bands of brown silk covered with white insertion; a three-sided revers of brown silk trims the second breadths, while the back has a group of narrow flounces. The round open-front upper skirt is long behind and very slightly draped. The short jaunty basque has brown revers behind and a Marie Antoinette collar. The wide flowing sleeves are pointed in Dolman fashion.

A second costume is of blue-gray poplin. The back of the skirt is trimmed to the belt with clusters of bias gathered flounces, made three in a bunch, and finished on the lower edge by an inch-wide hem turned up on the outside and ornamented with a piping of a darker shade. The front is trimmed to the knee with flounces, and has a round apron formed of lengthwise puffs separated by darker pipings. The basque has a vest in front with revers behind.

Another feature in shaded dresses for spring will be the use of a bright color in contrast with two extreme shades of a quiet color. This is prettily illustrated in a silk dress that forms part of a trousseau just completed. The dress is of a pale fade tint called Ophelia, and the trimmings are darkest olive brown and very light blue silk. The flounces on the demi-train are edged with pipings of blue and olive. The front of the over-skirt is open, square, and double, and is bordered by tiny folds of the two colors. The long back breadths of the over-skirt have revers, and are joined by olive bows lined with blue, and tied with an Ophelia knot. The corsage has a belt in front, while the back is a basque. Around the neck is a Marie Antoinette collar and two standing ruffles of Valenciennes. Pretty bows of the three tints of the dress trim the front, back, and sleeves.

The wedding dress of this trousseau is white faille, trimmed with round point flounces and garlands of orange flowers. A large revers of silk and a garland is down each side of the skirt; on the back breadths is a sash of doubled silk hanging in large loops, and a cluster of flowers with trailing sprays. The half-low square corsage is pointed in front and has a basque back. The bertha is of tulle and lace, and a jabot of point lace ornaments the front. A flounce of tulle placed under the lace serves to develop the design. Tulle veil, and a coronet wreath of half-blown buds with one long spray. The dress worn by the bride's mother is pale blue silk with a tunic of point appliqué lace, and wide silk flounces, on which are placed narrower lace flounces. The corsage has two corded points in front and a basque behind. Sleeves plain below the elbow, with ruffles of silk and lace.

SPRING PERCALES AND LINENS.

The soft-finished percales noted at the wholesale houses are now displayed in retail stores, and are readily sold even at this early season. The first choice is the Napoleon blue percale, with white polka dots, marked 35 cents a yard. This is as soft as foulard, and is often mistaken for it. It is precisely the same on both sides, and ladies who bought it in Paris last year say it washes well. Foulard-percales of solid gray, écru, or brown grounds have bright borders in Cashmere colors and designs. These are to be used as flounces on the skirt and polonaise. Price 40 cents a yard. A thinner quality for 35 cents has gray grounds with white arabesque borders. White percales with blue pencil stripes have wider blue stripes for borders. French batiste lawn, at 25 cents a yard, has inch stripes of white and brown strewn with tiny chintz figures. Linen lawns are in the stereotyped stripes and dashes of color, and are sold for 25 cents a yard.

BALL DRESSES.

The most beautiful ball dresses of the winter were seen at the Infants' Asylum and Charity balls. Rose-color was worn in profusion, also tea-rose, yet white has lost nothing of its prestige. Some of the handsomest dresses were of white faille with embroidery, lace, black velvet, and flowers: and the lightest, airiest toilettes were white tulle with embroidered over-skirts of tulle or gauze. The garlands of flowers, the mammoth roses, the crimson and white camellias, and the embrowned foliage were really works of art. White tulle dresses have a foundation of coarse tulle, and on this there is around the bottom of the skirt a side-pleated flounce of tulle edged with a wide satin fold. From this flounce to the belt the back breadths are trimmed with large loose puffs, or else box-pleatings of doubled tulle, or perhaps alternate puffs and pleated ruffles. In front are lengthwise puffs and an embroidered tulle apron. The garlands are arranged in most diverse fashion, each side of the dress being differently trimmed. One of the most admired dresses of the season is black tulle with crimson camellias and a crimson sash.

For information received thanks are due, for bonnets, to Messrs. WORTHINGTON & SMITH; for dresses, to Miss SWITZER; and Mrs. CONNELLY; and for materials, to Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and JAMES M'CREERY & Co.

PERSONAL.

SPEAKER BLAINE is not only a gallant man, but when he has the intent to do a nice thing, goes about it with a directness and vim that bring success. Last week he left the Speaker's chair, took the floor, introduced, advocated, and pressed to a successful vote a bill granting a pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of the late Surgeon R. C. WOOD, a daughter of the late President ZACHARY TAYLOR. She is the only person of the lineage of General TAYLOR who ever received any benefit from the government of the United States.

—LOUISA KING, a maiden of Augusta, Georgia, emulous of the fame of Mr. BERGH, is enforcing the laws for preventing cruelty to animals in that city, and is lobbying for special bills with the skill and pertinacity of a Washington veteran.

—The stature of the Emperor and princes of Germany is as follows: The height of the Emperor is five feet ten inches three lines: that of the Prince Imperial, five feet eleven inches; that of Prince CHARLES, five feet nine inches; that of Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, five feet seven inches one line; that of Prince ALBRECHT, Jun., six feet four inches. The late Prince ALBRECHT was five feet eleven inches tall. BISMARCK is five feet eleven inches.

—Mrs. J. BELLAMY HENDERSON, of Baltimore, proposes to see if certain caitiffs in England can defraud her of a round million of dollars left to her in London four years ago. It is the old story—a wicked trustee. Mrs. H. has employed REVERDY JOHNSON and E. M. YERGER as her counsel, who have associated with them JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, of London, formerly Confederate Secretary of State. She is an attractive and accomplished lady, speaking several languages, and an accomplished musician.

—Miss JENNIE COLLINS, of Boston, is impressed with the beautiful and bold idea of starting an establishment which shall be half hotel half college, where cooks may go through special courses, and all classes of domestics graduate in their several degrees.

—Lady BURDETT-COUTTS seems to be incessant in works of beneficence. We now hear of her supporting a sewing school of two hundred pupils in Spitalfields, and a night school in Shoreditch, where she made a speech to the street Arabs whom she hopes to benefit.

—ABD-EL-KADER, the famous Arab, who so long and successfully fought the French in Algeria, is seriously ill. After warring against the French for more than ten years, with indomitable bravery and varying fortune, he was at length vanquished and taken prisoner in 1841, and was held as a captive in France until 1852, when he was released, and took up his residence in the East. He has always been regarded as the model type of the Arab chieftain. His personal appearance is thus described: "His stature is above the middle height, his head beautifully shaped, and his black beard and hair form a striking contrast to his garments of white wool. His hands are of the most graceful form, and white as a woman's, and his whole aspect is one of grace and dignity."

—Madame NILSSON-ROUZAUD, at an evening party given recently in St. Petersburg, performed upon the banjo given to her by Dr. DOREMUS, of this city. She "took the house."

—Mrs. CHARLES SUMNER busies herself abroad in works of benevolence, giving large portions of her time to attending and nursing ladies of American families, who from sickness or other mishap have fallen into distress.

—ISABELLA BRUSH, one of our bright American girls, has been performing in opera with great success in Florence. Crowded houses. In society she is also much courted, and is on terms of respectful tenderness with numberless marchesas and daughters thereof.

—Speaking of Presidents of the United States, some monger in personal history has ferreted out the following: WASHINGTON, the first President, had no children. He was re-elected. JOHN ADAMS, the second President, had children—sons and daughters. He was not re-elected. THOMAS JEFFERSON, his successor, had no sons, but two daughters. He was rechosen. The fourth President, JAMES MADISON, like WASHINGTON, had no children. He was re-elected. The fifth, JAMES MONROE, had a daughter, but no son. He was President eight years. After him came JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, who had children—sons and, we think, daughters. He failed of re-election. The seventh President, ANDREW JACKSON, had the fate of WASHINGTON and MADISON in having no descendants, and being re-elected. MARTIN VAN BUREN, the eighth President, had sons, and was continued in office only a single term. General WILLIAM H. HARRISON, his successor, had children of both sexes. He died in one month after his inauguration. After him came JOHN TYLER, who had a family of sons and daughters. He was an aspirant for the Presidency, but was defeated. Then came JAMES K. POLK, whose domestic condition was that of WASHINGTON, MADISON, and JACKSON—he had no children. General TAYLOR, who followed him, died in office in fifteen months after his accession. He had both sons and daughters. The thirteenth President, MILLARD FILLMORE, had a daughter and a son. He was not re-elected. FRANKLIN PIERCE, when he came to the Presidential chair, was a childless man. So also was the fifteenth President, JAMES BUCHANAN, who was a bachelor. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, who succeeded him, had three sons, and was twice chosen President. ANDREW JOHNSON had children of both sexes, and was not re-elected. GRANT has both sons and daughters, and is chosen for the second term.

—For the first time in the history of Wisconsin, a United States Senator has been re-elected without the intervention of a caucus—Senator HOWE having just had that honor. He received all the Republican and five or six Democratic votes. We think also that this is the first instance where such a thing has occurred in any State in the Union.

—DAVID BAILEY, of Somerset County, Maine, is the oldest postmaster in New England, having been appointed under ADAMS in 1828.

—Miss CLEMENTINA TOMPKINS, of Baltimore, has taken a studio in Paris, and is working hard to fulfill the hopes formed from her first efforts. She is a pupil of BOUNAT, who thinks highly of her talents.

—The Princess of Wales has triumphed over the disability which caused her friends so much anxiety several years ago, and on New-Year's Day accomplished a ride of thirty-six miles in a fox-hunt, returning home in good condition.

—Mrs. FISHER, of Harrisonville, New Hampshire, has enough to be happy with—viz., a dear little boy, five years old, who weighs one hundred and thirty pounds. What a pudgy little rascal he must be!

—Herr BELLACHINO, who is to Berlin what BLITZ is all along shore in this country, has been astonishing the Berliners by his sleight-of-hand tricks, playing nightly to crowded houses; and, in connection with his art, a good story is told. Herr B. had a great desire to become magician to the court, and in order to accomplish his wish sought an interview with Kaiser WILHELM. Admitted into the Emperor's presence, he stated the object of his visit. The Emperor told him his desire should be granted if he could do any thing at all unusual. Thereupon he requested the Emperor to take a pen and write what he wished him to do. Kaiser WILHELM turned to his writing-desk, took up his customary pen, dipped it into the ink, and essayed to write; but with all his force and power the pen could not be made to form a letter. He laid it down, and tried a second with no better effect. Herr BELLACHINO then said, "Try a third, your majesty, and write, BELLACHINO is appointed court magician." The Emperor tried a third pen, and it instantly wrote as freely as usual; laughing, he threw it down, and assured the magician his wish was granted.

—Governor COOKE, of the District of Columbia, was recently addressed by a lady, who said, "Governor, you have made wonderful improvements in our pavements. Even in winter one can almost wear slippers." "If they would vote appropriations, madam, and stop criticism, your pretty feet should kiss velvet only." The lady rejoined, "Give my sex the suffrage, Governor, and you shall have millions where you now get dollars." "If you should put that declaration in your platform, madam, they would never vote you the suffrage."

—The oldest man now living is believed to be JOSÉ MARTIUS COUTINHO, of Rio Janeiro, Brazil, who, from the census report, is one hundred and seventy-nine years old. His mental faculties are perfect, though he is stiff in the knees. He remembers the notable facts of the reigns of Dom JOHN V. and the subsequent doms and domas. The old party has forty-two children by six wives, and counts one hundred and twenty-three grandchildren, eighty-six great-grandchildren, and twenty-three great-great grandchildren.

—Archbishop BAYLEY, of Baltimore, talks manfully on the subject of tippling. He says that "a real inspection of liquors would destroy two-thirds of our intemperance. Any real good government should enforce such an inspection, or stop the sale altogether, because the object of government is to protect the lives of citizens, and while it enforces stringent laws against the sale of decayed vegetables, it is far more important that it should hinder the sale of drinks which poison the blood and madden the brain."

Hosted by Google

ALPHABET WITH VIGNETTES IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.—[SEE PAGE 133.]

Hosted by Google

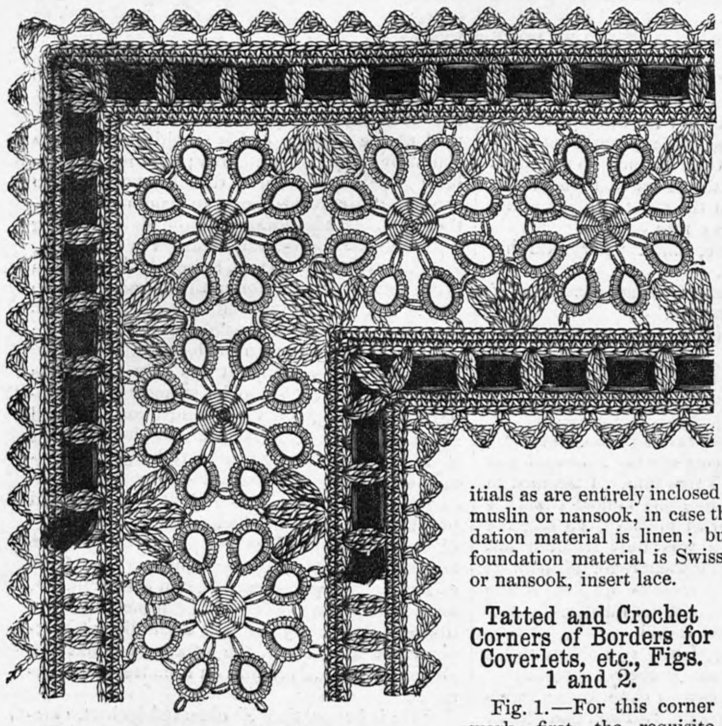

Fig. 1.—TATTED AND CROCHET CORNER OF BORDER FOR COVERLETS, ETC.

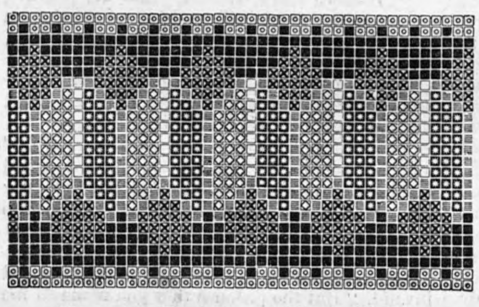
Alphabet with Vignettes in White Embroidery.

See illustration on p. 132.

THESE letters are suitable for marking handkerchiefs, pillow-cases, etc., and are worked on fine linen, batiste, Swiss muslin, or nansook, in straight satin and half-polka stitch, with embroidery cotton. The dotted parts of the design figures are overcast closely, and filled with back stitches; inside of the open-work parts work wheels with fine thread. For the striped foundation of such initials as are entirely inclosed in an edge insert Swiss muslin or nansook, in case the foundation material is linen; but if the foundation material is Swiss muslin or nansook, insert lace.

Tatted and Crochet Corners of Borders for Coverlets, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—For this corner work, first, the requisite number of tatted rosettes with tatting cotton, No. 80, with one shuttle only, as follows: One ring of 6 ds. (double stitch—that is, one stitch left, one stitch right) and three times alternately 1 p. (picot), 6 ds., ∗ after a thread interval of three-quarters of an inch work a similar ring, which, however, instead of forming the first p., is fastened on the last p. of the preceding ring. Repeat six times more from ∗. In working the last ring, however, instead of forming the last p., fasten to the first p. of the first ring, then fasten the working thread, after a thread interval of three-quarters of an inch, on the first ring where its row of stitches is closed. The joining threads of the circle of rings thus formed are darned in point de reprise, observing the illustration. Crochet the separate rosettes together with tatting cotton, No. 80, in the following manner: 1st round.—On the inner edge of the border work 1 sc. (single crochet) on the p. at the point of a ring of one of the rosettes, ∗ 6 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. on the p. at the point of the following ring, 3 ch., 1 leaflet on the joining picot between the ring just referred to and the following ring; this leaflet consists of 3 tc. (treble crochet), which are not worked off separately, but together. Now work a similar leaflet on the p. at the point of the ring last referred to, and at the same time on the p. at the point of a ring of a new rosette, by which both rosettes are held together. Work a leaflet as before on the joining picot between the ring last referred to and the following ring, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the following p. at the point of the ring, and repeat from ∗. The corners of the border are formed as shown by the illustration. On this round crochet six rounds more, observing the illustration. When the seven rounds referred to have also been crocheted on the other free outer edge of the rosettes, run black or colored silk, or velvet ribbon, through the round of leaflets on both sides of the insertion.



TAPESTRY DESIGN FOR CIGAR-CASES, BASKETS, ETC.

Description of Symbols: ■ Light Green; ⊠ Black; □ Gray; ▣ Crystal, ⊡ Milk, □ Chalk, ⊟ Steel Beads.

Fig. 2.—For this corner work, first, the requisite number of Marguerite rosettes separately. For each rosette work with coarse tatting cotton one ring of 1 ds., 11 times alternately 1 p. two-fifteenths of an inch long and 2 ds., then 1 p., 1 ds. Tie the beginning and end of the thread together. On this ring crochet with finer cotton one round as follows: 1 stc. (short treble crochet, throwing the thread over twice) on the next p., 1 stc. on the following p., work off both stc. together, throwing the thread over once, ∗ 3 ch., 1 leaflet of 3 tc. worked off together, throwing the thread over once, on the same p., 3 ch., 1 stc. again on the p. on which the last stc. and the leaflet have been crocheted, 1 stc. on the next p., work this and the preceding stc. off together, throwing the thread over once, repeat from ∗, always going forward, and, finally, work 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first 2 stc. worked off together in this round. After working the requisite number of such rosettes, join them, as shown by the illustration, with two rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on the 3 ch. behind the next leaflet of the rosette, ∗ 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following 3 ch., seven times alternately 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the next 3 ch. of the rosette, 5 ch., 1 dc. on the following 3 ch., 1 dc. on the 3 ch. behind a leaflet of a new rosette, and repeat from ∗. 2d round.—One cross double crochet, for this work 1 qc. (quadruple crochet) on the 5 ch. before the last dc. of a rosette; ∗ only half finish this qc., and work 1 stc. on the first 5 ch. of the next rosette, then finish the qc., throwing the thread over three times, 1 ch. and 1 stc. on the middle of the qc., which completes the cross double crochet, 1 ch., 1 dc. on the next 5 ch., 2 ch., 1 sdc. (short double crochet) on the following 5 ch., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, twice alternately 2 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 1 ch., 1 sdc. on the following 5 ch., 2 ch., 1 dc. on the next ch. scallop, 1 ch., 1 qc. on the following ch. scallop, and repeat from ∗. Work these two rounds on the other side of the rosettes also, and work the corners as shown by the illustration. Now crochet an edge on both sides of the insertion in the following four rounds: 1st round.—All in sl. 2d round.—∗ 2 tc., separated by 1 ch. and an interval of 1 st., on the next and the third following st. of the preceding round, 1 ch., then wind the thread about the needle once, take up the middle vein of each of the preceding 2 tc. on the needle, work 1 dc. on the second following st. of the preceding round, wind the thread about the needle, work off the next three loops on the needle together, and finish the tc., then 1 ch., pass over 1 st., and repeat from ∗. 3d round.—All in sl. 4th round.—Always alternately 6 dc. separated each by 1 ch. on 1 ch. of the preceding round, and pass over 5 st.; work off the first and last dc. of two scallops together, throwing the thread over once. Run velvet ribbon through the insertion as shown by the illustration.

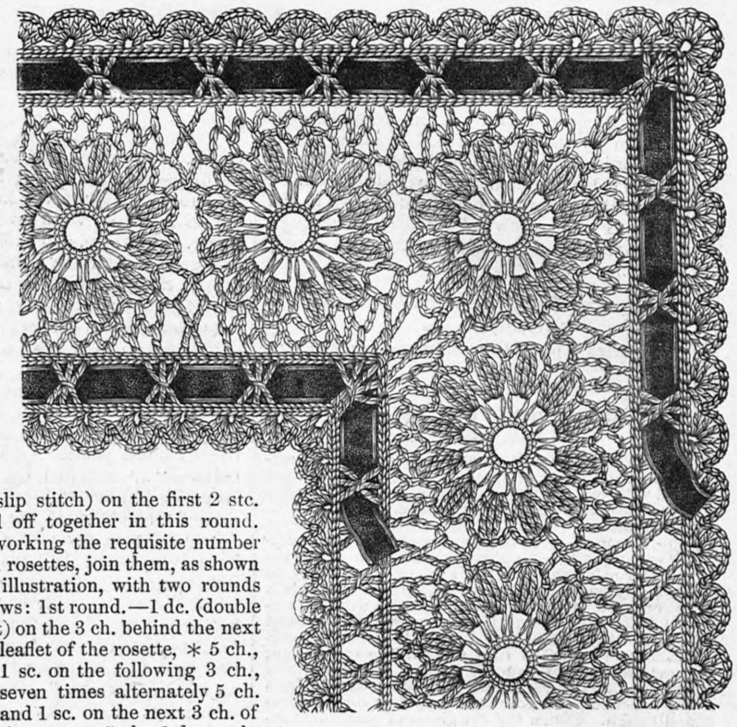


Fig. 2.—TATTED AND CROCHET CORNER OF BORDER FOR COVERLETS, ETC.

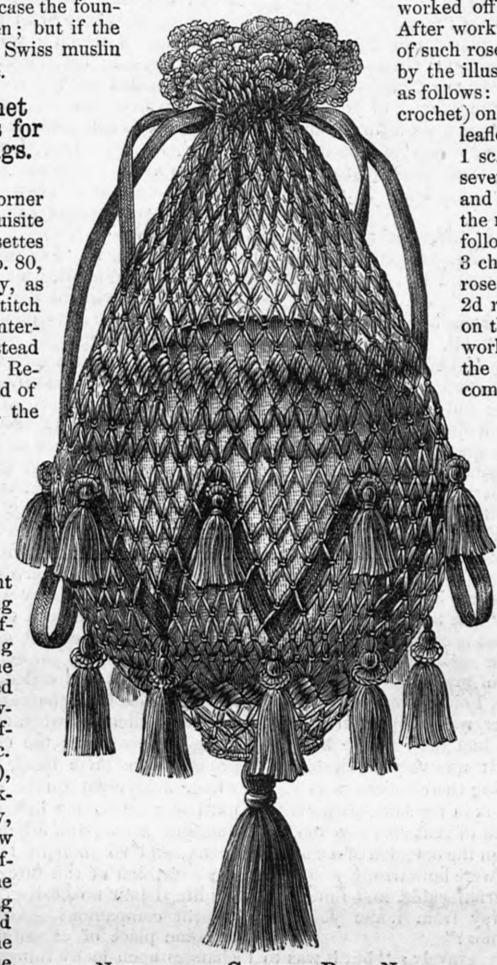

NETTED AND CROCHET BALL NET.

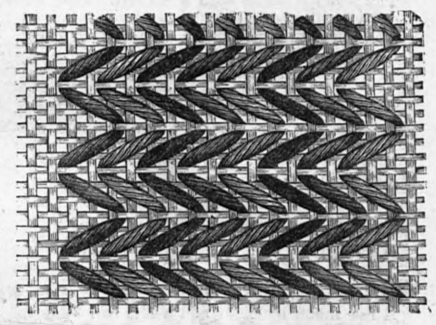

Fig. 4.—FOUNDATION OF KNITTING-NEEDLE CASE.—FULL SIZE.

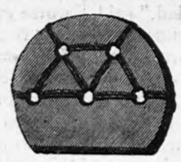

Fig. 3.—PASTEBOARD NEEDLE-HOLDER. FULL SIZE.

Netted and Crochet Ball Net.

THIS ball net is worked in diagonal netting with gray thread and red Saxony wool on a netting mesh four-fifths of an inch in circumference. Make a foundation of 24 stitches with thread, close it in a ring, and on this work with thread also 7 rounds, then 2 rounds with red wool. In the first red round work 3 st. (stitch) on every st., so that this round counts 72 st. Without changing the number of stitches now work 8 rounds gray, 2 rounds red, 10 rounds gray, 4 rounds red, the last of these on a netting mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference. On each st. of this round crochet with red wool 1 point of 1 sc. (single crochet), 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 3 dc. (double crochet), 1 sdc., 1 sc. Through the gray strip eight rounds wide draw red worsted braid two-fifths of an inch wide in the pointed design shown by the illustration; lay the

Fig. 1.—KNITTING-NEEDLE CASE. OPEN.—[See Figs. 2–4.]

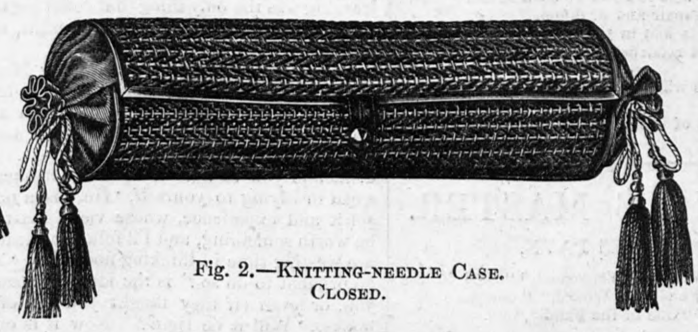

Fig. 2.—KNITTING-NEEDLE CASE. CLOSED.

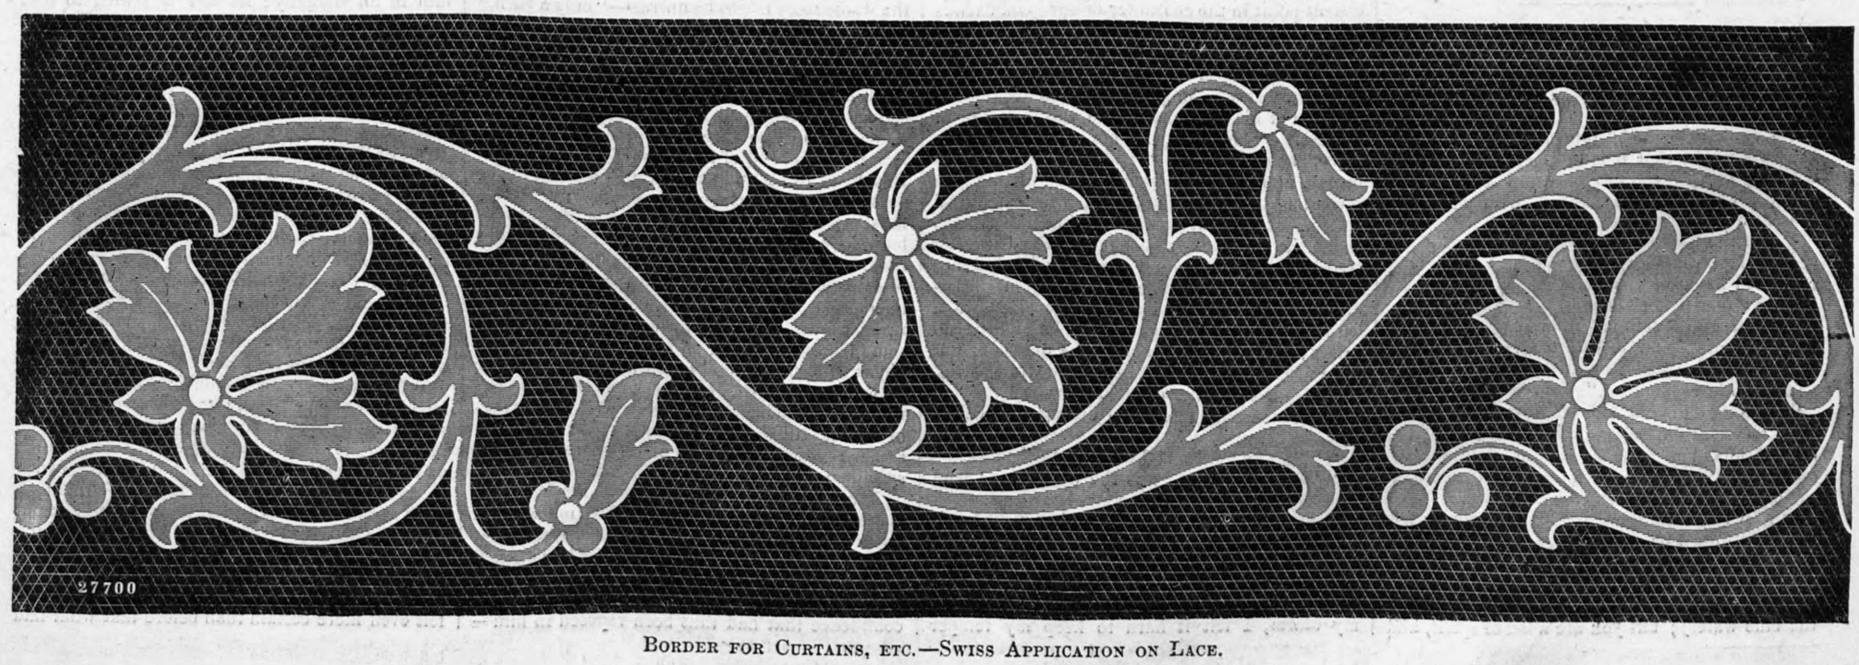

BORDER FOR CURTAINS, ETC.—SWISS APPLICATION ON LACE.

Hosted by Google

braid in a pleat at the extremity of each point, and fasten it with red silk. Darn the gray rounds above and below the two red rounds edging the pointed strip, each with red worsted in point de reprise. Small tassels of red wool, the heads of which are trimmed with a cardboard ring covered with red, ornament the net as shown by the illustration. A larger tassel and a card-board ring two-fifths of an inch wide and two inches in diameter, covered in a similar manner, are set on the middle of the net at the bottom. Finally, draw red worsted braid through the first red round on the upper edge of the net, for closing.

Tapestry Design for Cigar-Cases, etc.

See illustration on page 133.

THIS design is worked on canvas with beads, silk, or worsted. The colors are selected as shown by the description of symbols.

Knitting-needle Case, Figs. 1–4.

See illustrations on page 133.

THIS case is made of canvas, ornamented with embroidery of zephyr worsted in different colors, and lined with red cashmere. Work on a piece of canvas nine inches and one-fifth long and eight inches wide the foundation shown by Fig. 4, with red and gray zephyr worsted in three shades each. In embroidering care must be taken that the coarser threads of the canvas run crosswise. Any kind of canvas may be used. Having completed the embroidery, interline it with net, line it, and bind it on the edge with silk ribbon half an inch wide, in doing which at the same time sew in the side pieces seven inches and three-quarters long and an inch and three-quarters wide; these are made of a double layer of cashmere. Sew through these pieces at a distance of half an inch from the upper edge, in order to make a shirr for the cords and tassels. Fasten the flat pieces of pasteboard intended to hold the knitting-needles on the inside of the case as shown by Fig. 1. These needle-holders, which are shown full sized in the illustration Fig. 3, are made of pasteboard and cashmere, and fastened on the lining of the case in the manner shown in Fig. 1. Finish the case with a button and loop for closing.

Border for Curtains, etc.—Swiss Application on Lace.

See illustration on page 133.

THIS border is worked, according to the purpose for which it is designed, on coarse or fine lace in Swiss application. The embroidery is worked with fine white embroidery cotton, in half polka and satin stitch. Cut away the Swiss muslin between the design figures, observing the illustration.

A WHITE WOOD.

THE wood is white with feathered fans of snow,
And with the burden barren boughs are bent;
And when the frosty winter wind doth blow,
A pearly dust unto the path is sent:
And the stream lies dead
In an icy bed;
But fairies have covered her brow with beads,
And hung crystal crowns on willows and weeds:
And in the spring
Throstles shall sing,
And daisies shall dot the green of the grass,
For girls and for boys to pluck as they pass;
And the stream shall awake
To rejoice in the day,
And with love-laughter shake
All the flowers on its way;
And there shall be clusters of red and white May—
A fair moon by night and a fine sun by day.

But the wide wood is white
In this time of blight,
And the sun is but showing
A shadow of light,
And the darkness is growing
Before it is night.

A sadness doth fill
The dale and the hill—
The robin seems chill
In the tree that is black,
In the wood that is still;
And white in a swoon
Sun sinks, and the moon
Is beginning to float
Like a pale phantom boat;
And the cottage smoke curls up in a dream
Of despair and of doom,
And is lost in the gloom
That gathers and reddens the fire-light gleam.

Let us leave this white wood, and thoughts that are dire,
For the warmth of the hearth and the flame of the fire.

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CABIN PASSENGERS.

"MR. KAVANAGH on board! That is incredible," exclaimed Robert.

"I can't help that," returned Maguire; "I can only repeat that it is the fact. I saw him with my own eyes to-day. I think I may even promise that you shall see him with yours to-morrow."

"But the police—" commenced Chesney.

"Oh! you believe in the police, do you?" interrupted the other, contemptuously, "and yet talk of things being 'incredible.' For my part, I have been in a ship before in which there was 'one too many' on board, and that was 'the devil' himself. The present incident, therefore, sinks into insignificance."

It was certain that Mr. Maguire was not joking; he never did joke, after the fashion of his compatriots, but used a certain staidness of speech and manner, sometimes, as in the case of the police galley, diversified by ferocity.

"You are wondering who I am, young fellow," continued he, "and since I have promised to satisfy a reasonable curiosity, I will tell you. I would not tell every body, mind you (nor even you, for that matter, if we were not well out in the blue water); but you are a lad of spirit, and I like you. With your wits and pluck, you would make a figure in the world, if it was not for your slavish respect for people in high places."

"I was not aware that I entertained a slavish respect for any man," answered Robert, somewhat haughtily, for his youthful pride was touched.

"Nevertheless, it is so," continued Maguire, coolly. "You are frightened at the very shadow of so-called authority; any Jack-in-office has only to cry out, 'In the king's name,' and you dare not lift your voice against him, far less your finger. Yet kings, and such-like, would have no existence but for the dullness of mankind. It pleases the great mass of the world to make believe to worship stupidity, and to exalt it above independence and energy; for then, let the clever fellows do their best, they can never get to the top of the tree."

"I think I see what you mean," said Robert, thoughtfully; "yet what is the feeling toward the young master, as they call him, by which our friends down yonder"—he pointed to the deck below—"are actuated, but this same worship of an accidental distinction? What is the possession of 'the old blood' but an accident of birth?"

"Quite true, my young friend. You might have even added (had you known it), 'How is it that you yourself are called "Mister Maguire," when there is no difference of present fortune between yourself and the poorest of your companions, but only that once upon a time your father held a bit of the land which he inherited by no merit of his own?' Well, the explanation of it is easy: these poor fellows are a parcel of fools."

"Perhaps," observed Robert, shrugging his shoulders; "still, there must be something in it. Murphy, for instance, would lay down his life for the young master."

"Very true; but that is because Murphy is the greatest fool of them all. Now, I like 'the young masther,' as they call him, too, and would go as far to serve him, perhaps, as any of his poor besotted idolaters; but then I like him for his own sake. He is a fine fellow, and might have gone far even in his own country at one time, only luck was against him. Now Murphy would admire him just the same if he were a miser or a coward, such as Louis was. By-the-bye"—here the speaker looked at his companion with great significance—"do you know about Louis?"

"I think I have heard it said that he was dead," said Robert; "that is all."

"Ah, well; then that is enough. We are already getting out of our reckoning. I promised to tell you something of my own life, which has nothing to do with Mr. Louis Kavanagh's death, poor devil. My father was a squireen in Tipperary, as his fathers had been before him for many a generation. It was very creditable of them to go on succeeding their ancestors so regularly, and getting drunk in the same parlor with such assiduity; but life of that sort was too respectable for me, and on the occasion of a certain domestic difficulty (we were both wrong, and very drunk), I cut the paternal cable, and ran away to sea. You ran away from home yourself, young fellow, did you not?"

"I did," said Robert, gravely; "but it was to avoid my step-father's ill treatment."

"No apology is requisite to me, my lad," said Maguire, frankly. "I like a lad that runs away from home. What are ease and comfort at that age compared to independence?"

"Nay, pray do not imagine that I left them when I left my home," explained Robert. "It was but a cottage, and my step-father but a gamekeeper."

"Then where did you learn your fine words and your good figuring?"

"At the village school. It seemed to me that learning was the only thing that could get me out of a condition that was very unpleasant, and so I worked hard at my books."

"Ah, that's bad," observed Mister Maguire, deprecatingly. "I don't mind a young fellow's learning to read and to write, and even a little arithmetic, which I have myself found useful at a pinch—but I am dead against books. They disincline you to action. At this moment, instead of saying to yourself, 'Here is a man of spirit and experience, whose views must needs be worth something, and I'll follow his lead,' you are wasting time in thinking about it. 'Will it be prudent to do so?' is the idea that occurs to you, or even (if they taught you out of good books), 'Will it be right?' Now it is one excellent point in the character of our good friends below here that they never think."

Not a muscle of Mr. Maguire's countenance moved, save those employed in the suction of his pipe. It was impossible to tell by the expression of his face whether he was in jest or in earnest. "However, let me go on with my story," he continued. "I went to sea as a cabin-boy, and in twelve years' time—when I was seven-and-twenty—I found myself the captain of a ship. It was but a small one, indeed—a sloop called the Mermaid, with but very few hands on board, but I was proud enough of being her skipper. She was laden with oil from Barbadoes, and we had not long left the place when we fell in with a strange sail. She showed no colors; and as she drew nearer, I made her out to be a schooner, full of hands all in white shirts, and with a whole tier of great guns.

"'Where does this sloop belong to?' hailed she.

"'To London,' said I; 'from Barbadoes.'

"'We know that,' was the answer. 'Send your master on board.'

"And a black flag flew up to her mast-head. That was thirty years ago, and yet I remember that moment as clearly as though it happened yesterday. One doesn't fall into the hands of pirates every day. Notwithstanding my alarm, I felt it hard to keep my temper (which was always short) when the captain called out, as we were making the best haste we could in our little boat toward his ship, 'Pull faster, you speckled-shirted dogs' (as though we would not have worn white ones, if we had known of his preference for them), 'or I will drub you within an inch of your lives, and that inch too.' But I knew better than to answer; for when your hand is in the lion's mouth, says the proverb, get it out as easy as you can. Only I made up my mind that if the worst came to the worst, I would take that gentleman around the waist and jump into the sea with him, at any rate.

"'And who are we, think you?' said he, when I got upon deck.

"'Sir,' said I, 'I believe you are gentlemen of fortune belonging to the sea.'

"'Nay, there you lie,' said he, 'for, by ——, we are pirates.'

"For though, like most people in authority, he was inclined to give himself airs, this gentleman was very plain spoken. He asked what I had on board my ship—warning me at the same time that a lie would cost me my life—and was very dissatisfied when I told him. It seemed to me, indeed, that the time had almost come for his taking that leap with me into the sea, the satisfaction of which I was fully resolved not to deny myself; but, fortunately for us both, it seemed he had not the absolute disposal of life and death in his own hands, but must needs consult the ship's company.

"In the mean time, I was sent down to his cabin to await the result of their deliberations. While there, one of his men came in, and with a friendly countenance, said, 'So you don't know me, Mr. Maguire?'

"'No,' said I; 'I have not that pleasure.'

"Then he reminded me that he had served in the same ship with me five years ago, as likewise two others of his companions had.

"'We three wish you well,' said he; 'but it is unfortunate that the Mermaid has so little in her, which makes the others bitter against you. Now what we shall propose—since they are for shooting you—is to make you one of ourselves; for there is not a man on board of us who can keep accounts, which we know you can do. So I have come down to bid you have no hesitation, in case you get the chance of such an offer—not without risk to myself, let me tell you; but one should stand by an old shipmate.'

"I thanked him heartily, and said, what was very true, though piracy was not to my taste, a bullet through the head was much less so; and in the end it turned out as he had given me to hope. I was made purser of the Mother Carey, as their vessel was called, that very night, and shook hands with the captain upon it (instead of kissing them, as when the king gives you any thing), and with all the crew. Moreover, they brought in a huge bowl, made of solid silver, which held eight quarts of punch, and drank until sunrise to my new appointment—a most undesirable one, you are doubtless thinking, my friend, and so thought I at that time. With the exception of the three men that had saved my life, I had no desire to see any one of my present companions again, unless it should be at some place of execution; but one's opinion changes upon many things in this world, and I have been on board worse ships, and mated with worse crews than that of the Mother Carey."

"But how long were you on board of her, before you had an opportunity of escape?"

"Well, really," said Maguire, sucking slowly at his pipe, and regarding Robert with a sort of comical grimness, "I can't quite say as to the opportunity of escape, but I was with the Mother Carey, or, at all events, with her chickens—for she went to the bottom the next cruise—for about twenty years. But there! it's getting late, lad, and time to turn in, so I'll finish my yarn another time." And with that he rose, knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and with a nod at his petrified young companion, descended gravely into the steerage.

Twenty years the companion of pirates! It was clear, even to the inexperience of Robert Chesney, that no man could be among such persons for such a length of time, and yet not of them. "Misther Maguire," then, who enjoyed such respect below stairs and with Murphy, and who even associated on familiar terms with Mr. Denton himself, had been in his time "a gentleman of fortune," as he had delicately put it, "belonging to the sea!" This was sufficiently astounding, of course, but it was not absolutely shocking to the feelings; for, in the first place, the whole story might be untrue—"only a yarn," as the narrator himself had termed it, spun to beguile an idle hour, or to impose upon his own (Robert's) credulity; and secondly, if it was true (and indeed he believed it to be so), the circumstance had happened so long ago, and was so much out of the pale of ordinary experience, that it was robbed of its more offensive features. Piracy, as Robert understood, was a thing of the past; and this strange fellow-passenger of his must have been one of the very last of that now legendary race, whose hand was against every man, and every man's hand against them. This Maguire (who, moreover, had some good points about him, or, at all events, points that were attractive) was, after all, to be regarded more as some marine monster, so rare that it is more an object of curiosity than of loathing or alarm; or as some antediluvian animal, supposed to be extinct, whom nobody would now wish to destroy, even if it still was a little dangerous, but would rather preserve and make much of, as a solitary specimen of what had once existed.

What doubtless strengthened these liberal views in Robert, who was certainly not without good principles, was the powerful interest that the relation thus suddenly broken off had excited in him; he wanted, it must be confessed, to hear the conclusion of the matter. Moreover, the confidence that had thus been reposed in him—for it was reasonable to suppose that Maguire did not show every body this strange leaf of his own history—was a compliment to his good sense as well as his sense of honor. It was evidently not expected that he should tell this wonderful story all over the ship, as many lads of his age would have hastened to do. He did not see that what was a compliment to his prudence was paid at the expense of his sensitiveness to the claims of justice and authority; that it must also have not been expected that he would be so shocked at the revelation as to denounce the author of it. He lay awake half the night thinking of the Mother Carey, and dreamed of a "speckled-shirted dog," who was, however, in his dream but a retriever; and not until the morning—so wholly had the greater wonder absorbed the lesser—did he remember what Maguire had told him of Kavanagh's presence on board the Star of Erin. If that was true, it was only a few steps more of improbability to be surmounted to believe the strange story his companion had told about himself. The greeting that Maguire gave him the next morning was more brief and commonplace even than usual, being confined to a careless nod, so that at first Robert was inclined to think that the other had repented of his confidence of the previous evening. When noon had arrived without his receiving any communication, he got very impatient, and even irritable, for it struck him that he had been made the victim of a practical joke; but after dinner Murphy came to him with the information that Mr. Denton wished to see him on a matter of importance.

"He is better, then?" observed Robert, careful not to exhibit his own state of expectation—for though it was certain that Murphy must know any secret connected with his young master that Maguire knew, he thought it well to show himself worthy of the latter's confidence.

"Yes, he's better, but still in his berth; and the light hurts his eyes, so you must talk through the curtain."

When Robert knocked at the cabin door it was certainly a stronger and more healthy voice that bade him "come in" than he had expected to hear; and he found Mr. Denton, though still confined to bed, very different in appearance from what he had expected. Not only was he far from looking like a sick man but lately in extremis, but even better than when he had seen him in Herne Street.

"Sit down there, Robert," said he, pointing to a seat beside his pillow, but separated from it by the curtain which was drawn round him, "and tell me about the boys."

Robert made his report; to which the other seemed to listen attentively, and then expressed his high approval of what he had done.

"With Mr. Kavanagh away, and myself ill," said he, frankly, "I don't know how we should have got on without you. I hope you find your own position comfortable on board, as I am sure it deserves to be?"

"Yes, thank you, Sir."

It seemed ungrateful to say to this kind old invalid, "But the promise that you made to me has not been kept with respect to one thing—that Mr. Frank was to come with us."

"And did you write home, as I told you, and bid your pretty sweetheart reply to you at Liverpool?"

"I wrote home, Sir, and got an answer," replied Robert, a little stiffly. Mr. Denton was not his patron, and this light allusion to his Lizzie seemed unjustifiable. Moreover, there was a movement of the curtain which suggested that his companion might be laughing at him—rather heartily for a sick man.

"And what did the young woman say, Robert?"

"Well—she sent me but ill news, Sir; but such as it was, it only concerns myself and her. If Mr. Kavanagh had asked me, it would be different, but you must excuse—"

There was a chuckle from the bed; the curtain was drawn suddenly back, and, to Robert's intense astonishment, revealed Mr. Frank Kavanagh himself, just as he had seen him on the morning after their adventure, except that he had a smoking-cap on his head, which he wore, perhaps, by way of night-cap!

"There goes my scalp," cried he, flinging the gray wig, which had so long concealed his own curling locks, against the cabin wall, "and Mr. Denton with it, though, you see, he has kept his word with you, after all."

Robert took the hand that was extended to him in all sincerity; he was delighted to find himself once more face to face with his friendly patron; but his prevailing idea was still that of astonishment at the means that had secured this incognito.

"So you were Mr. Denton, were you, all along, Sir, and Mr. Wilson as well?"

"Yes," returned Kavanagh, gravely; the gay tone and the smiling look both vanished—swept away, as Robert judged, by the tender memory which the latter alias had evoked—"yes. There were reasons—political ones—why I lived in Herne Street under a feigned name."

"And when the police came on board, they never found you out neither! You should have seen them on deck, Sir, scrutinizing us all, and feeling the hair of our heads, though why they did that I can not imagine."

"Nor any one else, I should think," said Kavanagh, forcing a laugh: "they were not very sagacious, truly, but they were very civil. The inspector apologized for disturbing so confirmed an invalid as myself. But enough of that. I wish to know of your own affairs, Robert, What of your sweetheart, and her ill news? Can she not reconcile herself to your leaving her, and taking so long a journey? Well, that is only to be expected."

A sigh followed Kavanagh's words: Robert felt even more certain than before that what had

Hosted by Google

so suddenly turned his impulsive patron's mirth to melancholy was the remembrance of pretty "Miss Mary."

"No, Sir; it is worse than that;" and he told him of the troubles which Lizzie's letter had disclosed to him.

"Well, well," said Kavanagh, cheerfully, "we need not be afraid that a good-looking lad like you will be cut out by your step-father; but the poverty and the poaching are real misfortunes. What a pity we could not have brought the whole family out with us!"

"Yes, indeed, Sir; that is what I had in my mind when we were at Liverpool," answered Robert. "If I had known who you were, I think I should have plucked up courage to ask you that great favor, notwithstanding all the obligations—"

"Tush, tush!" interrupted the other, kindly; "don't talk of them. Without a treasurer and comptroller such as you have proved yourself to be, we could never have got on as we have. Even Murphy allows that. No, no; the debt is quite on the other side. As for your friends trying their luck in the New World, they can do that still; and it is much better that they should follow you, when you have got settled somewhere, than help to swell the number of our incapables. If money is wanting for their passage, I will let you have it—advance it out of your salary, if you are too proud to take it as a gift. There, there; that is settled, so no more words about it."

It was no longer a wonder to Robert that "the boys" should have such reverence for their "young masther," for he felt himself as though he could have laid down his life for his sake. It was not only gratitude which affected him; there was an indescribable charm in Kavanagh's tone and manner that was wholly removed from the lad's experience, and almost seemed to him to belong to a superior being; it was not patronage, and it was not friendship, but it had the grace of the one and the tenderness of the other.

"Indeed, Sir, you overwhelm me with kindness," was all he could answer; "and I only hope I may show myself—"

"Yes, yes, we shall always be good friends, Robert," interrupted the other; "I am sure of that. And now about the boys—I mean my boys. Are they under the belief that I have forsaken them, or have they more faith than some people I could mention?"

"Well, Sir," replied Robert, apologetically, "they are still too sick to be very urgent about any thing else, and besides, they don't see why you should not step on board any day from some island or continent."

Kavanagh laughed, but there was a touch of pity in the tone in which he replied, "Ah! yes, that is likely enough. They know nothing but what the priest tells them, poor fellows!" then added, still more gravely, "and perhaps the greatest proof of their simplicity is their belief in myself."

Here, somewhat to Robert's relief—for Kavanagh's voice had sunk so low that his companion scarcely knew whether this last observation was intended for his ear or not—there was a knock at the cabin door, and Murphy entered, which put an end to further confidential talk.

CHAPTER X.

THE CLOUDS GATHER.

THE next time Maguire met Robert his quick eye detected a difference in the lad's expression.

"Ah!" said he, "you have seen him, I perceive. Did I not tell you the truth?"

"Yes, indeed," answered Robert. "But you must allow there was some cause for incredulity. Surely nothing could be more unlikely than the whole affair."

"To you, perhaps not," answered Maguire. "But as for me, I am too old to be astonished at any thing. Besides, I have seen a much stranger thing in the way of 'keeping quiet' on board ship."

"Then that must have been on board the Mother Carey," said Robert, smiling.

"Well, lad, it was so." He too smiled good-naturedly enough, for he saw that the lad was greedy to hear more of that adventure; and lighting his pipe, and sitting down under the bulwarks as before, proceeded to gratify him.

"The story of my life would weary you, and, besides, some of its incidents might prove a trifle too strong for your stomach. But what we have just been saying reminds me of a curious circumstance. While I was perforce a member of the pirate crew they met with some hard knocks, for it is not every ship that gives up to the black flag without a tussle; and next to Captain Grim himself, as he was termed (for neither he nor his men were particular about preserving their real names), the greatest fire-eater among them was a good-looking young fellow called Galley. He was not a general favorite, because he kept himself to himself, and did not drink much; but his bravery made him respected. I well remember his resenting some innuendoes of the mate with respect to his sparing the punch in order that he might win at cards, one night, by throwing the whole bowl of liquor over him, and the duel that took place in consequence. When any of the crew quarreled it was not permitted to fight on board, but they were put out on the first land we came to, and there settled the matter with sword or pistol. The way in which young Galley polished off the mate with the sharp steel in half a dozen cuts was a very pretty sight, nor have I ever seen a man of his age so dextrous with that weapon. Whenever we met a bigger ship than we liked the look of, and it was a question of flight or fight, he was always for fighting; and sometimes when we have been chatting together, just as you and I are now, he would express himself with respect to his own trade in the most truculent manner. Being only a sort of amateur myself, I was allowed to have my own opinion about piracy, and I ventured to tell him that it seemed to me to be an unsatisfactory sort of life, especially as it had for the most part a noose of rope at the end of it. 'And quite right too,' said he: 'if it were not for hanging us pretty fellows, every cowardly scoundrel would turn pirate, and so infest the seas that men of courage would starve. The ocean would be crowded with rogues, like the land, and no merchant would dare venture out, so that our trade would no longer be worth the following.' Well, when the Mother Carey came to grief, and her chickens were lodged in jail, previously to having their necks wrung, an appeal was made to the court on behalf of Galley such as astonished me more than if the honest fellow had played booty, and turned king's evidence: his defense was that he was a young woman. And as one of the gentler sex, supposed to be incapable of piratical conduct—and also being very good-looking—the judges acquitted her on that plea. And now you will easily understand, my friend, how the fact of Mr. Denton's turning out to be Mr. Kavanagh does not appear to me so very extraordinary. You may think that one of us, at all events, was cognizant of Galley's sex, for whose sake, perhaps, she might even have assumed the masculine garb; but this was certainly not so; and, indeed, the sixth article of our regulations (which were common, I believe, to all the fraternity) ran as follows: 'If any man is found carrying a woman to sea disguised, or even conniving at such an act, he shall suffer death.'"

"You had laws, then, it seems, like honest people?" observed Robert.

"Most certainly. We had Articles of War, some of which, at least, were as strictly observed as on board of a king's ship, and to which every man had to subscribe; and I did so myself—though of course under compulsion. There were ten (if I remember right) in all. Number one established universal suffrage. Every man had an equal vote in affairs of moment; an equal share of the fresh provisions and strong liquors, at any time seized, and might use them at pleasure, unless a scarcity (no uncommon thing with us) made it necessary to vote a retrenchment. Number two referred to public property, in which, if any man defrauded his companions, if it was but the worth of a dollar, he was marooned (that is, set on the first desolate island we might come to, with a gun and a few charges of powder and shot, and a bottle of water, to perish of starvation). If the robbery was only between one another, the offender had his ears and nose split, but was not marooned. The third article was directed against gambling, and was by no means scrupulously observed. The fourth commanded lights and candles to be extinguished at eight o'clock; and if any of the crew after that hour were still inclined for drinking, they were to drink on the open deck. The fifth related to keeping the cutlasses and pistols clean and fit for service, and was the most popular of all. The men were extravagantly nice in the beauty and richness of their weapons, and would give sometimes at an auction (at the mast) as much as forty pounds a pair for pistols, which they wore in time of service slung over their shoulders, and adorned with ribbons. The sixth article I have already quoted. The seventh decreed death to any man who should desert the ship or his quarters in battle. The eighth was to arrange quarrels. There was to be no striking on board, but (as I have said) at the nearest convenient spot the disputants were landed, and placed back to back at twenty paces. At the word of command they turned and fired immediately, or else the piece was knocked out of their hands. Then, if both missed, they came to their cutlasses, and who drew first blood was held the victor. The ninth enacted that no man should talk of breaking up their way of living until each had cleared a thousand pounds. But if any man should lose a limb or become a cripple in the public service, he was to have eight hundred dollars out of the common stock, and for lesser hurts proportionally. The tenth and last article provided the captain and quartermaster should receive two shares of a prize, the master, boatswain, and gunner one share and a half, and other officers one and a quarter."

"Then there were persons in authority as well as laws among you?" remarked Robert, not forgetful of Mr. Maguire's anarchical opinions of the previous night.

"Yes, there were; nor do I deny that such institutions are necessary. Nevertheless, so far as government was concerned, the Mother Carey was, I contend, a model vessel; nay, there is no doubt, looking at the matter as a commercial speculation, that, with ordinary prudence, any man on board might have made his thousand pounds twice over! The law against drunkenness, however, and gambling was almost a dead letter; and the captain, as you may judge from my own case, was unnecessarily brutal."

"Was he cruel to others as well as yourself, then?" inquired Robert.

"Yes, indeed. I have known him make a poor skipper, in whose cargo he was disappointed, eat his own ears with pepper and salt! He had not the head-piece for a captain; and that is what I complain of in other societies, that men who are altogether unfit for it are trusted with authority."

Robert was too horrified with the incident of the skipper's ears to pay much attention to this philosophical observation; but it did not escape him that Mr. Maguire was very charitable in his views with respect to piracy, and seemed inexplicably desirous to make his listener a convert to them. At that time, however, he did not think very seriously of the matter. Mr. Maguire still appeared to him in the light of a lusus naturæ—a being to excite wonder rather than apprehension. He did not reflect that representations of exciting adventures and wealth easily come by, although they had no influence upon himself, might have their weight with more ignorant and impulsive hearers; that the spark which falls innocuous on the hearth-rug will set a heap of shavings in a blaze.

"You think, then, that if you had had a wise man instead of a brute for captain, you would have made an excellent speculation of the Mother Carey," observed Robert, dryly, "and that each of the crew might have retired from business upon a handsome fortune?"

"Yes, I do," said Maguire, boldly. "If I had not been an ass at that time, I might now myself be a rich man, for that matter."

"They gave you a share of their gains, then, though you were but an amateur?"

"Of course they did: why the deuce should they not?" answered the other, so naïvely, and even indignantly, that Robert refrained from putting the inquiry that had suggested itself, as to how Mr. Maguire had reconciled it to his conscience to partake of such ill-got spoil. "Yes, I could have made my fortune," continued he, "had I had the head on my shoulders which I carry now; while Captain Grim, drunkard and gambler as he was, used to boast of his twenty thousand pounds laid up in some place, which he was wont to say 'only himself and the devil knew of; and the longest liver should take all.' His weakness was drink," continued Mr. Maguire, in a deprecating tone, "under the influence of which he became just what all men in authority become who have no right to their high places—tyrannical. I shall never forget his firing a brace of pistols right and left under the dinner-table one night among us all, 'in order,' as he explained, 'that we should not forget who he was.' We fined him eight hundred dollars, however, for breaking the mate's leg with one of the bullets, so that it was an expensive shot."

"Then it must have been rather dangerous work to be even purser on board the Mother Carey?" remarked Robert.

"Oh, that was nothing," answered Maguire, coolly. "I've—that is, I have known a man on board that ship to stand in the powder-magazine during an action in which we were likely to get the worst of it, torch in hand, with orders from the captain to send all to blazes in case things went the wrong way.—But here's one of your sheep from the steerage in search of his shepherd." And leaving Robert with one of his many charges, who happened to come up at that moment to make some complaint respecting rations—he had forgotten for the tenth time to bring his pannikin and other utensils on deck to receive them, and the steward had poured rice, oatmeal, and flour, pease, sugar, and tea, into one paper bag, in a rage—Mr. Maguire sauntered away. It struck Robert that he was glad to do so; that he had spoken rather more freely than he had intended to do respecting his own share in the proceedings of the crew of the Mother Carey, and this idea was strengthened by the fact that he made no further allusion to that vessel of his own accord, and was chary of doing so even when interrogated concerning her.

The Star of Erin pursued her voyage, upon the whole, most favorably; there were storms and calms, of course, but for the most part she had fine weather, and there was little to complain of save the tediousness inseparable from life on shipboard. Notwithstanding what has been sung of it, this is a very prosaic state of existence: on sea one day is more like another than it can possibly be on shore, even in the most unvarying of households. The smallest details assume a gigantic importance. The sight of a shoal of porpoises, the catching of a shark, the speaking with another ship, are events to be remembered, because they are the only ones. The sunsets of the tropics are gorgeous, but there are times when the sun is not setting, and, to say the truth, "the boys" did not, as a general rule, appreciate it even when it did. Some of the women made themselves useful in cooking and mending and washing clothes; but the men did nothing; when they were not listening to Mr. Maguire's yarns, of which they were very greedy, they lay on deck and slept all day, then went below and slept again—a mode of existence which suited them very well. Robert had his duties, such as they were, to occupy him; he borrowed a few books from the captain, of whom he was a great favorite, and devoured them word by word; and had always by him a letter for Lizzie, ready for any homeward-bound vessel that might volunteer to be their ocean postman. But the time hung heavily on his hands. How differently would it have passed (thought he) if he could have had Lizzie for a fellow-passenger! how differently it would pass when she had once joined him in the Under-world! His letters were full of that bright prospect, we may be sure.

When they had been about two months at sea an incident happened to vary the monotony of their existence. Mr. Kavanagh emerged from his cabin in his own proper character. The enthusiasm among the tenants of the steerage was immense, yet not so great as it would have been had his presence on board been unsuspected: one by one "the boys"—that is, his own Tipperary boys—had been of late admitted into the secret, and these had told the rest. But, even as it was, the turmoil and excitement were something startling. There was not only joy that the young master was among them; there was also triumph because a victory had been obtained over the law. The crew, indeed, were comparatively indifferent about the matter, but they formed but a small portion of the population of the Star of Erin. The captain, as Robert could not but remark, not only did not share in these manifestations of delight, but showed some signs of displeasure. This might be accounted for by the fact that he had been imposed upon—used as a cat's-paw by Kavanagh—for it seemed he had himself been ignorant hitherto of the identity of that gentleman with Denton; but, at all events, so it was. The steerage passengers were exceedingly uproarious that night, having had liquor supplied them by Murphy; and Robert remained on deck until a late hour, in case his services might be required among them. While thus keeping voluntary watch, the captain came up and spoke with him on the matter, and his manner seemed uneasy; they both agreed that to give liquor in such abundance to so excitable a throng was most injudicious: it might have been fancy, but, in the moonlight, Robert caught sight of something gleaming in the captain's breast pocket which looked very like the butt of a revolver.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

SELECTED FROM "ADAM BEDE."

WHY did they say she was so changed? In the corpse we love, it is the likeness we see—it is the likeness, which makes itself felt the more keenly because something else was and is not.

Well, well, my boy, if good luck knocks at your door, don't you put your head out at window and tell it to be gone about its business, that's all.

You must learn to deal with odd and even in life, as well as in figures.

A man about town might perhaps consider that these influences (of the country) were not to be felt out of a child's story-book; but when you are among the fields and hedge-rows it is impossible to maintain a consistent superiority to simple natural pleasures.

It's good to live only a moment at a time, as I've read in one of Mr. Wesley's books. It isn't for you and me to lay plans; we've nothing to do but to obey and to trust.

It is a vain thought to flee from the work that God appoints us, for the sake of finding a greater blessing to our own souls, as if we could choose for ourselves where we shall find the fullness of the Divine Presence, instead of seeking it where alone it is to be found, in loving obedience.

Poor dog! I've a strange feeling about the dumb things as if they wanted to speak, and it was a trouble to 'em because they couldn't. I can't help being sorry for the dogs always, though perhaps there's no need. But they may well have more in them than they know how to make us understand, for we can't say half what we feel, with all our words.

THE LAST LEVÉE OF NAPOLEON III.

"YOU will know it by its gold gates," said a laborer, as I asked the way to Camden Place about nine o'clock on the morning of January 14. A surer index was the tricolor flag, drooping half-mast high above the little lodge. I entered the gold gates, and while I waited in the lodge a Frenchman in dingy black came in, who saluted me as a fellow-mourner, and signed his name in the visitors' book, M——, Avocat. M. Pietri would see me if I would go to the house. So I walked down the avenue, and opening the central door, stood in a carved oak vestibule cut off from the hall by a black curtain. The scene of the lying in state was not yet set behind that black drop curtain. I could hear subdued voices. It parted a little, and a Sister of Mercy passed out. "Ma sœur, where is M. Pietri?" She could not tell. Then it bulged out with an elbow, which I touched, repeating my question. A workman's face appeared, who took me for a foreigner, and wasted no words on me. At last enters the tall footman of the Emperor, in black even to the epaulets, who took my card. Then M. Pietri himself. "If I could come again in three-quarters of an hour, preparations would be complete." I went to the "Tiger's Head" and breakfasted, to fortify myself against my interview with the dead. The landlady told me with much pride that Prince Teck had lunched there the day before. Then I hurried to the Catholic chapel, and thinking to make its incumbent my ally, called upon him. The reverend gentleman answered my ring in person, and eying me askance, sighed, "Why has the sergeant not sent me down those policemen?" He was already tired of such intruders as myself. But I made my peace with him, met the sergeant, and told him to send down the men. At the lodge-gates I found that M. Pietri had already sent for me. "Dépêchez-vous," said an impatient Frenchman, interrupting something I had to say. So I stood again before the black curtain, and was led into a small room filled with French gentlemen. All wore white neck-ties and dress-coats. Most were decorated—some with the cross at the button-hole; some with the ribbon around the neck; others with the broad sash. I knew that I stood among such men as Fleury, Rouher, the Duc de Gramont, Canrobert, and as I sat mute in a corner I puzzled to guess which was which. I was beckoned away; so taking book and pencil, and following my guide down the black-draped passage, sombre as the valley of the shadow of death, I was ushered into the Chapelle Ardente. There was the coffin and the dead Emperor! I listened but abstractedly to whispered instructions. I was told to be quick, then left alone. That right hand folded over the left, and clasping white gloves—there are no traces of death there: the single rings on the third and last fingers; a crucifix and withered flower within reach of the hand, could it but move. Dare I stoop over the coffin to see what expression lingers in that thin, waxen face? The atmosphere seems faint and hot. Even those huge wreaths of violets can not perfume it. That "N," written in immortelles—mark that. Two priests glide in. One sprinkles holy-water toward the body, and each passes to a priedieu at the head of the coffin. The light just glances on the rims of those medals. The coffin lined with what seems amber satin; pall, purple velvet; gold fringe and tassels hanging from the top, the crown and "N" in gold upon it; broad amber edge to the pall; the crown and "N" repeated on the wall six times; the ceiling the tricolor. That old priest looks up from his prayers, and seems to start at seeing me there. This one gets up and holds his book close to the flare of one of the candles. Some one brings in fresh rose-buds and kneels to lay them at the foot of the coffin. The curtain moves again. A figure stands in its shadow. A fold of the amber satin is out of place; he goes forward to arrange it. Thus I make my rapid sketches. One last look, and I sign that I have done. I join again that company of French celebrities. Paris papers with broad mourning border have just come in. Some one is reading an Imperialist article. It avers that the empire is not dead, but lives anew in the person of the young Prince Imperial, Napoleon IV., in whose ears no one can din "Sedan, Sedan." The listeners murmur applause with tearful eyes. I raise a corner of the drawn blind, and see the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh drive up. We move to the door, and in a room opposite stands the figure of Prince Napoleon, so marvelously like the first Emperor. The broad upright forehead, those deep sunken eyes piercing the sharp-cut overhanging brow, the short upper lip, and square prodigious chin. The empire might well live again in him who seems the Emperor alive again. He comes out with the Prince Imperial. The poor boy, delicate and slight in figure, bows and shakes hands with some of his father's courtiers. They move to the Chapelle Ardente, Prince Napoleon darting a glance of fire at some Englishman who brushes his shoulder. Ladies in deep crape follow them, stop for a moment by the cord that parts off the chapelle, sprinkle holy-water, or throw sprigs of box toward the coffin, cross themselves, and go away. A policeman stands behind, who, versed in French, says alternately, "Pass on, ladies and gentlemen," and "Passez, s'il vous plait." Then the public in continuous stream flows in down that black channel from door to door. The Emperor holds his last levée.

Hosted by Google

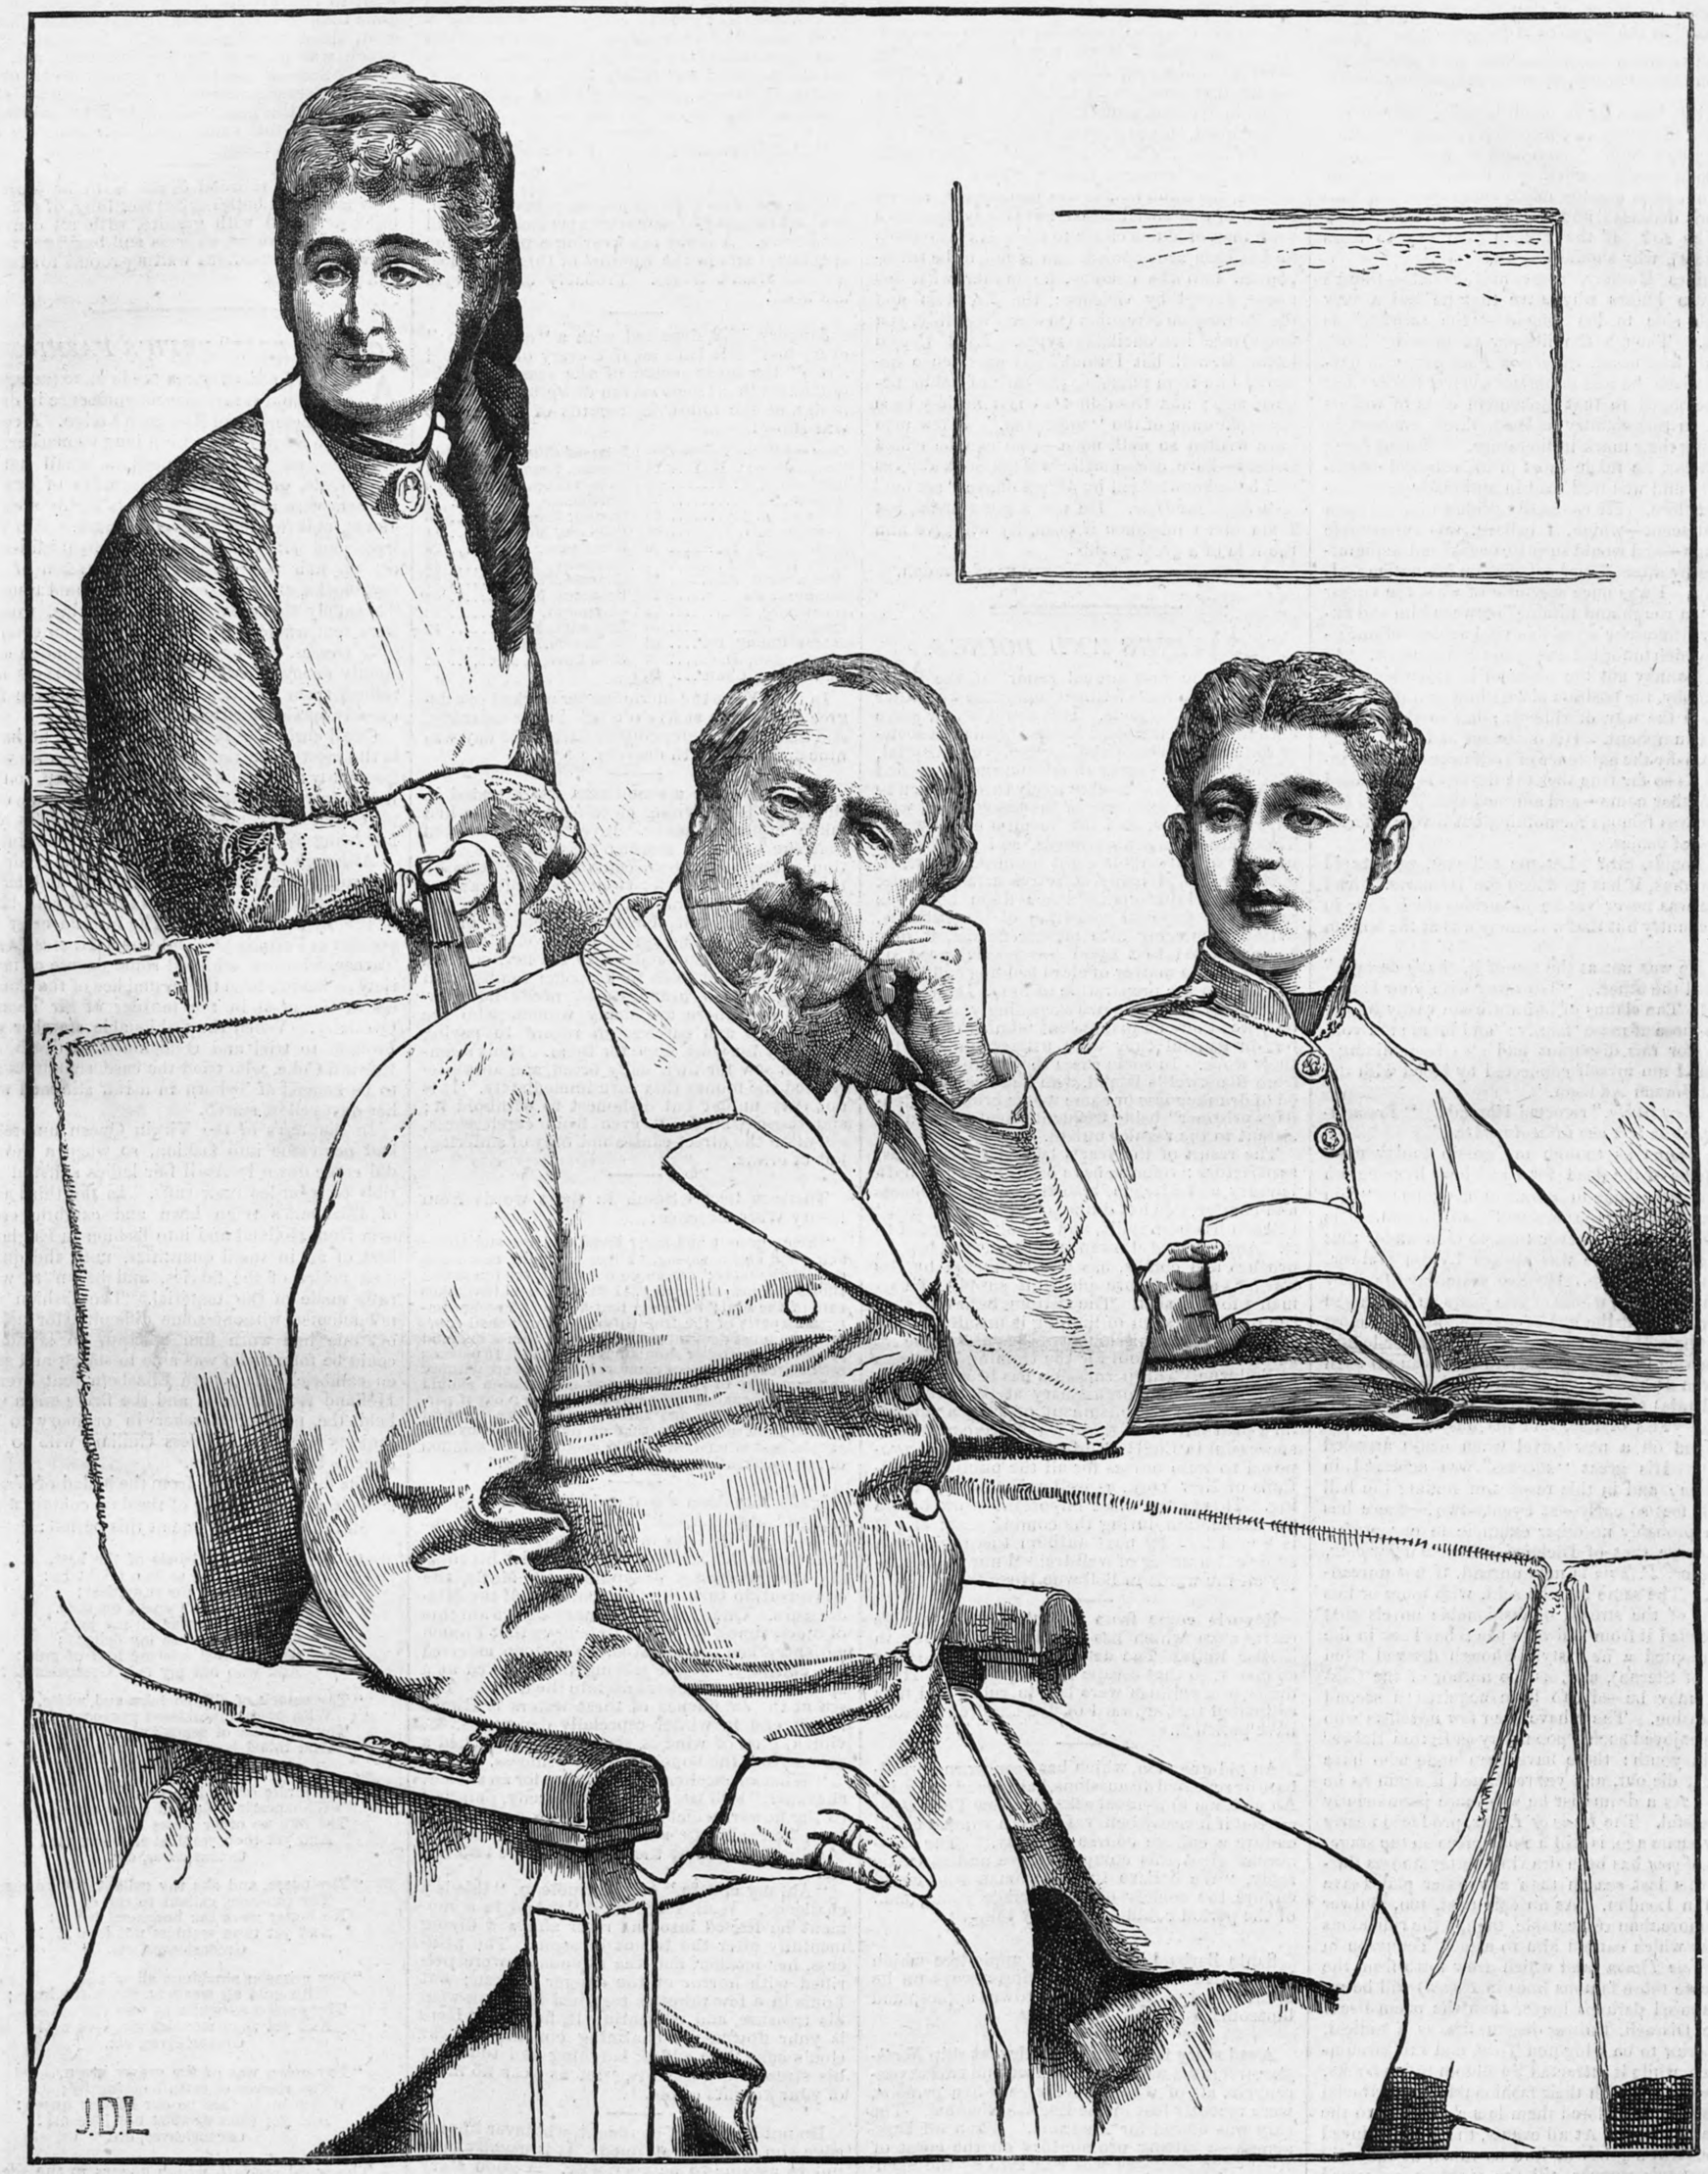
THE LAST LEVÉE—INSIDE THE CHAPELLE ARDENTE AT CHISELHURST, JANUARY 14, 1873, AT THE LYING IN STATE OF NAPOLEON III.

Outside is a little gate to which we crowd for egress. But two policemen are listening with vacant smile to a torrent of French, which they take to mean that the gate must be closed. Near by is a table where the throng of visitors are signing names, two French gentlemen handing the pens. Leaving this record of their sympathy, they are content to go.

Hosted by Google



NAPOLEON III. AND HIS FAMILY AT CHISELHURST—A REMINISCENCE.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Emperor's Funeral.—James Hannay.—Lord Lytton.

THE Emperor of the French, after lying in state last Thursday, and "receiving" in that sad fashion some 20,000 persons—his last levee—was buried yesterday in the little chapel at Chiselhurst, but not in British soil. M. Eugene Delessert, his former secretary, brought a chest full of the earth he had last trodden when at the Tuileries to be placed around his coffin. All the chief Imperialists came over from France to pay him the tribute of their presence, and it is computed that no less than 2000 of his fellow-countrymen accompanied the coffin—studded with the golden bees that are the badges of his race—to its resting-place. A poet of his own nation, and if not a statesman, one of whom it was truly said that "he leaped on the revolution in its hour of might, and tamed it," in writing of Napoleon I., thus finely sings:

"Ne crains pas cependant, ombre encore inquiète,
Que je vienne outrager ta majesté muette.
Non. La lyre aux tombeaux n'a jamais insulté;
La mort fut de tout temps l'asile de la gloire;
Rien ne doit jusqu'ici poursuivre une mémoire;
Rien—excepté la vérité.

* * * * * * *

C'est le dieu qui regne, et qui couronne;
C'est le dieu qui punit; c'est le dieu qui pardonne:
Pour les héros et nous il a des lois divers.
Parle-lui sans effroi, lui seul peut le comprendre;
L'esclave et le tyran ont tous un compte à rendre,
L'un du sceptre, l'autre des fers.
Son cercueil est fermé; Dieu l'a jugé: Silence!
Son crime et ses exploits pesent dans la balance,
Que des faibles mortels la main n'y touche plus."

Let us be taught by Lamartine, and say nothing of this dead man; nay, not even the truth—la vérité—unless it be designed in imitation of him once more to raise up an empire upon the ruins of public virtue. Of all that took place at Chiselhurst nothing is to be reprehended except that loyal outburst of Vive Napoléon IV., which saluted the Prince Imperial from his 2000 would-be subjects. The world desires no more of that empire which, while protesting that it was La Paix, was, as the witty courtier put it, in fact L'Epée. It came like the Gospel in that particular, and in that only, not to preach peace, but the sword.

The Imperialists, perhaps feeling that their best card is now played, and anxious in their weakness to conciliate all that are not absolutely their declared enemies, have become very demonstrative in their gratitude toward England for its hospitality to the exile of Chiselhurst. The Paris paper, L'Ordre, which describes to-day the Emperor's obsequies, is printed in English out of compliment to that land which has ever been "the refuge of fallen greatness." We have not been much accustomed to such compliments from our neighbors across the Channel—the last remark upon our national hospitality having been a vehement remonstrance from the Imperialists themselves against our practice of "welcoming bandits"—i. e., Frenchmen professing politics of a different stamp from themselves. "Thanks be to the Queen," goes on L'Ordre to say—"noble sovereign, our once respected guest.....who, in the considerations shown by her to the Emperor and Empress in their misfortune, shows she is still mindful of the acclamations and of the honors of Versailles. Thanks to the great English people, once and long our redoubtable enemy, to-day our ally in works of peace and progress, but ever our model and our master, by the sentiment of order and the inspiration of patriotism." This admirable publication has discovered that our aristocracy is celebrated for its "lofty spirit and calm energy," our middle classes for "a feverish ardor for industry and commerce," our politicians for "an animation that almost rises to turbulence," and our newspaper-writers, "while proud, determined, and impassioned as all the rest," for "a strength that always enables them to remain just." Upon the whole, in fact, L'Ordre reminds me much of that famous example of "gush" in the Rejected Addresses:

Hosted by Google

"God bless the army, bless their coats of scarlet;
God bless the navy; bless the Princess Charlotte!"

But if it hopes by so much blessing to create an Imperialist party in this country, it must be very sanguine indeed. Even as it is, people are asking one another whether a little too much stir has not been already made concerning the Emperor's decease; and it has been wittily replied, "Why so? If the French give way to tears (Thiers), why should not we?"

James Hannay, sometimes called — though Heaven knows why, save that he had a very rough side to his tongue—"the satirist," is dead. Though the literary promise held out by his first novel, Singleton Fontenoy, was never realized, he was doubtless a clever fellow; but he belonged to that Bohemian class of writers who, in this country at least, rarely succeed in making their mark in literature. Without being a scholar, he made most of his classical attainments, and was well read in antiquarian and historical lore. He especially prided himself upon his descent—which, I believe, was respectable enough—and would surprise occasional acquaintances by after-dinner eulogies on his native Galloway. I was once spectator of what the vulgar call "a rough and tumble" between him and another littérateur upon this vital subject of ancestry, which afforded me great amusement. At first Hannay got the worst of it, since being on his hobby, the position placed him at a disadvantage in the way of ridicule; but in the end he was triumphant. His opponent had gone so far as to deny the existence of Galloway—which, indeed, is so far true that the district is now called by another name—and affirmed that if it did exist, it was famous for nothing but a very inferior breed of ponies.

"Ponies, Sir? Let me tell you, you stupid ignoramus, it has produced the Hannays. And there was never yet an illustrious deed done in this country but that a Hannay was at the bottom of it."

"He was not at the top of it, that's certain," replied the other. "Go away with your Galloway! The claims of literature are vastly higher than those of mere 'family;' and let me tell you, Sir" (for this disputant had also been dining), "that I am myself connected by blood with the great Joseph Addison."

"Very likely," retorted Hannay. "I remember that he left one idiot daughter."

It seems as though my gossip to-day must needs be of the dead, for I just hear by telegram that a great name in literature has gone to "join the majority" in the person of Lord Lytton. The world of readers never took to him under that title: to them he was always Lytton Bulwer, and will remain so. He died yesterday (January 18) at Torquay, where of late years he has passed his winters, at the age of sixty-eight. To most of us he will have seemed older, since for length of service in his calling there has been no such veteran as he. His first book (Ishmael, an Oriental tale) appeared in 1820, when he was but fifteen years of age, and his busy fingers were engaged on a new novel when death arrested them. His great "success" was achieved in Pelham; and in this respect of finding the ball at his feet so early—at twenty-two!—there has been probably no other example in our profession, save that of Dickens. Unlike Pickwick, however, Pelham is now unread, if not unreadable. The same may be said, with more or less truth, of the stream of fashionable novels that succeeded it from Bulwer's pen; but later in life he adopted a new style (though derived from that of Sterne), and, as the author of the Caxtons, may be said to have acquired a second reputation. There have been few novelists who have enjoyed such a popularity as Lytton Bulwer did in youth: there have been none who have seen it die out, and yet reillumed it again as he did. As a dramatist he was more permanently successful. The Lady of Lyons, produced nearly forty years ago, is still a stock piece on the stage, and Money has been drawing better houses during this last season than any other play (save one) in London. As an epic poet, too, Bulwer was more than respectable, though the ridiculous vanity which caused him to attack Tennyson in the New Timon (and which drew forth from the laureate those famous lines in Punch) will be remembered perhaps longer than the poem itself. Like Disraeli, Bulwer began life as a radical, and grew to be a bigoted Tory, and this circumstance, while it attracted Swelldom to his books, may—joined with their fashionable and artificial style—have rendered them less acceptable to the general public. At all events, the latter enjoyed Thackeray's gibes at him as much as they did Tennyson's rhymes, till the Caxtons redeemed him in our eyes. He repaid them scorn for scorn; and I remember to have heard him say at a private table, on the occasion of Garibaldi's triumphant reception in London, that "the excessive stupidity of that man was quite enough to account for his popularity."

His sympathies were indeed by no means naturally "popular," though through the influence of his friend Dickens (whom he owned to be his master, and always spoke of with the most generous warmth) they were sometimes turned in that direction. With him he established the Guild of Literature and Art, and the buildings destined for decayed veterans of the army of men of letters were erected at Stevenage, close to Knebworth, Lord Lytton's country-seat in Hertfordshire. On the occasion of their inauguration his lordship gave a splendid fête, to which all the "literary men" of London—a wide term, which includes some very queer people, as you may imagine—were invited to meet the gentry of "the county." His object was, perhaps, to accustom the latter to the manners and appearance of the expected "veterans," however eccentric they might prove to be; but the two parties did not get on together very harmoniously. Never shall I forget a youthful "groundswell" (I thank your Harper's Weekly for teaching me that word), with a glass in his eye and a drawl in his tone, remarking to a friend of mine, as we stood on the terrace watching the metropolitan literati, that he had seen nothing like it "since the Foresters' fête."* To this hour, I believe, the guild houses are unoccupied, not by reason of that social fiasco, but simply because a town man of letters clings to the society to which he has been accustomed, and is not to be transplanted into the country, no matter what his needs, except by violence: the Arcadian and the Burlington Arcadian (in our Piccadilly, you know) are irreconcilable types. Lord Lytton meant it well, but I think that experience deterred him from pursuing the path of public benevolence; and from first to last he has been the spokesman of the "upper ten." If few men have written so well, none—who can be called writers—have occasionally written so badly, as will be acknowledged by all who have "sat out" The Rightful Heir. He was a great artist, but I am much mistaken if posterity will give him the title of a great genius.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

* "The Foresters" are a benefit club, numbering some millions of our lower classes, who once a year swarm out for a holiday in the country, and enjoy it without the repose of manner that "stamps the caste of Vere de Vere."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

FROM the first annual report of the Bellevue Hospital Visiting Committee we gather some interesting facts. It is about a year since a number of benevolent ladies organized a society for the purpose of visiting Bellevue Hospital, in the hope of bringing about some much-needed reforms. The wards were freely thrown open to the fifty-three members of the association, who have regularly visited the hospital every week. There are twenty-nine wards, and the average number of patients is eight hundred. Investigation revealed many defective arrangements, having an injurious influence upon both the moral and physical condition of the patients. Without entering into minute details, it may be mentioned that there was special need of reform in the matter of clean bedding and clothing, and in the preparation of food. Moreover, the system of nursing was exceedingly poor. Not only was there an insufficient number of nurses, but in general they were utterly unfitted for their work. In some cases they were criminals from Blackwell's Island, who had been convicted of drunkenness or some worse crime, a "ten-days prisoner" being frequently sent to be an assistant to the regular nurses.

The result of the year's labor has been most satisfactory: reforms have been effected in both laundry and kitchen, resulting in clean sheets and comfortable hot dinners. A "special diet" kitchen has been built, and a cook appointed to it. An increased allowance of towels and basins, brushes and combs, has been provided by the warden, and a more plentiful supply of garments for the sick. The visitors, believing that the present system of nursing is unsuitable, applied to the Commissioners of Charities for leave to establish a school for the training of nurses at Bellevue. This permission has been cordially granted, and the preliminary steps have been taken for the establishment of such a school, on a plan similar to those which have proved so successful in England. In this school it is proposed to train nurses for all the public institutions of New York, as well as for private nursing. This is the most important work before the association during the coming year; and it is hoped that by next autumn there will be a sufficient number of well-trained nurses to supply all the wards in Bellevue Hospital.

Reports come from Calcutta of a terrible earthquake which has occurred at Lehree, in British India. The disaster overtook the city suddenly, so that escape was impossible. Hundreds of dwellings were laid in ruins, and it is estimated that upward of five hundred persons have perished.

An old question, which has been worn threadbare by repeated discussions, has turned up again. An anxious individual asks the New York Commercial if it really believes "that a woman could endure a college course of study." The Commercial gives this comprehensive and sarcastic reply, "We believe that a woman who could endure the society of the average young man of the period could endure any thing."

Santa Barbara boasts of an apple-tree which bears three crops a year, having always on its branches ripe apples, half-grown apples, and blossoms.

A sad story is that of the emigrant ship Northfleet, freighted with four hundred and twelve passengers, all of whom, save eighty-five persons, were recently lost in the English Channel. The ship was bound for Australia. When off Dungeness—a jutting promontory on the coast of Kent—the Northfleet was run into by the Spanish steam-ship Murillo, and sunk. The Murillo kept on her course, giving no heed to the cries for help coming from the sinking vessel. It now appears from testimony given by passengers of the Murillo before the British consul at Cadiz that the captain and crew of the Spanish ship knew that some unfortunate vessel had been struck, but did not make the slightest effort to render assistance. Such inhumanity is beyond conception.

A new method is suggested for growing winter hyacinths. The bulbs are bedded in deep incisions made in large sponges, the latter closed over and around the bulbs, and then placed in appropriately shaped vases. Water moderately warmed is poured into the vase until it reaches about midway the height of the sponge. The bulbs will sprout in two or three days, and continue to thrive until the flowers come out, which are said to be of "unusually large size and perfect form." The sponge may be hidden after the first week or two by sowing rape-seed upon it, the resultant growth completely covering it with moss-like vegetation. From its porous and warm nature the sponge seems well adapted to the purpose, and dilute fertilizing material might, it would appear, be added to aid the quick development of the plants.

Humanity to animals has taken a new form in Paris. An optician of that city, who believes animals suffer from near-sightedness as well as people, and who believes also in relieving them, has just taken out a patent for spectacles adapted for horses. A tabby cat wearing a pair of blue spectacles sits in the window of this whimsical humanitarian's house. Probably tabby's eyes are weak.

January, 1873, departed with a "cold snap;" every body felt it to be, like every other "cold snap," the most severe of the season. Thermometers in all sections ran down to a very low figure, as the following records of January 30 will show:

Towns and Cities.	Below Zero.	Towns and Cities.	Below Zero.
Poughkeepsie, N. Y.	26	Canaan, Conn.	28
Rhinebeck, N. Y.	30	Falls Village, Conn.	30
Amenia, N. Y.	37	Providence, R. I.	14
Hudson, N. Y.	29	Boston, Mass.	6
Newburgh, N. Y.	35	Portland, Me.	11
Syracuse, N. Y.	12	Brunswick, Me.	30
Buffalo, N. Y.	3	Lancaster, N. H.	42
Wilkesbarre, Pa.	25	Concord, N. H.	28
Scranton, Pa.	19	Bradford, N. H.	42
Harrisburg, Pa.	14	Claremont, N. H.	32
Reading, Pa.	30	Frederick, Md.	19
Mauch Chunk, Pa.	34	Baltimore, Md.	4
Washington, D. C.	1	Glen Cove, L. I.	22
New Haven, Conn.	26

In New York the thermometer marked one degree above zero at five o'clock in the morning, and the average temperature during the day was nine and one-eighth degrees.

Not long since a seamstress was arrested in Brooklyn for pawning clothing which she had taken home to make. Investigation showed that she had been making garments at starvation prices—seventeen cents for four pairs of trowsers, fifty cents for twelve pairs of drawers, and twenty-five for six shirts. Because the seamstress was not able to complete all of the work as soon as she agreed to, her employer—a New York woman—refused to pay her, and she pawned some articles to keep her family from starving. Such heartlessness needs no comment. But there are many women who are thoughtless and careless in regard to paying promptly for work done for them. Many seamstresses sew for their daily bread, and absolutely need the money they earn immediately. It is not only unjust but dishonest to withhold it; and those who do it, even from carelessness, are often the direct causes not only of suffering, but of crime.

There is true wisdom in these words from Henry Ward Beecher:

"Some go out and carry bread and tea and coffee and good cheer, saying, 'I like a Gospel that takes care of the body;' others go out and carry tracts and Bibles and prayers, saying, 'I like a Gospel that takes care of the soul;' but I say that both of these are important parts of the true Gospel. Which shall come first you must determine wisely. Sometimes one and sometimes the other should have priority. If persons are in circumstances of comfort in life, but are without the sympathy of Christ, the first ministration should be that of personal sympathy and prayer; but if persons are degraded and thrown out of life, the first ministration should be that of outward mercy and succor, and afterward should come the ministration of religious truth in its various applications."

Louis Napoleon was not destitute of courage and gallantry. A story is told of him at the age of twenty. One day in midwinter, when he was walking on the banks of the Rhine with his cousins the Princesses Josephine and Marie, the conversation turned on the chivalry of the Middle Ages. One of the ladies, praising the knights of olden times, professed to believe that French gallantry had degenerated. Napoleon asserted the contrary. While talking they arrived at a spot where the Necker falls into the Rhine. The sea at the confluence of these waters is always rough, and in winter especially dangerous. A violent gust of wind at the moment detached a flower from the bouquet of the princess.

"What an excellent opportunity for an ancient chevalier," said the young girl, saucily, pointing to the flower, which, carried off by a rapid current, had already almost disappeared in the whirlpool caused by the meeting of the two rivers.

"Ah, my cousin," cried Napoleon, "this is a challenge. Well, I accept it." And in a moment he leaped into the river and was diving manfully after the truant blossom. The princess, her mother, and the attendants were petrified with horror at the danger he ran; but Louis in a few minutes regained the bank with his treasure, and presenting it, he said, "Here is your flower, my charming cousin; but for God's sake," he added, laughing and touching his streaming garments, "let us hear no more of your knights of old."

Do not be too self-confident, whatever knowledge you may have attained. It is usually safer not to assume to be very wise. A good story is told of a certain reverend doctor of Philadelphia—in fact, he told it of himself, so that he might deduce the moral for the benefit of his fellow-men. At one time, when he was a connoisseur in bird-stuffing, he used to criticise other people's bird-stuffing severely. Walking with a gentleman one day, he stopped at a window where a gigantic owl was exhibited. "You see," said the doctor to his friend, "that there is a magnificent bird utterly ruined by unskillful stuffing. Notice the mounting! Execrable, isn't it? No living owl ever roosted in that position. And the eyes are fully a third larger than any owl ever possessed." At this moment the stuffed bird raised one foot and solemnly blinked at his critic, who said very little more about stuffed birds that afternoon!

Housekeepers need to exercise some care about valuables left on hat racks in the hall. Thieves are fertile in invention, and we must be on guard against them. A short time ago a genteel-looking young man called at a house in this city, asking by name for the gentleman who occupied it. The servant-girl left him seated in the hall, and called the gentleman. The feigned errand was of such a nature that the gentleman went to consult his family. No sooner was he gone than the young man caught up a valuable coat, lined throughout with Astrakhan fur, which was hanging on the hat rack, and instantly fled—of course too rapidly to be overtaken. Servants are often compelled to leave persons in the hall while they carry messages up stairs, so that valuables left in hall-ways are exposed to be taken.

A fine new railroad dépôt is to be built at New Haven—a building 300 feet long, of pressed brick trimmed with granite, with all conveniences of platforms, express and baggage room, as well as commodious waiting-rooms for ladies and gentlemen.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S FASHIONS.

A GAYLY attired queen made an extravagant court, and sumptuous magnificence in dress is the characteristic of Elizabeth's reign. A court lady wore a low dress with a long stomacher, an immense ruff round her neck, a small hat, a farthingale, or crinoline, a large fan of ostrich feathers with a mirror attached, highly scented gloves, and frequently a velvet mask. Her feet were shod with pumps of scented Spanish leather, her hair was dyed red in imitation of the royal locks, and her face was painted and rouged. To supply the great demand for wigs, women were sent round the country to buy up country girls' tresses, and female thieves in London constantly decoyed children into dark corners and robbed them of their hair: the dead were frequently spoiled for the same purpose.

Of all curiosities in costume, the ruff, perhaps, is the most eccentric. These monstrosities were frequently made a quarter of a yard deep, so that the wearer was obliged to eat with a spoon a couple of feet long, and were of different colors, yellow being for a long time the fashionable tint.

Although yellow was the fashionable color for the ruff, other tints were also used, and ladies constantly appeared with ruffs tinged with blue, or red, or purple starch. The introducer of the popular color into England was a Mistress Anne Turner, who has achieved some degree of notoriety as having been the accomplice of the Countess of Somerset in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. When the fashionable starcher was brought to trial and condemned to death, Sir Edward Coke, who tried the case, sentenced her to be hanged at Tyburn in a ruff stiffened with her own yellow starch.

In the days of the Virgin Queen umbrellas had not come into fashion, so when a shower did come down in April fair ladies suffered terribly as regarded their ruffs. In the third year of Elizabeth's reign lawn and cambric came over from Holland and into fashion in England, first of all in small quantities, until the queen took notice of the fabrics, and began to wear ruffs made of the material. The fashion was not adopted without some difficulty, for as every one had worn fine holland, no laundress could be found who was able to starch and stiffen cambric. At length Elizabeth sent over to Holland for starchers, and the first person who held the post of starcher in ordinary to her majesty was one Mistress Guillan, wife to the queen's head coachman.

The following verses from the ballad of Greensleaves, a popular song of the day, contain a fair detail of a lady's costume at this period:

"I bought thee petticoats of the best,
The cloth so fine as fine might be:
I gave thee jewels for thy chest;
And all this cost I spent on thee.
Greensleaves was all my joy;
Greensleaves was my delight;
Greensleaves was my hart of gold;
And who but my lady Greensleaves?

"Thy smock of silk so faire and white,
With gold embroidered gorgeously;
Thy petticoat of sendall right;
And this I bought thee gladly.
Greensleaves, etc.

"Thy girdle of gold so red,
With pearls bedecked sumptuously,
The like no other lasses had:
And yet thou wouldst not love me!
Greensleaves, etc.

"Thy purse, and eke thy gallant gilt knives,
Thy pin-case, gallant to the eye;
No better wore the burghers' wives:
And yet thou wouldst not love me!
Greensleaves, etc.

"Thy crimson stockings all of silk,
With gold all wrought above the knee;
Thy pumps as white as was the milk:
And yet thou wouldst not love me!
Greensleaves, etc.

"Thy gown was of the grassy green,
Thy sleeves of satin hanging by;
Which made thee be our harvest queen:
And yet thou wouldst not love me!
Greensleaves, etc."

The word sendall, which occurs in the second of the verses quoted, was a kind of thin silk; in the fourth verse the custom for a lady to carry a purse and a knife is referred to. From the earliest times a purse was worn at the girdle, and in the sixteenth century small and costly daggers were carried in bejeweled sheaths which were attached to the girdle by a small band or chain.

Fashion at the court of Henri IV. of France presented another eccentricity in the way of collars. The ruff, which had gone out of fashion some years previous to the date of which we are now speaking, was succeeded by this fan-like collar, or, as it was called at the time, the collaso monté. The daughters of those ladies who flaunted in ruffs a quarter of a yard deep now flirted in collars a quarter of a yard high, for we are assured that the collaso rose frequently as high as the top of the head. Frequently the edges were fringed and ornamented with lace; the texture was gauze, which was stiffened and thickly plaited. If the fair one pleased, fashion would allow her to turn the collaso down over the back of her dress, a practice which afterward became the habit in the following reign, when every lady wore what is called the Vandyke collar.

Hosted by Google

(Continued from No. 7, page 108.)

LONDON'S HEART.

By B. L. FARJEON,

Author of "Blade-o'-Grass," "Grif," and "Joshua Marvel."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

FELIX BECOMES A LANDLORD.

Jim Podmore's first feeling, after the shock of the discovery, was one of deep-felt gratitude, and a muttered "Thank the Lord!" escaped his lips as he saw his wife and child lying asleep in bed. When he started to his feet in a half-conscious state, with the clamor and the roar in his ears, his fear was that there had been an accident on the line, and that Polly and her mother had been hurt; and he was inexpressibly relieved to find that he had been dreaming. So deep and strong was his feeling of relief that he did not immediately realize the real danger which threatened him and those dear to him. It came upon him presently in its full force, and he recognized that a moment's delay might prove fatal. The first thing to find out was the extent of the danger. He had shut the door directly the fire met his gaze. Now he opened it, and ran down a few steps on which the fire had not yet seized. He was beaten back by the flames. He fancied he heard cries from the lower part of the house, but he could see nothing for the smoke. There was no escape that way. Snap ran hither and thither in the wildest agitation, barking at the flames to keep them down. As Jim Podmore threw open the window in despair, to see what means of escape that outlet afforded, he saw the forms of persons hurrying to the street, and heard the cries they uttered; but he could not distinguish a face. Neither could they below distinguish his face, for he had taken the precaution to close the door, and the flames had not yet entered his room. They saw, however, that some one was standing at the window, and they called out to him, but he was too agitated to understand what they said. The front of the house presented a flat surface of brick, and there seemed to be nothing between him and death—not a foot-hold, nor any thing to cling to. The whole of this action had taken place in scarcely more than two or three moments, and within that time Snap had leaped upon the bed, and had aroused Pollypod and her mother. Had they been alone, it is probable that they would have slept on unconscious of their danger, for the smoke, stealing through the crevices of the door, had already somewhat stupefied them, and whatever subtle influence that and the dull roar of voices without might have had upon their dreams, they would not have aroused them to consciousness. Mrs. Podmore, with a scream, jumped out of bed, and looked wildly around; at the same moment she snatched Polly from the bed, and held the child close to shield her from danger.

"Keep cool, old woman," said Jim Podmore; "the house is on fire;" and muttered inly, "I knew that presentiment would come true—didn't I tell old Wheels so?"

Mrs. Podmore was now standing at the window by Jim's side, with Polly in her arms. Their white night-dresses shone in the midst of the dark surface of brick, and voices reached them, rashly advising them to jump down. But they were on the third floor, and although Jim saw friendly arms held out below, he held his wife tight, lest in her fear she should obey the entreaties of their neighbors.

"There's time enough for that, old woman," he muttered, with thick breath; "perhaps the fire-escape 'll come. It 'd be almost certain death to take the leap."

Time was too precious to waste in mere words, and he released her from his embrace. She turned to the door, but he cried out to her not to open it, and that their only chance lay in doing their best to keep out the flames.

"There's only one way out for us, old woman; and that's by the window. Put Polly down, and give me a hand here. Quick! Don't be frightened, my darling!"

He was tying the bedclothes together to form a rope by which they might escape through the window, and Mrs. Podmore flew to help him. The door began to crack, and the room to fill with smoke; little jets of flame appeared.

"God help us!" cried Mrs. Podmore. "We shall be burned to death!"

Jim said nothing to this, but all the bedclothes being used, he hurriedly fixed the mattress against the door, to gain another moment; then tied one end of the rope firmly to the foot of the bedstead, and threw the other end out of the window. It reached a little below the second-floor window. As he leaned forward to see how long it was, a ladder was fixed against the wall of the house, and a man, cheered on by the crowd, ran up to the room where old Wheels slept.

"There's the old man getting out," said Jim, in a suppressed tone (the father, mother, and child were now together at the window), "and the man's jumped into the room. Don't look behind you, mother! Thank God, there's the fire-engine!"

It came tearing up the narrow street, and brave men were at work almost in an instant.

"The man's out on the ladder, mother, with Lily in his arms. Hurrah!" Jim lost sight of his own danger for a moment. "It 'll be our turn presently. The Gribbles are getting down now. They've found a rope."

Indeed, in less time than it takes to describe, all these, happily, were safely rescued, and only Jim Podmore and his wife and child remained in the burning house. The flames were in the room, and the fire-escape had not arrived. A moment's delay now would be fatal.

"Do you think you could hold fast to the rope," asked Jim of his wife, with a tightening grasp on the knots, "and slide down? There's no other chance left."

"I don't know, Jim," replied the trembling woman.

"See, there are two men climbing the ladder to catch us, and there are others below them, holding them up. You'll have to drop into their arms when you get to the end. Quick, mother! Now!"

"I can't, Jim," gasped the fainting woman; "I can't! Never mind me. Save Polly!"

Without another word, Jim Podmore, with Polly in his arms, swung out upon the rope. Happily it held, and bore the strain. Those below watched him with agonized looks, and the roar suddenly became hushed.

"Drop the child!" cried a voice. It came from one of the men on the ladder, and sounded clear and distinct as from a silver trumpet. "Don't be frightened, Pollypod! It's me—Felix."

"Felix! Felix!" screamed Pollypod, and as she cried, fell through the air into his arms. The cheers and the roar of delight that came from the crowd were frozen as it were in the throats of the excited throng as Jim, assuring himself by a hasty glance that his child was safe, began to ascend the rope for his wife. He was not a moment too soon. She was so overpowered with fright that he had to drag her through the window.

"Keep your senses about you," he cried, "for God's sake, old woman! Polly's safe! Hold me tight—don't loose your hold! For Polly's sake, now—for Polly's sake, mother!"

She clung to him so tightly as almost to press the breath out of his body. It was fortunate for them that another ladder was raised, and that other friendly arms were held out to break their fall. The moment they were safe the attention of the crowd was diverted to the form of a dog, who was standing and barking on the window-sill above. It was Snap, who had been left behind. The dog was in great distress, for the flames were darting toward him, and he could scarcely keep his foot-hold. But Jim Podmore saw the peril of his faithful servant, and having hurriedly ascertained that his wife and Pollypod were unhurt, he ran up the ladder and called out to Snap to jump. The dog had but one alternative—to be burned; so he risked his limbs, and jumped clean on to the shoulders of his master, whence he rolled safely into the crowd, who cheered merrily at the episode. Soon all the rescued ones were assembled in a house at the bottom of the street. Their neighbors had lent them clothes, and they stood looking strangely at one another, grateful for their escape, but dismayed at the prospect before them. Presently their tongues were loosened, and every little incident connected with the fire was narrated with eagerness. No one knew or suspected how it had occurred. Alfred had come home, and, in accordance with the promise he had given to Lizzie to kiss Lily before he went to bed, had knocked at his sister's door and found that she was awake. He sat talking to her for about a quarter of an hour, and then went to bed.

"I was asleep in a minute," said Alfred, "and I don't remember any thing until I was pulled out of bed and told that the house was on fire."

He held out his hand to Felix, for it was Felix who, after helping to rescue Lily and old Wheels, had aroused Alfred to a sense of his danger. Felix responded cordially, and was sufficient of a casuist to be quietly pleased because a lucky chance had given him a claim upon Alfred's gratitude.

Voices asked where the fire had commenced.

"It must have broken out in the lower part of the house," said old Wheels; "but it does not matter to us now. Thank God we're all saved, eh, Pollypod?"

Pollypod nodded her head a dozen times, and looked solemnly at Felix.

"You saved me," she said.

"Father saved you, Polly," replied Felix. "Didn't he make a rope and creep out of the window down it with Polly in his arms?"

"But you caught me!"

"Yes, I caught you, little one. It's like the story of Cock Robin, with a happier ending. Some one saw the fire—some one cried it out—some one climbed up—some one crept down—some one caught Polly."

Which made Polly laugh. But her father looked grave. His strait was a hard one indeed. Every stick of furniture burned, every scrap of spare clothing burned, no money in his purse, and not insured for a shilling. Here was a fine example for theorists whose favorite theme is the improvidence of the poor!

The Gribbles were better off than the others, and had taken shelter elsewhere. Gribble junior had saved his little store of money, and had thrown his clothes and those of his wife out of the window, not having had time to put them on. Gribble senior driveled a great deal, and weakly declared his belief that co-operation was the cause of this, his crowning misfortune.

Jim Podmore did not say any thing of his dream. His wife made a remark:

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good, Jim. If you hadn't fell asleep in the chair, you wouldn't have saved your clothes, perhaps."

"A nice figure I should ha' looked going to work without 'em," he replied, with grim humor.

If there was any comfort in the fact that they were all in the same boat as regards the complete destruction of their worldly goods, that comfort was theirs. The only one who seemed to make light of the misfortune was Felix: he extracted some secret satisfaction from it. He had a plan in his head.

He certainly lost no time in putting it into execution. In the afternoon of the following day he burst in upon them. He was flushed and triumphant.

"Now, then," he said, with heartless gayety, "if you had any thing to pack up, I should tell you to pack up at once and get ready. As it is, you can come along with me at once. I intend to take you all into custody."

They looked at him for his meaning.

"Polly," he said, "will you come and live in my house?"

"Oh yes, yes!"

"I've settled it all with your husband, Mrs. Podmore, and he comes straight from his work to my house to-night; so you are powerless, you see, and dare not make an objection."

Old Wheels drew Felix aside.

"Explain this to me, Felix."

"Well, I knew of a house—a small one—ready furnished, which I could obtain on reasonable terms for a short time. I have taken it as a speculation, and I am going to install you at once in your new home."

"How as a speculation, Felix?"

"Why, you shall pay me rent, of course, when you have turned yourself round, and so shall Mr. Podmore. The loss would be a very trifling one to me—I am doing fairly well now, you know—if you all cheated me out of the rent. Seriously, Sir, I know you would as soon be under an obligation to me as to any other man, and a home you must have. I am delighted to have you all in my power."

He beckoned to Lily.

"Where do you think your new home is, Lily?"

"I can't guess."

Strange enough, she also seemed to extract happiness from their trouble.

"Where would you like it to be? Near to Lizzie's?"

She uttered an exclamation of pleasure.

"Well, it is; within twenty yards of Lizzie's house. Lizzie is making every thing ready for you now. Mrs. Podmore has a room up stairs. A cab is waiting at the door, and we are all going together in a bunch."

Old Wheels wrung Felix's hand; Lily smiled one of her brightest smiles; Pollypod jumped for joy; and Mrs. Podmore burst out crying, and throwing her arms round Felix's neck, kissed him first and begged his pardon afterward.

That evening they were all comfortably installed in their new residence. Even Alfred was delighted, although he knew that a sword was hanging over his head.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ALFRED'S LAST CHANCE.

It happened that on the day succeeding the fire Mr. David Sheldrake purposely kept away from Soho. He was nettled at the treatment he had received the previous evening both from Lily and Lizzie, and he was determined to show them that he was not to be trifled with. He knew that Alfred would be uneasy at not seeing him, for a great race—the City and Suburban—was to be run at Epsom the following week, and Alfred's hopes hung upon the result. Alfred had begged for another advance of money, and Mr. Sheldrake had promised to give it to him, knowing that it would be returned to him through Con Staveley. "He will be mad at not seeing me," thought Mr. Sheldrake, "and he will set it down to the manner in which the girls behaved to me last night. They will be sure to hear of it from him, and it will do them good. At any rate, it will show them that it is a dangerous game to play fast and loose with me." Mr. Sheldrake was beginning to think that he was not making a very flattering progress in Lily's good opinion, and the reflection mortified him. It wounded his vanity. He had never taken so much pains with a girl before, and here he was, after many months' attention and wooing, in the same position as when he started. Time had been wasted, and money had been thrown away; not much of the latter, certainly, but the result altogether was unsatisfactory. He would bring the matter to a climax; he would close on Alfred, and send old Musgrave and Lizzie to the right-about. He had them all in his power, and fear might accomplish what fair words failed to do. Such resolves as these, however—he had made them often lately—melted into thin air when he was in Lily's presence. The girl held him in her power by a simple look, by a word, a smile; and the more difficult seemed the task of winning her, the greater became her value in his eyes. It needed a stronger incentive than any he had yet received to make him thoroughly determined to push matters to their fullest extremity.

He did not hear of the fire until late in the following night. He hastened to the spot, and found the house in ruins. It was quite midnight before he ascertained where Lily had found refuge, and when he learned that they had gone to live in a house very near to that occupied by Mr. Musgrave, he smiled complacently. "I could not have hoped for any thing better," he thought. Before noon the next day he was at the house, overwhelming them with expressions of sympathy and with offers of assistance, all of which were gently declined by old Wheels.

"We want for nothing, thank you," he said, smilingly.

"But," urged Mr. Sheldrake, somewhat coarsely, "I am told you were burned right out, and hadn't time to save a stick."

"You were told right," replied old Wheels: "we did not save a stick."

"Then you want a friend," persisted Mr. Sheldrake.

"We did," said old Wheels, "and one came—the best of friends."

Burning to know who this best of friends was, Mr. Sheldrake put the question direct, which old Wheels parried by saying,

"I don't think he would like us to speak of it, and I shall please him, I believe, by not mentioning his name."

There were in the room only the old man and Lily and Pollypod, and not one of these enlightened Mr. Sheldrake. When the old man spoke of this best of friends, Pollypod chimed in with enthusiastic declarations, and said, in her child-like way, that he was so good, so good!

"He seems to be a favorite with all of you," observed Mr. Sheldrake, still not suspecting.

"He is a wizard," said Pollypod from her corner—"a good wizard. Father says he's a trump, and mother loves him. So do I, dearly, dearly. So does Mr. Wheels. So does Lily—don't you, Lily?"

Mr. Sheldrake turned suddenly and sharply upon Lily. A deep rose tint had stolen into her face, and, for contrast, a dark cloud overshadowed Mr. Sheldrake's. Not a motion, not a look, escaped old Wheels, who said,

"Yes, we can not help having an affection for one who has been so kind to us."

"Of course not, of course not," assented Mr. Sheldrake, concealing his displeasure; "and I consider myself particularly unfortunate in having been deprived of the opportunity of standing in his place. Then I might have had the same claim upon your affection. It is the more unfortunate because I am so often in the habit of strolling about Soho during the small hours. Many a time have I walked up and down your street for an hour at least after midnight. Now what hard fortune was it that prevented me doing so on this occasion?" He intended these words to convey a significant declaration of his tender regard for Lily, and he added, in a low tone, addressed especially to her: "I went home not very happy because I thought you were angry with me for what occurred at the theatre. I hope you are not displeased with me now. Indeed I was not to blame."

Lily was compelled to reply in the words he wished to hear, and then again Mr. Sheldrake pressed offers of assistance upon old Wheels, which again were firmly declined. The man of the world departed in no pleasant humor, and as he walked from the house looked about him for some person upon whom to vent his spleen. His jealousy was aroused. Who was this friend of whom the child had said that she loved him dearly, dearly, and that Lily loved him also? He had half a suspicion, and he was determined to know. Then his thoughts reverted to Lily's behavior to himself. "Does she suspect," he mused, in his own elegant vernacular, "that I am not acting on the square, and is she holding off on purpose to draw me on? In one word, David Sheldrake, is the girl a model of simplicity—or artfulness? Any way, she is a witch, and has set me on fire. I will have her! I could almost make up my mind to marry her." A serious consideration for such a man as he, who looked upon girls merely as the playthings of an hour, and in whose mind womanly virtue and goodness were like dead wood in a forest. That, in case he made up his mind to such a contingency, there would be a doubt of success was too manifestly ridiculous to be entertained for a moment. As he mused he saw Alfred coming toward him. The young man did not see Mr. Sheldrake at first, and that gentleman stepped aside to observe Alfred's manner, in which he seemed to detect something more marked than usual. Alfred was walking quickly and nervously, looking over his shoulder hurriedly this way and that, as if some one were dogging him. Once a dog ran, barking, out of a house, and Alfred turned round swiftly with a white face and an exclamation of fright. Mr. Sheldrake watched these symptoms of agitation with remarkable keenness, and as Alfred passed clapped him on the shoulder. A cry of alarm escaped from Alfred's trembling lips, for Mr. Sheldrake's salutation was sudden and violent; seeing who it was, however, Alfred smiled and drew a long breath of relief.

"Who did you think it was, Alf?" asked Mr. Sheldrake, to whom Alfred's manner seemed to be in some way a satisfaction.

"I didn't know," was the reply: "you clapped me on the shoulder so suddenly."

"You gave a cry," observed Mr. Sheldrake, with assumed carelessness, "for all the world as if I were a detective officer. Don't start—I'm not. That's one comfort, isn't it?"

"I don't see how it is a comfort," said Alfred, half sullenly, and yet with an air which showed that he wished not to offend his companion. "I'm nervous, that's the fact. Been smoking and drinking a little too much. I shall be all right next Tuesday, after the City and Suburban's run."

"Going to Epsom to see the race?"

"Yes. I hope you'll do what you promised."

"We'll talk of that presently. You've got the tip, of course."

"Yes, and a good one. But there's something else I'm going to do if you'll stand my friend once more."

"A new system?"

"Well, not exactly that, but a plan which must prevent the chance of loss."

"That's good enough, Alf," said Mr. Sheldrake, in a light tone. "But come, I want to have a talk with you." They were at the gate of Mr. Musgrave's house. "Let us turn in here."

Lizzie opened the door, and greeted them with a smile. Mr. Sheldrake had not seen her since the night they were at the theatre together, and, remembering how she had spoken to him then, he was somewhat surprised at her amiability. He was still more surprised when Lizzie said she

Hosted by Google

"CROUCHING OUTSIDE THE DOOR, AT THE TOP OF THE LANDING, WAS LIZZIE."

hoped he had not taken offense because she spoke so sharply to him.

"I was so anxious about Lily, you see," she said, "and even Alfred had to put up with my bad temper. Didn't you, Alf?"

"Yes, dear," replied Alfred, pleased with her changed manner toward his friend.

"Well, well," said Mr. Sheldrake, gayly shaking hands again with Lizzie, "let by-gones be by-gones. Is the old man at home?"

"No," replied Lizzie, readily. "I don't think he will be back for an hour."

"We'll go into his room," said Mr. Sheldrake; and he and Alfred went up stairs to the room where Mr. Musgrave transacted his business, and which Lizzie had called Blue-beard's room, because she was never allowed to enter it. Mr. Sheldrake had a private key, and before he opened the door he turned to Lizzie, who had accompanied them to the landing, and tapping her familiarly on the cheek, told her to go down stairs, that he and Alfred would not keep her long, and that he was glad she thought better of him.

"Upon my word," he said, with blithe significance, "I'm as glad for Alfred's sake as I am for my own."

And with a light laugh he led the way into the room. If he had seen the change that came over the girl's face when he shut the door upon her, and if he had seen her clinch her little fists and shake them at an airy picture of himself which she conjured up, he might have altered his agreeable tone. His manner also changed directly the door was closed and locked. All his cordiality vanished as he sat down at the table and took a pocket-book from his pocket. Alfred watched him apprehensively.

Every thing in this Blue-beard's room betokened order and system. Two sides of the room were completely covered with pigeon-holes, and the compartments were nearly filled with documents neatly folded and ticketed. Although from the appearance of the room and the shelves a large amount of work was evidently gone through, not a loose document nor a scrap of writing was lying about. This circumstance appeared to give Mr. Sheldrake much satisfaction, and he nodded his head approvingly as he looked around. He did not waste time, however, but proceeded at once to the business before him. Opening his pocket-book, he selected some papers from it, and laid them on the table.

"Sit down, Alf," he said.

Alfred obeyed. Mr. Sheldrake unfolded the papers, and jotted down some figures from them, and laying his hand upon them, as if he did not immediately intend to refer to them, said,

"I have been to your new house to-day, Alf."

"I called at your place yesterday," said Alfred, "to tell you about the fire, and where we had moved to, but you were not at home."

"No; and I kept from Soho purposely. I was angry with Lizzie, and I was not pleased with your sister. They will have to learn, if they have not learned already, that I am not to be trifled with."

Alfred had no reply to make to this. He felt that his best plan would be to listen quietly, and to say as few words as possible.

"By heavens!" exclaimed Mr. Sheldrake, with more passion than he usually displayed, "I think I have been patient long enough—too long. No other man but me would have stood it. Every advance that I make—except," he added, with a sneer, "those advances I make to you—is met as if I were an enemy instead of a friend. It is time for this to be settled. I'll know very soon whether I'm to be friend or foe. I can be as good an enemy as a friend, and that I'll prove. With you now, which is it, friend or foe?"

"Which can it be," answered Alfred, moodily, "but friend?"

"Out-and-out friend, eh?" plumbed Mr. Sheldrake. "No half measures—thorough!"

"Thorough, out-and-out!" responded Alfred, a little less despondently.

"No beating about the bush?" still farther plumbed Mr. Sheldrake; "no concealments, no double-dealing?"

"None."

"And you say this," pursued Mr. Sheldrake, with remorseless tenacity—he had been so goaded that it was necessary he should revenge himself upon some one—"you say this not because it is for your interest to say it, not because you are in my debt, and I could shut you up at any moment I please, but because you believe it, because you know that I am straightforward, honest-minded, open-hearted?"

"What other motive can I have for saying it?"

"But say it plainly. You wish me to continue your friend, and to be my friend, for the reasons that I have given?"

"Yes, for those reasons, and no other." And as Alfred spoke the lie which was forced from him by fear, Mr. Sheldrake laughed lightly, and with an open scorn of the avowal which brought the blood to the younger man's cheek.

It brought the blood also to the cheek of another person not in the room. Crouching outside the door, at the top of the landing, was Lizzie, listening with beating heart, and hearing every word that passed. She could see clearly every thing in the room, and being in the dark herself, could not be detected. A small lumber-room, the door of which she had partly opened, and which swung noiselessly on its hinges, was ready to afford her the means of concealment should the suspicions of Mr. Sheldrake be aroused. She saw the insolent, triumphant manner of Mr. Sheldrake, and she thought for a moment that if she were a man she would kill him; but she saw also the abject manner of her lover, and her passion was subdued by fear.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

EVENING DRESS.

THIS pretty evening dress is of ciel blue faille. The trained skirt is trimmed with three deep flounces of the material. The over-skirt is of white crêpe de Chine, embroidered with white silk, and edged with very heavy netted white silk fringe. The upper part of the over-skirt is formed of lengthwise puffs of blue faille, simulating a basque, which are set on the crêpe de Chine with cordons of green and yellow rose leaves. Clusters of very large tea-roses, with trailing sprays of leaves, ornament the sides of the over-skirt, and are set on the corsage. The low pointed corsage is edged in the neck with a narrow lace ruche. Very short sleeves of white crêpe de Chine with blue faille bands. Large tea-roses in the hair. White silk fan. Etruscan gold and oxidized silver necklace, with gold medallion. Etruscan bracelets and ear-rings.

EVENING DRESS.

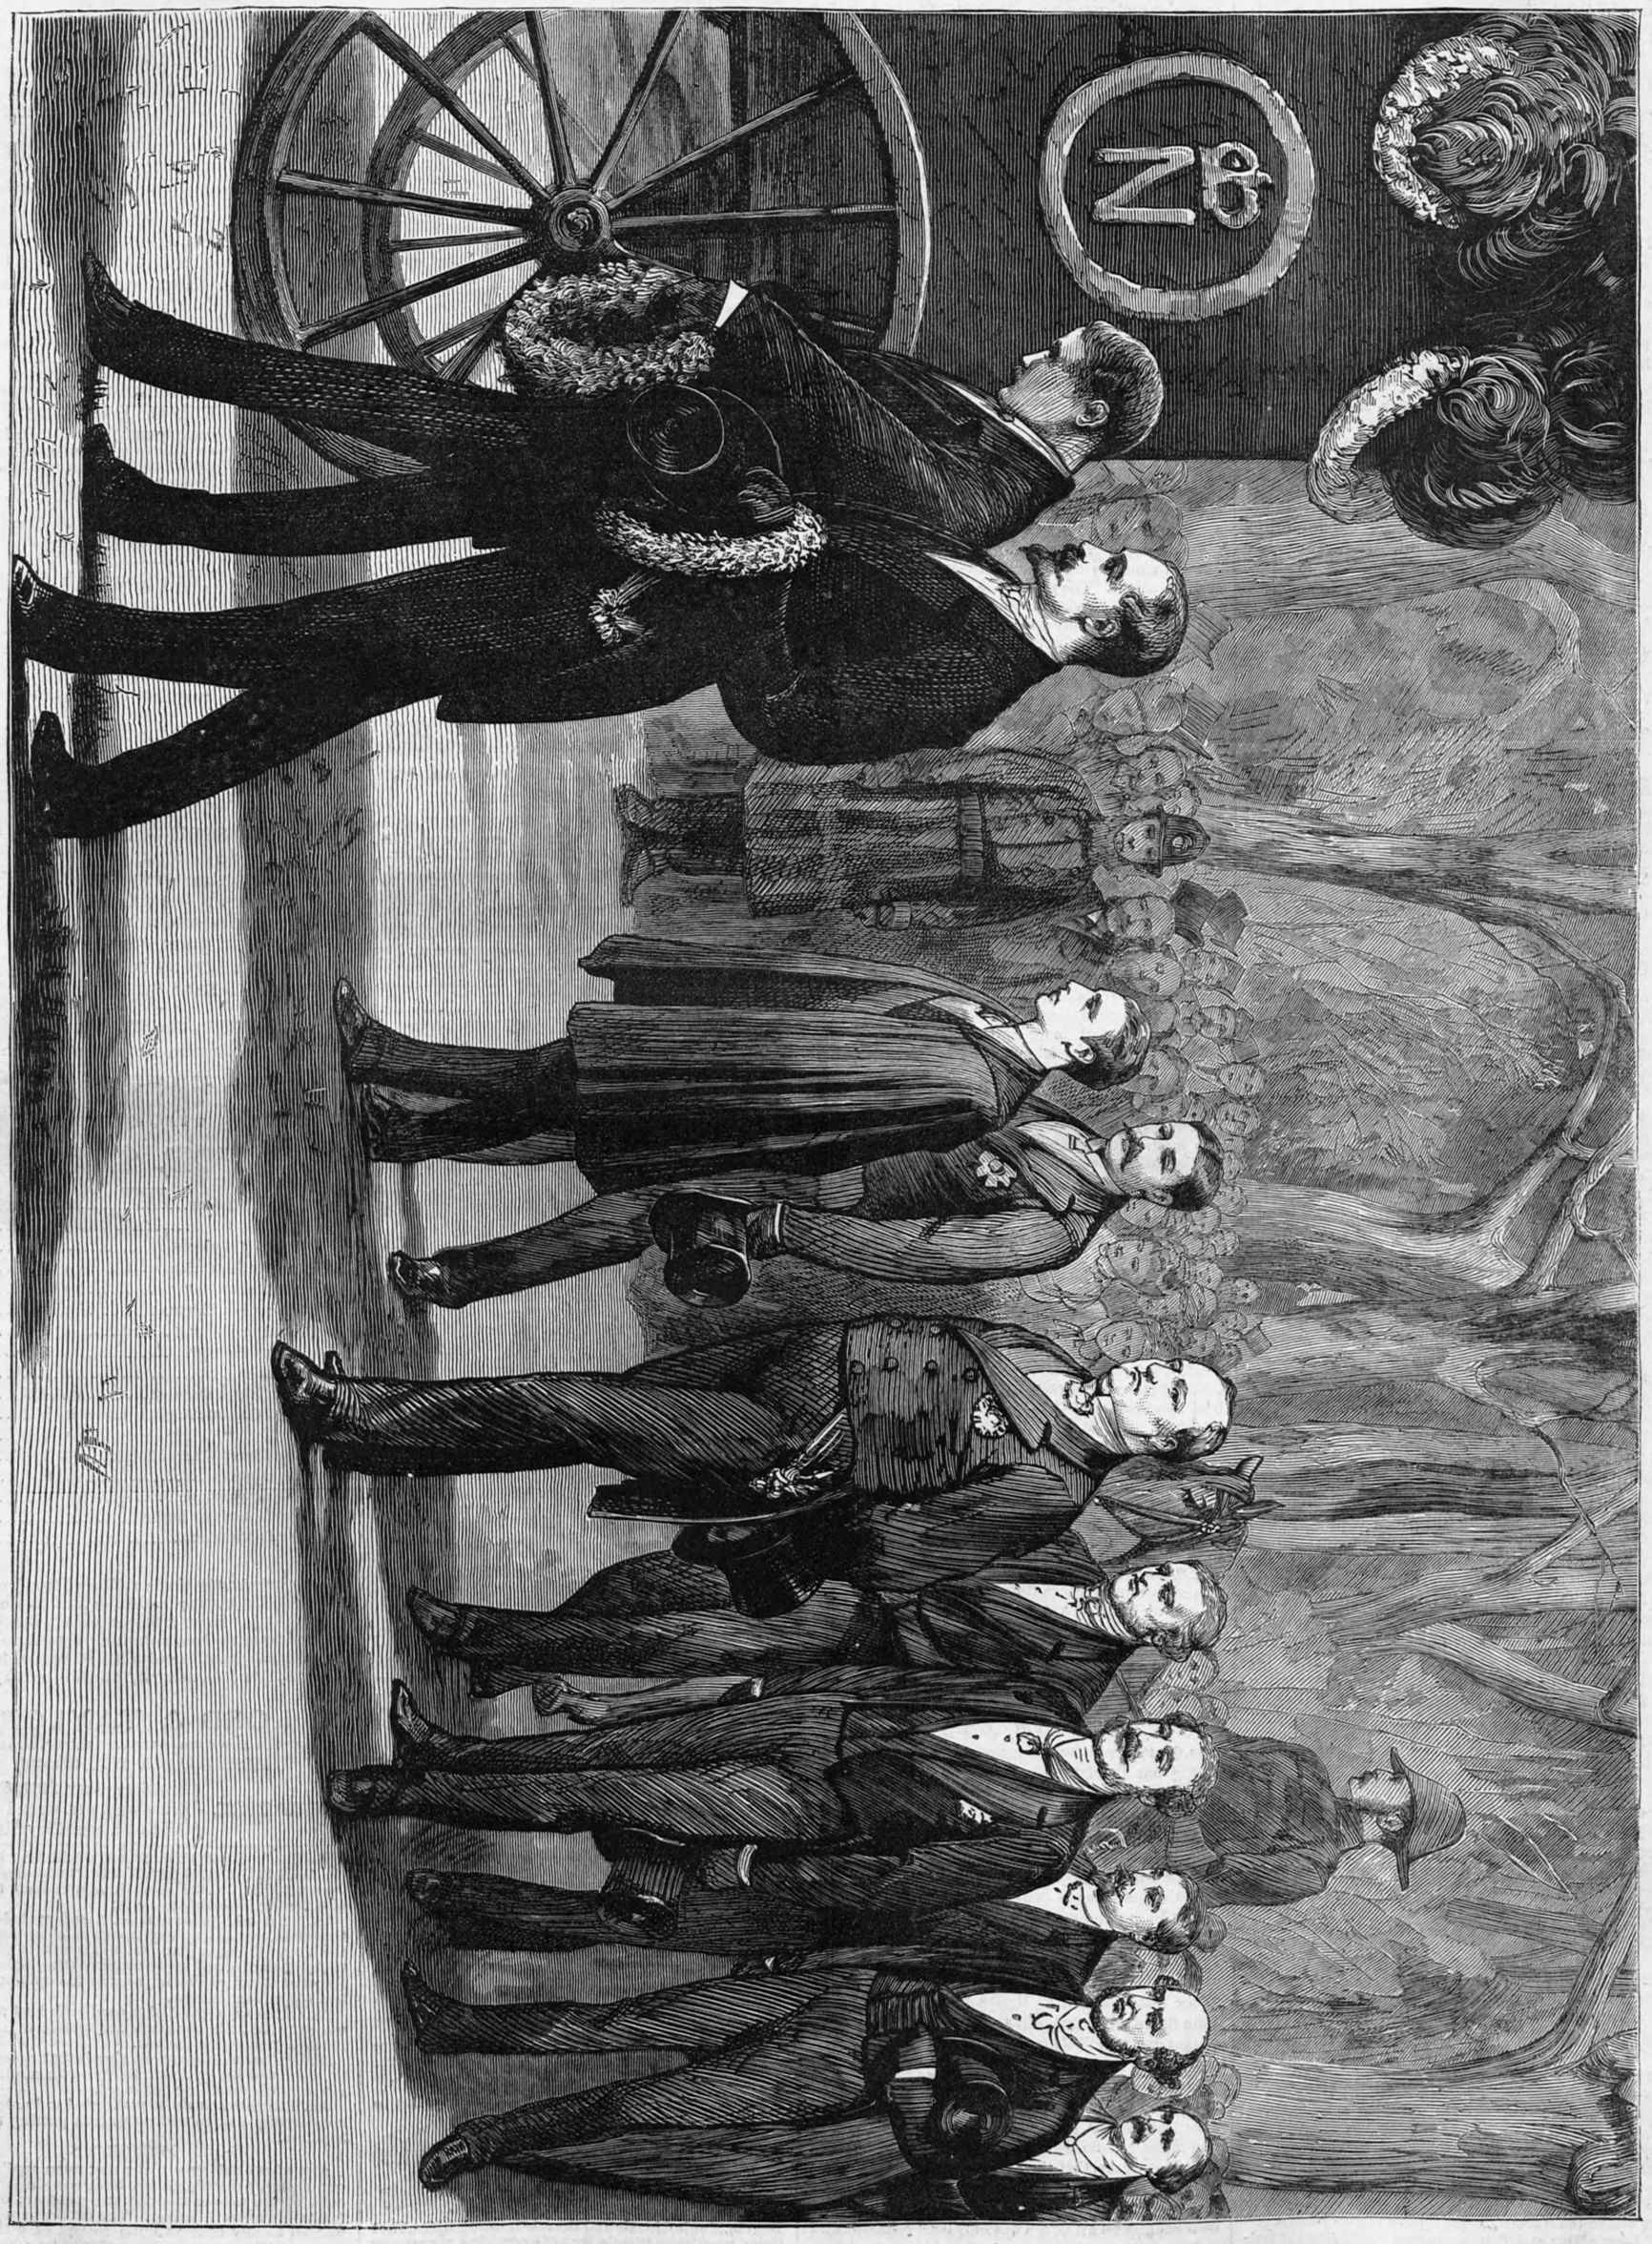
Hosted by Google

THE FUNERAL OF NAPOLEON III.

THE entrance to the Roman Catholic Chapel of St. Mary, Chiselhurst, where the obsequies of Napoleon III. were celebrated, is by a little Gothic porch on the southern side. The exterior of the building is modest and unpretending, but the interior is not devoid of claims to architectural effect. The roof is high-pitched and sharp, of stained timber on plaster-work, and the rafters, which rest on uncarved brackets, are of open wood-work. Near the altar is a finely painted rose-window. The rest of the glass is plain. The interior of the little church forms an oblong area, usually nearly filled with chairs. These were removed in preparation for the funeral, the church was hung with black, and a catafalque was placed in the centre. On the altar dais, on the right side of the chancel as one stands with his back to the altar, are three fauteuils, with a priedieu between them—both fauteuils and priedieu covered with crimson velvet. These were the imperial seats, and on the Sunday morning after the Emperor's death, just before the service began, the priest came in and draped them with black velvet, trimmed with white.

The funeral took place on Wednesday, January 15, and thousands of visitors assembled at Chiselhurst. The deputation of workmen, with the French tricolor at their head, led the way; then the seven priests, bare-headed, and chanting as they went; then the hearse with its nodding plumes. The Prince Imperial, as chief mourner, walked alone, immediately behind. Then followed the Princes Lucien and Joseph Bonaparte, Princes Murat, and the younger scions of the house of Bonaparte, and then a motley throng of senators, nobles, embassadors, and deputies, and other personages, amounting altogether to some two thousand people. Of these only a privileged few were allowed to enter the church, which is calculated to hold only about two hundred persons. The funeral service lasted an hour and twenty minutes, and was mainly choral. The sweet voices of the children chanting the Agnus Dei, and the rolling strophes of the Miserere, were deeply thrilling, and when the bells rang for the Elevation and Remonstrance, and the whole assemblage sank on their knees, the scene was very striking. Finally, after the officiating prelate, wearing his mourning mitre of white silk, had pronounced absolution, the coffin was raised from the bier and carried into the sepulchre. The grave had been constructed a few feet down the nave, in a small dark recess. Over it the Empress intends to erect a mortuary chapel, though it is said that, if the French government give permission, the remains of the Emperor will be ultimately deposited in the burial-place of the Bonapartes at Napoleon St. Leu.

Floral devices were suspended from or attached to the gate of the tomb, so as to make it somewhat more of a veil than of itself it would have



THE FUNERAL OF NAPOLEON III.—THE CHIEF MOURNERS.

Hosted by Google

been; nevertheless, the coffin, with its rich violet pall and gold-broidered cross, could be seen without difficulty through the open spaces, though half buried in flowers and wreaths of amaranth. Each of these tokens had its tale of private sympathy and sorrow. The Queen sent a white amaranthine wreath; near it lay one that bore the name of Prince Leopold; and to a wreath of lilies of the valley, bedded in moss, was a card attached, bearing the words, "De la part de la Princesse Beatrice."

CONVENIENT INSANITY.

THE Saturday Review says very pertinently concerning the plea of insanity, which forms such a convenient expedient of modern times for acquitting murderers, breaking wills, and evading the law in every way, that the beauty of this kind of evidence is that it can be adapted to any case. Take any irascible, fidgety old lady or gentleman, rake up all the wonderful stories and tittle-tattle of landladies and maid-servants as to their odd ways, and the experts will do the rest. The basis of their science is that sane people are invariably rational, and never say or do any thing without a good reason. To be irrational is to be mad. On such terms there are few indeed who could hope to pass safely through such an ordeal.

There is something both contemptible and frightful in the sort of evidence on which attempts are sometimes made to get a man judicially declared unfit for the management of his affairs, or to upset his will if there is enough property to be worth fighting about. Nobody doubts that the symptoms of insanity are various in character and degree, and that there are many persons hovering on the border-land between sanity and madness. It is impossible to draw a distinct and definite line which shall determine exactly where sanity leaves off and insanity begins, just as it is impossible to say when the day ceases and the night has come. All that can be positively said is that at a certain point the darkness of night has certainly fallen. But it is just because these questions of sanity are so delicate and difficult that the public has a right to expect that professional men should be careful, in the interests of science and for the dignity of their profession, as well as out of regard for social security, not to offer rash and hasty conclusions, especially when they have nothing better to go upon than the gossip of silly old women. There is no occasion on which the most skilled and experienced men are so liable to fall into error as in attempting to decide whether eccentric or outrageous acts are due to cerebral disease or simply to want of moral self-control. It is necessary, therefore, that great caution should be exercised in forming opinions on questions of this kind, and especially in acting upon them. It is not enough even that there should be scientific grounds for assuming insanity to exist. There are certain broad considerations of expediency and public policy which can not be left out of account. It does not follow that, because a man is suffering from cerebral disease, he is therefore to be held absolutely irresponsible for his acts; and, on the other hand, a mad person who during his life does no harm to himself or others, and whose eccentricities are not more serious than those of many people who are accounted sane and rational, is entitled to the ordinary freedom of a citizen in regard to the management or disposal of his property. A well-known writer on cerebral disease complains of the inconsistency of public opinion on questions of this kind. An attempt to prove sanity and mental capacity at a Commission of Lunacy with the object of preserving intact the liberty of the subject is applauded, while any endeavor to excuse, on the plea of insanity, the crime of some unhappy wretch alleged to be an irresponsible lunatic is denounced as an unjustifiable interference with the course of justice. He also observes that an ordinary jury is incompetent "to estimate the delicate coloring, tints, and shades of the ever-varying phases and degrees of disordered and unsound mind." It may be admitted that a jury of mad doctors would have a quicker eye for the delicate colorings of insanity, but popular instincts on this matter are perhaps a safer guide in the long-run. Individual liberty and responsibility are essential to social order, and there is danger in whatever tends to weaken or disturb them.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NETTIE.—Des-sert' is spelled with two s's, and is accented on the last syllable.—Your mother is not too old for over-skirts, and flounces are by no means abandoned by old ladies. Black silks with two plain simply trimmed skirts and a basque are worn by very old ladies. Their black alpacas are usually made with a single skirt and basque, or a polonaise.

MOUNTAIN FRINGE.—A bride married at home should partake of the breakfast with the guests. It will not be in taste to put your father's title on the invitations. Tea-rose and pink are the light silk shades most suitable for a brunette. The groom should also be dressed in traveling suit, instead of plain black, when the bride wears a traveling dress. Black lace sacques will probably be worn next summer.

B. A. AND M. J. S.—Make your blue serge with a double-breasted redingote like that illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. A pearl-colored silk for evening dress, or a gray empress for traveling, is what you want. Make the latter with two skirts and a basque, trimmed with bias ruffles of the material. Wear gloves to match the traveling dress during the ceremony.

LITTLE NELLIE.—Thirteen papers containing the articles to "Ugly Girls" have been published. They cost ten cents each, and will be forwarded to you from this office on receipt of money and your address.—The book you mention is an English work, and there is no cheaper edition.

ONE OF SIXTEEN.—Do not dye your pretty brown grenadine. Get an inexpensive brown silk skirt, and put grenadine flounces upon it. Then make a grenadine loose polonaise, lining the waist and sleeves with thin brown silk. It need not be very expensive.

JANE ESTELLE.—Winter weather in Florida is similar to that of the month of November in New York State. You will require ordinary winter clothes, without heavy wraps, furs, and overcoats.

NELLIE.—Eighteen yards of white silk are required for a court-train bridal dress. Trim with flounces of the same. The sleeves are plain to the elbow, with lace ruffles below. Make the neck heart-shape, with a lace frill inside, and a bouquet of orange blossoms in front. The traveling dress should be a brown or gray cashmere redingote over a silk skirt. The bride-maid's tarlatan should have an over-skirt and flounces. Make black silk suit by the Louis Quinze pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 46, Vol. V. The mother's bronze silk should have an over-skirt and basque, trimmed with velvet and white lace. A square of tulle that is nearly four yards wide forms the bridal veil. The groomsmen and ushers are usually given their gloves by the groom.

A CONSTANT READER.—The toilette you mention will be suitable for a wedding guest, but not for a bride. Your letter is very indefinite. A bride wearing slight mourning should leave it off at her wedding, and wear pure white. With the black dress you suggest wear white gloves, and for a head-dress get a white aigrette. Undressed kids are very fashionably worn on the street.

AN ATTENTIVE READER.—Make your Swiss muslin dress with a demi-train, trimmed with three side-pleated flounces, each eight inches wide. Let the over-skirt have a short round apron, covered with narrow Swiss pleatings, and have the long back breadths looped in a puff held in place by a sash of black velvet, lined with white or pink silk, tied in loops on the left side, with a cluster of flowers in the loops. The waist is a tiny basque, with a Watteau pleat back of the shoulders; antique sleeves and pointed neck, with lace ruffles.

FULL DRESS.—The full-dress suit worn by "city gentlemen of taste" is entirely black—a swallow-tail coat, low-cut vest, and pantaloons, all made from the same piece of cloth. The coat tail is not lined with white, but with black silk, and white vests are tabooed on such occasions. The neck-tie is a narrow folded lawn tie, worn usually with a standing English collar; the kid gloves are creamy white; the shirt front is plain, or else very slightly embroidered; the dress boots are of fine calf-skin—not patent-leather—and the evening overcoat is a long surtout of light drab cloth.

L. D.—We can not give you the information you desire.

WORKING-WOMAN.—We know of nothing better you can do than to advertise for the kind of situation you desire.

PRETTY POLLY PERKINS.—First calls should be returned within a week.—Undoubtedly a familiarity with good standard literature will aid you greatly in conversation; but to this knowledge must be added tact and ease of manner to enable you to become a brilliant conversationalist, and these must be the outgrowth of nature apart from books.

ELIZABETH.—You say that your father lavishes money on costly articles for your use, and refuses you pin-money for the most necessary articles—spends three hundred dollars for a velvet polonaise, and scolds you for wasting five cents on a letter. This is a common kind of inconsiderateness, on which a sermon might be preached. But in order to be independent you must submit to the common rules of money-getting, nor expect any privilege because of your father's wealth. Take your fancy-work to a dealer and negotiate its sale with him, or employ your leisure time in learning some business whereby you can earn what you need. You are the best judge of your own capabilities, and we can only give you general advice, of which you must make the special application.

AN UGLY GIRL.—We certainly do not know of any better suggestions for preserving good looks than are to be found in the "Ugly Girl" papers published in the Bazar.

D. M. P.—It is impossible to comply with your request.

FRIENDS OF THE BAZAR.—The story which displeases you so much is by an eminent writer, and is highly commended by some of our best critics. On the other hand, what you like would very probably not be relished by many other readers. We can only follow our best judgment, and try to furnish food for all tastes. Editing a paper is, indeed, very much like stirring a fire—every body thinks he could do it better than the one who is holding the poker.

R. A.—By the present regulations of the Post-office, MSS. intended for newspapers are subject to letter postage. You should make special agreements concerning articles which you desire to publish in book form after their appearance in periodicals.

E. S.—Address a European news agency for particulars concerning subscriptions to foreign journals.—We have never heard of a sequel to the book you mention.

CONSTANT READER.—Isabella II. of Spain married her cousin, Don Francisco d'Assis, the eldest son of her maternal uncle, Don Francisco de Paula.

CAMEOS.

IN the Rocky Mountain regions of Dakotah and Wyoming our indefatigable explorers have discovered some of the richest and most valuable masses of Onyx in the world. They have been particularly fortunate in finding there quantities of the variety of Onyx known heretofore as Nicolo or Onicolo. This has a deep brown ground overlaid by a layer of bluish white, which upper layer is extremely thin, and reveals the brown by its transparency. This sort of Onyx had previously been found, though less abundantly, in Bohemia and the Tyrol. It was extensively used by the ancients for engraving Cameos and Intaglios. A visit to the establishment of Messrs. STARR & MARCUS, 22 John Street (up stairs), will show how important, at no distant day, it is likely to be to our arts that this material should be found at our doors. The outlay of money, and time, and thought made by Messrs. STARR & MARCUS in the production of the most delicate and beautiful Cameos, proves that they find the enterprise remunerative. So refined and exquisite is the style of their best works, that the public, which demands to be so supplied, may be safely counted upon to furnish ere long all the inducements necessary to establish in our own country an art which has only been re-established in Europe itself within the memory of man.—[Com.]

THE NEW WILSON UNDER-FEED SEWING-MACHINE is the machine that is to-day—with its perfect operation, beautiful, easy, noiseless movement, and unparalleled range of work—making firm friends and advocates in hundreds of thousands of families in all parts of the globe; it is the machine to buy if you want the best. Salesroom at 707 Broadway, New York, and in all other cities in the United States. The Company want agents in country towns.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The GUIDE is now published QUARTERLY. 25 cents pays for the year, four numbers, which is not half the cost. Those who afterward send money to the amount of One Dollar or more for Seeds may also order Twenty-five Cents' worth extra—the price paid for the Guide.

The January Number is beautiful, giving plans for making Rural Homes, Designs for Dining Table Decorations, Window Gardens, &c., and containing a mass of information invaluable to the lover of flowers.——One Hundred and Fifty pages, on fine tinted paper, some Five Hundred Engravings, and a superb Colored Plate and Chromo Cover.——The First Edition of TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND just printed in English and German, and ready to send out.

JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 43 Sixth Ave., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

LADIES' FURS

IN EVERY VARIETY;

SEAL CAPS AND GLOVES,

All at the Lowest Prices.

IMPORTER OF ENGLISH HATS,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS, { 719 Broadway, N. Y.

REAL LACES

Embroideries, Cloak Velvets, &c. Cheapest in the country. Every C. O. D. package subject to examination before acceptance. SAMPLES and PRICE-LISTS mailed free from

EHRICH'S TEMPLE of FASHION,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, N. Y.

LADIES' CHEST PROTECTOR.

Something entirely New.

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO FIT THE FORM.

Price in Felt, $2 00, $3 00, $4 00.
" " Chamois, $3 00, $4 00, $5 00.

For married or single Ladies. In ordering please state which and size of bust.

Sold by all Druggists and Ladies' Furnishing Stores, and at 2140 Third Ave.; 218 Broadway; Broadway, cor. 29th St.; and at 7 Sixth Ave.

WHOLESALE.—Chas. H. Crittenton, 7 Sixth Avenue; W. H. Schieffelin & Co., 170 William St.; Fraser & Lee, 20 Beekman St.; G. S. Crawford & Co., 119 Fulton St.

A. C. JACKSON, Manufacturer,
No. 2140 Third Avenue, New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

TO THE LADIES!

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Will make Ladies' and Children's Boots and Shoes that have become rough and red, and Ladies' Traveling Bags which look so old and rusty that they are ashamed to carry them, look just as good as new. It will not rub off or smut when wet. Softens the leather.

No lady will be without it after one trial. Beware of imitations and counterfeits. For sale every where.

B. F. BROWN & Co., Boston.

Write for Large Illustrated Descriptive Price-List to

Double, Single, Muzzle and Breech-Loading Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, Pistols, &c., of every kind, for men or boys, at very low prices. Guns, $3–$300; Pistols, $1–$25.

HOW 'TIS DONE OR THE SECRET OUT

An Illustrated Book of 64 pages, that every one should have. Sent free post paid, by BOND, MARTIN & CO. Springfield, Mass.

PANSY SEEDS! Direct from a celebrated German grower, the finest varieties in cultivation. 25 cts. per pkt.; 5 pkts. $1. J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are offering a large invoice of

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS,

Filled centres, $100 each, recently sold at $175 and $200.

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS!

Also a large variety of the RICHEST AND MOST ELEGANT LONG AND SQUARE SHAWLS IMPORTED.

BLACK SILK SUITS, VERY HEAVY AND ELEGANTLY TRIMMED, ONLY $50.

PARIS-MADE EMBROIDERED BLACK SILK SUITS, $100: VALUE, $200.

PARIS-MADE BLACK & COLORED SILK SUITS, $50 EACH AND UPWARD,

About one-half the cost of importation.

An immense stock of

LADIES' CHILDREN'S, AND MISSES'

UNDERGARMENTS,

Comprising every variety and description manufactured, including a full assortment of superbly

EMBROIDERED SKIRTS, CHEMISES, NIGHT-ROBES, DRAWERS, DRESSING-SACQUES, &c.,

Laundered and unlaundered.

They request special attention to their large

DRESSMAKING DEPARTMENT,

Under superior management, in which orders for mourning as well as every other description of Fashionable Costumes are executed with promptness and in styles equal if not superior to any foreign production.

CHARGES MODERATE.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

INDIA SHAWLS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.,

Have opened an invoice of the above desirable goods in

OPEN AND FILLED CENTRE SQUARES

(New Colorings and Designs).

Also, a Fine Assortment of

STRIPED INDIA LONG SHAWLS.

SPRING GOODS.

CAMEL'S-HAIR SERGES,
PLAIN AND STRIPED ALGERINES,
FIG'D BAPTISTE, WHITE STRIPE SATTEENS,
PLAIN AND EMBROIDERED PIQUES,
FIGURED CAMBRICS, PERCALES,
BORDERED CRETONS FOR SUITS,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH PRINTS, &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth St., N. Y.

LADIES' TROUSSEAU "C"

FOR $250.

6	Muslin Chemises	@ $2 25	$13 50
6	Linen "	@ 4 75	28 50
1	Bridal Set (3 pieces)		20 00
6	Pairs Muslin Drawers	@ 2 25	13 50
6	" Linen "	@ 3 50	21 00
3	Plain Cotton Skirts	@ 2 25	6 75
3	Tucked " "	@ 3 00	9 00
3	" " "	@ 3 50	10 50
1	Underskirt		6 50
3	Muslin Night Dresses	@ 4 50	13 50
3	Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@ 5 75	17 25
3	Embr'd " " "	@ 9 00	27 00
2	Embroidered Flannel Skirts	@ 7 00	14 00
3	Corset Covers	@ 5 00	15 00
2	Dressing Sacques	@ 4 75	9 50
1	" Sacque Embr'd		7 50
1	Robe de Chambre		17 00
			$250 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent by express, C. O. D. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Directions for self-measurement, together with list of articles in Trousseau "A," for $150, and "B," for $200, sent by mail if desired.

LORD & TAYLOR,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN

FASHIONABLE DRY GOODS,

NEW YORK, { Broadway, cor. 20th St. / Broadway, cor. Grand St. / Grand St. cor. Chrystie St.

THE "PAPER PATTERNS FROM HARPER'S BAZAR," manufactured by GROSSFELD & Co., 551 Pearl St., are claimed to be the best for the following reasons:

1st. That each pattern is fitted and graded by Herr Grossfeld, whose long experience as chief manager of the Court Dressmaking Establishment of Herr Dietrich, of Berlin, and more recently Dressmaker to the Imperial Court of Vienna, renders his opinion in matters of fashion decisive.

2d. Ladies are requested to send both bust and waist measures, as it is obviously impossible otherwise to insure a well-fitting pattern.

3d. Our instructions are so simple that, accompanied by the cut of the garment, they will be readily understood by the most inexperienced.

4th. The patterns are so perforated and notched that no difficulty will be encountered in putting the parts together.

NOTICE.

Any of our patterns will be sent upon application to our agents, postpaid, in the U. S. and Canada, on receipt of the catalogue price and number; or will be forwarded by us if desired. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. All communications should be addressed to GROSSFELD & CO., 551 Pearl St., New York City.

The following houses are the agents in this city for the sale of our Patterns: Messrs. Peake, Opdyke & Co., 427 and 429 Broadway; Jas. McCreery & Co., cor. 11th St. and Broadway; Johnson, Burns & Co., cor. 14th St. and University Place; Ed. A. Morrison, 827 Broadway.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Hosted by Google

HAIR.—HUMAN HAIR SWITCHES.

SOLID HAIR—NOT DYED.

RETAILED AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

32 inches long, weight 3 oz., only $9 00.
32 inches long, weight 4 oz., only $12 00.
32 inches long, weight 5 oz., only $15 00.
32 inches long, weight 6 oz., only $18 00.

Coronet or Crown Braids, Solid Hair, 2 oz., 20 inches, only $4 50.

BACK CURLS,

Now the fashion for evening wear. Full sets. Naturally curly.

Size.	My Price.	Retails in N. Y. for
Medium	$7 00	$10 00
Large	8 00	12 00
Extra Large	10 00	15 00

LONG SINGLE CURLS.

22-inch Hair (naturally curly), only..... $3 00
24 " " " " " 3 50
26 " " " " " 4 50

Frizweft or Face Curls, 50 cts. per yard.

Every lady should embrace this opportunity, and purchase hair goods from the only hair importer who retails at wholesale prices.

Established 1843. { CHAS. V. PECKHAM, 687 Broadway, near Amity St., New York City.

Will send goods, C. O. D., by express; or by mail or express, prepaid, on receipt of color and money in registered letter or P. O. money order.

Correspondence answered by inclosing two 3-cent stamps. Please mention Harper's Bazar when you write.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

IS THE BEST IN THE WORLD
For both the FAMILY and Workshop.

Agents wanted.

Address
"DOMESTIC" S. M. Co., New York.

$100,000 for only $10!

TEN THOUSAND CASH GIFTS aggregating $500,000 will be distributed by lot to patrons of the Third Grand Gift Concert in aid of the Public Library of Ky., at Louisville, Ky., Tuesday, April 8, 1873. Gifts range from $10 to $100,000, all cash. Whole tickets $10, halves $5, quarters $2 50. The first Concert, Dec. 16, 1871, and second, Dec. 7, 1872, went off with great success and received universal approval for the scrupulous integrity with which they were conducted and promptness with which gifts were paid. For tickets and full information, address Hon. Thos. E. Bramlette, Agent for Trustees Public Library of Ky., Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

THE ALBERT TOILET SOAPS
ARE PURE AND THEIR
PERFUME CHOICE AND LASTING.

ALFRED SAVAGE & SON, Montreal; or
D. FINLEY, Rouse's Point.

TO the WORKING CLASS, male or female, $60 a week guaranteed. Respectable employment at home, day or evening; no capital required; full instructions and valuable package of goods to start with, sent free by mail. Address, with 6-cent return stamp, M. YOUNG & CO., 16 Courtlandt Street, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS
OF
THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS.

1.

SANTO DOMINGO, Past and Present; with a Glance at Hayti. By SAMUEL HAZARD. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

2.

RECLUS'S OCEAN. The Ocean, Atmosphere, and Life. Being the Second Series of a Descriptive History of the Life of the Globe. By ÉLISÉE RECLUS. Illustrated with 250 Maps or Figures, and 27 Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

Uniform in style with "THE EARTH," by ÉLISÉE RECLUS. 8vo, Cloth $5 00.

3.

GEORGE ELIOT'S MIDDLEMARCH. Middlemarch: a Study of Provincial Life. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

4.

HUDSON'S HISTORY OF JOURNALISM. Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872. By FREDERIC HUDSON. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

5.

ROBIN GRAY. A Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, "Author of "For the King," and "For Lack of Gold." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

THE WANDERING HEIR. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," "Foul Play," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.; Cloth, 60 cts.

7.

THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. With an Introduction by the Rev. P. SCHAFF, D.D. 618 pp., Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

This work embraces in one volume:

ON A FRESH REVISION OF THE ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's, and Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Second Edition, Revised.

ON THE AUTHORIZED VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in connection with some Recent Proposals for its Revision. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE REVISION OF THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

8.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF A PHAETON. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" "In Silk Attire," "The Monarch of Mincing-Lane," "Kilmeny," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

9.

A PASSION IN TATTERS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Maud Mohan," "Denis Donne," "False Colors," "Played Out," "The Dower House," "Theo Leigh," "Only Herself," "Playing for High Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

10.

NORDHOFF'S CALIFORNIA. California: for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travelers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $2 00; Cloth, $2 50.

11.

BREAD-AND-CHEESE AND KISSES. A Christmas Story. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "London's Heart," "Joshua Marvel," "Grif," "Blade-o'-Grass," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

12.

DR. WAINWRIGHT'S PATIENT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Wrecked in Port," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

TALMAGE'S SERMONS. Sermons by the Rev. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $4 00.

14.

A WOMAN'S VENGEANCE. A Novel. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Cecil's Tryst," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Bred in the Bone," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

15.

FOR THE KING. An Historical Novel. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "For Lack of Gold," "Robin Gray," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

16.

SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.

FORCE. Being Vol. IV. of Science for the Young, by JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HEAT. — LIGHT. — WATER AND LAND. — FORCE. 4 vols. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 each.

17.

BOOKS FOR GIRLS. Written or Edited by the Author of "John Halifax." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each.

LITTLE SUNSHINE'S HOLIDAY.—THE COUSIN FROM INDIA.—TWENTY YEARS AGO.—IS IT TRUE?—AN ONLY SISTER.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

PARQUET FLOORS.

The National Wood M'f'g Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
WOOD CARPETING,
942 BROADWAY.

Send Stamp for Designs.

A GREAT OFFER FOR FEBRUARY.

Horace Waters & Son, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS of first-class makers, including Waters's, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES FOR CASH, during THIS MONTH. New 7-octave PIANOS, modern improvements, for $250 and $275, cash. The WATERS CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS, are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. Prices at bargains, for cash. Monthly installments received, running from one to three years. Illustrated Catalogues mailed.

HAVE YOU SEEN the New and Wonderful Method of Showing Ghosts in every Man's House without the aid of a medium? Innocent Amusement for the Home Circle. The great demand for this development of Optical Science shows it to be ONE OF THE WONDERS OF THE AGE! Sent post-paid for 50 cts., with directions

M. W. TYLER & CO., Providence, R. I.

PATENT METALLIC SHIELDS—certain cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all other Nervous Diseases. By mail or express. GEO. SWEETSER, 120 Wall St., N. Y.

Largest Organ Establishment in the World.

7 Extensive Factories.

J. ESTEY & COMPANY,
Brattleboro, Vt., U. S. A.

THE CELEBRATED
ESTEY COTTAGE ORGANS.

The latest and best improvements. Every thing that is new and novel. The leading improvements in Organs were introduced first in this establishment.

Established 1846.

SEND FOR OUR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING
WITH A
NOVELTY PRESS,

The best ever made for the purpose.

Principal office 349-351 Federal, and 152 Kneeland Streets, Boston. Branch office, 543 Broadway and 88 Mercer Street, New York.

W. Y. EDWARDS is no longer Agent for me or the sale of my goods. BENJ. O. WOODS,

Manufacturer of Novelty Presses, and dealer in every description of
PRINTING MATERIAL.

Send for NEW Illustrated Catalogue, with Agents' addresses.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP	" 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
VEST BASQUE, with Over-skirt and Kilt-pleated Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 21
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
POINTED CAPE, with 5-Pleat Blouse, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
POSTILION-BASQUE POLONAISE, with Apron Front and Adjustable Demi-Trained Skirt	" 27
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
GIRL'S PRINCESSE POLONAISE SUIT (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt	" 50
DOLMAN MANTLE WALKING SUIT	" 51

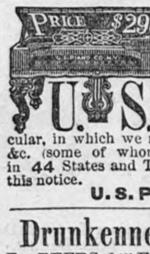
Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Pleasure and Instruction

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Before buying send for our descriptive
SEED AND PLANT CATALOGUE.
AZELL BOWDITCH, 645 Warren St., Boston, Mass.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

Persons of either sex, who have the tact and energy requisite to make successful Book Agents, can secure an opportunity for lucrative employment by applying in person or by letter as below. The subscriber is selling through his agents some of the most desirable publications ever offered to the public. Such persons as mean business are requested to address

AVERY BILL,
Care Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments or all the time than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

Recommended by physicians and mothers. Retains linen diaper, and is thoroughly waterproof. 4 sizes—1 smallest, 4 largest. Sample mailed, on receipt of $1, by Eureka Diaper Co., 532 B'dway, N. Y. Sold, also, by Stewart, Claflin, H. G. Norton, and Druggists, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA. See stamp of Eureka Patent Diaper Co. Take no other. Agents wanted.

"OVER AND OVER." Over and over again have we for weeks, months, and years kept telling you of the merits of the Star-Spangled Banner. 50,000 people have already become permanent subscribers, but we want YOU. Only $1 secures Prang's splendid Chromo, "A BOUQUET OF AUTUMN LEAVES," and the paper a whole year. It is a popular family paper FOR EVERY BODY. Splendid Tales, Sketches, Poems, Wit, Humor, &c., &c. TRY IT ONCE. Ledger size, 40 columns. Specimens 6 cents. Satisfaction guaranteed. Send $1. Address Star-Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.

Hosted by Google

PROCEEDING TO EXTREMITIES.

MRS. SHODDY. "Am I to understand that you two Ninnies refuse to go out with the Sleigh on the plea that you are not warmly clad? Certainly you have your Fur Collars."

THOMAS (coachman). "Oh, our Necks is well enough, Ma'am; but we respeckf'ly objecks to your passing over our Legs."

AN UNANSWERABLE ARGUMENT.

EDDY. "Now you two can be Horses or Driver, whichever you please. But I should advise you to be Horses; it's so much nicer!"

FREDDY. "But you're too heavy, Eddy."

EDDY. "Oh, that's impossible. If I were, Mr. Bergh would send you two little Horses home at once."

FACETIÆ.

WE have heard of a Methodist parson, somewhat eccentric, and an excellent singer. Sunday after Sunday his rich voice came from the pulpit "with the spirit and the understanding." Not so at the other end of the church, where, with abundance of spirit, there was a lamentable lack of the other virtue. In fact, the singing was execrable. The good brother could finally endure it no longer, and exclaimed, "Brothers and sisters, I wish those of you who can't sing would wait till you get to the celestial regions before you try." The hint was a success.

A country editor reports money "close, but not close enough to be reached."

"You must have lived here a long time," said a traveling Englishman to an old Oregon pioneer.

"Yes, Sir, I have. Do you see that mountain? Well, when I came here that mountain was a hole in the ground."

The Englishman opened his half-shut eyes.

A writer says, "Fathers, remembering their own boyhood, should make some little allowance for their children." But the trouble is that many children, after spending their "allowance," get into debt for double the amount.

"Our children will have immense taxes on their hands," said a gentleman.

"Oh, horrible!" exclaimed an elderly lady. "What a blessing we have nails on ours!"

A poverty-stricken clerk applied for a situation to a large employer of labor. There was no vacancy, and he was curtly informed of the fact. Being of a religious turn of mind, as he was leaving the office he consoled himself with the passage of Scripture the concluding words of which are, "hath not where to lay his head."

"Don't stand there quoting Shakspeare," said the employer. "I can't give you what I haven't got."

One day when Mrs. Partington heard the minister say that there would be a nave in the new church, she observed that "she knew who the party was."

EXAMINER. "Now, my young friends, suppose twelve men buy twenty-four bushels of wheat, to be divided equally, how many bushels is that for each?"

BOLDEST OF THE BOYS. "Please, Sir, we've not gone that far."

EXAMINER. "How is that? Your teacher told me you had learned all the first four rules."

BOY. "Yes, Sir; but we have always done our sums in potatoes and turnips. We have never had wheat."

THE WRONG GIRL IN THE RIGHT PLACE.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER. "What! Did not say your Prayers before going to Bed? You naughty Child, were not you afraid you would be taken away in the Middle of the Night?"

NAUGHTY CHILD. "No, please, Teacher, I sleeps in the Middle."

Elder Knapp, the great revivalist of religion down in Arkansas, when about to baptize a new convert called out in a loud voice, "Does any one know any reason why this man should not be baptized?" and to his surprise a long specimen of an Arkansas traveler shouted in response, "See here, Mister Preacher, I don't want to interfere in that 'ere business of yours; but if you expect to get the sin out of that old cuss you will have to anchor him out in the river overnight."

An enthusiastic Nebraska editor says, "Nine months of the year in Nebraska is summer, and the rest is mighty late in the spring."

A Bengal paper supplies a neat instance of confusion of metaphor. Criticising the income tax, our contemporary hopes "the government will not repeat the blunder of killing the calf which daily produces the golden egg."

An alderman of a country town being invited to attend a centennial jubilee, replied, "I can't attend this one, but I'll go next time."

After asking your name in the State of Arkansas, the natives are in the habit of further inquiring, in a confidential tone, "Well, now, what was your name afore yer moved to these parts?"

AN EDUCATIONAL INSTRUMENT—The grinding organ.

A novelty in gentlemen's dress is promised in Boston. The bosom of the shirt is to have a few bars of music printed upon it, in some cases with words. Gentlemen wearing them will stand behind pianos to be sung and played from.

A political orator speaking of a certain general whom he admired, said he was always on the field of battle where the bullets were the thickest.

"Where was that?" asked one of the auditors.

"In the ammunition wagon," responded another.

Why is an oyster the greatest paradox in nature?—Because it has a beard without a chin, and is pulled out of bed to be tucked in.

Why is a lovely young lady like a hinge?—Because she is something to a-dore.

Quiet girls will be pleased to hear that a new color will be much worn this season, which is described as a subdued mouse-color.

This odd advertisement is from an English newspaper: "My husband is out on a strike. He prefers that to work. He ain't of any use to me. I must work to keep the children and myself. His ten shillings goes in beer. I'll swap him while he's on strike for a sewing-machine."

NOT TO BE BEATEN.

MRS. BROWN (whose daughter has just been performing admirably on the piano-forte). "Do your Daughters Play, Mrs. Jones?"

MRS. JONES (whose four daughters have only been listening). "No."

MRS. BROWN. "Paint in Water-colors?"

MRS. BROWN. "Sing?"

MRS. JONES. "No."

MRS. JONES. "No. We go in for Beauty!"

LOOK OUT FOR THE MOON.

Alonzo and Imogen, who love one another dreadfully, but have not yet obtained Papa's consent, quite forget that the Moon is throwing the Shadow of their joined hands on the road right under the Governor's nose.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 10.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

USES FOR USELESS THINGS.

TO find a use for some positively useless and valueless article that has been, or is soon to be, cast aside to clutter up one's house—a thing that is not even worth giving away, because no one wants the rubbish—is to become in some degree a public benefactor. The idea we suggest may be small in itself, and yet may lead to greater triumphs; therefore let the patient reader who has begun to read follow on a little further while we tell of some things very pretty and useful, yet made from one of the most worthless of all residuums, and to be found in nearly every household. I mean now to discourse on hoop skirts—the old worn-out, broken, and cast-off articles that become nuisances the moment they are discarded from their legitimate use—and think I can show several ways of utilizing even them.

Very pretty wall-baskets may be made by persons of quite ordinary ability in the following manner: Cut the wires into proper lengths, say half a yard each, and perhaps sixteen or eighteen in number. Then form circles of them and sew the ends strongly, so as to be firm, afterward bending in the opposite sides so as to form something like figure 8's, and sewing them also to keep them in that shape. When all are thus fastened, they may be covered with zephyr worsted in button-hole stitch—either crimson or green will look well, or shaded browns. When they are all covered, they may be joined together, placing four of them side by side, and sewing them at the points where they touch each other—that is, each pair being sewed in two places. Four more joined in the same manner to match, and you have the front and back of the pocket, with two more at each end, joined at the corners, and a third four for the bottom. This gives an oblong open-work box, and when the bottom wires are secured by sewing to the sides, it will be quite strong. Next sew together four more, as a continuation of the back, and a small circle or any other device at the top will complete it, and also furnish something by which it may be suspended. A similar arrangement at the bottom will serve as a finish to that part of it, and the whole will be very graceful and pretty. Another variety that will be quite as easily produced is made by forming circles of two or three sizes, and placing them one within another, sewing them on the opposite sides, then joining them together as one's taste and ingenuity may suggest.

Some will find it easier to omit the zephyr worsted covering, and as a substitute will put on thick oil paint with an orristle brush. Dark brown or leather-color will look ral as well as corner ornaments of leather-work may be fastened on and varnished, or buttons of odd shapes and sizes may be glued on at the points where the rings or figures are sewed, and will be quite ornamental. Besides these wall-pockets, the same idea and materials may be applied to the manufacture of covers for flower-pots and window-boxes; then, by varying the style and shape, very useful scrap-baskets may be produced, and—perhaps as pretty as any thing—very tasteful lanterns for lighting piazzas and gardens on summer evenings.

For the latter cut the hoops so as to form three circles, one to be ten inches in diameter, and the others six inches each; place them at regular distances one above another, with the largest one in the centre, adjusting and holding them in position by three twine strings passing from top to bottom. Upon the largest ring place one of the wire frames such as are used for supports to paper lamp or gas shades, and fasten it with wire or string. This is merely the frame-work of your lantern, and the outer covering may be formed of tissue-paper of different colors, or of bright transparent chintz, or of gay prints of birds, flowers, etc., rendered transparent by a coat of gum or varnish. It can be suspended by wires or cords from the ceiling of a piazza, and lighted by a candle or small lamp fixed in the wire frame in the centre.

Another use for old hoops is to convert them into trellises and frames for delicate vines, such as cypress or Alleghany vines; and for hanging-baskets or window-gardens they will furnish very light and tasteful supports, being painted green or brown as one may choose.

Fly-covers to place over dishes on the table may also be made very cheaply by first removing the cotton covering from the hoops, and then forming a circle for the lower part, or base, with other strips of the same wire bent over and fastened to it, say three pieces at equal distances; these form a frame-work, over which black net may be drawn and sewed over the bottom wire. A rosette or bow of some kind at the top will answer for a handle, and add to the appearance of the covers. These covers will serve the purpose as well as the expensive wire ones, and will cost but about ten cents each.

An ingenious person, having once caught the idea, may find methods of pursuing it still farther, and may contrive graceful fruit-stands, card-racks, and many other pretty things, fully demonstrating the usefulness of what at first sight appeared to be very useless indeed.

Fig. 1.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FICHU BACK.—[See Fig. 2; also Figs. 1 and 2, Page 157.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

Fig. 3.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FANCHON-HOOD. BACK.—[See Fig. 4.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

Fig. 2.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FICHU.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1; also Figs. 1 and 2, Page 157.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

Fig. 4.—FIGURED TULLE AND LACE SCARF WORN AS FANCHON-HOOD. FRONT.—[See Fig. 3.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

FERN IMPRESSIONS.

IN a previous number of the Bazar we gave directions for the beautiful fern impression work produced by spattering with inks of various colors. This method of decorating has lately been used for quite a variety of materials, of which we may mention papier-maché as one of the best. For instance, in making real papier-maché—or, as will perhaps be more commonly used for experiment, the imitations of it—use paint of either light green, buff, or white; arrange your ferns in graceful groups, according to taste, and then spatter them with printers' ink, thinned with either boiled linseed-oil or turpentine: the latter will dry faster. The ferns and leaves will, of course, be of the same color as the ground, while the black shading will throw them out very beautifully, and when varnished with dammar will be as brilliant as can be desired.

Hosted by Google

Beautiful screens may thus be made, and also designs on card-board for framing. One of the most tasteful of the latter is a cross surrounded with ferns and ivy leaves. To obtain this design a cross of card-board is cut, and then laid on the centre of a sheet of Bristol-board, with the ferns grouped around, the shadows being made deeper on one side than on the other, so as to have a perspective effect. When the cross has been lifted off the paper, the monogram "I. H. S.," in old English letters, and cut out of stiff paper, or any other appropriate motto, can be laid on the cross, and enough of the same shading applied to make them distinctly visible without covering the outlines of the cross itself.

Other pretty articles for gifts or fairs are letter-cases and wall-pockets made of stiff Bristol-board, and tied with bright ribbons. For tidies there is nothing prettier than the same work applied to squares of sheer French muslin, which are afterward finished with broad hems, and deep fringes of white crochet spool cotton tied on.

A WINTER WEDDING.

(AT CHISELHURST, JANUARY 9, 1873.)

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

It fled away in a clang of bells,
Marriage-bells,
On the wings of the blast that sinks and swells,
That bold, weak, fate-struck, suffering soul,
Whom Christ wash clean, and God make whole!
And we stand in the light of two happy faces,
Two happy hearts whom our heart embraces,
And we hear the peaceful organ's sound,
And the angry storm sweeps harmless round.
Blessed is the bridegroom, though the heavens are dun:
Blessed is the bride whom no sun shines on.

Mayhap some wandering angels say,
Stop and say,
As through the gloom they carry away
That bodiless spirit to Him who knows—
He only—whither the spirit goes:
"God give them all that the dead man lacked
(As men dare judge him) in thought, word, act;
Deny them all that to him was given,
Lest earth's doors opened shut doors of heaven."
Blessed is the bridegroom without crown or land:
Blessed is the bride with the ring on her hand.

Peal, ye joy-bells, peal through the rain,
Blinding rain:
God makes happiness, God makes pain;
Summer and winter a good tree grows,
A strong soul strengthens through weal and woes.
"Be not afraid," says the wild sobbing wind;
"Weep," sigh the clouds, "but the blue is behind."
Blessed is the bridegroom under shower or sun:
Blessed is the bride whom Love's light shines on.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1873.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new and elegant Tight Basque with Apron-front Over-Skirt and Walking Skirt will be published with the next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 159.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain numerous patterns of Ladies' Spring House and Street Dresses; Children's Spring Suits; Ladies' Sleeveless Jackets, Fichus, Aprons, Petticoats, Corset Covers, etc.; Children's Aprons; Gentlemen's Smoking-Caps; Collars, Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

THE HEART OF THE CELERY.

"SHE was a good wife to me," said a widower bon-vivant to his consoler: "she always gave me the heart of the celery."

It was an absurd speech, of course, and turned the current of sympathy at once into one of ridicule; and certainly the hearer might well feel that the man who mourned his wife in that style deserved no better treatment than ridicule.

Yet was it so very peculiar? Was the mourner so totally different a being from the consoler? Probably not: probably much of the difference between them, after all, lay in the phraseology of the mourner's lament. It is not at all impossible, we grieve to say, that the consoler had the heart of the celery too—if he chanced to like that better than the fuller-flavored green stalks—but had failed to observe that his wife fared less richly; that is to say, if he did not happen to be a gourmand, he gratified himself in other ways quite as satisfactory as the celery.

He liked, perhaps, the most comfortable chair in the house: it was always pulled forward for him into the warmest place beside the fire and beneath the lamp. He liked, perhaps, the cutting of the new magazine: his wife would not have peeped between the leaves without the fate of Fatima before her eyes. He liked early rising: his wife, half somnambulic, martyred herself that he might breakfast by candle-light. He liked to live away from people: his wife isolated herself from the society dear to her heart. He liked a warm dressing-room: his wife sprung up in the winter prime, unhindered by him, and lighted the fire. He liked driving his fast horses: his wife, quaking with fear, and longing to clutch the sides of the carriage, drove smiling beside him. He liked a large family: his wife had it, and died of it. After all, it seems to us that he had the heart of the celery.

Not that we mean that every husband as a matter of course is selfish; but that every wife, allowing for exceptions, would make him so if she could, and that, if a man can be spoiled, there is nothing like a good wife to spoil him. And this is a fact which we all see in our daily experience.

There are, indeed, two orders of husband, if no more. One of these comes home tired from business: he may have run round a good deal, or he may have sat still in his counting-room and read the shipping-list; he may have walked half a dozen squares home, or have taken the cars for twenty miles; and if his body be not tired, his mind may be; and it is wife here, and wife there, and wife in the other place, and there would be a fine state of things in that house if wife should refuse the call, or let fatigue or discontent ruffle her voice, or her face, or her manner. But she has been tossing a teething baby in her arms half the day; mending and making, with her foot on the rocker; listening to the little boy's complaints; dressing the little girl's doll; overseeing servants if she has them; doing their work if she hasn't; keeping peace and order in the house; and her sleep was broken the night before, and will be the night after. But does it ever occur to him that wife may be tired too? No, indeed. She drops away into death before his eyes, and he calls it a mysterious dispensation of Providence, and by-and-by he marries a second wife; but not the patient and adoring slave he had before: far from it; the tables are turned, and he learns how great a thing it is to suffer and be strong—while all the neighbors declare that this is the sort of husband who needs to kill one wife in order to learn how to treat another.

But quite a different order of husband is another, the antipodes of this one, in fact. The baby is fretting when he comes home: it is his pleasure to take it and release the worn-out wife. Does he wants his slippers, his tobacco, his book? the wife put them in their places, and he knows where to find them. He sends her out for a run in the air; he intercepts the heavy burden that she would lift; he snatches away the work that she would be busy over when the house is still; he makes her feel that he does not merely allow her to live for the gratification it affords her to wait upon him, but that her life and comfort are as important to him as his own are, and that the religious rite of their marriage was not one where she was sacrificed a victim on its altar.

In reality, for the existence of the first order of husband it is chiefly the wives who are to be held accountable. They delight to serve where they love, and they give themselves the delight at the cost of making the service so common as to be unnoticeable, and of coarsening and hardening the nature they once thought so fine; they delight to make themselves felt, to make themselves indispensable; they forget the duty they owe their children and themselves of preserving health and strength in remembering the duty they owe their husbands, and they pamper the poor men's bodies at the expense, one might say, of their souls. If they happen to see another woman's husband undressing his little boy at night, they smile at the superior manliness of their husbands, who do not even put the studs into their own shirts in the morning; and if a man in all the neighborhood, conscious of his own strong back and stubborn muscles, considers himself better able to stand over the wash-tub than his delicate wife is, and does it, they unanimously laugh him to scorn.

How far a wife's responsibility extends in this matter it would be a delicate thing to decide. Yet as marriage is a partnership as well as a sacrament, and always an affair of mutual interests, and as both parties to it are supposed to be reasonable beings, able to resist temptation and guard themselves from straying into forbidden paths, not mere puppets and possessions, it seems a work of supererogation on the party of the one part to assume that she must lie down and let the party of the other part walk over her flesh and blood in order to keep his feet in the right path.

Nor, by this, do we mean to give any false pity to the fagged-out wives who keep their houses without system—incapables who deserve as small pity as any other class of sinners—who, however faithful they may be in desire, have never troubled themselves to learn any decent method of managing their affairs, whose maids are untrained, whose closets and drawers are at sixes and sevens, and who consequently drag their work about the house from morning till night, and give right of way to the old saw which says,

"Man's work is from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done."

Certainly, after the welfare of her children, it is the first duty of every wife to make her home a pleasant spot; to make it the one place in the world where her husband would prefer to spend his leisure; to make it so bright and cheerful and healthy that bars and billiards can have no attraction beside it, and always to cast such an aura of love and gentleness throughout its bounds that it shall seem a sacred and holy spot to him when he is away from it, that its influence shall extend about him wherever he goes. But the woman who could do so much alone would be a miracle, not to say a monstrosity. It is the happiness and right of the husband to be a builder as well as a dweller in such a home; and when a woman has such a home, that fact alone implies a spontaneity of co-operation on his part that shows he is not one to sequester to himself in any sense the heart of the celery.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Ghouls.

MY DEAR PETER,—Have you observed that some of our fellow-travelers have the manners of ghouls? You remember, of course, the Arabian Nights, and the bride who pecked at single grains of rice for her dinner, and who was discovered by her husband in the midst of the honey-moon repairing at night to a certain feast. She fed upon corruption. Perhaps also you remember the humorous sketch of Thackeray's, describing his Gretchen at a German court eating oysters. He, a fastidious Englishman, laid aside some of them as not entirely desirable, but Gretchen consumed them with gusto, finishing the oysters and his fond regard for her at the same time. But here we come upon delicate ground. For yesterday, when I dined with Apicius, he pressed upon me some cheese of Roquefort which was even as those oysters. Thackeray himself, who enjoyed a good dinner, would very probably have turned from a qualm of memory of Gretchen to solace his sorrow with a bit of venerable Stilton. But what is venerable Stilton? Is it fresh and sweet, or a little not so fresh? Did you say that a ghoul was an epicure of corruption?

Lucullus invited me to a supper of game the other evening, and I hope that I may often sit at his hospitable board. But I could not help thinking, as I assisted at the feast, of that ghoul-bride in the Arabian Nights. "A partridge," said Lucullus—he was speaking of partridges—"a partridge should be hung by the wing, and when it drops it is ripe and fit for dishing. White sauce always." The readiness of legs of mutton, I have heard, should be tested in the same manner; and I have sat at hospitable boards upon which the flavor of the game was such that the sensitive reveler wished to fly the room. For my part, I would rather dine with the bride upon single kernels of rice than assist at that other feast. In the days of the grand tour, when I too came to a German Residenz, I was bidden to a banquet, and the food was unspeakable. I gazed in amazement at ladies and gentlemen of cultivated intelligence partaking—if you will allow me—of carrion. Game flavor, indeed! A man needed to be "game" to eat it. "Did you see my dear friend Madame la Duchesse de Blutwurst?" said a French lady to me afterward. It was the hostess of the banquet. "Madame la Duchesse de Ghoul," I answered; and the French lady, who has a turn for raillery and friendship, smiled.

"'Tis only a question of degree," Apicius says to me when I decline that appalling cheese. Rather of preference, I answer. For I observe that while he smacks his lips over animated cheese he recoils with dismay from my suggestion of animated biscuit to eat with it—or them. Some of the worthy Abyssinians, we are told, cut steaks from the living cow, and find them tender and toothsome. They should dine with Leo, in whose kitchen cooking is a mere ceremony of momentary exposure of food to the fire. Between Leo and the Abyssinian it is indeed, as Apicius says, but a question of degree. But I wage no war upon his kitchen, for its products are often memorable and delicious. Yet why should he like morsels of game which—well, I can only say that if Madame de Ghoul, of the Arabian Nights, should sit at his table with those birds spread before her which have dropped from the wing, she would not eat single kernels of rice, and she would have no occasion for that subsequent feast.

But these are idiosyncrasies of taste, and these good friends of mine are not the ghouls whom I had in mind. That poor Gretchen who did not know when oysters were good or the reverse, who, indeed, enjoyed to the utmost that doubtful bivalve, may have been the sweetest and simplest and most charitable of maidens, anxious to save her sisters every pang, and ready to weep with the sorrow of a sparrow. Tender little Teutonic soul! I seem to see her now in a dowdy gown, and with murky fingers raising to her appreciative mouth that questionable morsel, and again and again, until all are gone; and her breast is heaving with sympathy for some lover whom she can not love, who sighs for her, hopeless, and who would fain be the oyster that she eats. "Happy oyster," he murmurs; "thee she evidently loves!" and when she has consumed two dozen she rests from her labors and sighs that she can not love him, nor eat more of the lickersome shell-fish. These, I say, are idiosyncrasies of taste; and that good soul for whom I gladly make room in my heart—fear not, Peter, 'tis a houri of the imagination only!—is not the ghoul who travels with us.

That ghoul is the real lover of corruption, who is greedy for it, who fattens upon it. There, you see, just opposite to me sits Mrs. Buzzard. You would not think her a heroine of Arabian story, but she is. Sweet rice is very tasteless to her, but a good reeking morsel of— Yes, she likes it! she likes it! Poor little Nell Gwyn's good name died the other day, and how Mrs. Buzzard feasts upon the dead Nellie! She knows all the details, and such venomous head-shakings and such ferocious delight! I protest I know not which seems to be the greater sinner, Nell Gwyn or her critic. There are excuses for some things, but none for others. Gossip, which is either the eating of steaks from the living animal or banqueting upon the dead, is the one unpardonable sin. How I respect Mr. Paterfamilias, whose brow darkens the moment gossip begins at his table, and who says, as it continues, "Silence!" in such a stentorian and conclusive voice that you think you have seen a giant planting his heel upon a spider. "My dear children," he says, "don't eat people, living or dead. Let us be human at this table, and neither ghouls nor cannibals!" If the dear young women, his daughters, sulk or look amazed, he asks them if they do not remember that for every hard word they speak of others the others are speaking perhaps a harder of them, and that each excuses it because the other does it. "My dear children," says the good father, "find fault with yourselves, and ridicule yourselves, and sneer at yourselves as much as you will, and I will say nothing, because you know what you are talking about. But when you speak of others you do not know; you only infer and surmise." Little Chatta, his darling, shakes her shoulders and pouts, and asks, "And, pa, I should like to know what would become of society under such rules!"

But there are more savage ghouls who travel with us, who delight to tear and bite the fairest reputations, and who are insanely greedy to consume those who are dead in disgrace. When the familiar remark was made that there was something intensely agreeable to us in the misfortunes of our best friends, it was merely saying that we were ghouls. And yet do you never think of it when you see the weaver bird hawking at the eagle in his majestic pride of place? You know, for instance, Boreas the editor. Now, my dear Peter, an editor is a very important personage, because he holds a speaking-trumpet, and he can blow his opinions very loud and very far, and the reverberation seems to you so infinite and multitudinous that it is hard for you to believe that it is only one little gentleman blowing his opinions through a tremendous trumpet. Perhaps great force of wind does not really increase the value of the tune. Master Boreas is very well known to us all. He is a vindictive and mercenary man. There are resounding thunders of virtue upon his editorial page, but the balance-wheel is on the other side, the advertising page. Missions to the moon are the only enterprise for a truly humane investment, until the advertisers are angry and withdraw, whereupon there is no illusion so absurd as missions to the moon.

Boreas is a mercenary fellow, bought by advertising and by party advantage. His paper puffs and blows certain stocks, for instance, and it is curious that a few hundred shares have been placed to his credit, in recognition of his fidelity and ability as an editor. Nothing was whispered of bargain. Far from it. By the honor of Mercury, nothing whatever. Yet it is curious, I say, that the tone of his paper is so very favorable to that stock, and how promptly it repels all sinister suggestions in regard to its management. By-and-by a little cloud as large as a man's hand arises in the West and settles upon some public man of spotless honor hitherto. Charges are made, suspicions are hinted, and Boreas, licking his greedy jaws, swoops upon the prey. Good heavens! what virtue! Justice has returned to earth. Such tremendous rhetoric, such infinite indignation, such loftiness of the moral sense, are primeval—they are millennial. "At length," shouts Boreas, his pockets bursting with the hush-money of that stock—"at length we have found a public servant who receives bribes—ay, fellow-citizens, BRIBES! Our opinions, as is well known, are pure and unbought. We say what we think with sublime disdain of interest or of consequences. But here is a public man whose votes are venal! O tempora! O mores! Whom shall we trust? Out upon the hypocrite, the muling, puling pretender! We always knew what a shallow imposture he was! Some of our fellow-citizens believed him to be sincere, we always knew him to be a mawkish scoundrel. Crucify him! crucify him! The bribe-taker, the corrupt scoundrel! a bloat of villainy! a mass of infamy!"

Hosted by Google

That Arabian bride, Madame le Ghoul, never enjoyed her banquet so keenly as Boreas enjoys rending and tossing and tasting this corruption. He gloats over what he calls moral ruin: all the onions of Wethersfield would not supply him tears enough to weep over this astounding hypocrisy. He returns to it again and again. The ghoul bride, you remember, was not satisfied with one repast. Perhaps you think that Boreas has a much deeper sense of morality than other people. My dear Peter, look at his pockets! He has puffed scoundrelism when it paid him, and he denounces it when it does not. All this fury of rhetoric is not moral sentiment, it is immoral sentiment: it is the ghoul's delight in corruption. Do you find in all that tumid declamation any real regret that a trusted man has fallen? Do you find any charitable reluctance to believe? Do you observe any humane forbearance? Do you feel a touch of divine sympathy and generous pity? As much as in the ghoul's banquet—no more. It is a fiery thirst, a raving greed for corruption.

Indeed, when I think of that Arabian bride, her odious fancy for the dead seems to be almost venial compared with this frenzy for rioting in the living reputation which is life itself. Prometheus, chained to the cliff by a superior power, and gnawed by the vultures which a resistless might drives to the horrible feast, is a thousandfold more majestic than that power, and his suffering is nobler than the will which imposes it. This would be the effect if he were guilty. Is it otherwise with this ghoul-like greed to prey upon honored names and character hitherto unsullied? And this is the immorality of ghouls, and the mischief which such fellow-travelers produce. Profound contempt for the spirit of the condemnation is likely to destroy or to palliate abhorrence of the offense condemned. When Mrs. Buzzard alights upon the poor lost Nellie Gwyn, I think the heart yearns toward that hapless lady, and shields her with tender pity. And when mercenary Boreas screams at the infamy of Aristides, we pity that public servant, and we heartily despise the ghoul who riots in the ruin of character.

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING STYLES.

THE approach of spring brings the usual rumor of changes of fashion. Foreign authorities on matters of dress say there have been gradual modifications going on all winter that will take decided shape in the costumes prepared for April and May. These changes are said to tend toward that simplicity of design and trimming that ladies of taste have long desired. Stately attire is to replace the jaunty costumes of to-day, elaborate Frou-Frou toilettes will give way to dresses distinguished for their simplicity, and tall, slight figures will be the rule instead of those made short and bunchy by bouffant drapery.

At present all this is mere conjecture, but there is already a tendency in favor of the simple, graceful drapery of the princesse and Medici costumes. The regular gored princesse dress buttoned all the way down, flat and plain in front and on the sides, with ample flowing drapery behind, has been illustrated in the Bazar. This dress is now fashionably worn in Europe, but the princesse costume which has obtained favor here is a composite dress, consisting of a long princesse polonaise very slightly draped, and opened over a skirt of similar material very simply trimmed. Large buttons, with the light facings, cords, and pipings described early in the season, are the trimmings for such over dresses; a sash sometimes drapes the back, and in many instances these polonaises are draped in the middle of the back only. In order to give the desired chic it is still necessary to have all the fullness behind. A few regular princesse dresses have been made here to be worn merely as house dresses. They are little more than the Gabrielle dress worn a few years ago; the waist and skirt breadths are cut in the same piece; the back breadths are caught up in a puff held by sash loops. In Europe wedding dresses are cut in this fashion, and are made elaborate by revers and side trimmings that simulate a court train. When puffs are added to the tops of the sleeves, a girdle or lace frill placed about the waist, and a voluminous fraise of lace around the back, this costume becomes the much-talked-of Medici dress. It is especially appropriate for rich fabrics—velvets, brocades, thick faille, and the moiré that is fast coming back into favor. The princesse suit—a single skirt and long polonaise draped slightly in the middle of the back—will be made up in the light, soft, woolen goods already recorded among spring fabrics, such as thin camel's-hair, cashmere, vigogne, and foulard-laine. Bronze, vert-de-gris, and ocean blue shades will be most worn. The trimmings will be thick repped silk pipings, swinging cords, yak lace, and flounces of the fabric faced with silk. It is probable that vigogne will be one of the most popular materials for spring; it is very light, and makes soft, graceful drapery, yet is so elastic that it does not rumple and crease like cashmere. It comes in natural brown and gray shades, and in the deep Napoleon blue of which so much is said at present.

Very deep basques are also foretold for spring. An idea of these is found on a costume of blue vigogne reported from abroad. The dress skirt is trimmed with lengthwise bands of velvet edged with yak lace. The princesse bodice has a very deep basque, which forms a sort of tablier in front, comes down in two long points on either side, and is divided in the middle of the back. Two large velvet buttons define the waist behind, and the whole basque is trimmed with a velvet band and lace. Velvet revers and epaulets are added if the wearer chooses. This dress may be worn either in the house or out-of-doors.

MANTLES.

It is again announced that mantles will supersede all sacques, jackets, and sleeved garments generally. For dressy wraps this is doubtless true, though the jaunty English double-breasted jacket will still be used for general wear. It is too convenient, becoming, and inexpensive to be readily abandoned. A new mantle, to be introduced when warmer days come, is of Oriental shape and color, and is called the Chudda. It is made of colored cashmere, either lotus gray, chocolate, or the soft, hazy, Oriental green shades, and is trimmed with a kind of raised silk embroidery called Persane. The scarf-mantle worn last fall is also being made up at the furnishing houses. This is of black cashmere, with insertion and edging of yak lace; it is merely a scarf adjusted in the back, and crossed in front to hang over the shoulders like sleeves. These, with the graceful Dolman with its newly elongated sleeves, will prevail in the early spring months, and do service as extra wraps at the watering-places and the sea-side.

MECHLIN LACE, FRAISES, ETC.

There is a fancy this winter for the fine white Mechlin or Malines lace which is better known as old-fashioned thread lace. It is exquisitely fine, and when brought out in quaint medieval designs connoisseurs in lace prefer it even to that staid favorite, Valenciennes. It has been beautifully used as trimming for a pale blue dress that is partly faille, partly velvet; a black brocade and faille dress worn by a distinguished-looking blonde has a Malines frill around the neck and wrists. These frills are worn standing, and are now laid in side pleats and worn very full, instead of being merely gathered as formerly. The Venetian fraise of lace for the throat is becoming to ladies with long necks. It is arranged around heart-shaped corsages, and made to stand outward in that prominent way seen in old pictures. Double ruches of lace, with a long jabot in front, are still very fashionable.

A pretty regalia that brightens up a black or dark silk dress for dinner-parties is a Marie Antoinette collar made of folds of colored China crape and Mechlin lace. A sash of faille or of China crape of the same color is edged with lace, and worn loosely knotted on the left side of the skirt. Buckles and other ornaments of pearl and of cut steel are sometimes added to these.

In the spring China crape and faille vests or sleeveless basques will take the place of the velvet ones now worn. A vest of peacock blue or Pompeian red crape enlivens a black silk dress, while bright contrasts are sought with colored dresses, such as a vest of pearl-colored crape with a turquoise or moss green silk dress, or a rose-colored vest with a pearl gray toilette. These vests may be entirely without trimming, but are more dressy when edged with Valenciennes lace.

FRENCH MOURNING.

Parisian fashion papers are filled with descriptions of mourning dresses worn in memory of Louis Napoleon. These are merely fanciful costumes of black cashmere and Sicilienne elaborately trimmed with crape and jet that would not be considered "mourning" in this country. The most sombre are those sent to England to the ex-Empress Eugénie. A suit of Valencia has the skirt covered with quadruple crape; the polonaise is lengthened behind to form a sweeping train, and is bordered all around with a crape side pleating. A black cashmere dress has the front width of kilt pleats alternately of cashmere and crape; the revers, buttons, and facings are of crape. Some of the dresses have vest fronts also of heavy English crape. The collars are all crape, and the only ornaments are Watteau bows of black ribbon hanging from the back, and chatelaine bags of crape worked with the armorials of the Empress.

Among the lighter mourning toilettes worn by friends of the imperialists is a dress of black Sicilienne, made with a basque opening over a crape vest that is buttoned by large chased steel buttons. Another, of black cashmere, has a long skirt and basque, with a cape of black crêpe lisse that partially covers the bodice. A jet chatelaine bag is added to the side of these black dresses. For still slighter mourning English crape bands are replaced by folds of dull black faille, quantities of jet are used, and the pelerine handkerchiefs or capes are of white lisse instead of black.

CHILDREN'S PIQUÉS.

The furnishing houses are making an abundance of children's clothing in white repped and dimity-figured piqués. For boys not yet in trowsers there are Highland suits of dimity-piqué, with kilt skirts laid in very small pleats, and a vest and open jacket trimmed with Hamburg edging. The jacket is a new loose shape, imitating the English sack. It is fastened by one button at the throat, falls open to disclose the buttoned vest with its two points, and has square pockets on the sides. A white pleated shirt waist is worn beneath this pretty suit. $14 is the price asked.

Another good idea for suits for small boys is a kilt skirt worn with a belted blouse or jacket without a vest. These simple, tasteful suits are excellent for every-day wear. They are made up in merino and cashmere, or even in fine flannel, to be worn on cool mornings. Gray, marron, and navy blue are the colors. The blouse is sometimes cut with a diagonal front, buttoning from right to left, like the Bismarck blouse, once so popular. Two or three rosettes of black ribbon are on the plain front of the kilt. Price $12. Very fine cloth suits in kilt fashion, either dark blue or green, cost from $20 to $25.

The piqué dresses for tiny girls are Gabrielles, with Hamburg insertion and edging arranged in curves down the front to simulate an apron, while on the waist is a Pompadour square of lengthwise tucks. Square pockets. Belt of piqué, with slanting ends ruffled. Coat sleeves with ruffle falling toward the hand. For larger girls are basques buttoned behind and two skirts. There is but one dart in front of the waist, and the basque is cut in square flaps. One of these flaps on each side forms a little square pocket, held by large pearl buttons. For plain dresses the trimming is two scant straight ruffles of piqué, scalloped and bound with bias piqué; the upper skirt is simply scalloped. More elaborate dresses are trimmed with embroidery.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.; A. T. STEWART & CO.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE London Court Journal says that the following is the manner in which the news of his father's death was broken to the Prince Imperial: When the Prince arrived he exclaimed, in alighting from the carriage, "My father!" Count DAVILLIERS grasped his hand, saying, "Monseigneur, you must have courage: the Emperor is very ill." At that moment the Prince perceived the Catholic priest of Chiselhurst, who looked painfully concerned. Manning himself against his first effect of sorrow, "Tell me the truth," he cried; "I have strength to support it." At length the Empress came out in tears, and clasping him in her arms, was able to say, "Louis, my poor boy, I have only you left." The Prince rushed into his father's room, and there, throwing himself on his knees, recited aloud the Lord's Prayer. This act of devotion ended, he cried out with a feeling of the deepest affliction, "I can not, I can not look!" and immediately hurried to his own room. It was there only, after having heard the distressing narrative of Baron CORVISART and Dr. CONNEAU, that his nerves became relaxed, and he was able to shed an abundance of tears. Two wedding-rings were left remaining on the ex-Emperor's left hand. One of these was his own; the other that of NAPOLEON I. During his lifetime his late majesty used to wear a third wedding-ring, that of his mother, "la Reine HORTENSE." This latter ring the Empress has kept as a souvenir.

—The widow of the late Secretary STANTON is residing at Germantown, near Philadelphia, and is said to be in rapidly declining health.

—M. LITTRÉ, one of the first scholars of France, and author of the great dictionary which is taking the place of that of the Academy, lives in squalid poverty in an out-of-the-way street in Paris.

—Recently, in Knoxville, Tennessee, one ATKINS was married to Miss ATKINS, the Rev. Mr. ATKINS performing the ceremony. Several of the At-kinsfolk were around to see the spectacle.

—It is whispered that Mr. DISRAELI will have to give up Hughenden Manor unless he can make arrangements with Lady BEACONSFIELD'S heir at law to retain it as tenant.

—The last words pronounced by the ex-Emperor of France in his dying moments were addressed to his old and faithful friend, Dr. CONNEAU. They were, "Etiez-vous à Sédan?" (Were you at Sedan?) Subsequently the Empress held his hand in hers, and gently kissed it; the Emperor smiled, and his lips moved as if returning his wife's embrace, but he never uttered another word after that last thought—"Sedan!"

—Lady OTWAY, widow of the late colonel of the Eighty-fourth British regiment, who died recently, was a lineal descendant of EDWARD III.

—Mrs. ANNA GOSS, of Amherst, New Hampshire, passed the 103d anniversary of her birth on the 1st ult. She was a daughter of STEPHEN BATHRICK, of Lunenburg, Massachusetts, and came to Amherst in 1785, then being fifteen years of age, and one year later married EPHRAIM GOSS, a soldier returned from the war, with whom she lived fifty-four years, till his decease in 1840, and by whom she had ten children, seven daughters and three sons, two of the daughters being still alive. One daughter, who had made her home with her mother, to whom the mother was able to minister and care for in a protracted sickness, and whom she always addressed in the endearing terms of "My dear child," died two years since at the age of eighty-two. Mrs. Goss has been in good health till within a few weeks, and able to be about her house. Her faculties are considerably impaired by age, her memory now failing to recall incidents of fourscore years ago. She has few relatives in New England; but, through the generosity of a granddaughter, the wife of ex-Mayor P. C. CHENEY, of Manchester, she is kindly cared for.

—Miss EDMONIA LEWIS (colored), our famous American sculptress in Rome, has two orders of $50,000 each from two susceptible British noblemen.

—Colonel FORNEY'S liberal offer to donate a free library to a Texas town was, in a way, declined. The citizens voted to accept buckshot and shot-guns instead, if it was all the same to him.

—After all the talk about the great wealth of the late LOUIS NAPOLEON, it turns out that his entire income, including that of the Empress, is only $60,000 a year. He received large sums from the French treasury, but all the money not claimed by state or household expenses was spent for public objects, charitable institutions, or private benevolence.

—Mr. RUSKIN has been re-elected to the important office of Slade Professor of Fine Arts. He was originally elected in 1866, in pursuance of the will of Mr. FELIX SLADE, who left $60,000 for the endowment of the professorship.

—And this recently happened to Lord NORTHBROOK, Governor-General of India—a genuine Oriental reception by some ladies on the occasion of an official visit: As soon as his carriage stopped, a bevy of gayly dressed ladies rushed toward him, and began to shower flowers, rose-water, etc., upon him, his carriage, and horses. When a Parsee lady wishes to pay her respects to a gentleman of high position, or when she wishes to bless him, she raises her hands and cracks her fingers against her temples; and this was done by the ladies.

—Count SCHOUVALEFF is said to be the coming man in Russia. He is now alluded to in court circles as l'homme tout puissant, and is regarded as the future successor of Count GORTSCHAKOFF, and is said to have been essentially instrumental in bringing about the late meeting of the three emperors.

—The monarchs of Austria and Italy have each ordered his court to go into mourning for twelve days for the late LOUIS NAPOLEON.

—A funny old man, Père LEGRY, has just died in Paris. His sole amusement for many years past consisted in taking part in as many funerals a day as possible.

—Some thirty odd years ago the secretary to St. Bartholomew's Hospital ran down to a watering-place in Wales for his vacation. While there he met accidentally with a very intelligent little boy who used to run about doing errands, and always turned up at the right moment, and when a penny was to be turned. Dr. —— noticed the lad with interest, and soon, by chatting with him, found that he had the stuff in him to make his way in the world if he only got the chance. His passion for learning was very great. "Suppose I were to try to get you into the Blue-coat Boys' School in London," said Dr. —— to his little man one day, "and suppose I were to succeed, would you do me credit, do you think? Would you work very hard?" "Would not I, though, Sir?" was the reply, and the boy's eyes actually danced in his head with delight. Dr. —— tried and succeeded, and his protégé kept his word. He did him such credit that on leaving the school with his arms full of honors his patron was able to get him into St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where, in course of time, he succeeded to Dr. ——'s post of secretary. Years went on and brought new successes to the young doctor, till at last he became court physician, and is now Sir WILLIAM GULL, the observed of all observers, and one of the most honorable notabilities of that most honorable of all professions.

—Mr. BARNUM is at it again. Already he is beginning to receive wild animals and varmints from abroad. By the Hansa he received a monster rhinoceros, having previously received four lions, six tigers, two leopards, and divers gnus, yaks, elands, zebras, ostriches, and scores of monkeys. Among other great rarities, he has a large-eared dwarf elephant, which weighs only 140 pounds. He also possesses the talking machine, which was illustrated in the Bazar some three years ago, and which is ready to converse in all languages with our cosmopolitan public.

—At a recent dinner given by the German embassador to President THIERS there were eight ladies present, three of whom were Americans—Baroness d'Erlanger (formerly Miss SLIDELL), Countess de Hatzfeld (formerly Miss MOULTON), and the Princess de Lynar. What the latter's "formerly" was has escaped us.

—Mrs. SARAH A. OREN has been elected by the Legislature of Indiana State Librarian. She is a woman of talent and culture, and the widow of a brave soldier who fell in battle.

—Mr. MIALL, M.P., who, during his Parliamentary career, always advocated religious equality, is about to receive from his friends a gift of $10,000, as a mark of their approbation of his course.

—FIRMIN HUGHES, recently buried in Père la Chaise, was the last of the three soldiers who first hoisted the French flag on the Mamelon, at Sebastopol. In doing it he lost an arm, and had his jaw-bone shattered.

—A Mr. RIGGS, recently elected a member of the Kansas Legislature, shuffled off this mortal coil a few days since, which caused an unfeeling colleague to observe that "Brother RIGGS won't feel the winters where he has gone."

—Madame PATTI will appear in Italian opera in London in April. She has concluded a new engagement with Mr. GYE for two years at £200 per night, with the privilege of choosing in what operas she will sing.

—There died a few days ago in Ohio a widow named KEZIAH DAVIS, leaving property worth a million of dollars. Twelve years ago she came to Ross County and created some excitement among the farmers of the Scioto Valley by the purchase, for $70,000 cash, of what was known as the Claypool Farm. She said she bought it because, many years before, while working there as a hired girl, at one dollar per week, she was married to her late husband, a hired hand upon the place at eight dollars per month of twenty-six days. All their savings were invested in the rich Scioto corn lands. To show their fertility it may be mentioned that she rented the Claypool Farm to a worthy but poor laboring man at a cash rent, because he was an excellent farmer of corn crops. For two or three years he could not sell his corn to advantage, and she advised him to crib it and wait for a good market, and she would wait for her rent. After the third year corn rose to a high price; he sold, paid his rent, and bought a Paint Valley farm for over twenty thousand dollars cash. He is now a wealthy farmer in the Scioto Valley. To this couple JAMES EMMITT, of Waverly, is indebted for the acquisition of his great fortune. Good Aunt KEZIAH made a great number of relatives happy by bequests of splendid farms, money, and other availables; but up to the last she kept up her habits of work, as without active employment she could not be happy.

—The oldest member of the House of Commons is WILLIAM HODGSON BARROW, M.P. for South Notts, aged eighty-eight; the youngest are Lord HENRY SOMERSET, M.P. for Monmouthshire, and WILLIAM F. MUNSTER, M.P. for Mallow, each aged twenty-three.

Hosted by Google

Tapestry Brioche, Figs. 1-4.

THIS brioche or footstool consists of a cornered cushion four inches and seven-eighths high, which is furnished with a canvas cover embroidered in cross stitch and loop stitch with zephyr and tapestry worsted in green shades. A fringed border, also worked on canvas, trims the edge of the cushion. To make the cover first draw the shape of the cushion on medium-sized canvas from Fig. 34, Supplement; the threads of the canvas should be straight along the middle lines of Fig. 34. Work on the canvas first the strip simulating a cross band, observing Fig. 1, in the ordinary cross stitch with black and green worsted and silk, beginning from the middle, in the design shown by No. 17 on the embroidery side of the Supplement, which gives a quarter section of the centre figure and a section of the strip. Fill the free parts of the canvas with light green tapestry worsted in loop stitch. Work the loop stitch, as shown by detail Fig. 2, with knots similar to button-hole stitches, between each of which a thread interval of seven-eighths of an inch remains for a loop. The knots are worked on four threads of the canvas in height, and at intervals of eight threads each, in horizontal rows transposed. For each knot first work an ordinary button-hole stitch, then pass the needle, close beside the finished stitch, through the canvas from the under to the upper side, and, following the line finished by an arrow-head in the illustration, carry it back through the loop thus formed, and draw the loop together. Of course the rows of loops are worked upward from the bottom, as the loops of the last row should always rest on the knots of the preceding row, and the first knot of each row should be worked close to the last two stitches of two cross stitch rows of the strip simulating a cross band. It must also be observed that the working thread should be laid on anew for each row of loops, but this should be done at the first knot of the preceding row, so that the canvas threads which lie between are covered. After finishing the upper cover work the fringed border for the edge of the brioche, observing Fig. 4, page 157, which gives a section of the border reduced in size. Fringe strands of black and green worsted are knotted into the loops projecting at the under edge of the windings. Having fastened the cover on the cushion, cover the seam on the upper edge with a braid formed of black and green worsted, cover the under side of the brioche with black leather or enameled cloth, and in each of the four slits set a handle of cord and clipped worsted. To make these handles of black and green worsted in various shades fasten balls (the lightest in the middle) on coarse black worsted cord as follows: For each ball take two circular pieces of card-board of equal size, furnished with a hole in the centre, slip them on the cord, wind them closely with several layers of worsted, and cut through the layers of worsted on the outer edge of the card-board as shown by Fig. 3, page 149. (This illustration shows the manner of working the balls without the cord on which they are fastened for the sake of greater distinctness.) Then wind the layers of worsted in the middle between the pieces of card-board with a worsted thread several times very tight, tie the ends of the thread together, and remove the card-board. Continue in this manner until the cord is covered with worsted tassels in the length required, then cut the tassels evenly all around, so that they form a round bunch, and fasten the ends of the cord on the brioche as shown by Fig. 3, page 149.

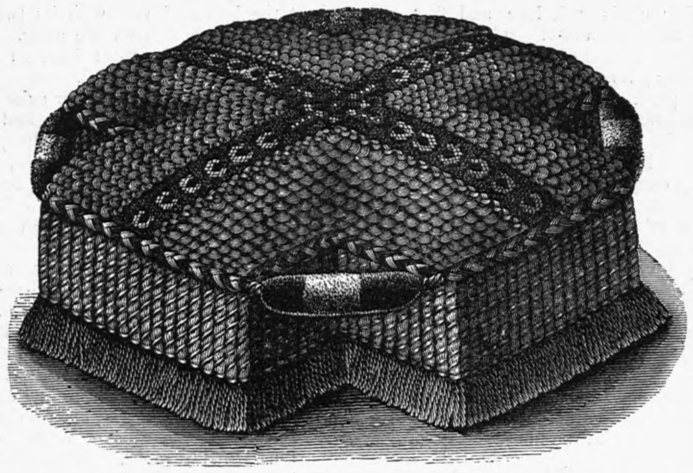

Fig. 1.—TAPESTRY BRIOCHE.—[See Figs. 2–4.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 34. For design see embroidery side of Supplement, No. 17.

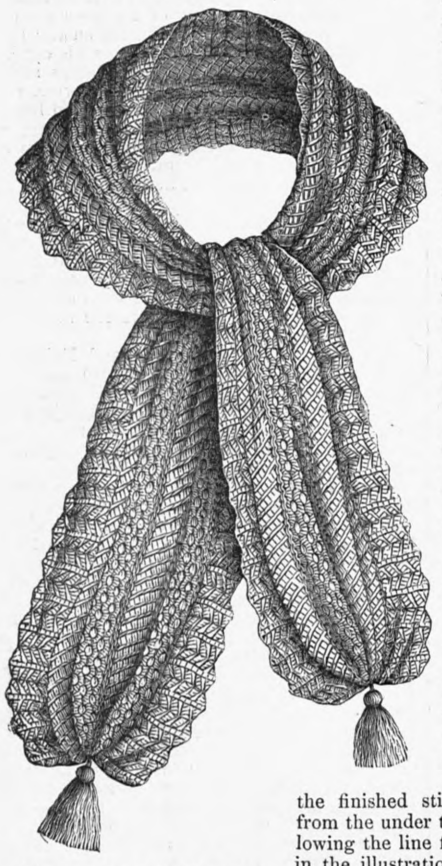

Fig. 1.—LADY'S KNITTED SCARF.—[See Figs. 2 and 3, Page 157.]

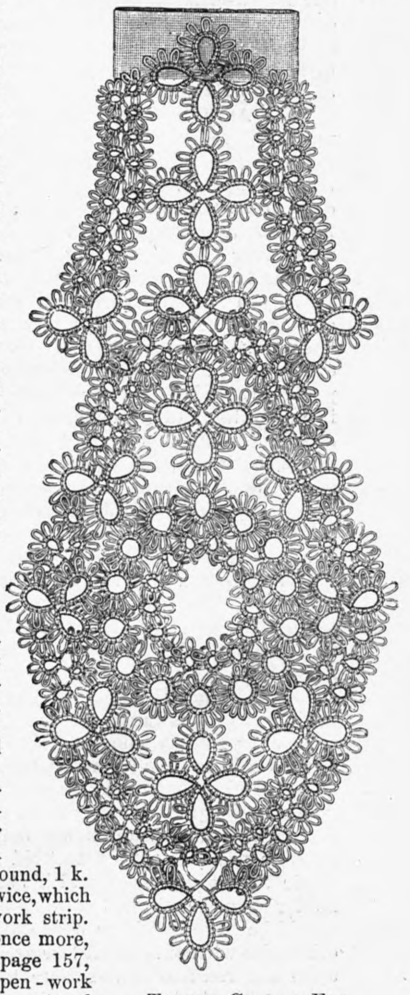
LADY'S CROCHET PURSE.

Lady's Knitted Scarf, Figs. 1-3.

THIS scarf may be worn out-of-doors instead of a hood, to protect the head and throat. It is worked in an open-work striped design with white Saxony wool and coarse steel needles lengthwise, in rounds going back and forth, and is bordered with knitted edging; the length is 72 inches. To make the scarf make a foundation of 360 st. (stitch), and on these knit the 1st and 2d rounds all plain. 3d round.—All purled. 4th round.—All plain. 5th round.—Always alternately k. (knit) 2 st. together, t. t. o. (thread thrown over). The threads thrown over are always knit off as st. in the following round. 6th round.—All purled. Repeat the 5th and 6th rounds four times more. 15th and 16th rounds.—All plain. 17th and 18th rounds.—All purled. This completes one open-work strip. 19th round.—Always alternately 1 k., k. 2 together. 20th round.—Always alternately work 3 st. (1 k., 1 purled, 1 k.) on each st. in the preceding round worked off singly, 1 k. 21st round.—All purled. 22d round.—All plain. 23d round.—Always alternately k. together the 3 st. which were worked on the single st. in the 20th round, 1 k. Repeat the 20th–23d rounds twice, which completes the second open-work strip. Repeat the 1st–31st rounds once more, and then cast off. Fig. 2, page 157, shows an open-work and a close strip of the foundation in full size. Next work the edging (Fig. 3, page 157, gives a full-sized section of the edging) separately and in several parts, in order to avoid the very long foundation. Make a foundation to suit the circumference of the scarf (the number of stitches should be divisible by 8), and on this knit in rounds going back and forth as follows: 1st round.—All plain. 2d round.—∗ 1 k., t. t. o., 2 k., k. 3 together, 2 k., t. t. o. Repeat from ∗. 3d round.—All purled. All rounds denoted by odd numbers are worked all purled in future. 4th round.—Like the second round. 6th round.—2 k., ∗ t. t. o., 1 k., k. 3 together, 1 k., t. t. o., 3 k. Repeat from ∗. 8th round.—3 k., ∗ t. t. o., k. 3 together, t. t. o., 5 k. Repeat from ∗. Repeat the design three times more from the 4th–9th rounds, and then cast off. Sew the edging thus finished all around the foundation of the scarf. Gather the scarf closely on the ends, and trim it there with white worsted tassels as shown by the illustration.



TATTED CRAVAT END.

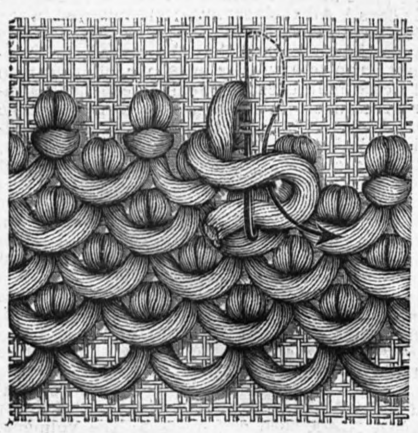


Fig. 2.—LOOP STITCH FOR BRIOCHE.
FULL SIZE.

CORNER OF NETTED GUIPURE BORDER.

Tatted Cravat End.

THIS cravat end is worked with tatting cotton, No. 100, with one thread (shuttle) throughout. Begin with the middle wreath-shaped rosette of small and large rings, and work as follows: 1 ring of 2 ds. (double stitch), 5 p. (picot) separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., t. (turn the work so that the last ring is turned downward); after a thread interval of an eighth of an inch work 1 ring of 1 ds., 15 p. separated each by 1 ds., 1 ds., t.; after the same thread interval (such an interval is always left between the rings when the length is not especially mentioned) ∗ 1 small ring like the preceding, instead of forming the first p., however, fasten to the last p. of the preceding small ring; t., 1 large ring like

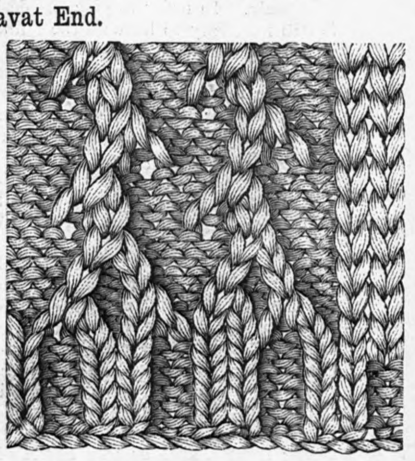

Fig. 1.—KNITTED FOUNDATION FOR LEGGING.—FULL SIZE.—[See Fig. 2, Page 149.]

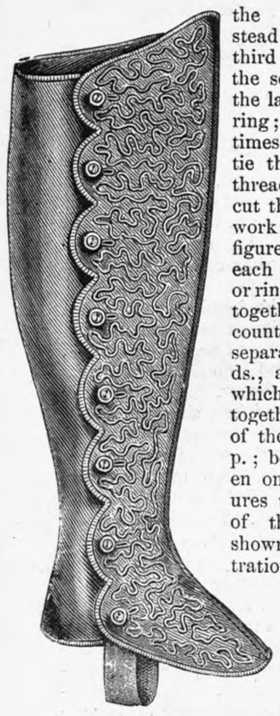
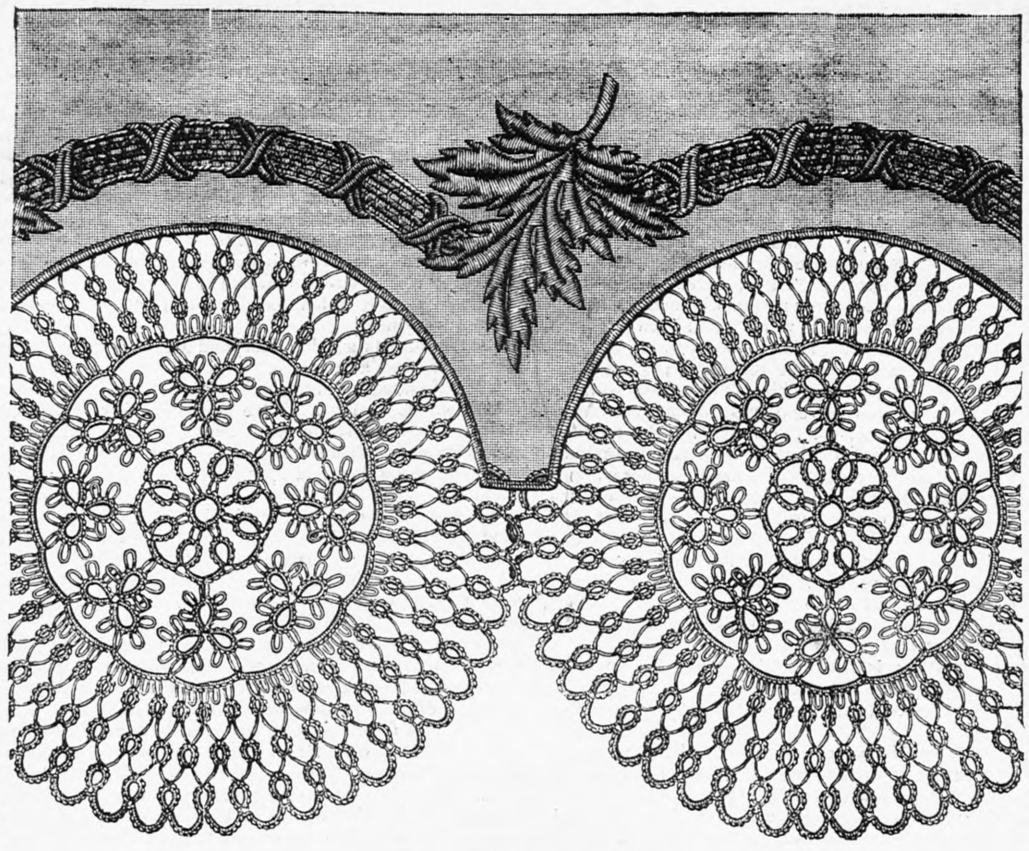
Hosted by Google



LADY'S CLOTH LEGGING.

For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 21–23.



NEEDLE-WORK AND TATTED EDGING FOR CURTAINS, COVERS, ETC.

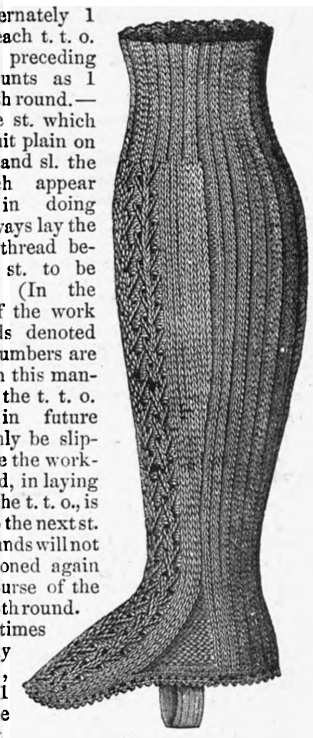


Fig. 2.—LADY'S KNITTED AND CROCHET LEGGING. [See Fig. 1, Page 148.]

JEWEL-CASE WITH GOLD EMBROIDERY.

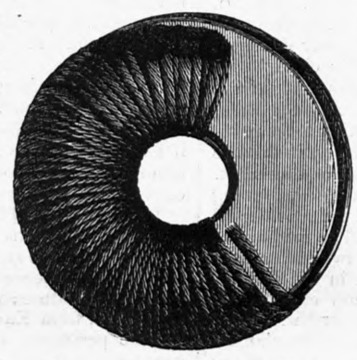

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF MAKING WORSTED BALL FOR BRIOCHE. [See Page 148.]

KEY-BASKET WITH POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY.

the preceding, instead of forming the third p., fasten to the second p. before the last of the same ring; repeat twelve times from ∗, then tie the ends of the thread together and cut them off. Now work two separate figures consisting each of four leaves or rings worked close together, each ring counting 3 ds., 9 p. separated each by 2 ds., and 3 ds., and which are fastened together by means of the first and last p.; besides this fasten one of these figures to a large ring of the rosette, as shown by the illustration, and the other figure to the opposite ring of the same rosette. Work the under point of the cravat end as follows: One figure of three rings like those of the preceding figures, fasten the middle ring to the second following ring of the rosette at the left side of one of the four-leaved figures, t., after a thread interval of a quarter of an inch ∗ work 1 ring of 2 ds., 7 p. separated each by 1 ds., 2 ds.; t., 1 ring of 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 1 ds., 2 ds., t.; repeat five times from ∗, but fasten the large rings and also the small rings together by means of the first and last p., and fasten the last small ring, instead of forming the middle p., to the next four-leaved figure, as shown by the illustration. After a thread interval of three-eighths of an inch work 1 figure of 3 rings like the preceding figure (this figure forms the lower point of the cravat end), fasten the third ring of this figure, instead of forming the last p., to the last p. of the last large ring of the row just finished; after a thread interval of three-eighths of an inch work one row of 6 small and 6 large rings as before, which are fastened together in the corresponding manner, t., after a thread interval of a quarter of an inch work 1 figure of 3 rings like the first figure, fasten the middle ring to the second following ring of the rosette at the right side of the four-leaved figure, and fasten the thread. Having worked so far, and with the help of the illustration, it will be easy to finish the remaining part of the cravat end, which consists of the same figures. The middle part of the cravat is made of fine Swiss muslin or nansook.

Lady's Knitted and Crochet Legging, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS legging is made of white zephyr worsted, and is worked with medium-sized steel knitting-needles in two equal parts, in rounds going back and forth. For the front half, beginning on the upper edge, knit on a foundation of 46 st. (stitch) 41 rounds in the ordinary ribbed design, always alternately 2 k. (knit plain), 2 p. (purled). 42d round.—Sl. (slip); in the course of the work the st. to be slipped at the beginning of each round will not be mentioned again; eleven times alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 p., 1 k., t. t. o., 1 k., 1 p.; finally, t. t. o., 1 p. 43d round.—With this round begins the open-work design of which Fig. 1, page 148, shows a full-sized section (right side of the work). Always alternately 1 p., 1 k. (each t. t. o. in the preceding round counts as 1 st.). 44th round.—K. all the st. which appear knit plain on this side, and sl. the st. which appear purled, in doing which always lay the working thread before the st. to be slipped. (In the course of the work all rounds denoted by even numbers are worked in this manner, and the t. t. o. formed in future should only be slipped, while the working thread, in laying it before the t. t. o., is carried to the next st. These rounds will not be mentioned again in the course of the work.) 45th round.—Eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k., then ∗ 1 p., drop the next st. from the needle, p. the following st., k. together the st. previously dropped with the now following st., and repeat eight times from ∗, then eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k. 47th round.—Eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k., ∗ 2 p., drop the following st. from the needle, p. the next st., drop the following st. from the needle; then k. the st. dropped last together with the st. which now follows, and p. the st. dropped last, t. t. o.; repeat three times from ∗, then 2 p. and eight times alternately 1 k., 1 p.; at the end of the round 1 p. 49th round.—Eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k., ∗ 3 p., 1 k., 1 p., 1 k.; repeat three times from ∗, then 2 p., eight times alternately 1 k., 1 p.; finally, 1 p. 51st round.—Eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k., ∗ 3 p., t. t. o., drop the next st. from the needle, 1 p., then k. the dropped st. together with the following st.; repeat three times from ∗, then 2 p., eight times alternately 1 k., 1 p.; finally, 1 p. 53d round.—Eight times alternately 1 p., 1 k., ∗ 3 p., drop the next 2 st. from the needle, k. the st. dropped first together with the following st. still on the needle, p. the second dropped st., t. t. o.; repeat three times from ∗, then 2 p., eight times alternately 1 k., 1 p.; finally, 1 p. This round corresponds to the 47th round. Repeat the pattern from the latter to the 54th round continually, observing the following: In the 100th, 106th, 112th, 118th, 124th, 130th, 136th, and 142d rounds (thus after every 6 rounds) narrow 1 st. each at the beginning and at the end of the round. Then follow 30 rounds without narrowing. In the 173d round the widening for the side gores at the under edge of the legging, which are knit in connection with the front, is begun; to do this widen 1 st. each at the beginning of the following 32 rounds. All the st. of the gore are knit so that they appear purled on the right side of the work. In the 206th round cast off the 16 st. which were widened for the gore at each side. Now finish the front in 42 rounds, in the last 12 of which narrow 1 st. at the beginning and end of each round, the remaining st. are cast off. For the back part of the legging, on a foundation of 46 st., work 206 rounds in a ribbed design, always alternately 2 k., 2 p., without changing the number of st., then cast off and join this part with the front. The under edge of the legging is formed by three crochet rounds. 1st and

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.

Hosted by Google

2d rounds.—1 single crochet on each st. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 picot (consisting of 5 chain stitches and 1 single crochet on the first of these), 1 single crochet. A band of white belt ribbon set on as shown by the illustration completes the legging.

Lady's Crochet Purse.

See illustration on page 148.

THIS purse consists of two rosettes crocheted with green saddler's silk and lined with green gros grain. They are then fastened together with a row of crochet edging and set into a steel clasp. Begin each part in the middle with a foundation of 10 ch. (chain stitch), which are closed in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch). Then crochet 13 rounds, always going forward, as follows: 1st round.—Four times alternately 7 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the ring. 2d round.—* 7 ch., 4 sc. on the next ch. scallop, repeat four times from , then 2 sc. on the next 2 sc. 3d round.— 7 ch., 4 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 2 sc. on the following 2 st. (stitch), repeat from , always going forward; this is also done in the following rounds. Crochet the 4th–8th rounds similarly to the 3d round, observing the illustration, but in each round the sc. of every close strip are increased by 2 st.; thus every strip in the 8th round counts 16 sc. 9th round.— 7 ch., 5 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 14 sc. on the following 14 st. 10th round.—* 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 5 ch., with these pass over the next 2 sc., 15 sc. on the following 15 st. 11th round.—* 5 ch., twice alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 5 ch.; pass over the next 2 sc., 11 sc. on the following 11 st. 12th round.—* 7 ch., three times alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 7 ch.; pass over the next 3 sc., 5 sc. on the following 5 st. 13th round.—* 7 ch., four times alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 7 ch.; 1 sc. on the middle of the 5 sc. in the preceding round. Having in this manner finished both halves of the purse, crochet for the upper edge of each half 8 ch. scallops, each of which consists of 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop in the preceding round and 7 ch. Edge both halves (the wrong side of the work forms the right side of the purse) in connection on the remaining outer edge with edging worked in four rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—2 sc. on the same ch. scallop in the 13th round on which the last sc. of the 8 ch. scallops forming the upper edge was worked, then always alternately 7 ch., 3 sc. on the next ch. scallop (with every 3 sc. of this round fasten together two corresponding ch. scallops of both halves of the purse); finally, 7 ch. and 2 sc. on the same ch. scallop in the 13th round on which the first sc. of the 8 ch. scallops was worked. 2d round.—1 ch., turn, always alternately 2 sl. on the next 2 st., then always alternately 5 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 7 ch.; finally, 5 sc. on the last ch. scallop. 3d round.—1 ch., turn, always alternately 3 sc. on the middle 3 of the next 5 sc., 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch. scallop, 5 ch.; finally, 3 sc. on the last 3 sc. 4th round.—1 ch., turn, then 1 sc. on each ch. scallop and on each middle sc. of the 3 sc. in the preceding round, after each sc. 5 ch. Finish the purse with lining and a clasp.

Corner of Netted Guipure Border.

See illustration on page 148.

THIS border is suitable for trimming covers, handkerchiefs, etc., and is worked on a coarse or fine netted foundation, with thread of a corresponding size, according to the purpose for which it is designed. The Greek lines and points on the outer edge are worked in point de toile, the straight, open-work lines of the design in point d'esprit, and the larger and smaller design figures in point de reprise as shown by the illustration. Inside of each of the smaller design figures work a wheel. Edge the border closely with buttonhole stitches; cut away the projecting netted foundation.

SLIGHTED.

BY HOWARD GLYNDON.

THIS thing that you have coldly done
Seems but a trifle in your eyes,
And maybe, if you knew my pain,
They would but greaten with surprise.

As one who brushing from a rose
Some small brown creature nested there,
To make it fitter for the eyes
Of her who shall its sweetness wear,

Recks little of the sudden pang
Of the poor tenant dispossessed,
Thrust from the pale pink palace where
Its insignificance was blest,

So you from out my life have swept
One frail illusion, flower-sweet:
If I am poorer for the loss,
You shall not know it when we meet!

MURPHY'S MASTER.

BY JAMES PAYN,

Author of "A Woman's Vengeance," "Bred in the Bone," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

PROMOTION.

TOWARD morning, and when the sounds of disorder from beneath had at last ceased, Robert was about to retire to his berth, when suddenly he heard a cry of "Help, help!" from the direction of the captain's cabin. Apprehensive, he scarcely knew of what, he rushed toward it, when on his way he was arrested by a repetition of the cry, not from where he had expected, but from the cabin occupied by his patron. It was uttered in muffled, half-suffocated tones; and finding the door locked, Robert flung himself without a moment's hesitation against it, and forced it open. Mr. Kavanagh was alone, sitting up in his berth, with the skull-cap on that he now wore night and day, and pointing with shaking finger to some object—an imaginary one, as it turned out—in the centre of the cabin. The moonlight which streamed in on him at the little window showed his staring eyes, his trembling lips, his features palsied as if with excess of terror. "Help, help!" he continued to cry, in a hoarse whisper. "Keep him off! keep him off! I say. He struck me first; I swear it."

"Who struck you, Mr. Kavanagh? There is no one here," said Robert, soothingly.

"There is, there is—there, there, with his strangled face!" and the bare stretched-out arm pointed quiveringly where nothing was to be seen. "Help, Murphy, help!"

"I am here, master," answered Murphy from without. Then pushing hurriedly in, and seeing Robert, he whispered, huskily, "Be off, lad; you are not wanted here."

Robert heard him, but took no notice: he had, he deemed, as much right to be where he was as Murphy had; nay, more, for it was clear enough that the latter was much intoxicated, and therefore unfit to be of service to his master; and, moreover, the insolence of the man's tone was such as might well excite antagonism.

"Do you hear, you fool?" continued Murphy, savagely. "You are not wanted here."

"Yes, yes; take him away," muttered Kavanagh, huddling himself in the bedclothes. "His mouth is bleeding. There, there!"

It was clear to any person who had the use of his senses that these words could have reference to no visible being; but no sooner were they uttered than, as if taking them as a positive command, Murphy threw himself on Robert with the fury of a wild beast, and dragged him to the door. The suddenness of the attack for the moment overcame the lad; but he soon recovered himself, and grappled with his assailant, not without effect. Had they both been on equal terms, indeed, the conflict would not long have been doubtful, but Murphy, being far gone in liquor, lost his footing and fell on the cabin floor, with Robert above him. There they writhed and struggled, till presently Maguire appeared, half dressed and far from sober-looking, at the open door.

"What is it, Dick?" inquired he. "Is it money you're wrastling for?"

"Put him out!" roared Murphy—"put him out!"

"Nay, it's an eviction, is it? Then you may just put him out yourself, for it's contrary to my principles to lend a hand to it."

"The master don't want him here," gasped Murphy, for Robert's hand had fastened on his neckerchief to some purpose. "He's got the fit on him."

"Oh, that's another thing," replied Maguire, gravely.—"I am the last man to interfere with an honest rough-and-tumble, Master Chesney, but this exhibition must positively close." He stooped down over the combatants, and seizing Robert, who was still uppermost, by the neck, compelled him on pain of suffocation to let go his hold; then swung him outside the cabin door, as easily as though he had been a cat, and closed it. Like a cat Robert alighted on his feet, and sprang at the door, though a moment's reflection must have convinced him that it would be madness to attempt to push his way against two such antagonists: he had forced the lock in the first instance, but the opposition he now encountered was far stronger than that of bolt or bar.

A chuckling sound from within proclaimed the sense of superiority enjoyed by at least one of the besieged, and convinced him of the uselessness of his efforts. Furious and baffled, he retired to his own cabin, not to sleep, but to reflect on the humiliation he had so unjustly suffered. He was no tale-bearer, but he was thoroughly resolved to lay the whole matter before Mr. Kavanagh, and if not righted by him, to withdraw from a service degraded by such companionship as Murphy's. In the New World, a man might make his own way without a patron. Still he could not forget that he was under great obligations to Kavanagh, nor forbear to pity his present condition. A London lad in the same position in life would probably have been at no loss for the right name for the attack to which he had been so lately a witness, but to Robert it seemed some uncommon disorder—perhaps an epileptic fit.

Days went by, and on the morning of each Robert presented himself at Kavanagh's cabin, only to be refused admittance in Murphy's dogged tones; but this, and a certain offensive grin with which Maguire now greeted him, only made him more intent upon his purpose. On the sixth morning he was admitted. He found Mr. Kavanagh looking very ill and pale, which touched him; and when he held out his wasted hand for him to take, and welcomed him even more kindly than usual, his wrongs somehow lost their proportions, and became at most a grievance.

"So I hear you have been to ask after me every morning, Robert?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir; but Murphy denied me admittance. He said I was not wanted."

"Well, well, he is gone now, and you are here," urged Kavanagh, smiling. "He's a rough fellow, and, I know, resents another's showing me any regard, which is very unreasonable."

"Nay, Sir, I find no fault with him on that account; but when you were taken ill the other night, and cried, 'Help, help!'"—a sudden spasm shot across the sick man's face. "Something ails you, Sir," said Robert, hastily. "It was very selfish of me to be making complaints at such a time: forgive me."

"No, no; I am better now," gasped Kavanagh. "I would rather hear all about it. I cried, 'Help, help!' you say?"

"Yes, Sir; and then I ran in, and found you sitting up in bed, and pointing to I know not what."

"Well, well, and what did I say more?" inquired the sick man, nervously.

"Nothing more, Sir, that was any sense. But while you wandered on, in Murphy came, and bade me leave the cabin, since you did not want me. It might have been so, but it seemed to me you did want 'help' of some sort; and since he was drunk, and I was sober, that I was the better fitted to give it. Then he threw himself upon me, and strove to turn me out by force. I left my mark upon his throat, I reckon." Here Robert paused, stopped this time by an ejaculation from the other of pain and horror.

"What wickedness!" he murmured: "you might have strangled him!"

"Indeed, Sir, he might have strangled me," answered Robert, indignant at what seemed to him an expression of gross favoritism. "If the big drunken brute had kept his feet, he would have done it. I do not show my own regard for you by flying like a bull-dog at the faces of your friends, but I strive to serve you, Sir, as best I can—"

"You do, you do," interrupted Kavanagh. "It is an ill return to be treated thus indeed. It shall not happen again; I will speak to Murphy." Robert smiled incredulously. "Ah, you think speaking of no use? Well, we shall see: tell Murphy to come hither at once."

"Indeed, Sir, there is no need to trouble yourself about the matter so immediately," urged Robert; "when you get well and strong—"

"I said at once," reiterated Kavanagh; "did you not hear me?"

Robert opened the cabin door, and there stood Murphy in close attendance.

"Mr. Kavanagh wants you."

Without bestowing a glance at the speaker, Murphy made one stride to his master's pillow, and there stood, obedient as the dog that hears the shepherd's voice, and springing to his side awaits his signal.

"I wish to speak to you, Dick, about our good friend Robert, here. We are not in England now, begirt by spies and hunted by the blood-hounds of the law; and when we were, remember, though you doubted him, this lad proved true as steel. There is no danger in his being one of us, in short, and if there were, I still would wish it. Don't speak"—his voice became imperative, and even harsh—"my mind is fixed upon it, and immovable. What you and I lack we have found in this good lad. He can use his wits and fingers too, and in the days to come will be more useful to us even than he has been. At present he has no authority, and you (he tells me) take advantage of it to treat him as you dare not treat one of those whom I have placed under his charge. This must not be. In future look on him as my lieutenant, my second in command, whom, in my absence, you will obey as though he were myself. And if I die—"

"The saints forbid!" ejaculated Murphy, piously.

"Still, it may happen, Dick," continued Kavanagh, kindly, "and then what would become of all these poor fellows, without a head? I say, if I should die, this man, so far as I can make him so—and with you at least I can—is my successor. Do you hear?"

The expression of Mr. Richard Murphy's countenance was curious to witness. Rage, dislike, humiliation, were struggling within him against a habit of obedience to his master's wishes that was second nature; he looked from Chesney to Kavanagh, from Kavanagh to Chesney, in such pitiable perplexity that the latter, who had a generous spirit, was moved by it.

"Indeed, Mr. Kavanagh," said he, "I have no wish to exercise authority over Murphy, but merely to be made secure from any such outrage as he put upon me the other night."

"That I feel sure of, Robert, or I should not intrust you with it. I know too well, from my own case, how ill it is to possess a power that one is not fit to wield." Here he stopped and sighed.

"Arrah, be aisy, Mr. Frank; sure yourself is the king of men," whispered Murphy, reassuringly; but the other took no notice.

"Yes, that is the only way," continued he, thoughtfully. "I tried to make you a friend of this good lad, Dick, but that, through your own fault, has failed. I now make him your superior. You could not give your good-will, it seems; but there will be no excuse for refusing your obedience."

"And is the likes of him to come between me and you, Masther Frank?" asked Murphy, pitifully.

"No, Dick; no man can do that, I think, nor woman either," answered Kavanagh, tenderly. "Don't fret, man. The lad has had honor done him, but not at your expense. Give me your hands, both of you."

He placed them in one another as he had done once before, on the night of their first meeting. Robert grasped Murphy's fingers heartily enough, and Murphy returned the pressure, keeping his eyes, however, intently fixed upon Kavanagh's face.

"You see what I am doing, master, for your sake," they seemed to say.

"That's well, Dick; now leave us for the present, for I have some private talk to finish with Mr. Chesney."

"Very good, Masther Frank.—Perhaps, Sir"—and here he turned to Robert with an air of hesitating respect—"you will kindly let me know when you have done, and I may come back again." As he said these words he ran out of the cabin, as though he could bear the scene no longer. To address Robert as his superior thus voluntarily had probably been the hardest task which he had ever set himself to do.

"Poor Dick!" ejaculated Kavanagh, remorsefully. "I think that ought to content you, lad."

"Indeed, Sir, it was more than I asked, or even desired," answered Robert.

"Perhaps," replied the other; "but it was necessary. I remember when I was at the military college—years ago in France—the only way by which a certain worthy cadet could be saved from a most unmerited persecution was by creating him a sub-lieutenant; and a first-rate officer he made."

"You were in the army, then, Sir?" asked Robert, simply.

"Yes and no: that is, I had a military training, which might have been useful had circumstances turned out as they were expected to do."

"In Ireland, I suppose?"

"Yes: there is no need to make a secret of the matter now, even if you have not guessed it. I nourished a vain dream, which was only real inasmuch as it was dangerous. On board ship I was obliged to be Mr. Denton; in Herne Street I was Wilson. You see I keep nothing from you, lieutenant."

"Yes, Sir," replied Robert, naïvely. "I should like, however, if you would not take it ill, to ask you one more question."

"What is that?" Kavanagh's tone became suddenly impatient and even suspicious, and under pretense of settling his skull-cap on his head, he covered his eyes with his hand. "I never promised to tell you all my private affairs, however."

"Indeed, Sir, I should not be so impertinent as to inquire into them. But might I ask what sort of man is he whom they call 'Misther Maguire?'"

Kavanagh removed the hand from his face, and revealed an expression of great relief.

"Oh, Maguire!" answered he, gayly: "Yes, he is a strange fellow, and I do not wonder that he has excited your curiosity. Moreover, it is only right it should be satisfied, since it is likely he will be more or less mixed up with our own fortunes. Well, he was the son of a gentleman on a neighboring estate to that of my father, and who, like the bad boys of the story-books, ran away at an early age to sea. He led a very queer life, I fancy—what is called 'a checkered career,' which is mostly black, you know; though I don't believe there was ever much real harm in him. When he returned home, after a quarter of a century, he found matters worse than he had left them—his father 'evicted' by the mortgagees from what had once been his own property, and other unpleasantries, such as only occur in Ireland. Then he got mixed up in 'the troubles,' and had to flee the country and save his skin, poor fellow—like myself."

"Nay, Sir, not so; for it seems to me that he had nothing to lose and all to gain, whereas you had an estate at stake."

"I had at one time—yes," returned Kavanagh, thoughtfully. "There is something in what you say, perhaps, though we have no right to impute selfish motives. You do not like Mr. Maguire, it seems."

"I don't dislike him, Sir, personally, but I confess that—of late—he has seemed to me to be a dangerous man."

"Dangerous! why dangerous?" inquired Kavanagh, quickly.

"Well, Sir, I can't exactly say; but this man has great influence among our people, and if he chose to use it ill there might be great danger. I am certain, at all events, that that is the captain's opinion. You have been ill and confined to your cabin, so that you may not have observed it; but I notice that both he and the other officers of the ship go about armed."

"Armed! How long has that been the case?" inquired Kavanagh, with excitement, a deep flush suffusing his pale face.

"Since the day you came on deck in your real character."

"That is strange," muttered Kavanagh; "very strange. Is this a matter of general remark; do the boys know it?"

"I think not, Sir; they do not take much notice of any thing; but there is one man that knows it besides myself, unless I am much mistaken, and that is Maguire himself."

"Ah; then he should have told me. I mean," added Kavanagh, hastily, "he should have confessed that he had been guilty of a foolish indiscretion. There is no harm in him nor in my people, but there should be no ground for supposing harm. Keep your eyes open, Robert, for the future, and, above all things, your mouth shut. To talk of danger before some people is like putting a match to a fire-grate that is already laid. And now tell poor Dick that I am ready to see him. To-morrow, or the next day at furthest, I shall be well and about again. Good-day, lad, good-day."

CHAPTER XII.

THE VOLCANIC ISLAND.

THE interview was over, and clearly, as it seemed to Robert, hurried to a close by the tidings which he had just communicated. It was evident that Mr. Kavanagh had been unaware of the effect produced by his own appearance among his people, and yet when informed of it he had not expressed that disapprobation which might have been expected of him. He must surely have known more of Maguire also than he had chosen to reveal, and in that respect, as perhaps in others, he (Robert) was still, therefore, it seemed, only half trusted. On the other hand, his appointment, if it could be called such, of second in command to his patron was at least a proof of extreme favor, while to the fact that it was genuine, Murphy's own behavior abundantly testified.

Neither on the next day nor for many days afterward did Robert again see Mr. Kavanagh. That gentleman was once more reported ill, and remained in his berth, visited only by Murphy and Maguire. It would have doubtless been within the scope of Chesney's newly conferred authority to insist on being admitted to the sick man's cabin; but he took no advantage of this. The same wild cries for "Help!" the same half-suffocated sounds, were repeated as he had heard on the previous occasion, and something hinted to him that, whatever might be the nature of his patron's seizures, the presence of an unaccustomed witness like himself would not be welcome to him. The ship's surgeon had attended the patient in the first instance, but of late he had not done so, since, as he explained to Robert, the two men in question thoroughly understood the case, and were competent to deal with it. The ship was by this time advanced far across the Indian Ocean, and was within a few hundred miles of the western coast of Australia, and the emigrants, no longer influenced by Maguire (whom Kavanagh's illness seemed to have greatly sobered, and who was much engaged about the sick man's person), and excited by the prospect of a termination to their tedious voyage, passed much of their time on deck, looking out for the first glimpse of land. Thus Robert made a more intimate acquaintance than he had hitherto done, not only with those under his own charge, but with the rest of his fellow-passengers, and was much struck with the difference between them. The Tipperary boys, with their wives and families, gave but little thought to their future, appearing to leave that, with great contentedness, in the hands of their patron; while the others were never tired of speculating like children upon the new world they were so rapidly approaching, where potatoes grew without planting, and all were masters, and none servants. But just when they seemed to be on the point of realizing these brilliant visions, Fortune, which had hitherto so favored the voyage of the Star of Erin, turned dead against her: a furious gale sprang up from the northwest, and drove the ship, under bare poles, hundreds of miles out of her course, at a pace she had never achieved when in full sail. The hatches had to be battened down, and the unhappy tenants of the steerage were reduced to a condition even worse than that in which they had been plunged at first: to the horrors of seasickness were now added unspeakable terrors. In their dark and confined quarters, amidst the howling of the tempest and the straining of the ship's timbers, they looked for nothing less than death from dawn to night, from night to dawn. This continued for many days; and when the wind slackened and the ship became once more under control, she was pronounced by the captain to be a greater distance from the desired haven than she had been at the beginning of the gale. The sun, indeed, had once more reappeared; the sea, like some passionate domestic despot, who, having committed endless ravage in his wrath, is astonished, now that it is over, that any one should remember it, wore a thousand smiles; but the poor passengers, huddled together on deck, and heart-sick with hope deferred, refused to be comforted, and believed themselves doomed to wander over the watery waste forever. Curiously enough, the condition of Kavanagh had improved during the late commotion, and his first act, when circumstances permitted of an interchange of talk—which had been absolutely impossible during the gale—was to send for Robert, who, to his great surprise, found his patron up and dressed.

Hosted by Google

"Better, lad; yes, I am better," said he, in answer to his congratulations; "but this bout has given me a lesson. If I had died, it would have been heavy on my conscience—which, alas! has its weight to bear already—that I should have left my sheep, with a shepherd, indeed, but without the means of pasturing them. Murphy, it is true, is as honest as this blessed sunlight that at last is shining on us again; but with all the good-will in the world to serve me, he has no head for management of any kind. Here are three thousand pounds in English notes, of which you will take charge, taking care at the same time that nobody suspects you of being my banker except for current expenses. When occasion arises you will make disbursements on our common account and on that of my poor people, which I will audit from time to time. Then, if any thing should happen to me—I don't say I apprehend it, but I think it right to take precautions—I leave you my trustee and guardian in their interests: when you shall once have given them a fair start, the balance may be retained by yourself, or, what is better, given to your sweetheart, from one who never knew her, but who wishes her well, as her marriage-portion.—It is my own property, mah," cried Kavanagh, with sudden vehemence, and observing Robert to hesitate. "Do you suppose that I would give away what is not my own?"

"Indeed, Sir, I was not thinking that at all," answered Chesney, earnestly, "but only of your great kindness and generosity: most sincerely do I trust that you may long live to expend this money to greater advantage, doubtless, than I should use; but it is a very large sum; and though such confidence can not but be gratifying to me, the responsibility is great."

"Nay, nay, lad," said Kavanagh, reassuringly, "one can only do one's best, which I have no fear but that you will do; while as to the mere safety of the money, it will be more secure with you, since you will never be suspected of the possession of it, than with myself. I have had warnings that my life is at best a precarious one; and though I flatter myself, could I once escape from this cursed imprisonment, and set a free foot on land— What's that?"

A sudden turmoil had broken out on the deck above them; clappings of hands and shouts of joy were heard; and while they listened, the cabin door was flung open by Murphy, who rushed in, in a wild state of excitement, crying, "Land, land! Begorra, Mr. Frank, we're there!"

"It is impossible," answered Kavanagh, incredulously, rising from his seat, nevertheless, with an eager light in his eyes. "The captain told me only an hour ago that it would take us a week to make the coast."

"Sure the coast is ready-made, then, for there it is, not half a dozen miles away. I've been up the mast-head to look, and there it lies all green and glorious like Ould Ireland herself, with just a bit of hill like the Hill of Howth growing out of the middle of it."

"The man is drunk," said Kavanagh, contemptuously. "Give me your arm, Robert, and help me on deck, that I may see with my own eyes."

The joy and excitement in Murphy's face faded as suddenly out as when the slide is withdrawn from a magic lantern, and leaves the blank white sheet. "'Drunk,' am I?" muttered he, as he watched them go slowly out; "and 'give me your arm, Robert!' is it? Well, I obey you, Mr. Frank, and therefore obey him! but, Holy Moses! how I hate him!" On deck both passengers and crew had all assembled, and it was with some difficulty that Robert could make way for his companion through the crowd to where the captain stood talking to one of the officers of ship.

"What is it?" asked Kavanagh, eagerly. "What is this nonsense about land?"

"I know no more than yourself," answered the captain, coldly and ungraciously, as Robert thought, considering that he was addressing the most influential passenger on board his ship, and, moreover, a sick man. "That land it is, there is no doubt, as any glass will show you, but how it comes there is more than I can tell. It is not in the chart, that's certain; nor can it be the main-land, which lies more than five hundred miles to eastward."

Here a telescope was offered by some by-stander, and Kavanagh endeavored to adjust it, but, whether from excitement or the weakness arising from his late illness, his hand was so unsteady that he could make no use of it. "There, do you take it, Robert," said he, pettishly, "for I am too weak to hold it. Tell me what you see."

"It is land without doubt," answered Robert; and, indeed, to the naked eye, what had seemed a dark cloud resting on the eastward horizon was already assuming color and consistency; "and if an island, it is a large one—large but low, except for one green hill in the centre; but I see no trace of trees."

"If this was in the Chinese waters," observed the firm but quiet voice of Maguire, "I should be at no loss to tell you what it was."

"Neither should I, if I were nearing the Needles," answered the captain, contemptuously, "for then I should say it was the Isle of Wight."

"And that would be a very good guess for a home-voyager," answered Maguire, coolly. "A man need only have been as far as Palermo, however, to see an island that has come up out of the sea, and here, if I am not much mistaken, is one of the same kidney. Off the Philippines I have seen half a dozen of them."

"You know a deal more about sea-faring, Mr. Maguire, it seems to me, than when you first came on board," remarked the captain, significantly, and regarding the object of debate attentively through his glass; "and I don't mean to say that you mayn't be right as to this island. I've seen Nerita myself in the Mediterranean, which sprang up, as you say, in a single night; but this has grass upon it, and looks a well-established concern enough. I only hope it has got fresh-water, for we shall want it before many days are out."

"There is something shining like a silver thread," observed Robert, "and running down from the hill-side toward the sea: that must surely be a river."

Half an hour more resolved all doubts. The island in question, which had very deep water all about it (a circumstance that corroborated the idea that it was of volcanic origin), so that the ship could coast quite close to it, was of considerable dimensions. It was covered with such beautiful verdure as delighted and refreshed the sea-wearied eyes of all, and had at least two considerable streams of fresh-water, still more welcome to the captain's view. A little bay on its more remote shore—the eastern one—formed a natural harbor, and into this the ship was steered and anchored. To see the enfranchised emigrants rush on shore, some rolling like dogs or horses, for very joy, upon the shining sward, some running along the shore as though to convince themselves that they had at last the use of their legs, and all shouting with mirth, was like beholding a school on "breaking-up day." Kavanagh himself looked bright and hopeful, as Robert had never seen him since they had set sail. "Murphy," said he, "I spoke to you harshly and unjustly a while ago. Put that down to my ill health, not to ill will. Come, let us take our first walk upon dry land together. Do you think that you and Robert, between you, could pull me up yonder hill?"

"One's plenty, Mr. Frank, for a job like that," answered Murphy, eagerly: "just get astride upon my neck—so—that's well. There is not a mother yonder with a child in her arms that feels the burden as light as I do now." And before Robert could offer his assistance—which indeed he would have been loath to do, for Murphy's sake, who would certainly have deeply resented it—the faithful fellow had started for the hill with his master on his shoulders. Robert walked rapidly by their side—for no slow pace would have kept up with Murphy's giant strides—in readiness to give his aid should it be required; and in that order the three left the crowd and climbed the hill. Arrived at the top, Kavanagh descended from his human steed, who had showed no signs of weariness, and proceeded to survey this singular territory, his reconnaissance being supplemented by Robert's eyes, who used the glass. To the latter, accustomed to the thick foliage of the forest, the island looked bare and bald enough; but whatever its foundations might be composed of, the upper soil was evidently rich, and even at the elevation at which they stood, far from rocky or barren. Its whole extent could not be less than ten miles long by eleven broad.

"It is quite a little kingdom in itself," murmured Kavanagh, delightedly.

"Then why should you not reign over it, Masther Frank?" This rejoinder came from Murphy, and was a much more apt one than might have been expected from his lips; but it was characteristic of the man and of his relations with Kavanagh, that, whereas except for some gleams of humor which seemed themselves to be unconsciously uttered, he was for the most part dull and unready, it was often otherwise when speaking with reference to his patron's interests; his wits seemed sharpened by the anxiety he felt to further them; and though judgment was often wanting even then, readiness never failed him. The suggestion he now made, doubtless out of the abundance of his personal loyalty rather than with any serious idea of its being realized, seemed to strike Kavanagh amazingly.

"Reign over it!" exclaimed he, striking his palms together. "Why not? By Heaven! Dick, you have more wit than ten Maguires. Here is good soil, fresh-water, and room to increase and multiply. Why not establish our own colony here, where no flag flouts the breeze to remind us that we are still slaves as well as exiles?—Your judgment, Robert, is of the sober sort: what think you of the plan?"

"Well, Sir, we can't eat grass, nor can the women and children lie on the bare earth—"

"There is no need for either," interposed Kavanagh, enthusiastically. "We have provisions enough and to spare for months, as the captain told me. We have tents, too, and even houses that can be set up in a few hours. We have seeds in plenty, and agricultural implements of all sorts. I have money, too, far beyond what you imagine—for there was no need to tempt you with the knowledge of it, good lad, to follow my fortunes. Well, why should I not employ it to get all we want from the main-land—clothes, timber, cattle—"

"The whisky is getting low," suggested Murphy, delicately.

"Be serious, you omadawn.—Why not, Robert, I say, use Melbourne as our store-house, but in other respects be independent of the world? The prospect seems a dream—a golden dream; but why should it not be realized? Why should I not be king, as Murphy puts it, and you prime minister? Why shouldn't your Lizzy," he added, in Robert's ear, "come out and marry you? A parson shall be imported for the very purpose, look you—there's my hand on it—and after my death you shall be king yourself, and all your progeny princes and princesses. Think of it, man—think of it!"

The air and tone of the speaker were wild and excited beyond any thing that Robert had yet seen in him; but the theme itself seemed to excuse it. Strange and fanciful, indeed, it was, but by no means ill adapted to win the ear of youth; and, moreover, there was no doubt, whatever might be the final success of the scheme, that it could be at least inaugurated. To Robert, it is true, it lacked the attraction which it possessed for his patron in its restriction to his own people and dependents; but, on the other hand, here was a home assured for Lizzy and her kindred at the outset; while the idea of his wielding so large a personal influence in the new colony, both at present and in the future, was also, doubtless, not without its influence.

"Do you think your people would themselves be in favor of such a plan?" inquired Robert, doubtfully.

"Do I think! no; I am certain." And Murphy laughed a laugh that carried more conviction with it than even his master's words.

Robert himself, indeed, had little doubt that most if not all of Kavanagh's immediate followers would hail the plan with delight, and not at all the less so because of its romantic wildness; but still the natural prudence of his character, and his very knowledge that the temptation of Lizzy's immediate coming was having a greater weight with him than all other considerations, bade him pause.

"It matters not whether we prosper here or not," continued Kavanagh, persuasively. "I shall get the captain to sell me a boat or two—one, at least, large enough to accomplish the voyage to Melbourne, from which place we could send over for the rest. Then all could start afresh, as we had originally intended to do. But I feel certain we shall prosper here. The captain has already taken the bearings of the island, and pronounced on the harbor very favorably: if we ourselves should not colonize it, be sure that others would. You were saying but a while ago how gladly you would welcome your friends the Alstons in the New World; with how much greater pride can you now invite them to our own private territory! No money shall be spared by me to further your wishes as to their coming; and if the ship that brings them from England can not be induced to steer a few days out of her course, a vessel shall be hired to bring them out from Melbourne immediately upon their arrival. It is a romance, my lad, I grant, from first to last; but there is no reason why it should not be a Romance of Reality."

The enthusiasm of the speaker's tone, the brilliancy of the future he depicted, the brightness and gayety of the scene that lay stretched before them, combined together to sweep away Robert's last lingering doubts.

"So far as I can help you, Mr. Kavanagh," said he, impulsively, "my services are altogether at your disposal, whether here or elsewhere."

"That's well, and spoken like yourself," cried the other. "For the present, then, they will be elsewhere. You must go on in the Star to Melbourne, and purchase all things that we may require; then return to us as soon as may be."

"I will do my best, Sir," replied Robert, hesitatingly; "but you speak as though the affair was settled. There are your people to be spoken to, and the captain—"

"Leave the people to me," answered Kavanagh, smiling; and as for the captain, you may take my word for it he will be glad enough to get rid of us.—And now, Murphy, there is one thing more to be done. Two hours ago I doubted your word when you spoke of land in sight—I am now about to make you compensation. Do you happen to have a drop of whisky in you pocket?"

"Have I a drop of blood in my body, do you mean, Masther Frank!" replied Murphy, reproachfully, and producing from his coat a flask of the vintage of his native land.

Kavanagh placed it to his lips, and said, "I name this island Murphy's Island;" then took a deep draught.

"The honor is too much for the likes of me, Masther Frank," returned Dick; "I feel quite overcome by it, and must just take a sup myself.—Mr. Chesney, I drink your very good health, and a fair voyage to Melbourne." There was something cynical in Murphy's tone, which perhaps at any other time would have excited Robert's notice; but his mind was too full of the scheme he had just heard propounded, and the hopes or dreams which it had evoked, to pay any attention to so trifling a circumstance.

"Come, let us go down and clinch this matter," cried Kavanagh, impatiently; "for there is not an hour to lose." And they descended to the shore accordingly.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

USEFUL RECIPES.

TO DRESS A RUMP OF BEEF BOUILLI FASHION.—Take the bone out of a rump of beef, wash it, and then pour a gill of vinegar over it. Dredge it well with flour, and put it in a pot large enough to turn conveniently; pour over it three pints of water; then put the pot over the fire until it boils. Prepare and cut small pieces of cabbages, carrots, potatoes, and turnips, nearly a half-pint bowlful of each, which you may add to the beef; also two onions, sliced, and a sprig of sweet-marjoram. Season all with two table-spoonfuls of salt, and nearly one of pepper. When the pot has come to a full boil, it may be set over coals on the hearth, closely covered. It should be kept stewing constantly but slowly at least five hours. As there will not be liquor enough to cover the beef, it should be frequently turned over in the pot. Pickled capers, or cucumbers cut in small pieces, are a great improvement to the sauce.

PUMPKIN PUDDING.—One quart of pumpkin after it is stewed and mashed fine through a sieve, one pint of rich cream, six spoonfuls of chopped beef suet, or a quarter of a pound of butter, and eight table-spoonfuls of sugar, four eggs, a wine-glassful of wine, and half that quantity of brandy, half a nutmeg, and a dessert-spoonful of ground ginger. This recipe will do for potato pudding, Irish or sweet; if sweet, less sugar is required. Line pie-plates with pastry rolled thin at bottom, and ornament the top with twisted strips laid crosswise.

FRENCH FRITTERS.—One quart of milk; boil half of it; mix the other half cold with one quart of flour. With this last thicken the boiling milk, and let all cook together till well done. While cooling, beat ten eggs light. Add a tea-spoonful of salt. Beat the eggs into the batter, adding a spoonful at a time until all is in. Have a small oven half full of boiling lard. This will require at least a pound. Allow not quite a spoonful of the batter to a fritter. Take them out before they turn dark, put them in a drainer bowl, in order that they may be well drained from the lard. Begin to fry them before your meat dinner is sent to table.

FRITTERS (another way).—One quart of flour, with two eggs, or four if convenient; one tea-spoonful of soda stirred into one quart of buttermilk. Drop from a spoon into boiling lard. Drain well. Serve with wine and sugar, West India sirup, or French sauce, for which see Harper's Bazar, No. 10, Vol. V.

GRATED CHEESE.—A fine appetizer is furnished by simply grating up the rind of any nice cheese. Eat it with butter crackers or thin biscuit.

LEMON PUDDING.—The peels of two large fresh lemons grated on sugar, or boiled and beat in a mortar; half a pound of sugar; the juice of a large lemon; half a pound of butter; ten eggs, half the whites left out. Beat all well together, and after lining your dish or plates with puff paste, bake. Sift over the top finely powdered sugar just before you send to table.

MACARONI MILANESE.—Throw your macaroni into boiling water, allowing it plenty of room for swelling. Add some salt, and let it be well covered with water. Let it boil for twenty-five minutes; drain it in a colander; then put it in a deep earthenware baking-dish in successive layers of macaroni and grated cheese. A little Cayenne pepper greatly improves the flavor also. Lay on the top slices of fresh butter, a quarter of a pound being enough for a large dishful. Pour over it enough unskimmed morning's milk to cover the whole, and bake in a regularly heated oven for fifteen or twenty minutes. Serve up quickly, and do not let it become dry by exposure to too intense a heat. Be careful in purchasing macaroni to get the genuine Italian article. The American imitation can not be made into a very nice dish—at least none that I have ever seen.

COCOA-NUT BALLS.—One and a half pounds of sugar, one pint of water, one tumblerful of cocoa-nut milk. Boil it until it candies. Stir into it a good-sized cocoa-nut, grated. When cold enough, make into balls.

APPLE PUDDING.—Take ten eggs. Leave out half of the whites. A pint of apples stewed and passed through a sieve, half a pound of butter, the rind of two lemons, and the juice of one. Sweeten it as you please, and bake in pastry. This quantity will fill two deep pie-plates.

GOOD MOLASSES PUDDINGS.—To one pint of molasses, measured after it has been stewed until very thick, add a heaping table-spoonful of butter and four lightly beaten eggs, the whites and yolks whisked up separately. Flavor highly with the rind and juice of lemons, or in default of these, season with cloves or nutmeg. Bake in pie-plates lined with pastry, plain or rich as preferred.

TO SPICE A ROUND OF BEEF.—One ounce of powdered Cayenne-pepper, half an ounce of cloves, half an ounce of allspice, and two nutmegs. Rub into your beef first an ounce of saltpetre, then a cupful of sugar, and two handfuls of salt. Break up the spices fine, and add them, laying the round in a large bowl or other covered vessel tight enough to hold the brine that will be forming. Turn the beef every morning, rubbing the spices in with the hand. It may be cooked in a fortnight, or left for six weeks. Stew in a pot, with beef suet strewed fine over it. Add some beef gravy, or a quart of water and a bottle of port-wine or claret. It must be done slowly, taking care to keep in the steam. It will require three or four hours, perhaps five, according to the size. Cook it also in the pickle drawn from the beef, adding three or four gallons of boiling water. Take care that it does not touch the vessel it is boiled in. If you choose you may tie it in a cloth, or wrap it in a coarse paste made for the purpose. A large round often keeps until too hard and dry to use; it is better than ever then for a relish if grated up fine, and is especially nice for tea.

Hosted by Google

Ladies' Coiffures, Figs. 1–4.

Fig. 1.—The front hair for this coiffure is combed up partly over crêpes and partly smooth, and covers the beginning of a braid which extends from the temples and falls low in the neck. The remaining hair is crimped, and partly arranged in puffs; the ends form short curls in the back.

Fig. 2.—The upper part of the front hair is waved, and is first combed on the forehead and then upward. The side hair is all combed up. All of the remaining hair is arranged in puffs of different sizes over crêpes.

Fig. 1.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

Fig. 3.—LADY'S COIFFURE. FRONT.—[See Fig. 4.]

Fig. 2.—LADY'S COIFFURE.

Fig. 4.—LADY'S COIFFURE.—BACK. [See Fig. 3.]

Figs. 3 and 4.—For this coiffure, of which Fig. 3 shows the front, and Fig. 4 the back, the front hair is partly arranged in short curls fastened by pearl combs, and partly combed up over a crêpe. The puffed back hair covers the beginning of two braids, which are wound around the crown, and which complete the coiffure. The back hair ends in curls of different lengths underneath the back braid.

Needle-work and Tatted Edging for Curtains, Covers, etc.

See illustration on page 149.

THIS edging is suitable for trimming curtains, window-shades, covers, etc.; it consists of separate rosettes, worked with twisted cotton, No. 100, which are joined on the under edge with a tatted round, and button-hole stitched on a piece of embroidered Swiss muslin. Begin each rosette in the middle, and work 6 rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 ring of 1 ds. (double stitch), 8 p. (picot) separated each by 2 ds., 1 ds.; tie the ends of the thread together and cut them off. 2d round.—This round is worked alternately with one and with two threads; the rings are always worked with one (the foundation thread), and the scallops with both threads. ∗ 1 ring of 6 ds., fasten to the next p. of the preceding round, 6 ds.; t. (turn the work), 1 scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; repeat from ∗. The 3d round consists of 8 figures; for each figure work 3 rings, consisting each of 3 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 3 ds. In working the middle ring of each figure, instead of forming the middle p., fasten to the next p. of a scallop in the preceding round. 4th round (with two threads).—Fasten both threads to a p. of a figure in the preceding round, as shown by the illustration, ∗ 1 scallop of 2 ds., 5 p. separated each by 2 ds., 2 ds., fasten to a p. of the preceding round as shown by the illustration. 5th round.—After a thread interval of a quarter of an inch each always work 1 ring of 3 ds., fasten to a p. of the preceding round as shown by the illustration, 3 ds. 6th round.—After a thread interval of half an inch always work 1 ring of 4 ds., fasten to the next joining thread of two rings in the preceding round, 4 ds. Having in this manner worked the requisite number of rosettes, join them on the outer edge with a round worked as shown by the illustration, and consisting of rings and scallops, and then button-hole stitch them on the embroidered Swiss muslin as shown by the illustration. Instead of working the embroidery shown by the illustration, any desirable needle-work border may be applied on the Swiss muslin.

Fig. 1.—FROCK FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 29–33.

FROCK FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 7–13.

FROCK FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 25–28.

Fig. 2.—FROCK FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 29–33.

Key-Basket with Point Russe Embroidery.

See illustration on page 149.

THIS key-basket, which is curved on the upper edge, is made of fine yellow straw plaiting, and is three inches and three-quarters high at the pointed ends, and two inches and a half high in the middle underneath the handle. The outside of the basket is ornamented with a scalloped lambrequin of light fawn-colored cloth, on which is fastened black guipure lace somewhat narrower, as shown by the illustration, with point Russe embroidery of blue saddler's silk. Instead of black, white or écru guipure lace may be used to trim the lambrequin. The hollows between the scallops are ornamented with blue silk tassels. The ends of the basket are covered above the lambrequins to the point with pleated blue satin, and are trimmed with a ruche of blue satin ribbon pleated in leaf-shape. A box-pleated ruche of similar ribbon trims the upper edge of the basket on the inside. Bows and ends of blue ribbon arranged on each side of the handles and on the ends of the basket, as shown by the illustration, complete the trimming.

Fig. 1.—TULLE, BLONDE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON BRETELLE-FICHU.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 18–20.

Fig. 2.—TULLE, BLONDE, AND GROS GRAIN RIBBON BRETELLE-FICHU.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 18–20.

Hosted by Google

Jewel-Case with Gold Embroidery.

See illustration on page 149.

THIS jewel-case is made of card-board covered with velvet, ornamented in gold embroidery, and is set into a frame of turned and bronzed wooden bars. The case, including the frame, is sixteen inches long, eight inches and a half high, and six inches and a half wide. The embroidery, consisting of the initial on the lid and narrow borders on the front and sides, is worked with gold bullion, gold cord, and gold thread in satin and half-polka stitch. The inside of the case is divided into halves, each half is furnished with three movable boxes of card-board lined with white silk for holding the jewelry.

Boys' and Girls' Fancy Costumes, Figs. 1–8.

Fig. 1.—PAGE'S COSTUME. The square-necked waist and short pleated skirt of this costume are made of dark blue satin, trimmed with inlaid silver braid. High blouse with long sleeves of pleated white silk. Blue satin beret, trimmed with silver braid and a white feather.

Fig. 2.—ANCIENT GERMAN BARONESS'S COSTUME. Maize gros grain dress with low-necked basque-waist, trimmed with silk fringe of a darker shade and with velvet ribbon set on in points. Sash and bows of gros grain ribbon of the color of the fringe. The sleeve puffs are made of white satin. White crape chemise Russe. High comb of gilt bronze.

Fig. 3.—ITALIAN GIRL'S COSTUME. Skirt and over dress of dark blue serge; the former is trimmed with a strip of black velvet, and the latter with gold braid. Peasant waist of red cashmere, trimmed with black velvet ribbon and gold embroidery. Light foulard apron. Half-high chemise of white batiste. Fine linen kerchief, and jeweled hair-pins in the hair.

Fig. 4.—CAVALIER'S COSTUME. The trowsers and doublet are made of brown velvet; the trowsers are gathered at the bottom and trimmed with brown satin bows. The doublet is trimmed with silver braid. Wide collar of embroidered linen. White silk stockings and brown satin shoes with buckles.

Fig. 5.—CLOWN'S COSTUME. The trowsers and frock of this costume are made of white shirting, and are trimmed with large buttons. Batiste frill for the neck. High white hat, wound with red ribbon.

Fig. 6.—WAITING-MAID'S COSTUME. Skirt of gray and blue striped cashmere; over-skirt and square-necked basque-waist of gray cashmere, trimmed with blue silk. Apron, under-sleeves, chemise Russe, and cap of embroidered white Swiss muslin.

Fig. 7.—RENAISSANCE COSTUME. White satin under dress, with white lace flounces and pink satin ruches. Pink silk damask over dress, trimmed with pleated strips of pink satin. White lace under-sleeves. Wreath of roses in the hair.

Fig. 8.—GERMAN PEASANT GIRL'S COSTUME. The skirt and

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED CASHMERE HOUSE JACKET.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 3–6.

CASHMERE, GUIPURE INSERTION, AND LACE TALMA.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED CASHMERE HOUSE JACKET.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 3–6.

Fig. 1.—PAGE. Fig. 2.—ANCIENT GERMAN BARONESS. Fig. 3.—ITALIAN GIRL. Fig. 4.—CAVALIER. Fig. 5.—CLOWN. Fig. 6.—WAITING-MAID. Fig. 7.—LADY OF THE RENAISSANCE. Fig. 8.—PEASANT GIRL.

FIGS. 1–8.—BOYS' AND GIRLS' FANCY COSTUMES.

Hosted by Google

sleeveless waist are made of blue woolen material; the waist is furnished with a bosom of red cashmere edged with gold buttons and laced with gold braid. The skirt is trimmed with black velvet ribbon and gold braid. Batiste chemisette with long sleeves, red and white striped percale apron fastened by a metal chain. Straw round hat trimmed with a wreath of wild flowers.

DOROTHY.

A REVERIE SUGGESTED BY THE NAME UPON A PANE.

SHE, then, must once have looked, as I
Look now, across the level rye,
Past church and manor-house, and seen,
As now I see, the village green,
The bridge, and Walton's River—she
Whose old-world name was Dorothy.

The swallows must have twittered, too,
Above her head; the roses blew
Below, no doubt—and, sure, the south
Crept up the wall and kissed her mouth—
That wistful mouth, which comes to me
Linked with her name of Dorothy.

What was she like? I picture her
Unmeet for uncouth worshiper—
Soft, pensive—far too subtly strung
To suit the sour bucolic tongue,
Whose thwarted prying could but see
"Ma'am Fine-airs" in Miss Dorothy.

How not? She liked, maybe, perfume,
Soft textures, lace, a half-lit room;
Perchance too candidly preferred
Clarissa to a gossip's word;
And, for the rest, would seem to be
Or dull or proud—this Dorothy.

Poor child—with heart the down-lined nest
Of warmest instincts unconfessed—
Soft, callow things that vaguely felt
The breeze caress, the sunlight melt,
But yet, by some obscure decree
Unwinged from birth—poor Dorothy!

Not less I dream her mute desire
To acred churl and booby squire,
Now pale, with timorous eyes that filled
At "twice-told tales" of foxes killed;
Now trembling when slow tongues grew free
'Twixt love and port—poor Dorothy!

'Twas then she'd seek this nook, and find
Its evening landscape balmy-kind;
And here, where still her gentle name
Lives on the old green glass, would frame
Fond dreams of half-heard harmony
'Twixt heart and heart. Poor Dorothy!

L'ENVOI.

These last I spoke. Then Florence said,
Behind me, "Dreams! delusions, Fred!
How strange it is you bards must go
So far to find a subject, though!
Are there no people living, pray,
Fit for a rhymer's holiday?—
Besides, you make mistakes, you see:
'Twas I who wrote that 'Dorothy.'"

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The dead Emperor.—Baron Grant.—"Jane."—The Burial of Bulwer.

"SO the Emperor is dead!" was the universal speech when men met one another on that day of the sad news from Chiselhurst. "The Emperor is dead!" yet though he has left an heir, few add, even in France, as was the custom under the old monarchy, "Long live the Emperor!" Here, in England, indeed, it is not as the head of a dynasty that the dead man is now regarded, so much as a partaker to the full in the sufferings of our common humanity. What physical wretchedness must that pale, proud man have endured in silence for so many years! what agonies in addition to his mental ones, on that day at Sedan, when he beheld France lost, and sat on his horse, "holding on with his hands, in torment," for five mortal hours! Well may he have offered his life "with eagerness" to the Prussian bullets there, and better for his memory had one of them reached his heart. Curiously enough, Camden House, Chiselhurst, had a fatal notoriety sixty years ago, when its inmates had also cause to send for the first surgeon in London. The master and mistress of the house were murdered by their footman, though when the maid-servant entered their apartment in the morning her mistress was still alive. A messenger was dispatched post-haste for Mr. Astley Cooper, who failed, however, to save the patient, as another generation of surgeons have failed now.

As a man, the Emperor is much regretted, for his personal friends are numerous, and he was one who stuck to his friends; but as an ex-ruler, this lessening by one of the many pretenders to the government of unhappy France is here not much deplored.

Of course our national snobbism takes this opportunity to display itself very notably. It is well enough for the court to go into mourning for ten days, but it is very absurd for Mrs. Jenkyns to put off her dinner-party for the 15th on account of the imperial funeral. Yet many of our Mrs. Jenkynses have done so. When the late Emperor of Russia died, we knew a lady who did not, indeed, put off her dinner, but who had it served in the old English fashion, with the various dishes on the table. She thought that not dining à la Russe, as usual, would be a delicate piece of respect to the Czar!

Your Mr. Edwin James, and ours, has appealed to the Common-Law Judges to reverse the decision of the benchers of the Temple, who in 1861 struck his name off the books of their society and canceled his call to the bar. He declares that only the want of funds during his twelve years' residence in the States of New York and New Jersey has hitherto prevented his making this application. If the matter is gone into, we shall hear some curious disclosures respecting this gentleman and his transactions with the present Lord Yarborough.

There is rather a good epigram going about concerning Mr. Albert Grant, our great city speculator, whose detractors, who are many, would probably describe as such without the s. He has been recently made a baron—Heaven knows by whom or where!—and calls himself Baron Grant, which has provoked the following:

"A title a king may give,
Honor he can't;
And a title without honor
Is but a Baron Grant."

A pretty love-story comes from Freshwater, where Tennyson lives, and which has an appropriate poetic touch about it. At the same spot dwells Mrs. Cameron, the most artistic photographist in England, and whose works are both pictures and studies. A gentleman called one day upon her, and, with an apology for the intrusion, requested to know the address of the original of one of her photographs—a very noble-looking young lady. It might be foolish, he said, but he had fallen in love with that pictorial presentment as completely as ever did Pygmalion with his statue. Having satisfied his hostess of his respectability and good intentions, she smiled and rang the bell.

"Send Jane," said she.

Jane was one of her domestics, and appeared accordingly: she was also the original of the picture. Mrs. Cameron is famous for the idealization of her works, yet the gentleman was so satisfied with "Jane" as she was in the flesh that he became none the less her wooer—nay, her winner also, for, as may be supposed, the photographed one did not turn out "a negative."

On Saturday last Lord Lytton was buried in Westminster Abbey, not, however, in "Poet's Corner," where lie his brethren of the pen, but in the neighboring St. Edmund's Chapel, next to the grave of Humphrey Bouchier, an ancestor of his own, who fell in 1471 at the battle of Barnet, and whose story he tells in the Last of the Barons. The funeral was numerously attended, though it could not be expected that the tribute of a people's love would be paid to him as it was to Dickens. It seems Lord Lytton suffered from a discharge of the ear (probably in consequence of some diseased bone), just as the former did from a malady in his foot. He had a nervous fear of being buried alive, and left directions behind him that after death, or presumed death, his body should be allowed to remain for three days untouched, after which medical men were to ascertain that he was really dead, and certify accordingly. Like the three novelists who have preceded him by but so short a space into the land of shadows—Thackeray, Dickens, and Lever—he may have been said to have died in harness. Fortunately for his readers, the MS. of Kenelm Chillingley, his last fiction, is said to be complete, and only the sprightly Parisians (now appearing in Blackwood's Magazine) remains unfinished. So diligent and active a worker could, indeed, scarcely have died at any time without leaving some "broken column," some beginning of a new fancy, which no other hand may attempt to consummate. The disclosure that the author of the Coming Race was the same with that of Pelham and the Caxtons has taken all the literary world by surprise, and certainly adds greatly to the marvel of Bulwer's many-sided mind. If I were to hear that he had written the Letters of an Englishman in the Times (a modern puzzle that may rank with that of Junius), or the Vestiges of Creation, the information would scarcely now astonish me.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

MOTHER RUE'S CASHMERE SHAWL.

"BLESS your soul! how air ye, Miss Sovereign?" said a bent, wizened old woman, accosting a lady who was giving some orders in a store. "I should hev knowed ye if I'd met you in the New Jerusalem: you ain't a day older'n you wus a dozen year ago." The old woman wore a rusty alpaca, and a tattered woolen shawl that did service at the same time for a bonnet.

"I really—I beg your pardon," murmured Mrs. Sovereign, smiling apologetically upon the poor old face, and trying to bring to mind all the old women she had ever met. "Is it Mrs. Rue?"

"Bless your eyes! I knew you wouldn't forget an old neighbor—when I made your wedding-cake, too! Now there's many a fine lady like you would hev jest made as if she'd never sot eyes on sich a shabby old body as me; but you never wus proud. Lor sakes! I wish I hed my teeth in! I jest thought of it. I'd 'a put 'em in if I'd knowed I wus going fur ter see you; but, ye see, I thought there'd be nobody here ter take a grain of notice of me. That's jest the way—go without a thing, and you're sure ter wish ye hed it; keep on your old gown, and company's certain ter call!"

"You've grown into a philosopher since we met," said Mrs. Sovereign.

"Like as not," answered Mrs. Rue, whose notions of philosophy were rather hazy. "But, you see, I wus allus one of them folks as set a sight by appearances—more's the pity! And the teeth, I got 'em by way of a slant; and somehow or other when I don't hev 'em in, the roof of my mouth seems ter go clear up ter the top my head. You see, there wus a young fellow as wus a dentist—a sort of peddling dentist—and he wus took down with the small-pox, and nobody ter look after him but them as wus scared ter death of it; but as it wa'n't no great account ter me noway, and I couldn't be much worse off in t'other place, if I died of it, than with 'Liza Ann, why, I jest up and nursed him clean through with it; and when he got well, says he,

"'What shall I do fur you fur all you've done in my behalf?' And says I,

"'Nothing whatsomever. I wus only curious to know if I'd be liable to the disease.'

"'Nonsense,' says he; 'I want ter pay you in some way.' And as he wusn't forehanded, and I knowed how ter feel fur them as wasn't, and as it wus all in his line, I said,

"'Well, if you're bent on it, make me a set of teeth.' And I'm awful sorry I ain't got 'em in."

"Indeed you deserved them," returned Mrs. Sovereign. "But don't concern yourself about it; I shouldn't know that you were without them if you had not told me."

"Oh yes, you would, begging your pardon, if you wus onst ter see them in."

"You are dropping a piece of steak from your paper," observed Mrs. Sovereign.

"Lor! I wouldn't mind losing the whole of it, I'm that glad at seeing you, only 'Liza Ann would raise sich a rumpus; she wouldn't take no excuses; and it couldn't be made up ter her noway! I s'pose she's a-scolding now, 'cause I ain't at home frying this 'ere; but I left the table all sot, and the water a-biling fur the tea."

"And who is 'Liza Ann?"

"Goodness! I thought every body knew 'Liza Ann—leastways, she thinks they do. Why, she's my Tom's widder; an' he left word on his dying-bed that she wus ter pervide fur me as long as I lived, an' sometimes I think she's a-trying ter see how soon she can git rid of me."

"And do you still live in Joy's Court?" pursued Mrs. Sovereign.

"Sakes alive! didn't you know that we'd left that there these ten year? I s'posed that wus town talk. I wish ter goodness I hed my teeth in, and I'd walk along with you a bit, ter hev a little chat, and not keep you a-waiting."

"Oh, never mind your teeth." Another woman might have hinted that she had her tongue left.

"Now that's downright Christian in you. I take it, 'Liza Ann herself wouldn't be seen outdoors with me in this old gown; and it wa'n't but yesterday as I met Miss Deacon Merit, and stopped ter ask after the deacon's numbpalsy, and she jest makes as though she wusn't looking my way, and walks straight on. I tell ye what, Miss Sovereign, if ye want ter find out the natur' of folks, what virtues they're made of, and what air hung onto 'em like their clothes, jest lose your worldly prosperity and your good looks, and wear out your store clothes. But that Cashmere shawl is ter blame fur it all—plague take it!"

"What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Sovereign.

"Oh, like as not you never see me wear it. I never hed it on my back more'n twice. I felt as if I wus carrying of Christian's burden every time I put it on. 'Liza Ann don't know I've got it—she'd take it away if she did. I keeps it sewed up in a towel in my straw bed—there wa'n't nowhere else out of the way of 'Liza Ann's prying eyes. I can't bear the sight of that shawl: it makes my eyes smart ter look at it, and the tears jest come of their own accord. Sometimes I've bin half a mind ter sell it; but, sakes alive! you can't never git the vally of a thing like that!"

"And how much did you give for it?" asked her listener.

"A hunderd dollars!—silver ones! It blisters my tongue ter tell it! A hunderd dollars, if I'm a sinner; and I've wore it twice, and hed more wretchedness out of it than there air threads wove into it!"

"Oh! oh!" sighed Mrs. Sovereign, wondering if her companion was in her right mind.

"Yes, I hev. Sometimes I've thought if I could git a hunderd dollars fur it agin—though, of course, I couldn't—it would be jest enough ter take me into the Old Ladies' Home—that's one of my castles in the air—so't I'd be out of 'Liza Ann's reach. I've thought maybe the grave couldn't be so bad if 'Liza Ann wusn't there too!"

"Dear, dear! But you were telling me about the shawl?"

"Lor, yes! I've got a habit of wandering onto me like my old grandmother. She'd begin a-telling how the children got the measles, and she'd let ye into the private history of half the family by the way, and wind up, like as not, with a fortin somebody wus expecting from Angland. Wa'al, I dunno as you remember the widder Niles's son that went a-voyaging ter the world's end? They do say how that he wus rich as Croysus, but she never got no more'n his cheest after he wus lost overboard. You see, she wus expecting of him home, and his cheest came instead. Wa'al, Miss Niles, she didn't so much as open it fur six months; and then she found this 'ere shawl in it, which I s'pose he wus a-bringing home ter her. I sometimes wish she never hed opened it! Howsomever, the minute I clapped my eyes on the shawl I wus covetous of it, and I never rested till I got it. I thought it wus the most beautifulest thing I'd ever sot eyes on. It looked as if it wus all wove of rubies and precious stones, and it wus most all border, saving a bit of scarlet about as big as a bandana handkerchief! Now, you see, I'd never owned a shawl but this 'ere robroy that I've got on; and though it wa'n't so nigh used up as it is now, it hed lost considerable of its bloom; and so, one day, when Miss Niles dropped in, and said she hedn't no heart fur nothing sence James's death, and she shouldn't never wear nothing but black clothes the rest of her life, and how her only desire now wus ter go out ter Indy fur a missionary, and if she could only raise a hunderd dollars on that Cashmere shawl, 'twould help pay her way, and after that the Board would take care of her, it seemed a sort of a pious duty ter help her out, if she felt a call. Leastways, it wus one of the biggest temptations that ever beset a poor vain mortal. We wus a-buying back the house in Joy's Court at that time—fur, ye see, my husband's name hed bin on Mr. Grew's paper, and what did he do but up and fail, and obleege us ter mortgage the house! Wa'al, I said it then, and I say it now, that it ain't proper fur a man ter put his name ter another man's paper, and leave his family out in the cold—not that I blames John half so much as myself, fur he did it jest ter obleege, and I bought the shawl only ter please myself! We wus trying ter git enough tergither, you understand, ter pay off the mortgage, and some years we couldn't do no better than ter pay the interest. I worked amazing hard. I took old Miss Lamson ter board—and a heap of trouble she wus, poor soul, with her rheumatics and ticdoloreux; and she hed ter hev skeleton jelly made for her, and lastly she hed ter be fed; and it wa'n't no fool of a job—she wus a powerful eater! But I never give her a hasty word, nor a wry look; and I treated her as handsome as if she'd 'a bin my own mother, or the fust lady in the land. You see, the town paid fur her board—and a migthy small one it wus, but it helped; and after she'd gone home I hed more time, and I took in needle-work, and I'd raked and scraped a hunderd and some odd dollars tergither—my John he'd bin laid up with rheumatic fever, and hedn't got nothing aforehand that year—and I wus going ter pay it down that very next Monday, when Miss Niles and the shawl they come in a Saturday!

"I hed a great struggle with myself fust. It kep' me a-turning and twisting all night a-making up of my mind. I hankered after that shawl like all possessed, till it seemed as if I couldn't be happy without it noway, though all the while I knowed I'd no business with any thing so grand. But all the neighbors hed hed new shawls that fall, even Miss Grew—lor! they rides in their carriage ter-day, and goes about cracking in their silks, as if failing and bringing honest folks inter poverty wa'n't a crying sin!—and I thought ter myself how this one would be crazy with envy when she saw me sail out in my new Cashmere, and the other one and her Bay State would be cast inter the shade. So, without onst thinking that I hedn't nothing, like gowns and fixings, ter correspond, I jest paid Miss Niles the money, and carried my shawl up stairs. Wa'al, she wa'n't no sooner out of the house than I'd give a farm not ter hev bought it; but I wus too proud ter call her back, and I've allus hed her heavy on my mind, as well as the shawl; for, you know, she wus lost a-going ter Indy, and I somehow felt sort of responsible—seeing, too, as she wus the last of her family. Wa'al, John he didn't know I hed the hunderd dollars—I'd kep' it fur a surprise—and now I couldn't make up my mind ter tell him about the shawl. So when it came Sunday I put it on with my old delaine, and my rough-and-ready straw bonnet, and sneaked down the back stairs ter meeting without saying a word ter him—he hedn't got able ter be out himself—and I felt so horrid mean about it that when Miss Jenkins said, 'What a splendid new shawl you're a-wearing of!' it didn't give me the leastest quiver of pleasure as ever wus; nor when Miss Grimalkin said, 'It really don't seem worth while ter hev such a dressy shawl ter wear about here, where there's nobody ter see—now, does it?' nor when Miss Little declared, 'There wasn't nothing like a shawl ter cover up your old gowns, and make ye look respectable!' though I knew it wus all spite and jealousy that made their words stinging. I've come ter think I'd rither hev my neighbors good-natured than envious as I git along in years. I wa'n't half so comfortable in my Cashmere as I'd bin in the old robroy; and after I wore it twice I took sich a disliking ter it that I jest hid it away, and went back ter the robroy. But I allus felt as if the Cashmere hed crippled us. Ye see, we allus has ter pay fur our luxuries, even after we've got tired of 'em. Money wus harder ter git after that, or perhaps I'd misused my opportunity and didn't desarve another. Howsomever, Mr. Doubleday, who held the mortgage, died, and his son foreclosed, and turned us out o' house and home! After that there wusn't much ter hinder us from going down hill pretty lively. John he lost courage, and wus gitting weakly; the children died one after another, except Tom, and 'Liza Ann she worrited the life out of him in time; and so here I am, an old woman, with naught in the world but a set of teeth and that there Cashmere shawl. You see, if I hed paid the money onto the mortgage, it would hev give John a lift, and put some spirit inter him—fur work never seems so light as when you're gitting ahead—and then maybe I shouldn't hev hed retribution a-follering of me round all my days in the shape of 'Liza Ann a-twitting me of being a burden and a millstone around the neck of she and the children; though, goodness knows, I slave well fur all I git—what with being up at five o' mornings, making pies, and frying of griddle-cakes, and standing at the wash-tub, till my feet were that numb they wouldn't bear me! But it ain't no use. You may do ninety-nine things fur some folks, and if you don't do the hundredth, ye might as well let it all alone; and 'Liza Ann's one on 'em; though I don't want ter be complaining, only a pot must bile over onst in a while, onless the fire goes out; and you're an old friend, so't I've made free ter tell ye about the shawl. A body must speak now and agin about what's worrying 'em, and there's no sympathy in 'Liza Ann more'n a tommyhawk!"

"And did you never speak to your husband about the shawl?" asked Mrs. Sovereign.

"Bless you, yes; and he said as how it wouldn't hev made no difference noway: Doubleday'd hev foreclosed, and the house and money'd hev gone together. He wus allus that consoling, John wus. But I've thought if any body could feel as how the shawl wus worth a hunderd dollars or less, it might, as I said, pay my way inter the Old Ladies' Home, out of 'Liza Ann's reach, for I'm sot agin being a burden or a millstone ter any body."

Hosted by Google

"I should like to see the shawl," said her friend; "if you will bring it to my mother's house to-morrow, I will see what can be done."

"I'll come, rain or shine. I've bothered you with an awful long yarn, but if it wa'n't fur 'Liza Ann—gracious! there she is at the door now, a-looking fur me, and a whole thunder-storm in her face! Good-day, and thanks!" and the little old woman hobbled off, up a muddy lane.

True to her word, Mrs. Rue appeared next day with the shawl.

"It is as good as new," she said, unfolding it.

"Quite," returned Mrs. Sovereign, exchanging glances with her mother. "It's a pity that you couldn't have sold it before, and had the money at interest all this time!"

"'Liza Ann wouldn't hev heered ter its staying there!"

"But how much do you think it is worth?" asked Mrs. Sovereign, with an amused smile.

"Lor sakes! if I could git twenty-five dollars, I should thank my born stars!"

"Well, I was looking at shawls of this kind in New York last week, and the price was—two thousand dollars!"

"Now don't! you're jest a-joking of me! Who ever heerd tell of a Cashmere shawl costing sich a power of money!"

"It's a very good joke, isn't it? But it's true, all the same. You see, it's an India Cashmere: you thought it was French, I suppose: so perhaps did Mrs. Niles. But as she set her own price, and has left no heirs, there will be no trouble. My husband is going to give me an India shawl. If you are willing, I will take this, and pay you two thousand dollars!"

"My!" cried the poor woman, with tears in her eyes. "It's the fust time I've wished John alive agin in this 'ere world of worlds! If he only knew! Miss Sovereign, the Lord must hev sent you a-purpose ter take me out of 'Liza Ann's reach! I don't hev no need ter be under obligation ter the Old Ladies' Home neither, fur I can hire a room, and keep house all ter myself, and hev folks ter tea sociable; and what's more, I shall hev something ter leave the children, ter pay 'em fur being a burden and a millstone 'bout their necks! I wish my John wus here ter thank you!"

A SEASONABLE CONTRAST.

See illustration on page 156.

THIS timely picture will be appreciated by many who have made the experience their own during this severest of winters. In the first scene we see the benighted traveler battling with the snowy blasts, and leading his horse through the trackless paths in the endeavor to find his way. In the second scene he has reached his home, and having thrown aside his wrappings and incased his feet in slippers, is warming his hands over the cheerful blaze, while his wife stands over him, tenderly asking about the perils through which he has passed, and shuddering at the tale of his journey amidst the storm. And it is so easy to forget a dreary past in a bright present that the cheerless ride doubtless seems already a thing of the distant past, almost effaced by the loving welcome that awaited him at home.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

IT can not be denied that long dresses are gaining ground, and that during the coming season they will dispute the fashion with suits; but I think that a combination of the two, uniting the most desirable features of each, will find favor with the majority of women. To make myself better understood I will sum up in a few words the characteristics of the two styles. Every one knows that a suit is composed of a skirt and polonaise, or else of a skirt, over-skirt, and waist with or without basques. The present long dress, which is less common, is also less known. Its length behind is almost unmeasured: it must be long enough, indeed, to form a pouf at the top of the back breadth, and still to leave a train. If the wearer wishes to walk in this dress, a number of buttons and loops is placed on the wrong side of the skirt, by which the train is looped so as to form a sort of drapery on the second story of the pouf.

The combination which I have mentioned consists of a skirt no longer than that of the suit, and a waist with very large basques of varied forms, which I shall explain directly, for it is necessary first to describe the skirt. The latter invariably has for the tablier a trimming different from the other breadths. The tablier, by-the-way, in dress-makers' language, is the front breadth of the skirt. The trimming of the tablier is perpendicular, while that of the other breadths is horizontal, and in general very voluminous. The tablier is covered with clusters of folds, which are set on narrow black ribbon, and are repeated two or three times; or else with five separate folds, made singly, and crossed perpendicularly by a narrow bias fold; or with three flat ruches, also set on perpendicularly; or with velvet ribbon, edged on each side with narrow fringe or lace, set on flat. In a word, the trimming of the tablier must be flat and perpendicular. The tablier is always bordered on each side with a bias fold, which at the same time covers the ends of the trimming of the back breadths. This trimming is composed of three or five flounces of a width to suit the taste, or of a number of narrow flounces sufficient to cover the entire skirt, or of puffs, or of ruches more or less wide. When the trimming of the back breadths does not reach to the belt, the waist is made not only with a basque, but also with some sort of a pouf. This pouf is not invariably a simple puff just below the belt: there are very graceful poufs composed only of two very wide sashes, lined with a contrasting color (which reappears again and again in the trimmings of the dress), extending from the basques, and tied at the bottom of the belt in a single very loose bow, the ends of which fall almost to the bottom of the skirt. The lining extends a little beyond the outside, so as to form a border.

I have seen one of these composite costumes, which will serve as a model. Skirt of black faille, with a tablier trimmed with three wide perpendicular folds, edged with a piping of pale blue faille. The back breadths were trimmed with a flounce, piped on the edge with pale blue faille. Above this flounce was a band of black faille, lined with pale blue faille, the lining of which was turned back at regular intervals, and fastened so as to form a kind of triangular pleat. The waist was made with very long basques in front, edged with a band lined with blue faille, and turned back in triangular pleats like that of the skirt. In the back were two enormous sash ends of black faille, lined with pale blue, with the lining projecting so as to form a broad blue border around the ends, which were tied in a single knot without loops, at the bottom of the waist.

When, on the contrary, the skirt is entirely covered with flounces and other trimmings, the waist is made with large round basques, and also with three small rounded basques in the back, which rest on the large basque. These dresses will be worn in the street in the spring without any wrapping, except in case of cold weather, when a pelerine or Dolman of black cashmere, or of white molleton de laine, striped or dotted with a color to correspond with the dress or its trimmings, will be added.

A great many small wrappings, such as mantelets, capes, etc., of black faille or cashmere, lined with bright colors, such as pale blue, pale pink, mauve, or cherry, are in preparation for spring. When the garment has a hood, the lining is always of the same bright color.

Among the ornaments most in use for elegant spring toilettes are buckles of mother-of-pearl, ivory, steel, gilt, or oxidized silver, which, set in the centre of velvet or ribbon bows, are scattered profusely over the dress. These bows are set on each side of the tablier from the top to the bottom, and sometimes also through the middle from the bottom of the skirt to the belt, being graduated, of course, in size, and trim the waist and sleeves. The buckles are square, oblong, and oval; the largest is reserved for the huge bow of the belt, which is worn on all dresses.

Large basques will be very much in vogue during the coming season, but as they are copied from the dress of the Louis Quinze marquises, it is not thought proper to combine with them the huge sleeves of the marchionesses of the same period, and the smaller sleeves of the marquises are preferred. Moiré will be much used for the trimmings of cashmere and faille dresses. I will give an example. Black faille skirt with tablier, striped perpendicularly with narrow bias folds of striped moiré. The tablier is, of course, edged on each side with a similar bias fold. The other breadths are trimmed with the same folds, arranged horizontally, and extending nearly to the waist, being separated by an interval the width of the fold, or about three or, at the most, four fifths of an inch. Basque-waist of black faille, with moiré folds and very large vest, coming far below the waist, made also of black moiré. Half-flowing sleeves with moiré revers.

A very original trimming, devised also for the spring, consists of rather coarse galloon of bise worsted—that is, almost white écru—and used on dark poplin or cashmere dresses. This trimming is arranged in herring-bone fashion on the tablier, and horizontally on the other breadths. These bise galloons are combined with marron, indigo, prune, and bottle green, and produce an effect more singular than pleasing. They are prepared especially with a view to sea-side costumes, which are always more eccentric than those worn in Paris.

For dinners and soirées, which are prolonged here until June, I have seen two novelties. One is a sort of open-work ribbon, made of chenille, and representing trellised foliage supporting shaded roses of natural tints. These ribbons are laid on flat, with gathered Mechlin lace set under the lower edge, and look very pretty on light fabrics, such as vert-d'eau, vert-de-gris, or silver gray. The other novelty is large leaves of black or white jet, sewed on black or white stiff lace, and clustered so as to form an open-work tablier, which is set in the front of the dress. This trimming is very expensive, each leaf costing from six to eight francs.

Another novelty consists of kid vests, made long and without sleeves; for instance, a mordoré kid vest worn over a velvet, or, for spring, a brown faille dress, a black kid vest over a black velvet or faille dress, etc. These vests are buttoned to the throat with marcasite buttons, and lined with buckskin.

Dresses for the country, and for summer in general, will be made of coutil, precisely such as is used for pillows, mattresses, and furniture covers, in the ugliest possible designs. In the hands of skillful dress-makers this will become charming, and will be adopted much more widely by the fashionable exclusives than by the public at large. These coarse coutil dresses will be trimmed with buckles and agrafes of mother-of-pearl or ivory, with buttons to match, and with the galloons of which I have spoken, and together with white piqué dresses will be the rage among the crème de la crème, while they will be disclaimed by the sensible middle classes. Their only value will be the style given them by the fashionable and expensive dress-makers whom the world of fashion delights to patronize.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHILE reading a recently published biography of that celebrated English divine, wit, and humorist, Rev. Sydney Smith, we came across a graphic little picture of tropical life. Though it may be familiar to many of our readers, a fresh reading just at this season may reconcile some grumblers to the biting frosts and heavy snows of the temperate zone, which keep in check some annoyances which never cease in hot climates. Read, and laugh, and be contented:

"Insects are the curse of tropical climates. Flies get entry into your mouth, into your eyes, into your nose; you eat flies, drink flies, and breathe flies. Lizards, cockroaches, and snakes get into your bed; ants eat up the books; scorpions sting you on the foot. Every thing bites, stings, or bruises; every second of your existence you are wounded by some piece of animal life that nobody has ever seen before, except Swammerdam and Meriam. An insect with eleven legs is swimming in your tea-cup, a nondescript with nine wings is struggling in the small-beer, or a caterpillar with several dozen eyes in his belly is hastening over the bread-and-butter! All nature is alive, and seems to be gathering all her entomological hosts to eat you up, as you are standing, out of your coat, waistcoat, and breeches. Such are the tropics."

And if the choice lies between centipedes and snow-banks, we prefer the latter—in moderate doses.

The present collection of water-color drawings on exhibition in the galleries of the National Academy of Design is the largest ever opened in this city. There are over 550 pictures, of which more than 350 are by American artists, and the remainder are examples of English and Continental schools. This "international" exhibition, as it has been called, is an experiment which will doubtless prove advantageous in many respects. It will certainly give the American public an opportunity of becoming somewhat familiar with the English modern water-color school, and enable our artists to avail themselves of the progress which has been made in this art abroad. The collection also contains some fine sketches and etchings in black and white—a branch of the art which is not only popular, but of great practical utility.

Amadeus has not found the throne of Spain a bed of roses, and so he has quietly abandoned it. Nobody could have fancied that Spain was an easy country to govern—it certainly needed a firm, strong, and wise control. Now it remains to be seen what a new government, formed by the republican party, will accomplish for a somewhat turbulent country.

The Sultan of Turkey believes in omens. A new and elegant palace has been recently built for him; but, unfortunately, the first time he entered it he stumbled. So he ordered it to be torn down. However, some of the foreign embassadors advised him to let it remain, and he finally concluded to do so.

An exchange informs us that an intelligent foreigner recently wrote to his home friends that "when a great man dies in the United States, the first thing done is to propose a fine statue in his honor; next, to raise part of the necessary money; next, to forget to order any statue; and last, to wonder what became of the money."

There has been, and still is, great suffering in Ireland from the overflowing of the lakes and rivers. In many villages the humble homes of the inhabitants are completely inundated. Many tenements have been abandoned, while in others a miserable attempt is made to live surrounded by water. No fires blaze on the hearth, but the little cooking is done in a large kettle on the table, where they manage to keep a small fire. Beds are suspended from rafters, boats are used for locomotion, and the poor people have been reduced to a truly pitiable condition. Some practical efforts have been made for their relief by the nobility and others whose sympathies have been awakened.

The latest method of spending the "honey-moon" is reported from Italy. An American recently met at Rome an old school-fellow whom he had not seen for years.

"You here?"

"Yes, my dear fellow; I have just been married, and am come to pass the honey-moon in Italy."

"And your wife?"

"My wife? Oh, I left her in New York!"

The "Old South," of Boston, is completely transformed as to its interior. Pews and pulpit have disappeared, though the great sounding-board still remains. On the west side are arranged the identical letter-boxes which have done good service in other places. The little room behind what was the pulpit is piled with leathern bags; where once was the bell-rope, money-orders may be obtained; where the choir once sang hymns, letter-carriers assort their various letters and papers. The body of the house is, of course, given up to the general work of sorting, distributing, and making up the mails. The upper galleries constitute a dressing-room for the government employés. The postmaster's private rooms—very pleasant and cozy—are on the second floor of the north side addition. Seldom has a building undergone such a thorough change in so short a time.

The Local Government Board of London has recently appointed a lady as "Poor-law Inspector," at a salary of £400 a year. Her duty is to report upon the domiciles and the treatment of children who are "boarded out."

A statue of Elias Howe, inventor of the sewing-machine, has been modeled by Ellis, the sculptor, and sent to Philadelphia to be cast in bronze. It will probably be placed in the Central Park early in the summer. The work is eight feet high, and the figure stands erect, the right hand holding a walking-stick, and the left a broad-brimmed hat. Mr. Ellis is now engaged in modeling three bass-reliefs which are to adorn the pedestal. One of these will illustrate the condition of the needle-woman before the invention of sewing-machines; the second represents Mr. Howe in his workshop, pondering over his first machine; and the third will indicate the easy manipulation of the perfected instrument.

On the summit of the Sierra Nevada range a rare gem has been found, something in appearance like a ruby, and yet so differing that it is believed to be a stone unknown to lapidaries. The owner, a Mr. Stewart, picked it up from the surface gravel in a ravine. The stone is surrounded by a ring of white stone of peculiar formation. The gem, or central stone, is about the size of a ten-cent piece, while the whole specimen is about the size of a half dollar. This stone, being viewed through a powerful glass, shows the most wonderful rays of light, with specks of gold and silver. It is said that three other stones of the same kind are in the possession of the Indians of that region, who regard them as talismans, and refuse to part with them for any price.

